"I can not understand your communion with spirits, dear Leonore. I love the world and its scenes of beauty and grandeur, but these wild dreams of thine will never bring happiness, my cousin, and are we not forbidden intercourse with spirits? Beware, Leonore, how you speak of such; but your cheeks are pale and your eyes wild; come, 'tis long past the noon of night, and see, your peerless model, the moon, has turned her regal footsteps to a place of rest, come down and tell me again of the wedding of the sea, and that young cavalier of Rome. Ah, Leonore, your blushing cheek betrays the magic power of his spirit over thine! Come cousin and tell me of him," and she laid her hand on Leonore's arm, and looked persuasively into her face.

"Not yet, Fidele; leave me to myself—I will come soon."

"Well, be it so, Leonore, but these wild dreams and vigils will bring you no good," and the maiden looked sadly on her for a moment, and then reluctantly left the balcony.

"Yes, she speaks truly, there is a power in his spirit over mine, so strong that his name will call me back from all these dreams which have been the happiness of my life, and why is this? because he can understand and feel with me;—but 'tis time he were here," and turning to a flight of steps opposite those by which Fidele had gone down, she hastily left the tower, and stood alone on a balcony at the foot, that overhung the river. It was situated behind the tower, and thus screened from observation on all sides but from the river and the door that led from the main building to it. The moon had sunk too low to shed much light upon it, but the stars guided a rival to their worshipper. She stood in the dim light, and looked anxiously up and down the river. This was the spot where she had promised to meet Stephano, when she parted with him on the balcony in Venice. After a few moments, the soft dash of a muffled oar was heard, the sound came nearer and nearer and ceased beneath the balcony. "Leonore," whispered a voice. "I am here, Stephano," was the joyful reply, but in the same subdued accents. The next moment he had sprung to the balcony and clasped her to his heart.

"How shall I thank thee, my own Leonore!"

"Have not I too been wretched? I need no thanks, Stephano, for what affords me so much happiness."

"You are indeed pale, my own love—dare I hope my absence alone has stolen the roses from thy cheeks!"

"In part, Stephano," she replied smiling faintly, "but alas! there is great evil in store for us—for the last week there has been a tall, dark looking stranger with my father, and I have continually found their eyes fixed upon me, and to-day my father told me the council of ten had solicited my hand in marriage for the Count Eccelino Di Romagna, and" he added, "it is my pleasure, that you refuse not."

"Leonore! can this be true? does your father know the character of Count Eccelino! and he is a Ghibeline!"

"Yes, Stephano, I have often heard him speak bitter words against Eccelino, but my father seems under some mysterious influence. He is gloomy and often harsh even to me whom he once idolized," and those beautiful eyes filled with tears.

"And what said you, Leonore, to this proposal?"

"I can not wed Count Eccelino, my father."

"He looked sternly on me and said, 'Remember the council of ten have made the demand, Princess.'

"And what," said I, "what right have they to require this of Azzo D'Este? I knew not they had the power to bestow the hand of a princess of Ferrara in marriage!"

"And my father's cheek flushed, and then grew pale as he answered:

"They have the means to enforce the demand, and you, Leonore, ere many days pass, will thank them for it; life is dear to thee," and he looked sadly on me and left me. "Oh! Stephano, what means it all!" and she wept bitterly as she leaned on his shoulder.

"Alas! I can not tell thee, my own Leonore, but fear not beloved, my heart and sword are with thee now, and naught shall harm thee; should they persist the world is before us, and thou would'st not hesitate to fly with me, Leonore! Hast thou forgotten thy promise in the balcony at Venice?"

And again that voice there heard, breathed out clearly and distinctly in the quiet night.

"Hast thou forgotten the warning that followed and the course then pointed out to thee?"

With a faint shriek the maiden clung to her lover—all was still around them, and after a few moments they again conversed, but their tones and words were full of sorrow.

"Ah! Stephano, leave me, our hearts can never be united, there is a dark fate woven out for me, leave me and be happy."

"Leave thee! and be happy, Leonore?" said he in tones of the deepest reproach. "Did'st thou know how I have been tempted to this but a few nights since, thou could'st then feel how impossible happiness is without thee!"

"Tempted to forsake me! how! by whom, Stephano?"

"By one who rules the higher spirits, Leonore; he showed me wondrous things, and our glorious dreams realized, but bade me relinquish thy love, or such joys could never be mine."

"And thou did'st refuse?"

"Had I not, would I now be here?"

"Oh! Stephano, return to him and obey his dictates, I will not be a fetter to bind thy soul to earth, and thou seest how darkness encompasses our love. Go thou into the clearer light, and one day, perhaps thou may'st bless the hapless Leonore by guiding her to it. I will be thy pupil, since fate denies us the boon of love."

"Never, Leonore; wilt thou renounce me? thou hast said, thine forever and only, Stephano. Wilt thou break this pledge? Oh! Leonore when the magician showed me wisdom, immortality and youth eternal, and then thy pure and trusting love, I yielded not to the temptation but clung to thee, and canst thou forsake me so willingly?"

"No, Stephano, no, my heart is still thine; but can I defy fate? Shall I dare transgress its commands? Oh! add not to the gloom and sorrow of my breaking heart a doubt of the fervor of my love, and its devotion to you; I will seek refuge in a convent's cloisters and devote a life of which I am weary to prayers for you."

"Nay, fly with me, Leonore, to other scenes where our innocent dreams of a nobler destiny, and our higher purposes and aims, may not debar us from love. We will commune with spirits and learn their lore, but not abandon love. Love will but give us strength to learn the more, and sweet 'twill be to tread the paths of knowledge with united hearts and minds attuned to each other: consent, my Leonore; I will guard thee and guide; no storm of woe shall ever ruffle the leaves of the gentle flower that seeks refuge in my bosom. But the sunshine of love and the dews of affection shall nourish it and preserve it forever—wilt thou go with me, my Leonore!"

The lovers were absorbed in their sweet and mournful communings, or they might have heard the stealthy footsteps that approached the angle of the tower during their last words.

"Heard'st thou that, Prince Azzo, he urges her to fly with him to hold communion with noble spirits and together they will learn their lore, and hear her answer," said a tall figure wrapped in a rich cloak of velvet.

"I will, Stephano, if my father urges this marriage more, I will fly with thee, and thou shalt teach me all the strange lessons thou hast learned. I too have outwatched the stars with my lone vigils and thirsted to taste the forbidden waters of knowledge; but wait a few days, mine own love, I cannot believe my father will force me to this marriage, and I would not willingly leave him thus, who has ever been devoted to me."

"Have not the council justice on their side, most noble Prince, when they accuse thy daughter of dealing with forbidden subjects, and should'st thou not thank them and the noble Count Eccelino that they are willing to save her from merited death?"

"Stranger, who callest thyself Count Gianetto, art thou a father?"

"No."

"Then my appeal will be in vain, but thou could'st induce the council to believe the statements they have heard were false, and spare me my child: heard'st thou not her last words? Oh! rich would be thy reward for this service," and the Prince looked imploringly on the stern dark countenance of him who stood before him, and Fabricio—his purpose wavered, but his countenance changed not. "Eccelino has paid me well and will again, and yonder cavalier has mocked my arts by refusing the temptations I offered—no, no, I must on with this work." Thus thought the magician, and he answered:

"Prince Azzo, I cannot aid thee thus, for the Count Eccelino has himself heard like words pass between them in the balcony of the ducal palace the night before you left Venice, and he has told the council, and neither he nor they will swerve from their purpose. The Princess Leonore must be the bride of death or of the Count Eccelino!"

Azzo's face darkened, and he asked, "Who is yon cavalier?"

"Stephano Colonna."

Prince Azzo made a step forward, but Gianetto seized his arm, and said:

"You will mar all, let us away, see they look around."

"And leave yon cavalier to tempt my child to flight?"

"Fear not, I will watch his movements," and silently they withdrew, leaving the unconscious lovers in fancied security. * * *

The stars were paling before the roseate blush of the coming morn, when Stephano pressed Leonore to his heart with a few fervent words of parting, and dropping from the balcony was gone. As the Princess entered the palace she met her father.

"I came but now from your chamber, Leonore, and your pillow has not been pressed this night, why is this?"

"I have been most of the night on the top of the tower, father, and the beauty of the sky made me forgetful of sleep."

"And the pallor of your cheek—Has parting with your lover naught to do with it? or is it too but the effect of your lonely vigil?"

Leonore's cheek grew crimson, and then pale, as she answered:

"Oh, my father, forgive us, do not urge this marriage with Eccelino, it is your child, father, who pleads for exemption from misery. Colonna is noble, and he has never wronged our house; will you not hear the prayer of your only child, your loved Leonore?"

"The council have demanded your hand in marriage for Eccelino, to save you from death: death you have deserved by dealing with forbidden spirits. The Count has knowledge of your guilt, but he too would spare you. Should not gratitude to them fill your heart?"

"My father, this is but some wicked device of that atrocious Count to place me in his power; I am innocent, Oh! believe it and spare your child!"

"Leonore, I have this night heard words which confirm these statements, pass between you and Colonna, and Count Gianetto, too, has heard them, I can not save you if I would."

"Father, father, my words were guiltless as have been my actions, I spake but of my dreams. Oh! must these bring on me a frightful death, or a life of misery? Holy Mother, thou know'st my innocence, oh pity and save thy child!" And she knelt with streaming eyes and clasped hands beside her father.

Count Azzo gently raised her, and pressing her to his bosom said, "May thy prayers be heard my erring child;" his voice trembled, and putting her from him he hastened away.

MUSINGS.

BY DR. JOHN C. McCABE.

How beautiful she looks! Her hair is parted
O'er a sweet forehead, calm, and passing fair;
Her smile bespeaks her pure and gentle hearted,
And a young bosom free from every care.

Her eye is very soft, and almost saintly,
Her voice is like the far off touching tone
Of midnight lute, when trembling wild, and faintly,
It breaks upon the wearied pilgrim lone.

At eventide, no more I'll wander sadly,
Nor gaze at night upon the stars alone;
For she is at my side, whose spirit gladly
Mingles with mine, and makes my thoughts its own.

Her brow, o'er which her beauteous locks are braided,
Like rich ripe clusters from the teeming vine;
Shall never more by sorrow's clouds be shaded,
My weal be her's, and woe, if any—mine!

God! may our days pass on as soft, as brightly,
As love, and hope, and peace can make them glide;
May our life's barque float on as sweet, as lightly,
As flowers, cast upon a silvery tide.

And oh! let no sad dreams of death e'er darken
The vision of our bliss, our dream of love;
But to Thy voice may we meekly hearken,
Live happy here, and live with Thee above.

SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY.

Cui Bono?

BY THE REV. W. CAREY CRANE.

There is much that passes for philosophy which is mere theory, and yet more which is naught else but speculation. Some moon-struck visionary fancies that he has arrived at the "ultima thule" of all profound logic, and with a bravery which would face any thing but danger, he challenges the world to a logomachy. His theory he would establish by skill in words. Another luckless wight abstracts himself from the world, forgetting its ways and always ignorant of the book of common sense, and imagines that he is a philosopher, because, forsooth, he does not think as do other men. He forgets that he has cut the cord of sympathy which binds man to man. He does not think with other men, because he does not feel with them; he thinks above them, his philosophy is abstraction run mad, logic on stilts. I hear such men, under the Carlyle mania, exclaim, "There lies the heroic Promised Land; under that heaving light, my brethren, bloom the happy isles—there, O, there! Thither will we;

"There dwells the great Achilles whom we knew;"

There dwell all heroes and will dwell; thither, all ye heroic minded!" "The choking nightmare chokes us no longer, for we stir under it; the nightmare has already fled." From such philosophers, reverently be it said, "Good Lord! deliver us."

Speculative philosophy may be distinguished from practical philosophy, inasmuch as it is purely mental, while yet it does not develope, nor discuss the power of mind. Practical philosophy scans mental operations, probes moral feelings, prys into nature's secrets, applies mind to matter, changes the forms of things, and is thus a benefactor. To this, let Newton and Franklin, Laplace and Bowditch testify. But shall it be said, that speculative philosophy is uninfluential and useless because it is not Benthamite? By no means. There is nothing without utility which gives range to thought and adds power to intellect. But it may well be urged against the "thousand and one" theories and fancies which literature has called philosophy, "Cui Bono?"

Let us call up a few of these systems and press his question. The statement of the principles of each system will be the best mode of applying the question and will serve every useful purpose without an application.

Among the ancients, the Aristotelian philosophy held a distinguished place. It described virtue as consisting in the medium between two extremes, position, as says Dr. Wardlaw, which is extremely vague and absolutely defines nothing. The doctrine of the Peripatetics placed all virtue in a medium between opposite vices, a theory, without doubt, suggested by the Platonic representation of the necessity of keeping up the harmony between the various parts of our natures. The Academics differed but little indeed from the Peripatetics. Arcesilas, Camenides and others as widely differed upon all these subjects. Each of these systems was exploded in turn, for how was it possible to draw that medium line between virtue and vice? The definition was more indefinite than the thing to be defined.

The stoical system of the school of Zeno represented virtue or moral rectitude as consisting in our "living according to nature." Some interpreted the definition as meaning "according to the nature of things in general." Others interpreted it "according to the nature of man." Zeno taught that there is only one substance in the universe, part active and part passive. He also argued against the undeniable truth, that matter is capable of motion. An arrow, he alleged, filled every moment a space equal to itself, consequently must always be at rest; if it were to move from that place, it would be in two places at the same time, therefore motion would be impossible.

Warburton, the author of the "Divine Legation of Moses," compared the three principal schools of antiquity, those of Zeno, Aristotle and Plato, to the systems of modern times, of "the moral sense," "arbitrary will" and "essential differences." If either the ancient or the modern theories have much improved mankind, the facts should be forthcoming to demonstrate it.

The main principle of the Atomical philosophy was that all things are composed of extremely minute particles, a theory which does not differ greatly, if at all, from the systems of Natural Philosophy of the present age. The Cyrenaic school held tenets favorable to luxury, unfriendly to virtue and destructive of the welfare of society. Both of these schools corresponded to the system of Hobbes of later times, regarding virtue and vice as mere arbitrary distinctions, depending upon the will of the magistrate and the authority of human enactments. The Epicureans considered happiness as the end of our being, which consisted in living as free as possible from the evils incident to life, and in the enjoyment of as large a measure of its good things as practicable. The chief point of Epicurean ethics was that a steady course of virtue produces the greatest amount of pleasure and real happiness of which human nature is capable. It was devoid of the "honestum" of Cicero, the rectitude or approbation of which, in our minds, was independent of consequences, whether painful or pleasant. This scheme, as is well known, ultimately degenerated into mere animal pleasure and unrestrained sensuality. At its best estate, it was a mere modification of Atheism, for the nature and superintendence of Providence were denied in the consideration of present results.

The Pythagorean philosophy rose above creature thoughts. The existence of one God, incorruptible and invisible, the transmigration of souls, the relationship between God and men, were taught as fundamental truths. Some men of distinction, Gale among them, contend that the tracks and footsteps of the theocracy and spiritual economy of Moses may be seen in several parts of the doctrines of Pythagoras.

Among all of the human race, whose names and principles are now all that mortals know of them, may be placed Socrates, a name, high on "The unmouldering pillar of fame."

Feeling that the divinity stirred within him, he taught his followers to contemplate the starry heavens, to study their own passions, faculties, opinions and actions. In the spirit of a heaven-descended philosophy, he acknowledged that the sum of all his knowledge was "that he knew nothing." It was not necessary that such a man should write books, for he wrote none: upon the tablet of mind, he inscribed his immortal principles to become the common heritage of men. How sublime is his last allusion to the greatest of all his principles. His friends had gathered around him, as the executioner tendered him the poisoned chalice, and besieged him with questions concerning the disposition of his body. Said the dying Philosopher, "You may bury or burn my body, if you do not think you bury or burn Socrates."

That Socrates taught a practical philosophy, who will deny; but that all that was practical and superhuman in it was derived from revelation, who will fail of perceiving?

Plato was the adumbration of Socrates. Wherein his philosophy differs from his master, it goes beyond him and agrees with the Hebrew theology. Frankly he confesses that the Greeks borrowed their knowledge of the one infinite God, from a people, ancient, better and nearer to God than themselves. His account of man's primeval innocence, birth from the earth, state of nakedness and paradisaical condition, is a transcript of the sacred original.

The Cynics, of whom Diogenes of "tub memory" was one, contemned all external things, riches and worldly pomp, the arts and sciences, excepting a moral life. They barked at all the bad and fawned upon the good.

The Sceptics were also called Pyrrhonists, after Pyrrho their founder. Their whole creed consisted in doubting every thing, affirming nothing at all, and in keeping the judgment in suspense upon every subject. It will therefore appear, from this slight detail of the principles of ancient philosophy, that wherever it has been practical, it has abandoned speculation and based its reasonings upon admitted facts in nature, or has borrowed from the brilliant light of divine revelation. Has modern philosophy speculated to better advantage? Without pretending to name all the theories, let us review a few of the more prominent.

Des Cartes adopted the doubting principle of Socrates and Plato, as to the incomprehensibility of truth. Was there ever a theory more beautifully poetical and amusing, than his theory of the soul's location? That part of the brain called by Anatomists the pineal gland, was the immediate receptacle of the soul, where it is affected by all sorts of perceptions and exerts all its operations by the intercourse of the animal spirits, which run through the nerves of the body. If our souls could but pass into the pineal glands of other men, and, being thus situated, we could become spectators of the origin, evolutions and involutions of the ideas in their minds, can mortal man imagine the vast improvement of the immortal mind? Much as has been said of labor-saving machines in mechanical philosophy, what would be all human inventions compared with this saving to the intellect? Long and tedious college courses would not be needed; an hour would suffice to pass through whole courses of classical and professional study, located in the pineal gland of a Wayland or a Dew, a Robinson or an Alexander, a Story or a Tucker, a Chapman or a Bell. What endless stores of amusement and instruction could be acquired in passing our time in the souls of poets and philosophers, mathematicians and linguists, beaux and belles, Statesmen and generals. Calculus, with all its intricate labyrinths of reasoning, might be the pastime of a moment, and the "Mecanique Celeste" would be the recreation of an idle hour. Delighted, we might wander through the perfumed groves of the East, or walk, in calm composure, upon enamelled meadows, without moving one foot. Wonderful philosophy! too beautiful to be true, too unreal to be human. To be present during a battle, or when a storm raged, and yet receive none of the showers of either bullets or rain, how surpassingly strange; who that loves glory would doubt? But we must doubt and press the inquiry, Cui bono? Malebranche proved the existence of a God, the corruption of human nature by sin, and the necessity of a Mediator. In other respects, his doctrines were ill-grounded, dangerous and destructive to religion. In some points they correspond with Cartesianism, which met with much opposition from French authors and from Locke.

Among the theories of German philosophers, the system of preëstablished harmony, originating with Leibnitz, is both curious and impracticable. It maintained that the soul and body were two distinct substances, having no influence upon one another.

that the soul is a spiritual substance, receiving all its ideas and perceptions without the agency of the body, and that the body is a machine like a clock, which produces all its motions in succession, without any manner of influence from the soul! It was also contended that God so arranged these substances, from the beginning, that all the resolutions of the soul would harmonize with those of the body. But suppose, (which is not unlikely to suppose,) that the body were so deranged as not to harmonize with the soul, then the body would no more belong to the soul of man, than the soul of man would belong to the body of a Rhinoceros. Suppose, too, that God had adjusted the body of an Elephant to the soul of a man, so that the powers of the one and the determinations of the other, should harmonize. The moment, therefore, that soul willed that the Elephant's foot should be raised, it would be raised and thus a human soul and a brute's body would be conjoined. Such a theory tallies very closely with transmigration. Cui bono?

England has furnished its full share of systems. Not among the least of its great ones, who boasted themselves philosophers, were Hume and Berkeley. The gist of their theory was to disbelieve the existence of the world and all that is supposed to be in the universe, except the visionary things, termed by them "ideas." If Hume had aught else worthy the name of a theory, it was borrowed from Jeremy Bentham.

How shall we judge of the philosophy of France? It was demoniacal speculation and frightful ruin. Reason, the ruler of men! and all men theophanthropists!! Let the guillotine and suicide, rapine and murder, incest and debauchery, the 6,000 divorces granted in a single year in Paris, teach us how laleful was French philosophy, assuming the province of religion.

Scepticism and impracticability pervade the mysticism of Kant, the theories of Idealists and Realists, Naturalists and Supernaturalists, Neologists and Nominalists. How much better have been the various vagaries which have prevailed extensively through the civilized world, and have tended to break up the bonds of union and dissolve society into its original elements of confusion? Hutcheson rested his moral system on what he called the "moral sense." Cudworth defended intuitive intellect and the eternal fitness of things, and he was unstained by Clarke and Price. Adam Smith, in his system of the "Moral Sentiments," maintained that we judge of the actions of others by a direct, and of our own, by a reflex sympathy. It may be inquired how much have these theories accomplished, apart from the teaching of the sacred original. If these statements of the principles of many philosophers be true, is it not clear, that wherein they are speculative, they are useless; wherein they are useful and have accomplished good, the honor is due not to them, but to the truths of inspiration! Those systems of morals and intellect only have elevated man, which have harmonized with natural theology, and the practical divinity of the two testaments of eternal love.—Philosophy, is not fanciful, but real; not atheistical, but devout; not sceptical, but firm in faith; not temporal, but eternal. To every scheme, unlike such an emanation of the immortal intellect, let us manfully oppose the key note of this article, Cui Bono?

"Baptized in the pure fount of celestial love,"

Cautiously abstaining from reflections upon the giant minds of Dugald Stewart and Locke, Brown and Payne, Reid and Bacon; for so to do would be likened to an attempt to thrash down the Peaks of Otter with a rye-straw; it yet may be questioned whether the speculative, in their systems, does not take precedence of the practical. In the battles of mind, they have fought for a theory. The world has looked on in wonder. The pugilism of philosophy! how all real battles of cannon and small arms, broad swords and lances, battles fought, likewise, to defend a theory, dwindle when compared with it! Tell us, ye who would be philosophers, if it is in the power of mind to grasp infinity. If mind cannot, it is not derogatory to our immortality to conclude, that not until all that is now finite has become infinite, will man have arrived at the goal of all true knowledge, so well expressed in the language of a wise man of antiquity, "Know thyself."

THE STARS.

How ye are softly fair!

Pale watchers of the night,

That through the misty air

Stream tremulous and bright;

Ye reign upon each distant throne,

Undying in your beauty and alone.

Star! mysteries are thine.

The lowly sons of earth

Their destinies entwine,

With you who watch their birth;

And deem their poor mortality,

Demands a guardian fate as bright as ye.

And in the deep midnight,

When hushed are earth and sky,

Your pale and trembling light

Seems fraught with destiny;

And thrills the bosom with a force,

That swells resistless to our being's source.

Ye bright eternal fires,
Lit by the holy spark,
That your dull mass inspires,
Ye are hung up to mark,
To chronicle the flight of time,
As ye glow on, eternal and sublime.

And ye have baffled well
The students of the earth,
Who would from you compel
The secrets of your birth;
Upon each gazing eye, your beams
Impenetrable look, and mock its dreams.

For science has not yet
Divested you of grace,
Nor made us quite forget,
From uncreated space,
Your lustre falling, fills our hearts
With all the rapture poetry imparts.

The works of man soon die,
His empires pass away,
But in you vaulted sky,
Ye burn without decay;
And on the earth your glories shed,
Regardless of the living or the dead.

Bright to the last, your fire
Shall be the torch to light
The earth unto her pyre,
When round her latest night,
The gath'ring horrors thickly grow,
Announcing to her creatures death and woe.

Your cold and feeble light
Has lit the gory plain,
When, past the madding fight,
The stiff'ning victims strain
With glazing eyes and bosom's swell,
To take of earth and you a last farewell.

Alas! thou starry heav'n!
Upon thy face what eyes
Have turned to be forgiv'n,
When in the agonies
Of nature's death, th' expiring brain
Grows cold upon the couch or battle plain.

Impartial, ye unfold
Your splendors on each toy,
Unsympathising, cold,
With misery or joy;
Your twinklings seem almost to sneer,
Upon the trifles that amuse us here.

And ye, when years have swept
Man from the earth away,
With all he loved and wept,
Will still your rays display,
And stretching through the future shine,
A mystery, a wonder, and a sign.

Of you we nothing know,
We see your light, and feel
With you a kindred glow;
And when the grave shall seal
Upon our corse, we shall know nought,
Impassive to thy beams and fancy's thought.

PLINY THE YOUNGER.

The private letters of two distinguished men, Cicero and Pliny the younger, have descended to us as part of Rome's classical literature. Both collections are valuable and interesting, but differ widely in merit, as might be expected from the different positions and abilities of the writers. Cicero's correspondence was extensive and diversified, embracing almost every variety of character and rank from the dictator Cæsar to the freedman Tura, from Cato and Marcellus to Antony and the infamous Vatinius. He was an actor in the troubled scenes of that important era; and his comments on the changes in public affairs, and the conduct and motives of the directing spirits of the revolution, have the authority of an eye-witness, and display the deep sagacity of his powerful mind. His own character is presented with such singular frankness that we can distinctly trace his virtues and failings, his wisdom and weakness, his tastes and prejudices, his devoted patriotism and selfish ambition, his occasional great energy of purpose and his timid and vacillating resolutions and inconsistent policy. His letters are all spirited and natural, and bear the impress of the circumstances under which they were written, exhibiting in varied succession confiding friendship, petulant complaints and recriminations, generous forbearance, or dignified self-vindication, and the cold civility of the well-bred man of the world. Hence, to the student of history and the philosophic observer of human nature, they form the most valuable collection of letters ever published.

The letters of Pliny are far inferior, whether as to the positiveness of historical facts, or a display of intellect and character. This must be ascribed to several causes. In the first place, the circumstances under which he wrote were widely different. The republic was long since extinct; and the manly independence nourished by it had given place to courtly subservience and adulation. Trajan was a benevolent prince but a stern ruler, who guarded his prerogative with jealousy, and exacted implicit submission from all; and Pliny was too good a courtier to risk his favor by unnecessary freedom of speech or gratuitous interference in political matters. It is not strange, therefore, that his correspondence should contain few references to public affairs; and perhaps it was his taste as well as prudence which led him to entertain his friends with literary and critical disquisitions, essays on oratory and elocution, sentimental morality on common-place topics, and long descriptions of beautiful villas, written with a tedious display of architectural science. Moreover, his intellect was by no means of the highest order, though possessing considerable vigor and activity; and his love of fine writing, which seems to pervade every sentence he has written, impedes the easy and natural flow of his pen, giving an artificial and studied air to the whole. Nor can we trust his facts implicitly when he speaks of himself; for he revised and published his own letters, which were probably written with that view originally: and it is not unfair to suppose him exhibited in a better light than that in which an impartial biographer would represent him. For the egotism of publishing his private correspondence he alleges the solicitations of friends,—that common resource of vanity, ambitious of display, yet wishing to seem modest. But in reading his letters carefully, it is hard to believe that they were not written for publication; and we are almost led to suspect that in some instances they were never actually sent, or intended to be sent, to the persons whose names they bear, but were composed on fictitious occasions merely to introduce some moral or sentimental reflections, or some incident which might display his character and principles in a favorable light. Certain it is, that they bear all the marks of having been written with as much care as ever Horace Walpole could have bestowed on his, of whom Lord Dover tells that he prepared anecdotes long beforehand, and kept them to be inserted in his correspondence as suitable occasions arose. It would be idle then to look in Pliny's letters for the same unaffected naïveté as in those of Cicero; but the loss is of less moment, as his feelings and character, even if fairly portrayed, would be far less worthy of study than those of his great countryman.

Montaigne says in one of his essays, "We find in the writings of Cicero and of that Pliny who, in my opinion, possessed little of his uncle's spirit, numberless proofs of inordinate ambition; among others, that they besought the historians of their time, as all the world knows, not to forget them in their annals; and fortune, as if in spite, has preserved to our day these petitions of vanity, while the histories themselves have utterly perished. But this exceeds all meanness of spirit in men of such rank—they sought to draw distinguished fame from their familiar chat and idle gossipings, and for this purpose even descended to employ private letters written to their friends."* Montaigne errs in one particular. Cicero's letters were not published by himself, nor till long after his death; and there is not a shadow of reason to suppose they were written for publication. But in other respects the critic is correct in his facts, whatever justice there may be in the severity of his censure. The historian of whom Pliny made his modest request was Tacitus: the one selected by Cicero was Luceius, a man who might have been of fame in his day, but who is now unknown except as a correspondent of Cicero.

Pliny's letters have merits to recommend them, however, though his mind was of an humbler caste than Cicero's, and the subjects of his correspondence of a less interesting character. He was well acquainted with the better society of Rome, and his observation was quick and attentive. He had received an excellent education; his reading was extensive; and in literary matters his taste and judgment were, in general, correct. His style is somewhat epigrammatic and antithetical, but neat and perspicuous, and when occasionally ambiguous or obscure, it seems to result less from any indistinctness in his perceptions than from a wish to employ pretty and recherché modes of expression. As a writer he exhibited the characteristics of his age, of which Lord Bacon says, "Somewhat less objectionable, but not free from vanity, is another style which commonly follows that florid rhetorical exuberance just described. Its characteristics are pointed words, concise expressions and periods rather prettily turned than flowing and full; and the effect of this artificial construction is to make the ideas presented seem more ingenious than they really are. It is found in Seneca to great excess, and to an inferior degree in Tacitus and Pliny the Younger; nor is it of late altogether strange to English ears. The style we speak of is apt to captivate moderate intellects, as seeming to confer a certain dignity on letters; but better judgments very properly despise it. And indeed it must be considered as a sort of distemper in learning, when the writer's care and ingenuity are expended on words and polished periods."*

Allied to the vicious taste from which this style proceeded, but displayed in augmented measure, and combined with intellectual indolence from which it arose and which, in turn, it fostered, was that which led to the multiplication of epitomes and compends designed to supersede larger and better treatises; and the evil increasing through successive centuries, gave a sort of encyclopædic character to literature,* by which a superficial knowledge of many branches was acquired with less labor than ought to have been bestowed on any one; a character accompanying, and in part producing, that gradual decline of learning which resulted in the total extinction of genius during the long night of the middle ages.

It is to the credit of Pliny's discernment that he saw the evil tendency of this sententious and artificial brevity, and from more than one letter it appears that his influence had been exerted to counteract it.

His letters contain much curious and some useful information, and interest us by exhibiting the customs, and manners, and minor moralities of his age. His views of social duty and the obligations of charity were judicious and even delicate; and he sometimes surprises us with sentiments which have almost a christian complexion. But of that deeper philosophy which, in the absence of revelation, seeks to develop the attributes of the Deity from the works of creation and the moral constitution of man, his letters afford few or no traces. Nor does it appear that his thoughts were ever much turned to the probability of a future existence, the only immortality he seems to have hoped for, being that immortality of fame to which he aspired so fondly. Yet in one of his letters, he considers it an excellent rule to live always as we would wish to have lived when in the near prospect of death.

His character, as we gather it from his correspondence, was a highly estimable one. His heart was kind and liberal, and his ample fortune enabled him to be a munificent patron of merit or genius. Among others, Martial and Quintilian partook of his bounty; and he had good taste enough to temper the obligations conferred with becoming delicacy. In pecuniary dealings his conduct was governed by correct and honorable principles. As an advocate he was highly distinguished, and his labors in many cases certainly, and perhaps in most, were bestowed gratuitously. He was for the most part gentle and liberal in scanning the conduct of others;† and often praised lavishly and with too little discrimination, for which his friends sometimes reproved him. The reasons he gives in excuse are characteristic, mingling an ingenious policy with that charitable judgment which seems to have been the unaffected impulse of his benevolent heart—that if the friends he praised were inferior to himself, his own merits were more commended; and if superior, it was best to rank them as high as possible that ampler room might thus be left for his own praises. His moral character was virtuous on the whole; but it must be admitted, on his own confession, that his life was not wholly pure from the vices of youth. His friends often censured his practice of writing immodest epigrams; in justification of which he urged the example of Catullus, Calvus and others, whose verses were as bad or worse than his own. It may be doubted, however, whether his vanity, leading him to imitate even the blemishes of those distinguished poets, was not more in fault than a vicious imagination. His letters are untainted with the immorality in question. Among his correspondents we find Tacitus, Suetonius and other literary men; and by their advice he was induced to undertake historical composition, but his works of that character have perished. He had some pretensions to taste in statuary and the fine arts; cultivated oratory assiduously; composed many verses, but of not much merit, if we may judge from the few specimens preserved in his letters, though he tells us with much self-complacency that certain Greeks learnt Latin merely for the pleasure of singing his songs; and sometimes he described quite vividly such natural phenomena as arrested his notice, occasionally offering explanations which indicate a prompt and observant but hardly a deep or philosophic curiosity. He was with his uncle at Misenum when the celebrated eruption of Vesuvius occurred, by which Pompeii and Herculaneum were destroyed; and when the energetic old man set forth to visit the burning mountain, he gave his nephew leave to accompany him; but the young gentlemen's love of study, which was most exemplary just then, curbed his ardor and kept him from taking part in the perilous enterprise. In mature life he was honored with Trajan's friendship, and by his favor was raised to some of the most important offices of the empire; and his letters to the emperor, while Governor of Bythia, though written in a strain of courtly subservience and adulation, display respectable talents for civil business. In stature he was small, and fastidious and aristocratic in his feelings and associations.

* Hallam's Lit. Hist. Europe. ch. 1. Hallam says that Isidore of Seville spoke of Cicero's and Quintilian's rhetorical works as too voluminous to be read.

In short, he was by profession a courtier and an advocate, and after his fashion, a philosopher, historian, poet, moralist, rhetorician, critic and virtuoso, but a dilettante and half a coxcomb in all; yet whatever his other accomplishments, he had certainly the merit of being a lively and agreeable though affected correspondent, and, as Dr. Johnson said of the poet Somerville, wrote very well for a gentleman.

The letters now offered in an English dress have been selected without much deliberation; but it is hoped the reader will find them not wholly uninteresting. The translation is perhaps somewhat free; and indeed the inverted and elliptical structure of the Latin forbids any attempt at a literal version; but the meaning has been preserved in general with sufficient accuracy. In some cases it is fully presented in fewer words than the original contains—for the English possesses at need great compressibility,—but for the most part the translation is more diffuse, as every such translation must be if it represents the author in tolerable English with any approach to fidelity. Still, it might have been brought nearer the original in spirit and exact meaning by repeated revisions; but the improvement, in the translator's opinion at least, would not repay the labor. Some liberties have been taken in rendering phrases for which our language affords no equivalent expressions; but such cases, when the subject seemed to require it, are indicated by brief notes.

The translation being designed merely to amuse the general reader, and not to assist the scholar in his studies, no effort has been made to collate different editions and compare various readings; a task which the want of facilities would render almost impracticable in this country, and of which, if executed, the benefit would be scarcely appreciable except by practised adepts. The edition used by the translator is the small Leipsic one, without notes or various readings, from the press of Tauchnitz. Nor has any arrangement of the letters been attempted, beyond occasionally placing those together which have some similarity of subject; for the originals are without date and arranged with no reference to the order of time, as the author tells us in his preface,—thus showing that disregard of chronology which is so great a defect in most of the historical works left us by the ancients. The selection exhibits, on the whole, considerable variety, and some of the letters are important for the information they give, as that relating to the Christians and those describing the eruption of Vesuvius and the elder Pliny's death; and imaginative writers, it is hoped, will be pleased with his fish and his ghost story at least.

TO SENECIO.

The present year has given birth to a numerous progeny of poets. Throughout the month of April, scarce a day passed without a recitation. It is gratifying to me that literature is so much cultivated, and that men of genius thus come forward to display themselves; but the concourse of auditors is neither large nor zealous. Many of those invited remain idle in their places and pass the time in telling anecdotes, requiring to be informed from time to time whether the reader has entered, concluded his address, or despatched any considerable part of the poem. At length they make their appearance tardily and reluctantly; nor yet will remain, but depart before the conclusion, some by stealth and silently, others carelessly and openly. It is said that Claudius Cæsar, as our fathers remember, was walking in his palace, when he heard a noise without and inquired the cause; and being told that Nonianus was reciting, he went suddenly and unexpectedly to take his place among the audience. But now even the idlest man among us, though invited long before and again reminded, either neglects to come, or else complains that the day is lost, because, in point of fact, it is not lost but improved. Authors, however, deserve more praise if they have the resolution to compose and recite notwithstanding the indolence or disrespect of their auditors. For myself, I have scarcely ever failed to attend when asked. In many cases, it is true, the authors were my friends,—as indeed few men of literary taste can be found who are not. Similar occasions have detained me in town longer than I had intended remaining. I can now repair to my country seat and write something which is destined never to be published; for I would avoid the appearance of having attended recitations, not for the sake of hearing, but of securing auditors in my turn. In offices of this sort, as in all others, the obligation is cancelled if a return is demanded. Farewell.

TO MACER.

It is highly gratifying to me to find you such a diligent reader of my uncle's works that you wish to procure them all, and for this purpose ask me to furnish you with a complete list. Let me, then, do the part of an index, and exhibit moreover the chronological order in which they were written; for such particulars are not unacceptable to the studious. One book of Cavalry Discipline. He composed it when colonel of a regiment, with equal intelligence and accuracy. Two of The Life of Pomponius Secundus, who, having been my uncle's particular friend, received this well-deserved tribute to his memory. Twenty of The Wars of Germany, in which are related in detail all the wars we have ever waged with the Germans. He was induced to undertake the work by a dream he had while serving in Germany. The image of Drusus Nero stood before him as he slept, who died in Germany after having subdued a large portion of the country. He commended his memory to my uncle, and besought him to vindicate his name from unmerited oblivion. Three of The Student, divided into six volumes because of their size. In these he takes the orator from the cradle as it were, and conducts him to perfection. Eight of Enigmatical Dissertation. He wrote them during the last years of Nero's reign, when tyrannical ny had made all free and manly studies dangerous. Thirty-one of A Continuation of Aufidius Bassus. Thirty-seven of *Natural History—a copious and learned work, and diversified as nature itself. Do you wonder that a man, immersed in business, could write so many volumes, and some of them exhibiting such scrupulous accuracy in research? You will wonder more to hear that he sometimes practised at the bar; and that he died in his fifty-sixth year, his leisure meantime interrupted and engrossed by the duties of the highest offices, as well as by others which the friendship of princes imposed. He was, however, a man of penetrating intellect and of incredible industry, and consumed little time in sleep. During the summer months, he rose when the night was nearly passed, not to observe auspices, but for the purpose of studying. In the winter, however, he rose at one o'clock, often at midnight, and never later than two. He sunk to sleep very readily, and sometimes would slumber a little and then wake again even in the midst of his studies. Before light he waited on the emperor Vespasian, who also made use of the nights; and then proceeded to fulfil the commissions entrusted to him. Returning home, he gave to study what time remained. In the summer, when dinner was over (which, like those of the ancients, was light and simple and taken by day), he reclined in the sunshine† if leisure permitted, reading some book and making notes and extracts—a practice he observed in regard to whatever he read. He used to say that no work was so mean that some good might not be gained from it. On leaving the sun he commonly bathed in cold water. He then tasted food and took a short repose. Afterwards, as if commencing a new day, he studied till supper time, during which a book was read to him and notes taken, but in a light and cursory way. One of his friends, I remember, when the reader pronounced some words badly, called him back and bade him repeat them. "Did you not understand them?" asked my uncle. The other admitted that he had. "Then why call him back?" continued my uncle: "we have lost more than ten lines by the interruption." Such was his frugality in the article of time. In summer he rose from supper ere day was closed; in the winter before seven o'clock,—and as punctually as if in obedience to some law. Such was his life amid the cares of business and the tumult of the city. In the retirement of the bath alone was his time exempt from study. When I speak of the bath, I refer to

* It is almost superfluous to say that the Natural History is the only extant work of the elder Pliny. It is not a work of Zoology simply, as its title might seem to imply, but a sort of encyclopædia, displaying great reading and research and no little credulity, and written in a style obscure, quaint and harsh.

its inner recesses; for while the fleshbrush and towel were employed, he either dictated or heard something read. During a journey, being freed from other cares, he gave himself up to study exclusively. A secretary accompanied him with books and writing materials, whose hands in winter were defended by thick gloves, that the freezing atmosphere might cause no remission of his services: and for the same reason he traversed the streets of Rome in a sedan. He once reprimanded me, I remember, for taking a walk. "The time might have been improved," said he:—for all time was lost in his estimation which was not devoted to study. By such diligence it was that he composed so many volumes. He left me besides one hundred and sixty commentaries on select passages, closely written on both sides of the page; which makes them greater in amount. He told me that when procurator in Spain he could have sold them to Lagus Licinius for four hundred thousand sesterces,* and some additions to them were afterwards made. Would you not suppose, considering how much he read and wrote, that his leisure had never been interrupted by regular business or by the friendship of princes? and again, recollecting with what laborious diligence his studies were prosecuted, you are almost surprised that no more was accomplished: for such application to business might be thought to exclude every other employment, while his indefatigable industry would seem sufficient to accomplish any thing. I laugh, therefore, when men call me studious; for compared with him, I am truly an idle man. My time, however, is occupied partly by public duties, and partly by those of friendship; but where will you find a man, even of those devoted through life to letters, who, if compared with my uncle, has not cause to blush for his indolence and sloth?—I have extended this letter beyond my original design, which was merely to give you, as requested, a list of my uncle's works. But I trust you will find these additional details not less interesting than those you asked; and if your ambition is roused, you may be induced not only to read the books, but to emulate the author's attainments. Farewell.

TO TACITUS.

You ask the particulars of my uncle's death, in order to transmit a true account to posterity. I thank you sincerely; for I see that immortal glory awaits it, if celebrated by you. Although he has composed many works of permanent reputation, and though his name might seem secured from oblivion by that memorable disaster which involved in destruction fair regions, cities and people as well as himself; yet his fame will be heightened and perpetuated by your immortal writings. Happy are they whom the favor of the gods enables to achieve what deserves to be recorded, or to write what is worthy to be read; and happier still whose fortune it is to accomplish both. In this number will my uncle be placed by your writings as well as his own; and therefore I willingly undertake, and even challenge as a right the office you impose.—He was at Misenum, and at that time commanded a fleet. On the 9th of the September Calends, shortly after midday, my mother called his attention to a cloud of extraordinary appearance and magnitude. He had reclined in the sun as usual, and afterwards having bathed in cold water and taken a light repast, was engaged in study; but rising immediately, he called for his sandals, and ascended a rising ground to gain a better view of the strange phenomenon. The cloud gradually rose, but from what mountain the spectators were unable to tell, though it was afterwards known to be Vesuvius. Its shape and appearance may be compared to a pine tree; for it seemed sustained on high by a tall trunk, and then diverged into ramifications;—borne aloft probably by the ascending blast, the force of which gradually declining, left it to expand laterally by its own weight. In parts it was white, but in other parts foul and mottled as if mixed with earth or ashes. My uncle resolved to examine the prodigy more closely, as became a learned and scientific man. He ordered a pinnacle to be prepared, and gave me leave to accompany him if I wished. I replied that I preferred to study, and it happened that he had himself given me a subject for composition. He then took his leave, carrying with him his note book. At Retina the seamen, alarmed by the imminent danger (for that place lay under the mountain, and offered no escape but by sea), besought him to relieve them from their perilous situation. He changed his purpose, and what he had undertaken from philosophic curiosity was prosecuted from a nobler motive. He manned the row-boats, and went up himself to carry assistance, not only to Retina, but to a multitude of others; for that coast, being pleasant and fertile, was thickly settled. He hastens thither whence others fly, and with a steady helm holds his course directly into danger, himself so little alarmed the while that he had leisure to survey carefully and dictate his comments on all the changes and circumstances of that terrible portent. And now, as they drew nearer, the ashes fell hotter and denser on the ships, mixed at times with cinders and fragments of stone scorched and blackened by the fire. Suddenly they reached shoal water, the rubbish from the mountain impeding the passage near the shore. For a moment he hesitated; and then turning to the captain who besought him to return, he exclaimed, "Fortune helps the brave! let us succor Pomponianus!"—who was then at Stabiae, separated by an intervening gulf; or the shore being depressed by the convulsion, and its line made to curve inwards, the sea flowed in upon it. At Stabiae, Pomponianus had collected his effects into ships, ready to depart as soon as the contrary wind subsided; since the danger, though yet distant, was plainly approaching, and threatened soon to be imminent. My uncle reached the place with a favoring gale, and embracing his friend, sought to dispel his fears by kindness and encouragement:—and to calm his agitation by his own quiet composure, he went to the bath as usual and then supped reclining, maintaining all the while a cheerful serenity, or what was equally magnanimous, dissembling his anxiety if he felt any. Meantime, from various parts of Vesuvius, broad, fierce and towering flames burst forth, of which the startling glare was heightened by the darkness of the night. To relieve the terror arising from this, my uncle suggested that the flames proceeded from deserted villas and rustic cottages, abandoned by their owners and left burning alone. He then retired to rest, and rested indeed in unaffected sleep; for being of a plethoric habit, his respiration was deep and sonorous, and was heard by persons passing near his chamber door. But the area which was traversed in reaching the dormitories was now so deeply covered with ashes and cinders that longer delay might have made it impossible to leave his room. He was waked therefore, and went forth to join Pomponianus and the rest who had kept watch through the night. They then held a consultation whether it was better to remain in their houses, or go forth into the open fields; for the buildings tottered with frequent and violent convulsions, and seemed almost as if moved from their places and carried to and fro by the earth's fluctuations. In the plain, on the other hand, they feared the falling cinders, which, though light and much corroded by the fire, were still dangerous. In this emergency the open field was preferred. With my uncle it was a victory of reason over reason; with the rest, of terror over terror. As a protection against falling stones, they bound pillows on their heads with handkerchiefs. And now day had dawned elsewhere, but there night still prevailed, of all nights the blackest and densest, which yet was relieved in part by the number of torches gleaming around. It was resolved to go to the shore, and see whether escape was left by water; but the sea continued stormy and adverse. There, reclining on a sheet spread on the ground, my uncle repeatedly called for cold water and drank. At length the flames, preceded by their herald, a sulphurous stench, roused him and put the rest to flight. He rose, supported by two servants, and immediately fell, suffocated, I apprehend, by the black fumes of that mephitic blast; for his chest was naturally weak and compressed, and subject to asthmatic disorders. When daylight dawned (the third day after the last he saw) his body was found entire and unwounded, and covered as when he fell, in appearance more like a sleeping than a dead man. Meantime at Misenum mother and I—but this is no theme for history, nor did you inquire but with regard to my uncle's death. I conclude therefore, with a single remark, that I have related all as I witnessed it, or as I heard it immediately after its occurrence while the truth was too fresh to be forgotten. You will select as you like; for what suits a letter written to a friend might not besseem a history intended for the world. Farewell.

TO THE SAME.

You say you have been induced by the letter which, at your request, I wrote concerning my uncle's death, to inquire what terrors and calamities befel me when left at Misenum—for at that point I broke off.

"Though memory shrinks appall'd from such a theme,
Yet will I speak."

My uncle having left us, I passed the time in study, for which purpose I had remained. Then followed the bath, supper, and a short and troubled sleep. For many days previous, tremblings of the earth had been felt, which caused less alarm as earthquakes were not uncommon in Campania. On that night, however, the agitation was such that you would have thought all things not simply shaken, but even convulsed and subverted. My mother burst into my chamber, and found me dressed, ready to go and rouse her if she had been asleep. We sat down in the courtyard, which interposed a short space between the house and the sea. Meantime I sent for my Livy, and (I hardly know whether to call this courage or rashness: I was then in my 18th year)—I sent for Livy, and recommenced reading and extracting in perfect composure. At this juncture a friend of my uncle, who had lately come to visit him from Spain, seeing mother and myself seated quietly, and me engaged in reading, reproved her unseasonable patience and my security. Notwithstanding, I continued engrossed with my book. It was now 6 o'clock, yet daylight was still faint and doubtful. We were in an open but narrow place, and the danger from the tottering houses was real and great. We resolved, therefore, to leave the town. The bewildered populace, with seeming prudence preferring another's judgment to their own, as terror commonly urges, followed in disorderly crowds, the hindmost thronging and impelling those before. We halted without the city. There we saw many strange portents and suffered much anxiety. The vehicles we had ordered to be brought were driven to and fro, though on a level plain, nor could be kept stationary even by stones placed under the wheels. Besides, the sea appeared absorbed within itself, repelled as 'twere by the earthquake; for the shore had certainly advanced, and multitudes of marine animals were left upon the dry sand. On the other side appeared a terrific black cloud, from which the fiery blast flashed forth in long vibrating wreaths of flame, like lightnings, but fiercer and brighter. At length the friend from Spain before mentioned, becoming more earnest and importunate, thus addressed us: "If your brother and uncle still lives, he desires your safety; and if he has perished, he wished you to survive him: then why do you linger in danger?" We replied that we would not escape while uncertain of my uncle's fate. He delayed no longer; but breaking away from us, left danger behind him in his rapid flight. Shortly after, the black cloud descending covered the earth and sea. Capreae was enveloped and hidden by it, and the advanced portion of Misenum concealed from view. Then mother begged, prayed and commanded me to escape as I best could: for a young man might escape, she said, but for herself, worn out with years and infirmities, she was content to die if I were not involved in the same fate. I protested, on my part, that I would not survive her; and seizing her hand, I compelled her to quicken her pace. She yielded reluctantly, and blamed herself for retarding me. Ashes now fell upon us to some small extent. I looked back: thick darkness impended behind and followed us like a torrent poured along the earth. "Let's turn aside," I exclaimed, "while we can see our way: if we fall on the road we shall be trampled in the darkness by the advancing crowd." Scarcely were we seated when night overtook us, not like a cloudy and moonless night, but as in a close room with the lights extinguished. You might hear from the crowd the shrieks of women, mingled with the cries of children and the clamors of men. Some sought their parents, others their children and others their wives or husbands, and in the mingled tumult recognized each other by their voices. Some bewailed their own misfortunes: others those of their friends. Some from mere dread of death prayed to die: many raised their hands to heaven; and more believed that no god survived, the last eternal night having now overshadowed the world. Nor were those wanting who magnified the real danger by false though terrible rumors. There were who asserted falsely, but to credulous ears, that they had just left Misenum behind them a heap of burning ruins. A faint light dawned, which we feared was not that of day, but of the advancing flames, now spreading farther and more widely. Again darkness supervened, accompanied by another copious and heavy fall of ashes. These we rose to shake off from time to time; otherwise we should have been covered and even crushed. It is a proud triumph to me that throughout such perils no groan escaped me, nor any unmanly word, unless you regard as such my adopting the sad but powerful solace in death that the universe was about to perish with me. The darkness at last departed, rarefied into a sort of smoky cloud; and afterwards actual day dawned, and even the sun shone forth, but lurid and dim as seen in eclipses. Creation seemed changed to our yet fearful eyes, all being covered with deep ashes like snow. Returning to Misenum and repairing our bodies as well as we could, we passed an anxious night of hope and fear, in which the latter predominated. For the earth's vibrations still continued, and certain maniacs augmented their own and the general distresses by terrible predictions. But notwithstanding all we had suffered and still apprehended, mother and I resolved to remain at Misenum till tidings of my uncle should be received. These particulars, which are wholly unworthy of history, you will read as a friend and not as an author; and blame your own request, if they seem too trifling even for a letter. Farewell.

THOU SHALT NE'ER BE GAY.

See you yonder beauteous star,
That glimmers in the sky,
Shedding its pallid light afar,
To soothe the wand'rer's eye!

'Twas yestere'en as wand'ring here,
That planet met my gaze,
Directed to the starlit sphere,
To mark the pale moon rays.

Struck by its purity of light,
And its unwonted size,
Surpassing far all suns of night,
That glitter in the skies,

I said that I would cast my fate
Upon that single star;
That should its splendor not abate,
Nor cloud its lustre mar;

Love, joy and happiness would smile,
Upon my every task,
And whilst all sorrow they'd beguile,
In pleasure's rays I'd bask.

But if a cloudlet fitted o'er,
And dim'd its beaming ray,
'Twould fate my life what 'twas before,
And bid me ne'er be gay.

Alas! whilst thus I stood and gaz'd,
Upon that azure sky,
A tiny cloud by zephyrs rais'd,
(I heard the zephyrs sigh,)

Flew fast towards my chosen star:
The cloud soon changed its snowy hue,
As on it came from regions far,
And blacken'd as it grew.

I hoped 'twould pause e'er it did reach,
The planet's high domain.

Alas! but fate doth love to teach
That mortal hopes are vain:

For, whilst with eager eye I gaz'd,
The cloud conceal'd the star,
And soon there came to me amaz'd
A voice as from afar;

Methought I heard some spirit say,
"Mortal, thy doom I state:
Go, wand'rer, thou shalt ne'er be gay,
'Tis the decree of fate."

EXTRACTS FROM NOTES

OF A VOYAGE IN THE EAST IN 1843.

BY W. B.
Wm. B. Sewall.

June 26. This day I arrived at Alexandria. My first wish was to see the Pasha. It was a desire I had cherished from my early years. Here was a "lion" of the first magnitude! a great oriental conqueror, a modern Saladin! The imagination kindled at the idea. Here was I in the land of the Pharaohs, in the city of Cleopatra—within sight of the pillar of Pompey, or of Diocletian, if it be more agreeable, and within a few steps of a man as remarkable as either;—a man who, in the space of six weeks, had excavated a canal forty eight miles in length, ninety feet in width and eighteen in depth,—a man who had realized in his eventful career one of those incidents which cause the reader of its history to gasp for breath and the blood to run cold in his veins.

An adventurer in a foreign land, in poverty and obscurity, the genius of Mehemet Ali has made him absolute master of Egypt. And but for the interposition of the European powers, he would long since have been firmly seated in the city of Constantine. The battle of Konieh decided the conflict with his illustrious enemy, Sultan Mahmoud, in his favor, and no barrier remained between himself and the Bosphorus. But his ambition is not content with being a conqueror. Common fame represents him as the great regenerator of the land of his adoption, as engaged in the effort of vanquishing the prejudices and changing the habits of centuries, of introducing the arts and sciences and pouring upon Egyptian darkness the lights of European civilization. The grandeur of his conceptions is equalled by the energy and activity of his movements and the fertility of his resources. Troubled by no scruples of conscience, he avails himself of all means to accomplish his objects. When the powerful body of the Mamelukes placed themselves in the way of his progress, he hesitated not, but by one fatal blow he extinguished the race. History records no more cold-blooded butchery; Machiavel never conceived a perfidy more profound than that which characterised this proceeding. Such was the man I now proposed to see and converse with face to face.

When I arrived at Cairo, I informed Mr. Glyndon, our Consul, of my wishes on this subject, and he forthwith wrote to Mr. Todd, the Vice-Consul at Alexandria, and requested him to make such arrangements if possible, that I might have an interview the day of my arrival. This was necessary as I anticipated that I should not be able to remain more than three or four hours in this city. Mr. Todd had informed Bognas Bay, the Prime Minister, of my anxiety to enjoy the honor of a presentation to his Highness, and he requested that when I arrived it should be immediately made known to him. I reached Alexandria at ten at night and sent to Mr. Todd to inform him, wishing to ensure a presentation in the morning. He sent to the Minister, but the messenger found him in bed. In the morning he sent again at an early hour, but being indisposed the premier did not rise until half past nine. All this haste was important, as the Pasha does not receive after twelve. At length, at half past eleven, I was waited on by the nephew of his Excellency, Bognas Bay, with many apologies and regrets on his part, that sickness prevented his calling in person, and was informed that his Highness would receive me at any time before twelve.

As soon as a carriage could be prepared we started, the Consul, the nephew, my companion and myself. When we arrived at the palace it was past twelve. The Pasha had given a grand reception that morning, his son Ibrahim having just arrived; but all had dispersed. The nephew said he would go in, leaving us in the carriage, and see if it were then possible to get in. He returned in a moment and informed us that his Highness would receive us. We immediately entered, saw two or three waiters about the door, but no soldiers, and passed into a large hall. Here the Lord Chamberlain, or Maitre de Cere-monies came out to meet us. To him Mr. Todd announced our names, and we advanced to the door of a large apartment and there in the centre of the room, stood the remarkable man we sought. We bowed ourselves into his presence with the three bows usually given to royalty. He received us graciously after the European manner, not making the Turkish salutations. In a moment after, he motioned to the divan, inviting us to a seat, and preceding, seated himself in a corner, where an ornamented cloth, wrought in gold, was thrown over, as it seemed to designate his place. I placed myself by his side, my companions after me, and a dragoman took his position in front. I now give literally the conversation. He said to me,

"By what route have you come to Egypt?"

I replied "By the way of Damietta from Syria."

"Have you been long in this country?"

"Between two and three weeks. I proceeded from Damietta to Cairo through a beautiful and interesting country. I have been much gratified in seeing a land so attractive from its fertility, its history and its antiquities."

"What has been your object?"

"We have heard much in America of the progress of this country in civilization and regeneration under the auspices of your Highness. I was anxious to see this advancement." He bowed with great courtesy and said "he did not aspire so high as to be the regenerator of Egypt." I replied, "Your Highness has certainly produced great changes in this country. One may now travel from the Mediterranean to Sennar with as much security as in any country in the world."

"This is true," he said, with apparent satisfaction.

"And the great works which have been constructed have restored Egypt to its ancient fertility. America now feels her influence in the markets of the world as a formidable rival in the sale of cotton."

To this he responded, "It is nothing—a drop in the ocean. Have you locusts in America?"

"We have, but not in such numbers as to do any injury. They appear to have been destructive here this season."

"No, as soon as they appeared I had them destroyed. There are none left; but for this, they would have done much injury."

This was true. With his usual energy he had declared war upon the locusts and occupied his troops with the conflict. They were engaged many days in killing them. Besides, he gave a premium to the Fellahs for all they destroyed. The result was, the enormous swarms which were laying waste the country in all directions, were soon exterminated. I saw the effects of their ravages, but the locusts themselves had disappeared. Even the garden of Ibrahim Pasha, on the island of Roda near Cairo, had suffered from them severely, a number of the trees having been killed.

He then remarked "that rats were the greatest foes to their agriculture, that it was not possible to destroy them; that they were born of the earth, that he had seen one in the process of transition, when one half was rat and the other half earth." I looked surprised, doubting if I understood the interpreter correctly, for he spoke French and not very well. The Pasha then emphatically repeated what he had said, the interpreter announcing distinctly "une moitié rat et une moitié terre." As he had seen it himself, it was of course no longer to be doubted. I remarked that in going from Cairo to the pyramids I had seen great numbers coming out from the crevices of the earth. These are the cracks in the soil caused by the process of drying after the inundation has retired. He asked if we had them in America. I said not that species, (to wit, those born of the earth.)

Coffee had been brought and drunk. Conversation now flagged. I was at a loss to know whether pipes were coming or not. Having remained sufficiently long, as I thought, I took my leave.

I had a good opportunity of examining the countenance and general appearance of the Pasha. His eye is acute and rapid in its movements; in color a glittering black and indicative of great intelligence. The general expression of his face is good-humored—nothing which would indicate a savage or sanguinary disposition. The murderer of the Mamelukes is not seen in his visage. The forehead I could not see, as it was covered by his turban, but I am told that it is high and good. His person is short and corpulent, and the whole appearance that of perfect health, though he is now seventy-four years old.

His dress was very simple, consisting of a kind of cloth jacket, such as is worn by the Greeks, and the full trowsers of the Albanians, without orders, ornaments or arms of any sort. His manners reserved, unpretending and equally destitute of grace and coarseness, without embarrassment and without effort.

During our interview, the two or three servants we found in the room retired. This was very different from the state usually maintained in these countries and in high contrast with what I had seen in my interviews with the Pashas of Syria and Damascus. When I was presented to them, a large retinue of officers and servants was in attendance and nothing could be more formal and stately than the ceremonies of my presentation. Indeed Turkish etiquette is generally rigid, cumbersome and oppressive as the old Spanish code.

Upon the whole, the appearance of the Pasha is not such as to induce one at first sight to pronounce him a remarkable man. I am not sure that if I had seen him in a crowd, I should have demanded who he was. The remark which Johnson made of Burke is certainly not applicable to him.

Though I have heard much of the great changes effected in Egypt, they surpass my expectations. The police is now as efficient as in any country of the world; the life and property of foreigners are perfectly secure; beautiful villas are seen on the Nile rivalling even those of Italy; magnificent palaces, lovely gardens and all the appendages of a luxury often combining with oriental taste the refinements and inventions of European skill and fashion adorn Cairo, Alexandria and even Damietta. The country seems well cultivated, and the numerous and enormous canals which have been excavated for the purpose of irrigation, astonish the voyager. The river is gay with picturesque boats floating on its surface, many devoted to pleasure, but the greater number laden with the rich imports and exports of the country. In the ports, ships are seen from every clime and a busy commerce meets you on the wharves. In the cities, long lines of camels, the ships of the desert as Napoleon called them, following each other in Indian file, bringing to market the productions of the interior, attract the attention of the stranger. The traveller from Turkey is struck with the entire change in the habits of the population. The pipe is no longer the business of life. Though still enjoyed as a luxury, it is not the engrossing occupation. Existence is no longer expended in puffs of smoke. A busy industry is seen on all sides. Farmers, artisans, soldiers, men of state are all pressing on with an activity and perseverance which calls to the mind of an American his own home beyond the "far Atlantic." Movement has succeeded to inaction. The doting, dreamy Turk has been succeeded by the bustling, noisy, chattering Fellah.

Yet, in spite of all these apparent evidences of change and prosperity, it is doubtful if the present people of Egypt are in any better condition for the existence of Mehemet Ali. He has brought order out of chaos, but it is the order of an unrelenting and merciless despotism. All Egypt is regarded and governed by him as his farm and the population as his slaves. This idea is the basis of all his police, all his laws and his whole system of polity. The land is his and the inhabitants are his. The unit is every thing, the many are nothing. He believes that Rome was made for Cæsar. The various innovations which have been introduced, have all reference to the improvement of his revenue, the consolidation of his power and the advancement of the various objects of his ambition. The interest of the people has never entered into his plans, nor occupied any portion of his consideration except as a part of the machinery necessary to the accomplishment of his designs. The engines of his factories have for him the same sort of interest. Improvements are introduced into the one and the other with the same views. Boys are trained and educated for the manufactories, and all improvements in machinery are imported. Schools are established to make soldiers, to give instruction in the art of war, that this arm of despotism may be strengthened, but the general improvement of the man, the elevation of his character and his moral advancement have never fallen within the sphere of his considerations.

There never was probably a despotism so pervading, so generally and oppressively felt by each and every one of a numerous people. None are too low for its reach, none are so high that they do not feel its weight upon their necks. Many nations are enslaved, but here the principles of national and individual slavery are combined and wrought out practically. Among all the populations I have seen in the Old World, none has appeared to me so degraded, so abject, so low in the scale of humanity. It is a common remark here, that the kourbash, which is an enormous whip, made of the elephant's hide, is the steam engine of Egypt. It is certain that the lash is nowhere else applied so liberally; and it seems to be the great instrument for carrying on the industrious movement of this country. Personal liberty has no existence except for foreigners, and for them, in many respects, it is almost without limit. The Arab of the desert looks with pity upon his brethren on the banks of the Nile; and well he may; he is free as the air that sweeps over his sands—he depends on his own arm for his protection and subsistence. Wanderer and savage as he is, he is a noble man.

If there is a canal to be made, a factory to be built, or a war to be waged, the poor Fellahs are collected and put to the work, whatever it may be, as a large proprietor in Virginia would gather his negroes from his different estates on occasion of some unusual undertaking. Thus, when the great Mahmoudic canal was decided on, all the laborers of lower Egypt were put in requisition, and it is said, at one time, two hundred and fifty thousand men were employed. They were marched in multitudes under their Sheiks along the line of the intended canal, and each chief had his share allotted him. Thus was executed this stupendous work, to which I have before referred, in the short space of six weeks. It is doubtful if the history of the world can present another example of so gigantic an undertaking concluded with such celerity. It is said that twenty thousand laborers were sacrificed on this occasion. It is probable that this statement is exaggerated, yet it is certain that great mortality prevailed and many thousands were believed to be the victims of the urgency of the Pasha. It is still a subject of prejudice, and one in which foreigners are also involved, as having advised the work.

But there is no cause, from which this unfortunate country has suffered more under its present ruler than from his passion for war. A want of laborers is now severely felt, and the population has greatly diminished. Mr. Falt, in his work on Egypt, written in 1834, states that some years before, the population was estimated, according to certain calculations which were then made, at two and a half millions; but of them, at least one half of those fit for military service had been taken to form and recruit the armies of regular troops and for the service of the Navy. He considered at that time, that from this source the population had sustained a loss of half a million of souls. Now the loss is much greater since the wars in Syria and the numerous hosts marched into that country. The service is so unpopular, that ten years since it was common for the inhabitants to maim themselves to prevent enlistment. But such has been the demand for troops, maiming is no longer a protection, and some battalions of men are now seen who have lost an eye, and others that have lost several of their fingers. Yet nothing can rescue them from the demands of their master but absolute inability. If the trigger finger is gone the others are called into requisition.

I was informed by our Consul at Beyrout, that in the attack on that place by the English, in the late campaign in Syria, it was a subject of surprise, that so few Egyptian shot took effect. It was afterwards ascertained that the troops had designedly shot over their heads, wishing them success, that they themselves might be driven out of Syria and relieved from so odious a service.

The system of monopolies is another portion of the administration of the Pasha, most injurious to the interests of the people. The poor peasant can not sell his cotton or his grain, or any of the products of his industry except to the Pasha or his agents. And if he wishes to purchase a pound of sugar or a pair of shoes, or should he want the use of a boat on the Nile, he is again obliged to go to another set of agents or favorites, who may have these monopolies, and pay those prices which men find it their interest to charge, who have no competition, or only such as is found among a few who enjoy a part of the monopoly. On this subject, the foreigners located in this country have been particularly sensitive, because it affects so seriously their interests; and complaints have been made, and remonstrances have been multiplied time after time by the Consuls of different powers.

At length, in 1838, a treaty of commerce was concluded between France and the Ottoman Porte, by which the latter was bound to destroy all monopolies throughout its dominions which affect the productions of agriculture. The Porte also renounced the use of Tes Rérés for the purchase of merchandise, or for transporting it from one place to another. The Pasha having received due notice of this treaty from the Sultan, pretended the necessity of an arrangement with the Fellahs and asked three years to prepare for carrying it into execution. To withdraw himself from the importunities of the Consuls and merchants, he went into Upper Egypt and there remained a long time. Finally he promulgated a decree abolishing the monopoly of boats on the Nile. A cry of joy was now heard—this was proclaimed the commencement of a new era. Some Europeans prepared boats. But lo! an unexpected difficulty now arose—sailors were not to be obtained. Ibrahim Pashaw, Abbas Pashaw and Cherif Pasha are proprietors of a vast number of boats and derive from them large revenues. They possessed themselves of all the sailors. And if the foreigners engaged some Fellahs, they learned in a short time that a gendarme of a divan had seized them in the name of his master. The Europeans claimed them, and behold the response which they received. "The barks are yours, but the men belong to the Pasha, and our master disposes of them as he pleases." In the meantime, while the public were discoursing of the acts and intentions of the government, the Pasha, by his agents, purchased all the grain of Upper Egypt at ten francs the bedebbe, transported it to Alexandria and sold it there at sixteen. And thus has he, in spite of the treaties of the Porte and all the efforts of the Consuls, continued to keep in operation his system of monopolies up to the present time.

He always professes to Europeans an anxious desire to introduce into Egypt the sciences and the arts of Europe, to make his people a civilized people. But to arrive at this object he says it is indispensable that his government should extend its action over all the sources of production—that the native should be in his hands an instrument docile to his will. That being without instruction and in a state of brutality since many ages, the Egyptian will never accept of civilization if it is not forced on him. This is the sophistry with which he amuses Europeans and attempts to conciliate European Courts. His acts but attest the sincerity of his declarations.

Among all the changes which this extraordinary man has introduced into this country, perhaps there is none which has more astonished the natives than the manner he has adopted of disposing of the inmates of his Harem. Among the elevated Turks and Arabs, such as the Sultans and wealthy and powerful Pashas, the women of the Harems even after the death of their lords, have always been preserved as sacred relics. Subsequent marriages have not been permitted. Their doom has been to pine in seclusion and mourn the departed—"to blush unseen, and waste their fragrance on the desert air." Mehemet Ali has very justly deemed this usage irrational and cruel to the fair sex. The result is, since he has become old, he has been acting as his own administrator, and he has disposed of most of his fair ones in matrimony to his most illustrious Generals. He has thus been able at the same time to reward the services of distinguished officers, by this high and extraordinary mark of honor and to manifest his regard to the ladies of his household by preventing their sacrifice after his decease.

I was curious to know what views are now entertained by the Pasha of that great event which is considered in all the Western world as the great reproach of his life, as the stain which no good can efface. I mean the murder of the Mamelukes. I made inquiries on this subject of those who are familiar with his sentiments. Nor regrets nor compunctions have ever been felt by him. He speaks of it freely and regards the achievement as a great "coup de politique." This treacherous assassination of the aristocracy of all Egypt he deems sufficiently justified from the fact that they stood in the way of his progress, and their sacrifice was necessary to secure his absolute power. This is as might have been anticipated. He has shed too much blood and been too familiar with scenes of death and carnage to place much value on human life. When myriads have been sacrificed on the altar of his ambition, the few hundreds, relieved of their lives on this occasion, occupy but small space in his "mind's eye." But he knows full well the estimation in which the act is held in Europe; and says he intends to have two great paintings taken, one of the murder of the Mamelukes, the other of the execution of the Duke d'Enghien by Napoleon, and the two may go down to posterity together.

I have expressed the opinion that it is doubtful if the present population of Egypt is in any better condition for the existence of Mehemet Ali. But posterity may profit. A very different opinion has prevailed in Europe and America. Impressed by his transcendent genius, astounded by his daring energy and wonderful successes, and dazzled by the halo of his military glory, men have for the most part hailed him as the regenerator of the land of the Pharaohs. The seed he has planted may hereafter produce fruit; the light he has introduced may in times to come make its way to the minds of the miserable Fellahs. The material improvements he has executed, his public works, the magnificent structure he has reared, the canals he has excavated, the lands reclaimed from the desert, all these will remain as monuments of his reign. His manufactories which he has nurtured with so much care and at so great an expense will probably pass away with him. They are a forced product, unsuited to the country and its circumstances.

The protection which he has extended to foreigners and their constant contact with the citizens of the country have probably diminished their prejudices and their bigotry. These beneficial effects may be the prelude to greater changes. They have been forced to see in many things the superiority of our usages. No innovation was more strenuously and violently resisted than the European discipline of the troops. It led even to revolution and came near costing the Pasha his throne. Now the results of their own campaigns have shown its great advantages. The introduction of steam upon the Nile and in the manufactories has had the same tendency. The habits of living adopted by the Pasha and the officers of State and of the army, the use of knives and forks, the drinking of wine and the conformity in many other things with our habits may eventually produce more harmony with the Christian races. Though this very conformity has caused a prejudice against the Pasha and a renewed want of confidence in the orthodoxy of his faith. The young men who have been educated in France and Italy at his expense, must also bring with them on their return European ideas; and these will obtain a certain degree of diffusion. It would seem that they must penetrate the dense darkness which envelops the natives. And yet so wide is the line of separation which divides the very few who constitute the aristocracy from the enslaved Fellahs, that all light must be very slow in its passage. The wretched peasant, galled by the lash of his imperious master, cares but little for light or information which gives no improvement to his condition. And if, perchance, his benighted intellect should be sufficiently illumined to perceive that from these innovations have been derived new means of strengthening his shackles, this indifference is converted into aversion. And again, when he finds that the new system tends to a destruction of that faith in which he reposes his hopes of a happy existence hereafter, his aversion becomes phrensy. We have but little idea of the pride and enthusiasm with which the Mahommedan cherishes his religion. It is a question which admits of no argument. Doubt entails disgrace—denial brings death in time and eternity. Religion is the soul of his existence. If you touch this you reach the heart's blood. Nor can any important change be hoped for on this subject, until general cultivation brings religion within the reach of reason, when feeling and prejudice may be submitted to the test of investigation.

Upon the whole, though the present population of Egypt may have profited but little from the various innovations of the Pasha, posterity may hope from them and other causes an advance of civilization and an improvement of their condition. The seed has been scattered here and there by the way side, but it is reserved to generations yet unborn to see it ripen and to gather in the harvest.

REFLECTIONS AT THE GRAVE OF MIDSHIPMAN ———, OF THE U. S. NAVY,

Who fell in a Duel.

BY H. P. VASS, DECEASED.

Hark to the bugle's mournful sound,
The last and requiem of the brave
And generous youth, who here hath found
Too soon his early grave!

And ours the grief which cannot speak,
To tell how deep our woe;
For words are all too faint and weak,
Where burning tears must flow.

Oh! hadst thou fall'n in glorious strife,
While victory cheered thy breast,
Given for thy country's cause thy life—
And found a hero's rest;

Tho' many a heart that held thee dear
Had mourned thy early doom,
Less bitter far had been the tear
Which now bedews thy tomb.

No longer will the cannon's roar
Disturb thy dreamless sleep!
Thy youthful comrades never more
Shall hail thee on the deep!

Ye winds! breathe softly o'er his grave!—
Sweet flowers! in beauty bloom,
To deck the turf, where sleeps the brave
Within his narrow tomb.

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

NO. V.

"An Army is a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man."—Locke.

TO THE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON.

By reference to the act of Congress of the 2nd of March, 1821, "to reduce and fix the military peace establishment," which I have regarded in all my communications as the basis of our present organization, it is perceived that no separate and distinct ordnance corps was then deemed necessary, and none was retained in our Army. Our then Secretary of War, the most able and efficient we have ever had, the Hon. John C. Calhoun, profiting by the experience of foreign services, and seeking the interest of his country instead of the welfare and advancement of individuals, secured an organization for our little Army combining efficiency and harmony with economy and unity of action. Peace-meal legislation has at length deprived us of every feature which recommended that establishment, and we are now clogged by checks and balances to such an extent that it is almost impossible for the different branches of the service to keep from open warfare. Encroachment after encroachment has been made upon our peace organization, by nearly every branch of our staff, as must already be apparent to you, but in no instance have they been more rapid and injurious—I had almost said, destructive to the interests of the Army—than will be exemplified by a glance at the Ordnance Department. The act of Congress of the 2nd of March, 1821, based upon the experience of foreign services, merged the ordnance of our Army in the Artillery, and provided for one supernumerary Captain to each Artillery regiment for ordnance duties,—a field officer of Artillery being detailed to superintend the duties of the department, and the law specially providing for the further detail of such Artillery officers for ordnance duties, as might be deemed necessary. It is perceived by reference to the official register of the British service, that, at the present day, no such thing as a separate and distinct Ordnance Department is known to them, unless, indeed, we consider that they have no Artillery, except in name; for under the head of "Ordnance Department," is to be found the "Royal Regiment of Artillery," and nothing else. In fact it is there considered, as it should be with us, that the two are inseparable: the effect of a division upon our service being to deprive the Artillery officer of all means of practical information connected with his profession. The system in the British service, which was introduced into ours in 1821, and abolished in 1838, is the only one by which information, essential and necessary, can be imparted to, and gained by officers of Artillery, and without which they are utterly useless and unnecessary. The theoretical portion of this education is gained, it is true, at the Military Academy, but practice and experience are as necessary to make artillerists as engineers, and no system of theoretical instruction can ever make an officer proficient in either. With this wise and necessary object in view, the practical education of our Artillery officers, otherwise unattainable, the act of 1821 consolidated the ordnance and Artillery, and provided for the detail of officers from the latter for ordnance duties: which system, with a few modifications, was kept up with the most beneficial results until the Staff mania raged with such violence and fatality in 1838. With the four supernumerary Captains of Artillery our ordnance duties were so performed from 1821 to 1832, as to disseminate useful and practical information throughout the Artillery arm,—a constant detail of from fifteen to twenty subalterns of that arm being kept on ordnance duty, and periodical changes being made, to allow all its subalterns the benefit of instruction and experience, as well as the advantages of comfortable posts, agreeable positions, and light and pleasant duties. But, as the population of our country advanced, its means increased, and our fortifications multiplied in number; strong arguments were urged for increasing our ordnance corps, and separating its permanent officers from the Artillery. In 1832 these arguments prevailed, not without some reason, and a separate and distinct department was organized, comprising fourteen officers, the grade of Captain being the lowest. It was not conceived at that time that it was in contemplation by the department to call for another increase in a few years, and thereby to drive the Artillery from its legitimate duties, thus erecting for itself a separate and independent department of the Army,—independent even of the Commanding General,—or this move, behind which so much was concealed, would have been opposed and successfully opposed.

The fourteen officers appointed to this newly organized department were supposed to be necessary for the permanent command and control of the different armories and arsenals then in operation and being constructed, and it was contended with much reason and propriety that the duties of the department would be more satisfactorily, more regularly, and more economically performed by this system than by that requiring the superintendents to change with the periodical details. For these reasons and some others of minor importance, this increase, or, rather, organization of the Ordnance Department, was made in 1832, which provided a chief of the department to be stationed in Washington City,—thirteen officers remaining to command and superintend the different armories and arsenals located throughout the country, and to attend to the practical instruction of such subalterns of artillery as should be periodically detailed to assist them. The favoritism attending the appointment of these officers, and the great injustice done a large portion of the Army at the time of their appointment, has been so frequently and so ably exposed to the country, that I deem it unnecessary to enter on that subject, not believing there is an individual to be found, knowing the circumstances, who has not unconditionally condemned the acts by which such monstrous injustice and oppression was practised towards a large portion of the Army. There being but thirteen and scarcely any two from the same section of country, it was no difficult task for these favored sons of the republic to arrange among themselves the different posts they would occupy; and knowing their positions were permanent, a system of expenditures was commenced under the general appropriations "for arsenals," which has drained the treasury of many hundred thousands for the sole benefit of these officers,—not the slightest necessity having ever existed for many enormous expenditures made by them, nor the smallest beneficial result accrued to the government, unless we consider as such, the erection of splendid buildings for these gentlemen to live in, and the grading and laying out of magnificent pleasure grounds for the enjoyment of their mechanics and laborers. In the erection of the splendid residences which each of these gentlemen has superintended for himself, an instance is not to be found where any one has confined himself to less than double the allowance of quarters granted by the regulations, and in many instances, when troops have been temporarily crowded together, officers attached to them have been compelled to live in most uncomfortable, nay, almost immoral proximity, when, within their view, officers of this favored department have been allowed to occupy double and treble the allowance granted them by regulations, because they belonged to a separate department and could not be interfered with. This is rather a wide departure from our motto, "a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man," but still it is a fact, daily exhibited, and an abuse which is hourly increasing. Heavy expenditures have also been made for fixtures and arrangements about these quarters for the private convenience and comforts of their occupants, which are rarely to be found in the residences of the most opulent citizens in their vicinity. In some instances good, substantial and comfortable dwellings have been condemned and torn down because they did not suit the taste and convenience of the officer occupying them, and splendid new edifices have been erected in their stead. I need only instance one prominent example, that of Springfield, Mass., and the sentiments of its citizens as expressed at regular meetings held for the purpose, and their views as contained in the public journals of the place within a few months past;—though every arsenal in the country might be particularly instanced as an example of extravagance and waste, were such details necessary. If their expenditures were only confined to the erection and decoration of houses in which to reside, so much attention would not be drawn to the subject, but beautifully laid-out lawns, parks and promenades surrounded by stone walls and iron railings, with grass plats and flower gardens enclosed with choice fences are by no means rare sights at arsenals, where one would suppose workshops for the conversion of wood and iron into the implements of war would be more appropriate ornaments and certainly not less appropriate appendages. It undoubtedly never was the intention of the government to stint its officers in the allowance of quarters and other necessary fixtures about a post to enable them to live decently and comfortably, but it never was contemplated that a certain branch of the service was to be set aside as the aristocracy of the Army and every thing, even the treasury of the country, be made subservient to the comfort, convenience and gratification of its members. Yet such has been the case with the Ordnance Department, and no stronger proof can be wanted than an inspection of the armories and arsenals occupied by them, and a comparison of those places with the stinted and almost untenable allowances of the kind granted to officers of the line of the Army at most of the military posts occupied by troops. Another and odious distinction is made between the comforts and conveniences allowed to the enlisted men of the ordnance with its hired mechanics and laborers, and to the regularly enlisted soldier of the Army. An example is now fresh in my memory of an outrage of this kind committed on a company of Artillery, commanded by one of the senior Captains of our service, which was forced to vacate its quarters upon the plea that they were necessary for hired men of the Ordnance Department, and to rent an old farm house some three miles from the military post. The effect of this move was to give the command of the arsenal to a subaltern of the Ordnance Department who was probably not born when the Captain of this company was first commissioned in our

Army, and this in the face of an order from the War Department, issued but a few months before, directing this same subaltern of ordnance to be placed under some discreet and severe commanding officer for past aggravated, military offences. The avowed reason for this outrage was, that there was not room for the Artillery and ordnance both, and that the former must give way as it was an ordnance post; yet it is known that four companies of troops have been accommodated there at the same time, and at the date of this occurrence there were only twenty-five men of the Ordnance Department. A better reason suggested as the cause of the act is to be found in the fact that the subaltern of ordnance is the son of the acting chief of the department. The Commanding General of the Army opposed it, and pronounced his opinion that such an outrage had never before been perpetrated upon the Army, and in the face of his remonstrance the Secretary of War was influenced to sanction it, and to continue the company of troops occupying hired quarters at a heavy expense to the government, in violation of the rank and rights of an officer of nearly thirty years service, to the great prejudice of the public interest and against the most pointed remonstrance of the whole community in the vicinity of the post.

But what renders this case the more flagrant is the fact, that a "hired guard" was employed at this same arsenal at a heavy expense to the government; and though this company was disposable and ordered there for the purpose, it was found necessary to retain that non-descript species of soldiery in government employ, to afford an excuse for excluding the company from its proper and legitimate quarters, and thereby to confer the command of the post on one declared unfit for it by an order issued to the Army but a few months previous. This "hired guard" was brought into the service at a heavy expense during the Florida war, when a company of troops could not be spared for the purpose, but so soon as the war was over, in fact before that, the citizens frequently applied to the department for a company of the regular Army to protect the property stored in their vicinity, and which without protection was more dangerous than otherwise. It was supposed, and very reasonably too, that this "hired guard" would at once be discharged upon the arrival of regular troops, but such was not the result, and we have loud complaints made at the intrusion of a company of Artillery into the limits of an "Ordnance post built with Ordnance funds." The presence of this "hired guard," suddenly converted into "Ordnance men," is strongly urged as a reason for the immediate withdrawal of the company on the ground that there was not room for both. In this the glib and oily act of the courtier was too much for the strong remonstrance of the Commanding General, joined, as he was, by the almost unanimous voice of the citizens in the vicinity of the post; and he finds himself in a short time mortified by the order of the Secretary of War undoing what had been done, and committing an outrage upon him and the Army by elevating one of his subordinates above him in importance and influence for the furtherance of family arrangements. Having effected the object in view by retaining these hired men, it will be supposed they were discharged, but such was not the case, and we find that as soon as the company was removed beyond the limits of the post, the guard is again necessary to perform the very duty this company was not permitted to do. This state of affairs existed for several months to the detriment of the service, and at a heavy cost to the government, during which time the citizens in the vicinity were not blind to the injustice done this veteran captain and his company, nor were they silent as to the cost of it to the government, and the folly and absurdity of the act. Memorials to the President and their delegation in Congress soon placed the matter in such a light that some measures were necessary to appease the indignation of an outraged people, and orders were prepared for the restoration of the company to its legitimate position. But as this would place the command in the hands of the able head of that company, taking it from the undeserving but favored subaltern, who was for years a Second Lieutenant in the same regiment, and during the same time his outraged senior was a Captain at the head of his company, by some unaccountable interference at the war office, and still more unaccountable success, this order was suppressed and in its stead one was issued dismembering the company of this Captain, sending him with one half of it to a post three hundred miles distant, and placing the other half with a subaltern under the immediate command and orders of this Lieutenant of ordnance. This move was made at an expense of hundreds, with a certainty of destroying the discipline and efficiency of the company—in violation of the most sacred military rank and rights of its Captain—to the prejudice of the public interests, against the remonstrance of the Commanding General of the Army and the combined efforts and protest of the citizens in the vicinity of the post,—and for what reasons? One fact exists,—the Lieutenant of ordnance, soon after the acting chief of the department, succeeded to the command of these troops, and thereby received a considerable increase to his pay.

The greatest increase which this department received, and the one most fatal to the interest of the Army, was that of 1838, when Congress appears to have been affected with a Staff fever. The section of that bill, as it first passed, added two Majors and twenty Lieutenants to the number of officers then in the department, but by the supplementary act passed two days after, the number of Lieutenants was limited to twelve; such, however, has not been the effect of the law, for the Army Register now shows nineteen Lieutenants in this department—seven supernumerary Brevet Second Lieutenants, one more than the number of Second Lieutenants, having been attached to the department, in violation of the provisions of two acts of Congress passed in 1812 and 1838.

The Colonel and chief of the department is kept on a sort of "special duty," the nature of which no one can understand, and it is shrewdly suspected that no better reason is known for it than a desire to make room for a more ambitious though less desiring aspirant. At our arsenals and armories these ordnance officers are to be found in numbers varying from one to six, depending on the position and its advantages. In addition to the thirty-five commissioned officers in the department, we have a corps of fifteen storekeepers to assist them in the discharge of their duties, and to relieve them from the property responsibility and other disagreeable parts of it. One of these storekeepers is to be found at every post where large supplies of property are on hand,—upon him all the pecuniary responsibility for this property rests, and yet the late Secretary of War commended these ordnance gentlemen to the favor of the government on account of the heavy responsibility under which they rested. There are about fifteen positions in our country occupied as important ordnance depôts, including arsenals and armories, with some eight or ten other unimportant positions, preserved only on account of the value of the public buildings thereon and not because they are of any use for ordnance purposes; and yet we have thirty-five officers besides fifteen storekeepers to attend to the duties at these posts. At not one of them, unless it be the arsenal at Watervliet, N. Y., is there a necessity for more than one officer, yet we find but very few of them with less than two and even three. The duties at these posts are nominally to superintend mechanics and artisans engaged in the fabrication of the implements and munitions of war, but when we consider the very large proportion of those articles supplied to our government by contract, it is difficult to imagine the occupation to be found for these meritorious officers and their mechanics and laborers, unless we advert to the splendid and princely buildings which they occupy, and the magnificent pleasure grounds surrounding them, ornamented in a style and with a studied taste and elegance far superior to any thing in private life to be found in their vicinity. A slight glance at all these things will show us the occupation of the ten, fifteen and twenty "artificers," "mechanics" and "laborers" hired at every arsenal and depôt occupied by the department. Congress makes a large appropriation annually "for arsenals," without specifying in what way, or for what purposes the money is to be expended: it seldom falls short of $100,000, and sometimes exceeds double that amount, the whole of which is employed in decorating fine residences, and laying out pleasure grounds, or "for grading public grounds, and setting out shade trees," as I find one item of the appropriation specifies.

Follow an Army into the field when an enemy is to be met, or pursued—when hardships are to be endured and danger to be faced, and where will your Ordnance gentlemen be found? Examine their fine buildings, pleasure grounds and flower gardens, and there you will find them enjoying themselves in sweet repose, expatiating most learnedly on the errors of the Commanding General in making such and such a movement, and laying down on paper a very pretty plan by which they would have done the work had they been permitted to manage it. This was most strikingly exemplified during the Florida war, at no time of which were there more than three ordnance officers in the country—in the field they never were—though two thirds of the line of the Army were then engaged in active operations. Yet these gentlemen could at any time have furnished a plan to finish the war by one campaign! And these are the modest gentlemen who, living in their carpeted parlors, promenading in their pleasure grounds, and occasionally looking into their workshops, as much from curiosity as a sense of duty, claim for themselves, in contradistinction to the line of the Army, the appellation of Scientific! and thereon ground a claim for cavalry pay and allowances, which an infatuated Congress granted, much to the surprise of every one and to the serious injury of the Army, which has had to bear up under the burden of heavy expense thus incurred, and the abuse consequent to it. Upon what grounds they presume to appropriate to themselves the title of scientific it puzzles one to know, especially when he is acquainted with their performances and the results of their labors, and is not entirely ignorant of the reputation enjoyed, and justly enjoyed, by some of them during a four years trial in scientific studies at the Military Academy. Nothing can more feebly test their claim to this title than an examination of the results of their labors. Those who have had to use their scientific productions in target practice, and in the field before an enemy, will never consent to darken the annals of science by admitting the authors of these works as worthy members of so sacred a class.

Nothing so clearly proves the uselessness of and the want of necessity for these highly paid, fed, and pampered officers of ordnance than the fact that something for them to do seems to be the most difficult question the department has to settle; and tours of inspection, boards, and even details for pleasure trips in Europe at public expense are becoming the regular duties of the Ordnance Department. The commanding officers of our fortifications can not be permitted to mount or dismount a number of guns, but they must have an ordnance officer to superintend it, a grateful relief, it's true, from the scientific operation of raising from five to eight thousand pounds of metal to an elevation of six feet and placing it on a carriage, but it may be questioned whether a Second Lieutenant of the Ordnance Department by virtue of such an appointment is more competent to discharge this duty than a veteran who has superintended the mounting and dismounting of more guns than this unfledged protégé of the government has numbered days in his life. I will venture that any non-commissioned officer in our service will take the same number of men and mount double the number of guns in the same time, and do it better than any one who can be selected from this scientific corps,—and I doubt whether any claims would be set up to scientific honors for accomplishing such a feat. It must be borne in mind, however, that this mounting and dismounting of guns is a mere cloak under which to cover a trip of pleasure for some selected favorites of the department, who wish to make tours through particular sections of the country, and who see no more of the mounting of guns than if that were not their business. It is remembered that about the time the Hon. J. C. Spencer issued an order in 1842, changing the allowances for transportation to officers, some two or three of these gentlemen were on tours through the country, but no sooner was that order out, which changed these travelling allowances from an emolument into a slight burden, than the necessity which had existed for their superintendence of this scientific duty ceased, and they suddenly winged their way to Washington,—since which, they have not been heard of; yet our guns have not ceased to be mounted and dismounted. Now, that the original allowances for transportation are restored at the instance and by the intercession of the Staff Departments in Washington, we may expect soon to hear of other missions connected with this important service. Some officers of the Staff have made large sums by these travelling emoluments, and I suppose the Ordnance Department could see no reasons for not dividing the spoils, especially as they are the victors, having not only declared but maintained their independence of the Commanding General of the Army.

Upon what just and equitable principle these scientific (!) gentlemen were placed on an equality with cavalry officers as to pay and allowances has never yet been explained; nor has the country ever learned the necessity which existed for furnishing each of these officers at government expense with forage for one, two, three, four, or five horses, according to his rank, when the duties which they have to perform confine them entirely to the limits of their offices and workshops. It is no doubt very convenient and a great pleasure to these gentlemen of the "bomb-shell" to be able to call for their horse, or their buggy for the purpose of taking a ride around their pleasure grounds, or visiting the cities in their vicinity, but why should the government be saddled with the expense! The true state of the case is, that two thirds of the officers of the department are unnecessary, and thousands of dollars annually expended for their private benefit in ornamenting and enriching their habitations and pleasure-grounds might be saved to the treasury by dispensing with those who expend them. By this, the harmony and efficiency of the Army would be restored—the practical instruction and improvement of our Artillery arm, now neglected, would be revived,—and the welfare of the whole service be advanced instead of the private interests of a few individual members.

If it shall ever become necessary for our country to resort to arms, and our Army is brought into action, the sad and culpable neglect which has existed and still exists, and grows worse in regard to our Artillery, will prove most disastrous. We shall not then be able to secure the services of one of these scientific gentlemen to remount and dismount our guns disabled by an enemy's shot; nor shall we have them always at our elbows to supply munitions of war prepared for service; the Artillery will be looked to, and very properly, for that, and yet its members are deprived of every means and opportunity by which to gain the necessary information. And this injury is inflicted upon the service by a system which saddles the government with an annual expenditure of at least $100,000, to support an Ordnance Department. By keeping a portion of our Artillery constantly at arsenals of construction, the greater part of the expense for hired and enlisted men could be dispensed with, and the most valuable information disseminated throughout the Army without cost and with the most beneficial results. But this probably would not comport with the dignity and independence of the ordnance corps and its scientific members, who might feel contaminated by an association with men, many of whom they looked up to before accident and intrigue placed them in their present comfortable, but, from being assailable, most unenviable positions.

The rippling waves on yonder stream,
How joyously they flow!
And smile beneath the sun's glad beam,
While all is cold and dark below.

E'en so a smile will oft-times steal
Across the brow of care,
And, from the world, a heart conceal
That pines in silent, lone despair.

How gaily o'er the moon-lit deep
Some fairy bark may glide,
All reckless of the Dead who sleep
In Ocean's caves beneath the tide!

And so may pass gay Pleasure's train
That heart unheeded by,
Whose Hope, deceiv'd by phantom vain,
Returns to fold her wing and die.

ELEGY

ON A MOCKING-BIRD KILLED BY A CAT.

Weep for the feathered minstrel gone,
The woodland wit, the poet wild,
The troubadour of silver tone,
Euterpe's winged and frolic child!—
His song is hushed, his gay laugh done,
His bright eye motionless and dim;
No more his fair wings glint the sun;
The Loved of Beauty,—weep for him!

From honeysuckle groves he came,
From wooing eyes, to gaze on hers;
To syllable in song her name.
And shame her duller worshippers:
And not in vain his ardent love,—
He won the lady's homage deep,
She prized her bird all beaux above;
But he is dead,—then for him weep!

Ah yes! how oft in shade and sun,
I've seen her with the winged bard play,
Forgetful of the human one,
Who envious gazed his soul away!—
And oh! what tones that bird would breathe
When playing with her cherry lips!—
As who would not!—yet mourn his death,
For 'twas a sudden, sad eclipse!

One mild and rosy summer eve,
When revelling in light and song,
With but one tone that seemed to grieve
His beauteous mistress absent long,—
As through the room his voice he flung,
In tones would craze a Malibran,
The parlor-tiger on him sprung,
And WILLIE was "a ruined man!"

Yet bright his life! her smiles by day
Were more than flowers or song to him,
And through the night his amorous lay
Around her dreaming couch would swim:
And oh! what glimpses met his eye,
Of charms but dreamed by other swains!—
If I such beauty could espy,
Grimalkin too might end my pains!

Yet mourn for him!—Ye rival bards
In gushing strains of sorrow weep!
His fate,—alas! like CHATELARD'S,— Ye should in long remembrance keep:
For had he never shaped his breath
In amorous odes 'round Beauty's shrine,
He had not met his cruel death,
Nor filled this cat-a-logue of mine!

Then WILLIE mourn ! for she will weep
 Her poet-pet, whose songs are o'er ;
 Oh ! sweet as Ovid's be his sleep,
 Where cats and beaux shall vex no more !
 I mourn him too,—yet own my tears
 Are like my numbers, somewhat flat,—
 For through the shades, my fancy hears
 The Mock-bird crying—"Scat !—'escat !"

CUPID AND FLORA.

TO A LADY FOR A BOUQUET.

Cupid and Flora together were straying,
 In frolicsome mood, through the flowers one day.
 And each to the other such "soft things" was saying,
 As only a God and a Goddess may say.

At length somewhat saddened, young Cupid bewailed him,
 That his power o'er hearts was growing much less,
 And arts, that till recently never had failed him,
 Had failed him where most he had wished for success.

"Sweet queen of the flowers!"—he sighing demanded,
 "Can't you lend me some aid in these troublesome times?
 My sceptre is broken, and oh!—to be candid,—
 There's no virtue in arrows, or ringlets, or rhymes!"

"Unless you assist me, I'm ruined all hollow!
 That rascally Plutus will seize on my throne,
 And soon, in his triumph,—base God of the dollar!
 Control every heart in the land as his own.

"By the bolts of my father!" "Don't swear!" said the Goddess,
 "I'll teach you a trick from your troubles will save,
 And drive back vile Plutus, who a greedy old clod is,
 To the silence and gloom of his miserly cave!"

"Just walk in this bower, and look at my treasures;
 With these I have governed for many a day,
 And held, by the force of their innocent pleasures,
 O'er the hearts of my people, imperial sway!"

"Now frame thee a wreath from these bright starring flowers, Encinctured about with thy bow's silken string,
 And, my word for it, Love, by their delicate powers,
 You'll reign in all hearts, as the flower-crowned king.

"Whenever you wish to make captive some bosom,
 That long all your magical arts has defied,
 Just feather your arrows with flower and blossom,
 And the trifer no longer your skill shall deride."

No sooner the Goddess, benignant, had spoken,
 Than Cupid framed quickly a fragrant bouquet,
 Looped 'round with the string from his bow he had broken,
 And pleasantly bade Mrs. Flora—good-day!

Swift, swiftly he flew to a fair blooming maiden,
 Who long with the God had a favorite been,
 And placed in her bosom the treasure, dew-laden,
 And bade her rule with it as Love's chosen queen!

As bees in the Spring-time 'round myrtle-bells hover,
 And quaff of their beauty till drunk with delight,
 So round that fair maiden hung many a lover,
 Entranced by the smiles of the Peerless and Bright.

But in frolicsome mood, on a sad, lonely poet,
 The maiden, one morning, the token bestowed,
 And won by its magic,—ah! well did she know it!—
 A bosom that long with no passion had glowed!

His heart like a cup, once with bright water sparkling,
 But rudely o'erturned by a pitiless hand,
 Long, long had lain broken and empty and darkling,
 No more on the shrine of affection to stand,

Yet roused by the touch of that beautiful sceptre,
 The ghosts of dead feelings came back 'round his heart,
 And smiled in the light of the beauty that kept her,
 Like angels in heaven, from sorrow apart!

But cruel the vision: those feelings and flowers
 Were doomed alike soon to one sorrowful lot,
 They flourished in bliss for a few sunny hours,
 Then withered in sadness and both were forgot.

For that lady she smiled on another adorer;
 And the bard in his frenzy awoke his wild lute,
 And cursed in heroics, both Cupid and Flora,
 The one for a vixen, the other a brute!

A NATIVE LITERATURE.

To the Editor of the Sou. Lit. Messenger.

SIR: I shall make no apology for troubling your readers with some remarks on the policy of extending the privilege of Copyright to foreign authors, fully and ably as the subject has been discussed in the recent numbers of the Messenger, deeming it, as I do, one of the first importance to the advancement of letters in the United States.

Until lately, the principal parties to this question were the literary men on one side, and the booksellers on the other—the one insisting on the policy of protecting domestic authors from the cheap, because untaxed literature of Great Britain, and the other urging the benefits of this very cheapness to the American people. Of late, however, many of our great publishers, finding themselves supplanted by the newspaper press, in the republication of foreign popular productions, have become advocates for an International Copyright, and have united, I believe, in the last petitions to Congress in favor of a measure that had been adopted long ago but for their opposition to it.

But this union of parties has not produced the anticipated effect. The extraordinary and unlooked-for cheapness with which books have been recently furnished, first by the newspaper press, and since by the regular trade, has raised up new adversaries to the proposed change. Finding that the pleasures and the profit of reading are thus carried to the remotest corners of the Union, and that mental aliment, once a costly luxury, is now brought within reach of the poorest among us, men of liberal and cultivated minds have, for the first time, become opposed to an International Copyright, lest it should deprive the country of the immense benefits of cheap books. Such, at least, is the inference from the continued inaction of Congress, and from the ingenious essay of your correspondent, J. B. D. While I cordially unite with him as to the advantages of cheap literature, and readily admit that, whether we consider the subject as politicians or philanthropists, his fervid eulogy on its benign effects is not overwrought, I do not think that these advantages will be materially affected by the proposed extension of Copyright, or that he has advanced arguments which should shake our confidence in the wisdom of that measure.

The chief consideration which prompted the great body of our professed writers in 1837 to second the application of British authors to Congress for an extension of the Copyright law was, that, while American publishers could obtain the works of English writers free of cost, they would not, and in fact could not, pay any thing to the domestic author, except now and then for works of a local character, or from pens of established reputation. The new productions thus gratuitously furnished by England, together with the reprint of the standard works in the language, were sufficient to employ the whole capital vested in the business of bookselling, and to satisfy the demands of the reading public in the United States. To place then the domestic author on a level with the foreign, they asked that the monopoly now given by our law to the one should be extended to the other; and since American publishers would then be compelled to pay for the right to reprint foreign original works, it was not doubted that they would also find their account in remunerating American authors.

In making this application our writers no doubt regarded their own exclusive interests, but the justice of their claims can not be easily resisted. Not, certainly, by tariff men, who, seeking to protect every other species of American industry against the cheaper products of foreign countries, could not consistently withhold such protection from those products which are first in dignity, and which, if the protection proved efficient, would, more than every other, elevate the national character. Their claim was the stronger, too, because English books, republished in this country, sold at a less price here than they sold there—the American public being free from the charge of Copyright which the English public was obliged to pay. Nor can the advocates of free trade oppose the desired change, since it is a fundamental principle of their school to put all producers, foreign and domestic, on a footing of equality.

But many who had no personal interest to serve, were in favor of International Copyright; from its probable influence on American literature, which, silenced by the cheaper literature of England, languished for want of exercise. The cultivation of letters, as a distinct employment, is as yet in its infancy with us, and it needs the benefits of exercise and emulation for the development of its powers. Look at the early productions of eminent writers, and compare them with those of their maturer years. They differ almost as much as the boy from the man. It is not often indeed that we have an opportunity of making the comparison, as the first efforts at authorship are generally anonymous and confined to the periodical press. It is only after repeated trials in his unfledged state that the writer ventures to essay the force of his wing in open day. Of course we can not see the feebleness, the baldness, the alternate yea-nay-ity and false glitter of his first experiments, or measure the wide chasm between them and the fruits of his ripened genius. Could we see the first effusions of Shakspeare, we should no doubt find in them the same crudeness—the same false taste. Ribaldry mistaken for wit, childish conceits for felicitous ingenuity, exaggeration for sublimity, and swelling expression for grandeur of thought; not occasionally, as we now see, but habitually, and unredeemed by those exquisite beauties which have made him the boast of our language. Had his mind wanted the benefit of the intermediate exercise, it had never attained its subsequent excellence. But our writers are deprived of this benefit under their present discouragements. In such a state of general inaction, to expect much improvement in our literature is about as rational as to expect that your infant son would acquire agility or strength of limb, if you kept him always tied to his chair.

Hence it is that, in every thing useful or great, the progress of nations, as well as of individuals, is gradual and slow, whether in commerce, manufactures, arts, or letters; and we must not vainly hope that our Minerva, like her of the ancient mythology, is to leap into existence fullgrown and armed at all points, but expect to see her, in passing from infancy to maturity, crawl and walk before she is able to jump and run.

Nor let it be thought that the desire of a name—of instructing or delighting mankind is sufficient to afford the requisite exercise. That may suffice to produce good poets, but not to create a national literature. It will no doubt influence, as it has influenced, a few ardent, energetic minds to persevere in a course of unprofitable labor, until they have ultimately earned money as well as fame. But these instances are but occasional, and we require incentives that operate steadily and operate upon all. It has been to overcome pinching want that some of the best English poets have written, and hundreds of the greatest names in their literature have perfected their talents in writing for a livelihood. To what purpose had been their fine conceptions without an accoucheur, in the form of a bookseller, to usher them into day? The laudum immensa cupido is indeed a powerful motive to ex-tion, but it finds a very efficient auxiliary in the auri sacra fames. When the passion for military glory was at its height in France, it was not that on which Napoleon relied so much as his liberal rewards to his marshals and soldiers. Besides, the profits of authorship are one of the most unequivocal signs of merit, and when Irving or Cooper received four or five thousand dollars for a single work, and Scott or Byron more than as many guineas, these remunerations of their genius gratified their love of glory quite as much as their love of gain. What, let me ask, would have been the character of our lawyers and physicians if they had not been rewarded by fees as well as fame? But the elements of their learning and science are precisely those of a national literature, and they would equally profit by the same encouragement.

We have a further reason, in the peculiar circumstances of our country, why our literature can not give up any incentive to its cultivation. We chance to have the same mother tongue as another nation far before us in science and literature, which has a numerous and well-instructed class, adequate to a copious and perennial supply of new books, and a wealthy aristocracy, able and willing to reward it. While here, our educated and half educated classes are barely sufficient for the liberal professions and the higher political offices. The consequence is, that, though the population of the United States and Great Britain are now almost precisely equal, both being about 19,000,000, there are twenty, or perhaps fifty times as many original works annually published in that country as in this. Without doubt, much of our inferiority is to be attributed to the difference of circumstances adverted to, and must continue until we have denser population, better schools of instruction, and a larger class exclusively devoted to letters; yet a part may also be fairly ascribed to the fact that the British writers receive, and ours do not receive a reward which is coveted by all, and is indispensable to the poor man. To expect that our literature would make no greater progress with this encouragement than when its only motive power was the popularis aura, is to suppose that a sail vessel will make as short a voyage as a steamer.

But these considerations, which appeal so forcibly to our national pride and love of country, must yield to that of the greater cheapness of books in the present state of things. If it be admitted that an International Copyright will improve our literature, elevate us in the eyes of others, and in our own eyes, what liberal or patriotic mind would compare those noble objects with a paltry saving of money? To let such saving weigh as a feather in the comparison, we should well deserve the reproach often cast on us of estimating every thing by dollars. It may, however, be said that it is not the saving, but the effects of the saving which are to be regarded. By reason of the present cheapness of books the people have at once more taste for reading and better means of gratifying it. That the cause of letters may be as much benefited by enlightening and instructing the mass of the people, as by giving a further stimulus to the efforts of a few gifted minds; and that the interests of the class of readers, amounting to tens of thousands, must not be sacrificed to that of writers, consisting at most of but a few hundred.

If the effect of an International Copyright were to deprive the people of their present easy access to books, then indeed one might well hesitate whether we should give up so great a public benefit for the sake of improving the literary character of the nation. But the degree of enhancement of price, and the effects of that enhancement, which the argument supposes, seem to me altogether unwarranted.

In the first place, all the books of which the Copyright has expired, comprehending the great mass of standard works, in poetry, history, philosophy, and general literature, would not be at all raised in price. They would continue to be sold, as they now are, both here and in England, for the cost of paper, print and binding, and the ordinary profits of capital, and since time washes away the light and flimsy fabrics of intellect, leaving its solid structures untouched, the books that are thus disburdened of the charge of Copyright, must always constitute the most valuable as well as the largest portion.

It is readily admitted that those stock works—the cream of English literature—will not, and ought not to satisfy the taste of the reading community; that they will crave new books; and that these will be enhanced in price when made subject to Copyright. But the addition to the price would be very small, so small as to be insignificant even to the poorest. As in other monopolies, the vendor would have to choose whether he would sell a few books at a high price, or many at a low one, and experience having clearly shown that the last course is the most profitable, that course, we may confidently expect, will be taken. It is not in this case as in that of valuable patented machines, in which the inventor can exact a price in proportion to the utility of the machine, without much affecting the number sold. But the consumption of books will indefinitely expand or contract according as they have merit and cheapness, or want it. If the foreign author, unversed in the laws of trade, were to demand so large a sum for his Copyright that it would require both an extensive sale and a high price to reimburse the bookseller, he could not find a purchaser. He would then be content with that sum for his remuneration which the publisher could obtain by a small advance on each copy. He might find it to his interest to take even less than his publisher could afford to give him, rather than to run the risk of having his work pirated, and be involved in a course of litigation, in a foreign country, and perhaps with irresponsible people. For these reasons I think that if the privilege of Copyright were extended to foreign authors, the price per copy of their most popular works would be but inconsiderably enhanced, except, perhaps, in those few copies which were printed in a costly style, in which case a more liberal remuneration to the author may be mixed up in the extra price.

Your correspondent, J. B. D., seems to be fully aware of the advantage of large sales at low prices, and he thinks that the American bookseller, who is now profiting by this advantage, may pay the domestic author without feeling it. And so he would pay, if he could not republish English books free of cost. But so long as he can thus employ his capital, to give $1,500, or $1,000 for an American work which would sell no better than a foreign one costing nothing, is not to be expected. It may be remarked that, for reasons which it would be tedious here to detail, the bookseller's business is one of the most unprofitable of all trades. The greater part of those who follow it earn no more than a livelihood, a large proportion become bankrupt, and not one in a hundred becomes rich. The late Matthew Carey of Philadelphia was one of these very few, and I state, on good authority, that he made his fortune chiefly by a single lucky hit—the publication of Scott's Bible. Those, then, who escape the general fate of the class are remarkable for prudence and for sharpness in their dealings, and are not the men to give a thousand dollars, or even five hundred, for an article when they can get as good a one for nothing. But now and then they do pay for an American work, which has no British competitor. In such cases, if you meet with a liberal publisher, ten to one but he breaks before he pays for the Copyright. But if you look out for one who will punctually comply with his bargain, you will be sure to find him tight in making it.

I would add, that should the price of foreign works be sensibly raised by an extension of Copyright, it would not be an uncompensated evil. Now that books, by reason of their extraordinary cheapness and easy transmission through the mail, are brought to every man's door, no species of literary production has been so multiplied as works of fiction. This arises from their being peculiarly suited to the general taste and to their being now attainable by a numerous class of readers, to whom they have opened a new world of delight. The consequence is, that the great mass of the community read little else. I do not grudge them this mental luxury, but cordially sympathize in their newborn enjoyment. Nor have I any sweeping prejudice against novel reading. With some harm, it does much good. It brings us employment when idle, society in solitude, and, transporting us to ideal scenes, makes us sweetly oblivious of the cares and anxieties of real life. Its occasional immoral tendency, too, has been greatly overrated, and much that has been said on this subject is downright twaddle. We must distinguish between what is offensive to good taste, and what is corrupting to good morals. Mere indecency may disgust, but does not contaminate. The grossness of Swift is simply repulsive, and never excited an immoral emotion. Vice must be arrayed with beauty and grace to be seductive. It is only those novels in which it is made to exhibit refinement, and is associated with generosity, frankness and other captivating virtues, or in which unlicensed passion is enkindled by glowing descriptions and cunningly wrought pictures of fancy, that corrupt the heart. Of this character are Liaisons dangereuses, Faublas—satan's own spawn both for eloquence and wickedness—and, to a certain extent, Rousseau's Heloise. To a woman of a sensitive heart and a lively imagination—as most women are—these works are a deadly poison. Some of the passages in the novels of Pigault, Le Brun and Paul de Kock are amenable to the same charge, though these writers have great merit, and it is probably to them that Dickens owes his talent of making minuteness of detail graphic without being tiresome. But the Mysteries of Paris, which some have proscribed as immoral, whatever we may think of its wild exaggerations and its too faithful delineations of scenes of horror or disgust, never had a corrupting influence on a single human being.

But with all these qualifications to an indiscriminate censure of novels, I do not wish to see them, as now, constitute the sole reading of the people. They may well afford an occasional, and even frequent gratification to the mind, but not be its daily food. In this case they give a distaste for less stimulating, but more instructive reading; as, I imagine, if one were to live sometime on confectionary it would destroy his relish for plain bread and meat. He certainly would be less able to digest them. Novels are therefore as fair subjects of taxation here as opium is in China, because they too have blessed effects as anodynes, but are deleterious and destructive as habitual stimulants. So far as their price would be raised by an International Copyright, the addition would be a virtual bounty on the more useful books not so enhanced, and if it should check the use of the one and encourage that of the other, these would be further good effects of the proposed change.

We have another reason for wishing an International Copyright, propitious as we have seen it is to the growth of a class exclusively devoted to letters. Such a class would be likely to correct that vice of verbosity which is now thought to characterize our speeches, our public documents, and even our literature. It is folly to suppose that this is to be ascribed to any peculiarity in our minds, to the influence of popular government, or any other permanent cause. It arises, I think, from the ascendancy which the lawyers naturally, and perhaps properly, have in our public concerns, and the influence of their example. I shall not stop to inquire how far this exuberance of words and even of thoughts, is to be referred to their habit of tasking their minds to make a bad cause good, and a good one better, or to that of making nice discriminations, or to the tautology of laws, deeds and pleadings, or to any other cause. But the fact is undoubted. The lawyer commonly uses twenty words where an ordinary man would use but ten; and more often he expands into a paragraph what he might compress into a sentence. He changes his silver into cents, and seems rich by the size of his bag, but takes as long to pay a dollar as he should take to pay a hundred. He turns his bullet into mustard seed shot, which, though it makes sad havoc with little birds, never yet brought down nobler game. There are not, perhaps, fifty lawyers in the United States who have raised themselves above this professional vice of dilatation. I don't know ten. This redundancy, which is almost a greater fault than the crotchety affectations of Carlyle, recommended as it often is by real talent and high station, has been contagious, and prevails in the pulpit and in our deliberative assemblies as well as at the bar; and hence we so often witness the curious phenomenon, that, in a large auditory, the only mind which is not weary is that which has worked the hardest. Now the cultivation of letters by a separate class would, by the force of emulation, free the class from this vice, and by their growing influence, eventually redeem the nation; and thus make the same improvement in the communication of thought that steam has made in locomotion.

I readily agree that the question of extending the Copyright law is mainly one of expediency, and I have accordingly defended the measure solely on the ground of its benefit to ourselves. But it seems to me to be no small recommendation of the change that it also conforms to the principles of abstract justice. In the country in which a book is written the right of the author to remuneration seems to be beyond dispute. That book is the joint result of the labor of the head and the hands, and both classes of laborers deserve their reward. The author, no less than the printer and paper maker, has spent his time and money in qualifying himself for his part of the work, and in actually performing it, and that which gives the book its chief value has been contributed by him. His right has been accordingly acknowledged and protected by the laws of most civilized nations.

The foundations of this natural right seem to be the same in the case of the foreigner as the citizen: he has made the same sacrifices, has rendered the same service, and the only difference is that municipal law has not felt itself called upon to defend the rights of any but the members of its own community. But the distinction is merely conventional and the principles of justice apply equally to both cases—those principles from which the law of copyright and in favor of patentees takes its origin and which are engraved on the human heart.

Some, however, not denying the claims of foreign authors altogether, say that it is one of gratitude and not of justice, and rely upon the distinction between perfect and imperfect obligations. Yet I believe that the only difference recognized by ethical writers between them is that the one being more indeterminate can not be enforced by law; and they agree that, at the bar of conscience, the two species of obligation are equally binding. It will probably be found, on a nice analysis, that our sense of justice has no other natural foundation than our instinctive feelings of gratitude and resentment,—on that ultimate fact in the constitution of our minds, by which we think that good should be returned to him who has done good to us, and evil returned to him who has done evil.

But J. B. D. endeavors to support his distinction between "the productions of mental labor and other property" by the English decision in the case of Donaldson v. Becket. As he has entirely mistaken the principle decided by that case,* misled no doubt by a compendious notice of it in some law book, I trust that when he finds the authority he relied on has failed him, he will reconsider the subject, and, taking a course more congenial to his cultivated mind and liberal views in other parts of his well written essay, unite with the friends of American literature in favor of an International Copyright.

A FRIEND TO LETTERS.

* In the report of that case, (4th Burrow,) it appears that on the several questions submitted to the Judges in the House of Lords, eight of the eleven were of opinion that "at common law" an author "had the sole right of first printing and publishing the same for sale; and might bring an action against any person who printed, published and sold the same without his consent."

Seven of the eleven were of opinion that the law did not take away his right upon his printing and publishing such book; and that no person might afterwards reprint and sell, for his own benefit, such book against the will of the author.

But six of the eleven thought that the author's action at common law was taken away by the statute of Anne. And on this last case the decision of the Chancellor, founded on that of the King's Bench, in the celebrated case of Miller v. Taylor, was reversed.

It may be further remarked, that as Lord Mansfield sat in the case of Miller v. Taylor, in which the question of literary property was so fully discussed, he, from the delicacy usual on such occasions, gave no opinion in the case of Donaldson v. Becket. But his opinions were, as Burrow says, notoriously unchanged, it is right to add the name to those of the other Judges on the two first points—making 9 on the first and 8 on the second against 3. and 4.

THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

B. B. Minor

Since the publication of our former article upon this engrossing subject, it has assumed a different aspect, and had so many political elements wrought with it, that we deem it best to leave the farther discussion of it to others. We still consider it a great national question; and believe that we might properly prosecute it as such, but it has become so mixed up with President-making and the divisions of parties, that the character of our Journal will probably be best preserved by abstaining from the discussion for the present. We can not forbear one or two remarks, however, before we dismiss the subject.

In our last number, we alluded to certain grave charges against the Hon. John Quincy Adams, in relation to the surrender of Texas to the Spanish Government in 1819. It was not our intention to take either side of those charges, and it is due to justice to state that Mr. Adams has since declared on the floor of Congress, that he was himself opposed to the said surrender, but was overruled by a majority of Mr. Monroe's Cabinet.

We wished at this time to consider particularly the subject of slavery in relation to the Annexation of Texas. Nor should this be regarded as a Southern Question only; for as parts of a whole, the interests of the parts should be deemed the interests of the whole. This Union now embraces twenty-six states, who should be welded together in bonds of fervent love. The "Old Thirteen" have become the mothers of as many daughters, some sprung from their loins, others adopted into their family, to promote the happiness and security of all and of each other. By their adoption, too, they were taken from the bosoms of less liberal mothers and the Ægis of a more enlightened Liberty was thrown around them. From their situation and circumstances, it was not, nor could have been expected, that their accession would directly benefit all the others alike. Congeniality, the place of their nativity, resemblance and other circumstances would naturally identify them with some more than others. But their hearts were one: when, the parts were equal to the whole, and when any new State was admitted, it was thought be added to the whole Union. The Atlantic States could have done without the Mississippi; but what would the great Valley of the West have done had the mouth of that "Father of Waters" remained in the possession of France? Yet, was it ever pretended that the possession of Louisiana, slavery or not, was not necessary to the whole Union? If the expediency of any other case be not as strong as this, it may still be strong enough to justify a proposed measure. Self preservation itself is but one degree of expediency, and many degrees short of this may fully justify national action. Our Northern neighbors are entitled to their anti-slavery sentiments; but do they not respect our peace and the Constitution? Can they not perceive that it is a matter of self-preservation, as slavery does exist among us, for the South to prevent herself from being placed "between two fires." If these abolition schemes of England, and of our fellow citizens, who even traverse the wide Atlantic to join with England, in world's conventions, do extend to us, one ruinous conflagration will sweep the American continent. This must be prevented and can be peaceably and honorably. It is a matter of self preservation to the South;—of duty, honor and interest to the North. In regard to our rights and the Constitution, the abolition of slavery must be left to us. In regard to our security and peace, which necessarily involve those of the Union, it must be let alone. And are not these national matters? Surely the tranquillity and safety of each State is a national matter. The Constitution is certainly a National Instrument. It recognizes slavery and prescribes the ratio of its representation. The Constitution is prospective. It says nothing of destroying this ratio, or the institution which gave rise to it. What it recognises and contemplates no change for, it guaranties. Are not they whose whole laboring class can cast their votes into the ballot-box, and whose population must, ex necessitate, increase much more rapidly than ours, content with the extinction of two-fifths of our laboring class?

In looking forward to the admission of New States, the framers of the Constitution never thought of but one prerequisite,—an equitable adjustment of the public debt. Yet, in violation of this sacred instrument, intended for all time, except wherein it is rightfully altered, a large portion of our fellow citizens wish to impose conditions, which will give them all the new States and the sole right to determine the whole question.

We are entitled to have the institution of slavery regarded as one recognized by the Constitution,—nay, guarantied by it. When the expediency of admitting new territory arises, it must be considered in relation to existing circumstances, institutions and interests. New territory must be attached to the Union upon some confine. It can not be transported to the centre. If it be in the North, it must be attached there, if attached at all, with all its institutions, so far as they are compatible with our fundamental principles. If it be in the South-West, the same course must be pursued. Any condition conforming it to the views of any section would be virtually transporting it to such section and adding it there.

As to the influence of England:—it is not necessary to suppose that England would even have Texas as a gift. She is tired of colonies. They are too expensive. She avows that she seeks commercial relations alone. Who knows not the depth of England's policy; the power and skill of her diplomacy? She only stretches out her long arm against whom her long head can not reach. China, exclusive and inaccessible, was forced to traffic. Negotiation will effect all she desires from Texas. Secret articles in a treaty might even give her a foothold in case of war, on this continent.

The commercial dependence of Texas on Britain is as consistent with the separate existence of that republic, as the apprehensions of Britain's interference with slavery are with all her repeated declarations on that subject. She avows that she is opposed to slavery every where; that she will use every proper means to effect its abolition every where; though she has no special designs upon the United States, and has made no direct overtures to Texas on the subject. Still, she has proposed to Mexico to recognize the Independence of Texas; but to prescribe the abolition of her slaves. She makes this proposition, too, notwithstanding that she is to receive one million of dollars from Texas in case her mediation is successful. Again, who shall judge what are "proper means," but Great Britain? The course of some of our Northern friends will furnish a pregnant commentary on this head. They have deemed it proper to wrest servants from our citizens who have visited them; to nullify our laws; to deny us fugitives from justice and to brand us as criminals for maintaining what our honored fathers entailed upon us and what our solemn compact has secured to us. "If they do these things in the green tree, what will they do in the dry?" If our own brethren deem these means proper, to what may not Great Britain resort? Having attentively weighed all her declarations and disclaimers, with Mr. Everett's lights upon them, we unhesitatingly declare that they are wholly unsatisfactory;—not as to her, for they may exonerate her, but as to the result to us. Her wishes are known to Texas as clearly as if she had made overtures to her; and who knows not the influence of the sentiments of a powerful nation, pledged perseveringly to carry them out. The shallowest philosophy knows and estimates the force of indirect influences, often more powerful than the most violent assaults.

"But the small continual creeping of the silent footsteps of the sea Mineth the wall of Adamant and stealthily compasseth its ruin."

"A wise man prevaileth in power, for he screeneth his battering engine, But a fool tilteth headlong, and his adversary is aware."

"For ideas are oftentimes shy of the close furniture of words And thought wherein only is power, may be best conveyed by a suggestion."

"But little wotteth he the might of the means his folly depicts;
He considereth not that these be the wires which move the puppets of the world."*

* Tupper's Thoughts:—"Of Indirect Influences."

The South has reason for apprehension. Her security should be dear to the entire Union, and when an appeal is made in her behalf, it should be regarded as made in behalf of the Union.

We have been led to say more than we intended. We now leave the subject, hoping that its decision, being made according to wisdom and enlarged patriotism, will redound to the honor, safety and happiness of the whole country.

DESULTORY NOTES ON DESULTORY READINGS.

NEW-YORK, 1844.

What Mr. Giddings said; The Spirit of the Age, to Diffuse Information; The People's Knowledge of the conduct of the Federal Government; Pride in the Excellence of National Things; The Bureau of Provisions and Clothing; How to fill it; Hints to Navy Officers, which they won't take; The New-York Journal of Medicine, Information for Mothers; A Question for Etymologists; American Deference to European Opinions of Books; Appreciation of Medical Men in France and England; The Medical Examiner; Legislature of Pennsylvania; Message of the Governor of New-York; Value of Natural History; Education of Children.

When Mr. Hale's resolution calling for information, in the House of Representatives, in relation to the expense of the Home Squadron was under debate, the Hon. Mr. Giddings said, he never felt disposed to refuse calls for information, and "he would ask whether there was a man here who would vote to refuse information to the country? Would any man deliberately record his name as voting for such refusal? Would he refuse to the people an account of money spent, when that very money had been drawn from the pockets of the people? It would be found that within the last five years the Navy had cost the American people more than thirty millions of dollars."

It seems to be the spirit of the present age, in the United States at least, to give free and unlimited circulation to all kinds of information, knowledge, whether general or special. So well known is this disposition of the people, that politicians take advantage of it to ingratiate themselves with voters, both "on the stump" and the floor of Congress. In a word, the themes of all, or almost all, political speeches are knowledge for the people, economy, and the people's money.

Being myself a very humble member of the somewhat extensive family, called the American people, I should be glad to learn from some of the political philosophers, why it is I have never had my share of these vast expenses we hear of, for the Army and Navy and other departments of the General Government. I was not really aware that I had paid my share of thirty millions of dollars in the past five years for the support of the Navy. I know I paid State taxes, but, to my knowledge, paid not a stiver to the General Government. To me this tax has been a mere abstraction, and I am very much inclined to think that my own case is that of eight in ten of the whole population. It really seems to me that all this declamation about the people's money is mere fustian and rant, a lure to catch votes. If we, the people, were not told of it, I question whether the majority would know where the General Government gets its means of support. Times will change, and the grand chorus of politicians will change too. The day will arrive when the weakness of the people will be to be proud of their institutions for their excellence and not on account of their little cost. We shall be proud of our National Library, our National University, our National Institute, of our Diplomatic Corps, of our Army, our Navy, our Military and Naval Hospitals, our Military Academy, our Naval School, our National Foundry, our National Observatory, &c., &c. We shall point to all these things proudly, because we shall think that excellence will be their predominant quality, and we shall think as little about their expense as we do of the cost of rearing a "show-beef." Who knows, except the owner, how much money was expended in making the celebrated Tyler ox weigh over 1000 lbs. Does any one of the admiring and admired people, even now, ask how much money the Steamer Princeton, or Mississippi cost; the people do not feel they cost any thing, and are gratified in believing them to be, in their kind, superior in all respects to any thing that floats upon the waters of the world. The people would not forego the gratification of national pride in these vessels in order that double the amount of their cost should be returned into the National Treasury. Would the people sell the Navy—would they part with it for a hundred millions paid down into the National Treasury, and the nine or ten millions yearly expense of sustaining it? If they would, their character has changed since 1776. We might as well ask if England would sell Westminster Abbey to extinguish her national debt! This debt is the pride of the nation!

A correspondent of a Boston paper, alluding to the appointment to fill the place of Chief of the bureau of provisions and clothing in the Navy Department, says, "But even if Isaac should be rejected, I can assure gentlemen of the Navy, many of whom have applied for his situation, that no one of their gallant body will be selected. Their country can not dispense with their services on the open sea."

This, says the "United States Gazette," is a gentle hint to "land loving seamen who try to creep on the quarter deck to the bureau"—"the nation will not educate and pay Navy officers to add up columns of figures."

If it be desirable to curtail the political patronage of the Executive, it might be well if the honest men in public life would inquire into the propriety of selecting a purser of the Navy for that station. It is the business of pursers to be familiar with "provisions and clothing" for seamen, and on this point, a purser would probably bring with him into the office more knowledge than any individual of almost any other professional pursuit.

"The New-York Journal of Medicine and the Collateral Sciences. Edited by Samuel Forry, M. D., 1844." Published "Bi-monthly," by J. & H. G. Langley.

When a newspaper is published "bi-weekly," we receive two copies a week; and "tri-weekly," three papers a week, but the "New-York Journal of Medicine" comes to us once in two months instead of twice a month. If "bi-weekly," means twice a week, and not once in two weeks, why should "bi-monthly" mean once, in two months, and not twice a month! This is a question for etymologists. Let them decide.

This journal averages about 144 pages, occupied by original communications, notices of books and numerous items of "medical intelligence." The variety of its subjects is considerable; not less than 84 in some numbers, that is, about a page and a half on an average to each subject.

We learn from the leading article in January, by Professor John B. Beck "on the effects of opium on the infant subject," that "Godfrey's cordial" in a single dose proved fatal in two cases and "in some instances, a few drops of Dalby's carminative have proved fatal in the course of a few hours to very young infants." Both these nostrums contain opium. Children are more susceptible to the action of opium than adults; consequently, it should never be administered without the advice of a physician. Old laudanum and old paregoric are stronger than when recently prepared, therefore uncertain in their effects.

Dr. Charles Caldwell of Kentucky presents a very remarkable review of Liebig's "Chemistry applied to Agriculture or Physiology." We quote the following as illustrative of the rather intense style of the writer. "The second reason for the undeserved popularity of Animal Chemistry is one which, as an American, I blush to record. The work is the production of a foreigner—a circumstance which, irrespective of merit or any other valuable consideration, strongly recommends it to too many of our countrymen. The reason is plain. As regards literature and science, we have not yet, as a people, learnt to know, respect and appreciate ourselves." (British writers don't think so!) "A colonial, not to call it a servile spirit, accompanied by a virtual acknowledgment of inferiority, so thoroughly pervades and actuates us, that we continue, as we did, in our provincial condition, before the swords of our gallant fathers had severed the chains and shackles that enthralled us, to regard Europeans as bearing toward us still the relation of instructors at least, if not of masters. Deny this, in words, as we may, our actions testify abundantly to its truth. The result is obvious and humiliatingly discreditable to us. We too often receive their mere dicta with the acquiescence and observance which would be due to them only were they delivered to us in the character of oracular responses."

French gratitude to medical men is mentioned. The names of Percy, Desgenettes and Larrey have been recently engraved on the famous Arc de Triomphe, at the Barrière de l'Étoile. Portal, Dupuytren and Cuvier were made Peers of the realm. Louis has been made an officer of the Legion of Honor, and Leuret a chevalier of the same order. Andral and Rayer have been elected members of the institute. In England medical men often achieve knighthood, for example Sir Astley Cooper, Sir Benjamin Brodie, Sir Charles Bell, Sir Henry Hallford, &c., &c.

Upon the whole, the New-York Journal can not claim, from its intrinsic merits, to be ranked among the very first medical periodicals of the United States. The cleverness and industry of its Editor, however, may bring it up to a higher level in a short time, provided there be sufficient patronage.

We turn from this to a very much smaller medical journal, in our judgment, of superior pretensions. It is published once every two weeks, but is not called a "bi-weekly," nor yet a "bi-monthly"—"The Medical Examiner and Retrospect of the Medical Sciences, edited by Meredith Clymer, M. D.," &c., Philadelphia. Each number contains 16 pages, devoted chiefly to reports of clinical lectures, and hospital reports, but a good deal of its space is occupied by honest reviews, and valuable excerpts from the periodical medical literature of Europe. The independent, high, gentlemanly tone of this little journal commends it to every lover of medical truth and honesty. "It is published every alternate Saturday."

Among the signs of the spirit of the present age, we note that there is a "Committee on Education" in each branch of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The school system of that State has many admirers: it will ultimately be of great value to the commonwealth and also to the whole country. The governor of New York, in his last message to the Legislature, congratulates the people, very justly, because "education in all its various departments has been beneficially extended," and he informs us that "The Geological Survey and the publishing of the Natural History are in progress and will be completed in 1844." Reports on Mineralogy, Geology, Zoology and Botany have already been published by the State.

Natural History is daily becoming of greater importance as a branch of common education, and in the course of a few years will be almost universally taught. Without a knowledge of the principles of general physiology and of natural history generally, Geology, which may be said to be the blossom and bloom* of natural history, can not be advantageously studied. The value of this science to the country is almost daily seen in the discovery of mines of metals, coal, &c., which without it might still remain unknown.

Among the popular errors is that which causes parents to make efforts to form precocious geniuses of their children. The notion that the infant mind is capable of acquiring learning led to the establishment of infant schools, of which, thanks to the spirit of the day, we now hear very little. On the subject of infantile education, Dr. Condie holds the following language:

"There is not, perhaps, remarks a sensible German writer, a greater or more reprehensible mistake in education, than the very common practice of compelling children to extraordinary mental exertions, and exacting from them early and rapid progress in intellectual pursuits; this is, too often, the grave both of their health and of their talents. The age of infancy is designed for bodily exercise, which strengthens and perfects the frame, and not for study which enfeebles it and checks its growth.

"Let the beginning of life, the first six years, perhaps, be devoted entirely to forming the body and organs of sense, by exercise in the open air. It is not necessary that the child should be permitted to grow up like a wild animal; for, with proper care, his mind may be made to receive considerable and valuable instruction through the medium of the senses, and the conversation of those around him. In these two ways, he may, indeed, acquire more useful knowledge by the end of his sixth year, than a child who had learned to read in his fourth. In his seventh year, he may spend an hour or two daily at his book; in his eighth, three hours; and so on until his fifteenth, when he may have six or seven hours allotted for study.

"Children are frequently confined to the school-room for many hours daily, when not occupied in any useful pursuit;—which time, without detracting from that necessary to the cultivation of the mind, might, with great propriety, be devoted to those bodily exercises and recreations which tend to develop the strength and promote the regular and energetic action of every organ of the frame—the brain and nervous system included."

Again:—"It is, indeed, to be regretted, that a small portion of the education of youth is devoted to the acquisition of knowledge from personal observation. The perceptive faculties are trained in a great measure, neglected, and the erudition of books, even in the acquisition of the natural sciences, is made to supplant the more exact, vivid and permanent impressions derived through their medium; on every subject of knowledge the mind receives a foreign impression—it is made to learn by the observations of others, rather than by original reflection, and to receive, upon the authority of books, what it should admit only in consequence of previous self-conviction,—its own original powers of acquisition being sacrificed at the shrine of authority”—A Practical Treatise on the Diseases of Children by D. NOTES ON OUR ARMY;

OFFICIAL REMONSTRANCE, &c.

The articles of "A Subaltern" upon our Army well deserve the attention of every friend of economy and of purity and efficiency in the public service. We are glad to learn that they have already attracted the attention of several distinguished members of both houses of Congress, who are willing and anxious to ferret out and correct the many grievous abuses which have crept into the Army, from year to year, and which "A Subaltern" so independently rebukes and exposes. We wonder that some of the public prints have not taken up these manly articles, and urged them upon the attention of the public. There is hardly enough of party politics in them, or the subject, to commend them to those now so particularly occupied with partizan strife and tactics; and hence arises the utility of, nay the necessity for, some independent vehicle of communication, uninfluenced by party heats and manoeuvres and unswayed by fear, favor, or affection towards "the powers that be." But there are many bold and patriotic journals, who would gladly have taken hold of this important subject, but for the engrossing excitements of the political arena. Indeed, some have ably handled it, induced thereto by the action of Congress, who with the long list of Army expenditures in one hand, and crying out "enormous," "prodigious," have blindly struck at the whole establishment. Without knowing where the excess was, where abuse had reared its luxuriant shoots, they have cut at the whole tree of our National protection, impairing it, by depriving the main body of its vital sap and nourishment. The top-heavy and overshadowing branches, the redundant bloom and gorgeous drapery, require the pruning knife. These are more than the trunk can well sustain; and abundant and waste the health and vigor of the parent stem. All who have taken this view of this important matter, in or out of Congress, will find a worthy coadjutor in "A Subaltern."

After the just commendation bestowed upon the "Notes on our Army," we must state that their tone has been objected to, and that by those who speak somewhat ex cathedra. A short time since we received the following remonstrance:

FORT ———, MAY —, 1844.

Sir,—At the Session of the Council of Administration of this Post of the ——— ultimo, an expression of its opinion in reference to certain articles signed Subaltern, published during the present year in the Southern Literary Messenger, was adopted as a part of its proceedings, with a direction that I should communicate the same to its Editor. I have accordingly extracted the following from the minutes of the proceedings of the Council, which I have the honor to transmit as directed.

"The Council of Administration of Fort ———, having subscribed to the Southern Literary Messenger, mainly induced thereto by the consideration that the Journal was open to the discussion of Military matters, feels constrained to express its decided disapprobation of the tone which has prevailed in the articles lately published and signed Subaltern, inasmuch as they indulge in harsh epithets to a number of officers.

"Be it therefore unanimously resolved, that the Post Treasurer communicate to the Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger the above expression of opinion.

Capt. ———, Pres. Council.

Capt. and A. Q. M., Sec. to Council of Administr.
Approved—(Signed) ———,
Lt. Col. Com'g."

The Council of Administration consists of three members of which the Surgeon of the Post is one; the above extract is, therefore, to be considered as the deliberate opinion of the four officers highest in rank of this garrison.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Very respectfully,
Your most ob't serv't,

—————,
Capt. ———, Post Treasurer.

Benj. B. Minor, Esq.

Editor Sou. Lit. Messenger.

Though a little surprised at the receipt of this, we took it, as we believe it was intended, in a respectful and temperate spirit. Such remarks as we make upon it will be tendered in the most respectful and courteous manner, as to the officers of Fort ——— and to all the officers of the Army.

When "A Subaltern" submitted his first article, he wrote to inquire if the Messenger would be open to such discussions, conducted in a proper manner. We replied that the Messenger should be open to every question of general, public interest; and that we would be glad for it to be the instrument of subserving the interests of the Army, as we believed it had those of the Navy. At the same time, we distinctly told him, that we would soften down some of his expressions towards certain public officers, which we did, and for which we have since received the thanks of "A Subaltern." He knows that we object to asperity and abuse; and we know, that, though earnest, zealous and indignant, he desires to be respectful and just. Yet he is fearless and independent, and when he thinks the circumstances warrant it, we give him the liberty of plainly uttering his sentiments. The tone of a writer is an inherent part of his style and a nice discriminator of tones would strip of its essence the style of some of the greatest worthies of English Literature. Pope, Swift and a host of others did not pause to weigh their words, when they were enlisted warmly in a favorite cause. Even the mild and dignified Secretary Addison would have been excited to unwonted indignation, in pointing out such abuses as are now destroying our Army and bringing farther injustice upon the innocent sufferers under them. A writer is naturally more wrought upon than his readers: his temperament, too, may be very, very different from theirs and ours,—and we can not possibly undertake to emasculate communications sent to the Messenger, to suit the supposed, or expressed taste of those who may not so enter into the feelings and circumstances of the writer as to excuse his warmth, or perhaps his severity. At the same time, we hold ourselves responsible for a strict conformity with the rules of decency and propriety. If there be nothing offending against these, we may permit another to say things in a tone different from that which we would adopt; for all men's temperaments are not alike and we erect no Procrustean bed for the writers for the Messenger.

We like a sprightly, spicy writer, warmed up by his subject, even though he may sometimes pour forth a sharp volley. But we do not think that "A Subaltern" is obnoxious to the "decided disapprobation" of the Council of Administration of Fort —. We may not be, can not be, as familiar as they with that tone, which the social intercourse and the regular and necessary subordination existing in the Army engender and demand. We know that it is proverbially courteous and gentlemanly: yet it should be proud and independent;—never cringing, or obsequious. "A Subaltern," we suppose, is well acquainted with all these things; and with a full sense of his responsibility, he gives his sentiments tone and embodiment. In this, we allow him and all others considerable latitude. We are perfectly sure, however, that he does not intend to "indulge in harsh epithets" towards his brother officers. They hold offices, which he believes to be superfluous, under a system of policy which he condemns; but he speaks of the offices and the system; and only introduces the incumbents, when necessary to enforce and illustrate matters that otherwise would be too abstract to have sufficient weight.

If the abuses known to exist in the Army, and the causes of the great expense attending it, be correctly pointed out by "A Subaltern," it is plain that opposition will be arrayed against him. We ask, then, every true friend of the Army if "A Subaltern" should not rather be judged by his motives and the merits of his pieces than by their tone; if he should not rather be encouraged and commended for his zeal and independence, than censured for his "harsh epithets."

It is well known that the lower house of Congress have already passed a bill for a general reduction of the pay of the Army. In reference to the resources of the country and that standard of comfort, personal and domestic, which should be kept up, as long as we can possibly afford it, there is scarcely a public agent in the whole Union who is paid too much. Yet our expenditures are often proportionately enormous. This arises from supernumeraries and incidental perquisites. Retrenchment should strike at the redundancy of agents, not the compensation. The soldier, even in peace, has privations and discomforts that demand our sympathy and liberality: yet one branch of Congress have already abridged his means of procuring enjoyment, and virtually doomed many to celibacy and perpetual dependence on their "pay."

"A Subaltern" has shown that our Staff is so out of proportion to what it was and should be, that if the Line were annihilated, some twenty-seven Staff officers would still be doing as efficient service as at this moment. He has also shown that the Staff of the British Army costs one twenty-eighth of the expense of the whole Army; whilst the Staff of our Army costs nearly one-fifth of the expense of the whole. Can European military establishments do with a less efficient Staff than our own! "A Subaltern" points out modes of effecting greater saving, by proper retrenchment in the Staff, Quartermaster and Ordnance Departments, than the contemplated reduction by Congress will amount to. The Army requires an advocate, and a channel. The Messenger will be glad to render it any service and will continue to maintain its interests. We would like the last word on the last page of the last Messenger, to be in defence of some great interest of our country, something patriotic, something AMERICAN.

EDITORIAL REMARKS.

It will be observed that in the present number there is not as much so called "light matter" as usual. But there are pieces of a general, popular character, which we hope will be taken as good substitutes. In the critiques which come from various quarters, there is great contrast. Some desire more lightness; others more solidity. The difficulty is to combine these, so as to get the "golden mean." As the Messenger is a large periodical, it is beyond that each reader will find something adapted to his taste, and that recollecting the various tastes of subscribers, we will not expect the whole work to be made up for him. We have some interesting tales, travels, &c., on hand, which will be dispersed through the next number.

The great Literary question of the day is undoubtedly the International Copyright, involving all the means and appliances of producing and fostering a National Literature.

The Messenger has gladly devoted much space to the full discussion of this important subject; and we invite attention to the able and instructive articles of Mr. Simms, and "A friend to letters," and to all that we publish on similar topics. Mr. Simms' aim is to sift the subject thoroughly; and it will be found that he does not confine himself to the mere expediency of an International Copyright Law; but enlarges upon our great desideratum, and dives into literary history, to illustrate and enforce his views. His first letter contained a succinct history of our literature and of the foreign causes operating against it—and also of its astonishing progress abroad; the second, the history of book publishing among us, and how it was influenced by the present condition of copyright, to the detriment of the author. These subjects involved others incidentally, as well of public morals as of policy. The present letter discusses the right of the author to his productions,—viewing it from the highest grounds and applying to it intrinsic and legitimate standards. Even should the old standards of right and property prove to be insufficient, which is by no means admitted, justice and morality require that new ones elevated and appropriate should be erected. The highest praise we have yet received was from our respected contemporary of a leading journal in Philadelphia, who said, "the Messenger is nearly the only American periodical in the Union." To promote a proud, abiding, self-relying National Spirit, and its friend, creator and preserver, a National Literature, is certainly our guiding principle. Thanks to those who have perceived and commended it.

In our next we shall give the Ghost and Fish stories, and other selections from the letters of Pliny the Younger,—together with sketches of a visit to the moon, by a distinguished author, and other interesting productions.

Notices of New Works.

HAMLET, A PLAY, BY WM. SHAKESPEARE. Part I.—Act 1.
H. W. Hewet. New York, 1844.

The illustrated Edition of Shakspeare, humorously noticed below, deserves, as it has unequivocally received, the encouragement of the public. It is edited by an eminent scholar, Gulian C. Verplanck, Esq.; the illustrations are designed, selected and arranged by Robt. W. Weir, an artist of acknowledged taste, and is brought out in fine style by the publisher, H. W. Hewet. Its design is similar to that of the Harpers' illuminated Bible, which we are glad to learn is amply remunerating the enterprise of the publishers. We have heard it related, that John Randolph declared that next to the Bible, Shakspeare was the best and greatest book extant; and in certain ingenious Literary pyramids we have seen, the Bible was the basis and Shakspeare next. The publishers of these two great pictorial works seem to be carrying out these ideas and their works, barring all their faults, redound to the taste, skill and enterprise of those engaged in them.

[Ed. Mess.

Mr. Randolph has very kindly placed in our hands, (after paying him for it,) Part I., Act 1. of this work, for us "to lay on our table."

As it is a duty, incumbent upon every Reviewer, to recommend as they appear only works of taste and ability to the perusal of the public, we are led in the faithful discharge of this imperative obligation, to "veto" the application of this work for the consideration of the public, and to cause it to pass the ordeal of our unbiassed criticism. We regret that our limited space will prevent our giving as extended a notice of the work as we might wish, therefore we will only review its more prominent parts.

In the first place, it is proper that we should state, that having no acquaintance with Mr. Shakspeare, when we condemn what we conceive to be the "fluency with which nonsense trickles from his pen," he must not attribute it to any personal dislike to him on our part, but rather reproach himself with his own folly in causing his dramatic effusions to aspire to the dignity of type. En passant, we would remark, that the engravings of the work, which have been finely executed by R. W. Weir, Esq, compared to the work itself, are as "Hyperion to a Satyr."

Mr. Shakspeare, totally disregarding every thing like the feelings of an American, has passed over all the time-honored portions of his own country, which furnish such ample themes for dramatic composition, and has thought proper to choose "Elsinore" in Denmark as the "scene" for his play; a place which, owing to its great distance from us, we can have no sympathy with any thing that ever transpired in it. But this is not the only privilege which our author has taken. Presuming upon what he conceives to be the entire ignorance of the people of his own land of the "manners and customs" of other countries, he has the extreme modesty to present us with the following, as "Scene 1st" in his play:

Francisco on his post! Now we do wonder whether Mr. Shakspeare lays "the flattering unction to his soul," that he can so impose upon the enlightened people of this country, as to make them believe that the inhabitants of Denmark reside on posts! or that every schoolboy in this land don't know that Francisco was one of the strongest men in our Revolution; that he lived and died here, and never was in Denmark in the whole course of his life!

Again. Not content with giving us such a statement of the mode of residence in other countries, he seeks to "steep our senses in forgetfulness" of it, by giving us another; after the perusal of which, we think any person who knows a hawk from a handsaw, must conclude that the author should be whipped for overdoing Termagant: it outhers Herod.

"Bernardo. Who's there?

Francisco. Nay, answer me, stand and unfold thyself."

We can very well imagine how the merchant, at the polite request of his fashionable customer, who is desirous of purchasing something from the Metropolitan city of sunny France, can unfold a piece of cloth, or even cassimere; but just think of a man's being requested to "stand" and "unfold himself!"

O! it offends us to the very soul to be forced to peruse such a production, which, (not to speak it profanely,) can but make the skilful laugh. After reading a little further we find our author causes a "Ghost to enter" and pass before some individuals whom he represents as holding a watch, whether gold or silver, lever or lepine, he does not inform us.

"Hor. What art thou? By heaven I charge thee speak.

Mar. It is offended.

Ber. See! it stalks away.

Mar. Thus, twice before, and jump at this dead hour. With martial stalk, hath he gone by our watch."

Now, dear reader, we would ask in all candor if it requires any undue portion of mental acumen, to perceive the arrant plagiarism which our author has here so manifestly committed. In fact, the only difference that we can perceive is in his substituting the name "Ghost" for "Witch," and in causing it to disappear with a "martial stalk," (corn stalk would not be romantic enough!) instead of that implement of the housewife—the broomstick, as did those of whom we read, in the early history of Salem, and from which Mr. Shakspeare has so obviously filched his idea.

In reading further, we find the author still harps on that watch, which he spoke of being held, in the commencement of the play, and which it appears was afterwards severely injured by Hor. and Mar. Instance the following:

"Hor. Break we our watch up, and by my advice.

Mar. Let's do't I pray."

And now in concluding this "Part I., Act 1," we perceive a degree of inconsistency, which we humbly conceive to be entirely inconsistent with good dramatic writing. In his exordium, he represents Hamlet, (a young man whose father was so unfortunate as to get something in his ear and died,) as the Prince of Denmark; and yet, in the conclusion of only the 1st Act, we find that he's nothing more than a dissatisfied Watchmaker! To prove that this assertion of ours is not a gratuitous one, we give the following extract:

"Hamlet. The time is out of joint."

(alluding no doubt to the Watch which Hor. and Mar. broke up.)

"O! cursed spite
That ever I was born to set it right."

Having now fully exposed this "Part I., Act 1" to the fire of our criticism, Mr. Shakspeare and his works must melt into a mere epithet.

ARITHMETIC, Divested of its Difficulties. For the use of Schools and Academies. By FREDRICK A. P. BARNARD, M. A., Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the University of Alabama. Tuscaloosa: Woodruff & Olcott, 1843.

Elementary school books are seldom the appropriate subjects of criticism, but this one has peculiar claims upon our attention. It emanates from a section of the Union, the South-west, which not long ago was in the possession of aboriginal tribes, and therefore it marks, intellectually, the wonderful progress which, in all things else, has been going on there. The State of Alabama has sprung up into commercial and political importance with Minerva-like precocity, and report speaks not unfavorably of her advancement in science and literature. The University, at Tuscaloosa, is a richly endowed and flourishing institution, with a learned and efficient Faculty, and has already sent forth many graduates of scholarship and talent, as an intellectual haven among the people of the State. Mobile sends forth her Educational Journal, and already looks have begun to be written, printed and published in places, which, but "a few moons" since, were the homes of the Creek and the Cherokee. Such is the book before us, and we regard it with interest in this point of view. But it presents other and better claims to our favorable notice.

Arithmetic, simple as it seems, is a science in which there are many mysteries. Who has ever fathomed the occult meanings of the figure 3, or the prophetic capacities of the figure 7? The number 9 has also some properties which are curious and well nigh inexplicable. Why should the sum of all the figures of any number divided by 9 leave the same remainder as the number itself divided by 9? But the most curious truth concerning numbers is the remarkable power which some persons have possessed over their combination and solution. Zerach Colburn, from his infancy, could solve intuitively any arithmetic problem, however enlarged or intricate. A son of Judge Clayton of Georgia possessed a similar capacity: and there are many other instances of a like character. But the power did not extend to the higher mathematics; and was inexplicable even by its possessors. Colburn, in some works on Arithmetic, attempted to explain it upon the principle of induction, but he only simplified the science, and rendered it easier of acquisition.

Upon the plan introduced by Colburn, several works have been written, which have been eminently successful in forming accurate and expert arithmeticians. But they have generally been wanting in conciseness and precision, or have followed too exclusively the method of their original. For their ready comprehension, much of the peculiar instinct of Colburn is necessary, which few pupils possess. The proper plan for an elementary Arithmetic is to employ induction extensively in the illustration of fundamental principles, and gradually then to unite demonstration with induction. This is the method pursued by Professor Barnard in the present treatise, and he has succeeded admirably in divesting the science of the difficulties with which it has hitherto been beset. We know no work which, for the simplicity of its arrangement, the brevity and yet clearness of its definitions, the force and aptness of its examples, and the happy union of the analytic and synthetic methods, is better suited for our common schools, or more readily calculated to lead a youthful mind, by progressive examples, from the comprehension of simple facts to the general principles under which they form themselves harmoniously into a science. The University of Alabama has done well in adopting this book as one of the requisitions for admission into that institution.

Professor Barnard deserves well of the public for having prepared this treatise. Few men possess better qualifications for such a work. He is extensively known as as enthusiastic and laborious devotee to the several branches of mathematical science. Some years ago he occupied a tutorship in Yale College, and was regarded by Professors Silliman and Olmstead as one of the most promising young men of science in our country. Since his connection with the University of Alabama, he has reflected honor upon that institution, and by various philosophic publications has contributed to the advancement of science and letters. Recently the trustees have placed under his management one of the best furnished Observatories in our country, with an unusually large transit-circle, and several superior telescopes; and we have every reason to expect from Professor Barnard, if not new and important discoveries, at least observations and calculations, of the utmost importance to science, and which will make Tuscaloosa, so to speak, the astronomical capital of the South-west, equal advantages existing nowhere else in that section for the promotion of the more elevated branches of practical philosophy, and astronomers in other parts of the world having to rely upon the reckonings there made for much indispensable information. The book before us, though humble in its character, when compared with these things, is no less creditable to its author, and we regard it not only as an evidence of his capacity for scientific pursuits in general, but as furnishing to the youth of Alabama one of the easiest guides to a knowledge of that science upon which all the higher Mathematics are erected. Indeed we know no treatise on Arithmetic more worthy of general adoption.

THE PRAIRIE-BIRD. BY THE HON. CHARLES AUGUSTUS MURRAY, author of "Travels in North America." Harper and Brothers' "Library of Select Novels," No. 34. Drinker and Morris, Richmond.

LIFE IN THE NEW WORLD; or Sketches of American Society. BY SEATSFIELD. 4 Parts. J. Winchester & Co., New-York. From German, by Hebbe and Mackay.

The progress of American Literature internally and externally is becoming very apparent, and we foresee clearly that the dawn of a splendid day is upon us. However the energies of our native mind may be repressed by the unwise policy now obtaining and the many disadvantages which gratuitous, foreign productions place in its way, still it is making rapid strides, and even forcing its way in an astonishing manner in other and gifted countries. But we have now presented to us still another aspect. America is becoming the theme of foreign authors. Tourists, laying aside the shameful traffic in libel and slander, are urging their claims to Literary fame, by painting our Society and Scenery and weaving our history and legends into graceful fiction. We have been amused at the shallow pedantry of some who thought there was and could be no literature, for ages at least, out of France, England, or Germany, and loudly asserted that the great want of our country was materials for writing. All we have needed was judicious stimulus, and time for observation and for tendencies to develop themselves. The stimulus can readily be increased; the desired era is fast approaching. It is true we want several classes of materials,—those gathered in courts and under time-worn institutions. But if we can not have the finish of the old, we can have the vigor and sprightliness of the new. Instead of the reminiscences of the past, we have the wonderful facts and changes of the present, with anticipations of a future that hangs over no other country on the globe. Man in his greatest variety is here to observe and to depict; the transitions of a singular and mighty People are to be watched and explored; and here the lover of nature may continually float in rapture, whilst those curious in her manifold productions have an unending field for their inquiries. From these sources why may not materials ample and fruitful be derived?

We have not yet clearly ascertained whether Seatsfield is a native German or a native American. Both have been asserted. He may be one of Mr. Mackay's "popular delusions." Certain it is that he is very familiar with our country. Of course he colors pretty highly; but is just, in the main, and so impartial that he makes each of his characters speak and act consistently with himself. The Courtships of George Howard and Ralph Doughby represent scenes in the South-west, and give quite striking portraits of many domestic and political scenes in the new portions of our country. Such descriptions of the life of a Southern planter so widely circulated in the North can do us no harm, and we rejoice that something of a service has thus been rendered us. Seatsfield, or Saatsfeld has but recently become known to our public. The German critics, Mundt and Schlegel, are said to have spoken in highest praise of his productions. The tremendous puffing that preceded their appearance in this country prepared the way for a great speculation, of which we suppose the publishers are reaping the benefit. We have already expressed our distrust of the cheapness of some of the cheap publications. The Prairie-Bird, quite a large novel, lies on our lap, at 25 cents;—whilst 50 cents have procured only 4 parts of Seatsfield, containing a little more than half as much as the former. This illustrates, however, the disadvantages under which our own Literature labors. Seatsfield, if indeed a German writer, had to be translated here, which must be paid for. But American interests require that a fair difference should be paid. Our author is rather minute in some of his details; but the work displays considerable talent and will be read with pleasure. The Hon. Mr. Murray's former work has already recommended him to the American public. The Prairie-Bird came in just as we were going to press and we have had no time to peruse it.

LEA & BLANCHARD: Philadelphia, 1844.

THE HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME. A Romance of the time of Louis XI. BY VICTOR HUGO. Translated from the French by Frederick Shoberl. With an illustration.

Victor Hugo has often been compared favorably with Scott. The work before us, said to be about the best of its author, distinguished alike as a novelist and dramatist, affords a good opportunity for such a comparison. Walter Scott selected the time of Louis XI., with his Barber prime minister, Oliver Le Dain, for his romance of "Quentin Durward." The Emeralda of Victor Hugo, a character in the Hunchback, has been supposed to have originated from Scott's singular and remarkable character, Fennella, in "Peveril of the Peak." The critics have also traced Hugo's obligations to the La Gitanilla of Cervantes and the Mignon of Goëthe; but all agree that "the Hunchback of Notre Dame" is a work of genius and originality. The graphic description of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, which, as Bulwer remarks, "is, by an effort of high art, made an absolute portion of the machinery of the tale," gives it an actual existence before the eye. Love is the ruling principle of the work and sways every variety of taste, circumstance and character. Drinker & Morris.

DESTINY; OR THE CHIEF'S DAUGHTER. By the author of "Marriage" and "The Inheritance."

This is one of the "Cabinet series of Novels" which Messrs. Lea & Blanchard propose to issue from time to time, in cheap and convenient form, and embracing such works "as may be selected for their pure moral tone and acknowledged excellence." These qualities secured, novels may be as improving as they are fascinating, and may impart much instruction to minds whose listlessness and indolence would reject nourishment presented in a less attractive form. Miss Ferrier, the authoress, gained her celebrity anonymously. Sir Walter Scott, on retiring from the field of fiction, said that he had left a worthy laborer in it, in the then unknown authoress of "Marriage." This is high praise; but Scott was a liberal and modest author. However, Blackwood says, "Miss Ferrier unites the perfect purity and moral elevation of mind visible in all Miss Baillie's delightful works, with much of the same caustic vigor of satire that has made Miss Edgeworth's pen almost as fearful as fascinating." To approach Miss Edgeworth is a very high degree of excellence. Drinker and Morris. 40 cents.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN CATTLE DOCTOR; Containing the Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment of all the Diseases Incident to Oxen, Sheep, and Swine; and a Sketch of the Anatomy and Physiology of Neat Cattle. By Francis Clater. Edited, Revised, and almost Rewritten by William Youatt, Author of "The Horse," &c., with Numerous Additions, Embracing An Essay on the Use of Oxen, and the Improvement in the Breed of Sheep, &c. By J. S. Skinner, Assistant Postmaster General. With Numerous Cuts and Illustrations. Philadelphia; Lea & Blanchard, 1844.

The title page of this work is its best notice. This is the ninth Edition improved and can not fail to be useful to farmers and graziers. Call on Drinker & Morris.

THE CYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL MEDICINE. EDITED BY JOHN FORBES, M. D., F. R. S.; ALEXANDER TWEEDIE, M. D., F. R. S.; AND JOHN CONOLLY, M. D. REVISED, WITH ADDITIONS, BY ROBLEY DUNGLISON, M. D.

This extensive and valuable work, an improvement upon its English prototype, will be published serially in twenty four parts, at fifty cents each, forming when complete four large super-royal octavo volumes, embracing over three thousand large pages in double columns. The American Editor's abilities are well known: he will take great pains in adapting, arranging and correcting the work, so as to render it of the highest value as a standard work of Medical reference.

The articles are arranged Alphabetically, with the names of their respective authors. The whole is neatly printed on good paper, with type a little smaller than that of the Messenger. The same publishers are issuing, in five parts, under the supervision of Professor Horner, an elegant and complete Anatomical Atlas, by Henry H. Smith, M. D., which will be almost as indispensable to the above Cyclopædia, as Maps undoubtedly are to a Cyclopædia of History or Geography. Drinker & Morris supply them.

THE COMPLETE FLORIST: A Manual of Gardening containing practical instruction for the management of Greenhouse Plants, and for the Cultivation of the Shrubbery, the Flower Garden and the Lawn. With additions and amendments, adapted to the climate of the United States.

Who loves not flowers is worse than what Shakspeare says of the man who has no music in his soul; he is very apt not to love music either. We rejoice at the evidences around us of an increasing taste for these beauties of Nature—a taste which the "Complete Florist" and Mr. Butcher's "Rose Manual" will improve and direct. Drinker & Morris, Richmond, Va.

HARPER & BROTHERS: New-York, 1844.

CHATSWORTH; or the Romance of a week. Edited by the author of "Tremaine" and "De Vere."

ARTHUR. Translated from the French of Eugene Sue. YOUNG KATE; or the Rescue. A tale of the Great Kanawha.

"There's a divinity shapes our ends, Rough hue them how we will."—Shak.

These belong to the two series now issuing from the press of the Harpers; the first two to the "Library of select novels;" the latter being No. 2 of the "Select novels," in better form.

We think that young Kate is the work which we announced some time since as about to be issued. When we have had leisure to examine its claims, we will speak of them more at large. It seems to be something concerning our State and is written by a native of Virginia, resident in the West. Drinker & Morris have all of them.

The following useful serials are going successfully on; MILMAN'S GIBBON. Nos. 8 and 9, from Drinker & Morris. NEAL'S HISTORY OF THE PURITANS. Part 5, from the same.

MILMAN'S GIBBON. No. 10., J. W. Randolph & Co. M'CULLOCH'S UNIVERSAL GAZETTEER, No. 12, from the same.

THE ILLUMINATED BIBLE, No. 3, has also been sent us by Messrs. Drinker and Morris. We have nothing to add to our commendation already bestowed. Next month we may give a review of it,—something novel, perhaps, if not original.

A NEW SPIRIT OF THE AGE. Edited by R. H. Horne, Author of "Orion," "Gregory VII," &c., &c. Complete in one volume, 8 vo. p.p. 165.

Every one who has the least literary curiosity desires to know something of the present and recent authors, who have attained any celebrity in Letters. The work before us will serve to gratify all such, though it needs must be very superficial. The sketches by Lord Brougham of distinguished statesmen, &c., of the time of George III., are very superficial; yet they contain much instruction and amusement. Mr. Horne could not be expected to give much concerning each of twenty-five authors in the short space of this work, embracing notices of Dickens, Landor, Macaulay, Talfourd, James, the Howitts, Bulwer, Carlyle, Knowles, Ainsworth, Hood, Hook and many others.

A little, however, is better than none; and a man who bends his mind to his task may compress a good deal into a small space. One chapter groups together in strange medley, James, Mrs. Gore, Capt. Marryat and Mrs. Trollope. Americans know very well why Mrs. Trollope and Capt. Marryat, C. B., should be linked together, but we did not suppose that an Englishman would thus classify them. In some respects, Mr. James is in rather bad company. Mr. Dickens leads off the Literary troop, and is pretty well glorified in nearly twice the space devoted to any one else. The work is designed to be similar to Hazlitt's "Spirit of the Age." If the British public patronise the undertaking, it will be extended into a series; when we trust the author, in justice to himself and his readers, will enlarge his notices of authors and their productions. Those before us are very general and written very much by way of allusion. They serve better to remind the familiar than to inform the curious. Still the design, as well as the contents, of the work recommend it to the general reader. J. W. Randolph and Co. have it.

RECORDS OF THE HEART. Poems, by MRS. SARAH A. LEWIS. New-York: D. Appleton & Co. Philadelphia: George S. Appleton.

The publishers have gotten out this little home-production in very neat and appropriate style. Mrs. Lewis is a poetess of Troy, New-York, who has written with some acceptance for the magazines, in which many of the minor poems of this collection first appeared. She gives us some gems of poetical thought; but "Florence" and others which we have read are not destined to confer any permanent fame upon the American Muse. "Zenel" has some merit.

J. S. TAYLOR & Co.: New York, 1844.

The Traveller; or the Wonders of Art.

The Lily of the Valley. By the Author of Little Harry and his Bearer. Sixth Edition.

Shanty the Blacksmith. A tale of other times. By Mrs. Sherwood.

Grace Harriet.

These beautiful juvenile books have been sent us by Messrs. Perkins, Harvey and Ball on Shockoe Hill, Richmond. A good book in the hands of children is one of the most important things in Education. Each of the above may be placed there with impunity, nay profit. "The Wonders of Art" will excite their curiosity and provoke their youthful minds to observation and inquiry. "The Lily of the Valley" is a tale of great beauty and simplicity: Mrs. Sherwood is sufficiently known for her name to guarantee any thing from her pen.

PAPER ON THE GULF STREAM AND CURRENTS OF THE SEA.

READ BEFORE THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE, APRIL 2nd, 1844.

(Copyright secured according to Law.)

BY M. F. MAURY, LT. U. S. N.

I am invited, in the name of the National Institute, to address this meeting on the Gulf Stream and other currents of the sea. This is an important subject—important to civilized man in the every-day business of life, and vitally important to all who use the sea: whatever relates to it, therefore, can not fail to be highly interesting and important to a nation so renowned as this is for its maritime pursuits.

Upon a correct knowledge of the force and set of currents on the Ocean, often depends not only the safety of vessel and cargo, but the lives of all on board; and, owing to the want of this knowledge, hundreds of vessels, thousands of persons, and millions of property are annually cast away or lost at sea.

I do not intend to occupy the time of members with a recapitulation here of what we do know with regard to Ocean currents; that indeed might soon be told; for we know little or nothing of them, except that they are to be met with here and there at sea, many of them sometimes going one way and sometimes another; and that the waters of some of them are colder and of others warmer than the seas in which they are found. That we should have a better knowledge of them, and of the laws which govern them is not only an important matter to those who follow the sea, or make ventures abroad, but it is also a matter of exceeding interest to all those whose enlarged philanthropy, or ennobling sentiments prompt in them a desire to diffuse knowledge among their fellows, or in any manner to benefit the human race. The mere fact that this meeting is held at all, is evidence ample and complete, that it is composed altogether of such. I therefore submit it is a question for the consideration of this meeting, whether it be not competent for the National Institute to devise and set on foot a plan for multiplying observations and extending our information upon these interesting phenomena. A subject of vast importance in the business of commerce and navigation, the currents of the ocean seem to me to be altogether worthy the attention of this society—a series of well conducted observations upon them would be in perfect unison with the great objects of usefulness for which it was created and now exists, and for which its distinguished members and guests have been invited, and are here assembled from all parts of the country.

Before such an assemblage of mind and intelligence, it is necessary only to mention the meagre state of our information even with regard to that great anomaly of the Ocean, the Gulf Stream, and there will be—there can be but one mind as to the importance of making further observations, and of multiplying facts with regard to it. In simply reminding the society, that all we know of this wonderful phenomenon is contained chiefly in what Doctor Franklin said of it more than 50 years ago, that his facts were collected by chance as it were, and his observations made with but few of the facilities which navigators now have, I feel that enough and all has been done that is necessary to be done, in order to impress the Institute with the importance of further observations upon it.

Were it the Institute only that is concerned in the matter, I would not say a word more on the subject, believing that all that I can say will add nothing of force to the appeal contained in the mere announcement of the fact just stated. But we live in a utilitarian age; we belong to a community of people eminently utilitarian in their habits of thought and motives of action; and, when they are called upon to cooperate, as they must be in all great measures of usefulness undertaken by an Institution so eminently national in its associations and its character as this is, the question "cui bono," on their part, must first be met, at least to some extent, before the requisite degree of coöperation can be obtained.

Distrustful of my ability to meet on the present occasion, this question as it can be met, and ought here to be met, I would cease from the attempt in hopeless despair, were it not for the respect which I entertain for the discernment of the distinguished members of the Committee who have selected me for the task.

As a people, we are disposed to do but little for science out of mere zeal for the cause. We are not apt to be prominent in any of its walks, unless we can perceive to our oft repeated "cui bono," frequent answers, like finger boards by the way side, to guide and to cheer us on. But when our way is thus made clear, it redounds not a little to the credit of the American people that they are foremost in pursuit.

Of this, the science of Geology affords a striking example. Chemistry and Astronomy in the Old World struggled for centuries in sickly infancy; but, on this side of the water, modern Geology, like the Goddess of old, leaped at a bound, fullgrown and panoplied into being. Immediately practical in its character and useful in its results, the people were eager in the pursuit of its principles. And for the honor of popular Institutions be it said, the States of Republican America have done more for the science of Geology than all the governments of all the world besides. They fostered it with a care and pursued it with an energy that no other department of science ever before received at the hands of a nation. But 'twas not for the mere love of science that geological investigations were thus encouraged among us. It was because its ends were adapted to our utilitarian ideas, and in themselves promptly answered the great question of utility now to be met.

Our researches in this field have revealed to us the fact, that the Ocean and its currents have been and no doubt still are important and active Geological agents. Of this truth, all the tide water country to the South and much of that to the North of us, is a present witness.

To say what agency the Gulf Stream and other currents now known to us, had in this formation, would carry us too far into the regions of speculation for our present purpose. But thus much we may venture: that between us and the Gulf Stream there is a current of cold water running towards the South with sufficient strength to produce important changes along the coast. Two hundred and fifty years ago, Sir Francis Drake with his fleet entered Albemarle Sound through Roanoke Inlet, which is now a sand bank above the reach of the highest tides. Only seventy years ago, it was navigable by vessels drawing 12 feet of water.

An examination by skilful engineers is now being made as to the practicability of re-opening this inlet. In their eyes at least a correct knowledge of the effects and tendency of this current would be of great value.

This circumstance explains better than volumes of disquisition could do, the "cui bono" of collecting and recording every fact whatever that observation may give us with regard to the currents on our coast. That they are effecting important changes along the sea board, the singular chain of long and narrow islands that curtain the coast from Albemarle Sound to the reefs of Florida, gives ample evidence. These and the shoals which endanger navigation off the Capes of Carolina, owe their existence entirely to currents, or uplift. The soundings and form of the Hatteras and other shoals clearly indicate that they are caused by a current from the North. A comparison of present charts with Jeffry's atlas published in 1775, shows not only that these shoals are increasing, but that the chain of islands alluded to is in process of gradual formation. Currituck and Roanoke inlets which are now sand bars, once were navigable. Occracoke inlet had then 17 feet of water, it now has 8. Besides these there were between Beaufort, North Carolina and Charleston in South Carolina, 25 or 30 others, many of them then navigable, and most of them now closed and appearing only as dry land.

Whence comes the sand that forms these islands? Separated from the main land by standing pools of water moved only by the tides from the Ocean, it can not be brought from the shore. It can only be upheaved with the general elevation of the coast by geological agencies, or it is cast up from the bottom of the Ocean by the Gulf Stream and the waves, or brought down from the North by the current on the coast. Investigation might settle the question.

Linked thus with other geological agents, the currents of the sea can not fail to present themselves to the mind of the Geologist, as important and interesting subjects for investigation. How much more so are they in the eyes of the Navigator; with him, the source of this coast current is a matter of conjecture, and its cause a mystery. And as to its strength, its fluctuations and the laws which govern them, his nautical books are all but silent. Nor has the history of navigation recorded the first series of systematic observations upon it.

Proceeding further into the Atlantic, we find a vast stream of warm water running counter to this. It is the Gulf Stream bound from the Straits of Florida to the Banks of Newfoundland, and thence to the shores of Europe. What its breadth or its depth may be, we know not. We are told indeed that even at the same place it runs sometimes at the rate of two knots the hour, sometimes at five, and we know that it may always be found within certain broad limits, varying in this too at the same place, from 140 to 340 miles. With this our knowledge of it ends; though more accurate information as to it and its offsets would many a time have saved the mariner from disaster, and his vessel from shipwreck, and even now, would add not a little to the speedy and safe navigation of the Atlantic.

Though Navigators had been in the habit of crossing and recrossing the stream, almost daily, for the space of near 300 years, its existence even was not generally known among them, until after Dr. Franklin discovered the warmth of its waters, about 70 years ago. And to this day, the information which he gave us, constitutes the basis, I had almost said the sum and substance of all we know about it.

When he was in London, in 1770, he happened to be consulted as to a memorial which the Board of Customs at Boston sent to the Lords of the Treasury, stating that the Falmouth packets were generally a fortnight longer to New York than common traders were from London to Providence, R. I. They therefore asked that the Falmouth packets might be sent to Providence instead of to New York. This appeared strange to the doctor, for London was much farther than Falmouth, and from Falmouth the routes were the same, and the difference should have been the other way. He however consulted a Nantucket whaler who chanced to be in London also; the fisherman explained to him that the difference arose from the circumstance that the Rhode Island Captains were acquainted with the Gulf Stream, while those of the English packets were not. The latter kept in it and were set back 60 or 70 miles a day while the former avoided it altogether. He had been made acquainted with it by the whales which were found on either side of it, but never in it. At the request of the doctor he then traced on a chart, the course of this stream from the Straits of Florida. The doctor had it engraved at Tower Hill and sent copies of it to the Falmouth Captains, who paid no attention to it. The course of the Gulf Stream, as laid down by that fisherman from his general recollection of it, is retained on our charts at the present day, almost without an alteration.*

If within the domains of Philosophy, there can be such a thing as a proprietary field of investigation, this phenomenon of a river in the Ocean is one—American in its source and origin, it is found in the waters of America, and closely concerns its navigating interests; first traced out by the fishermen of New England, it attracted the attention of the great American philosopher: he determined its most remarkable characteristic, and left it to his countrymen as a field to be re-occupied by them at some future day, and with a like spirit of philosophical research.

Therefore the Gulf Stream offers a field of investigation peculiarly American, and we, the Americans, are in duty, as we are in honor, bound to show ourselves curious and diligent in whatever there may be about it, of undiscovered mystery, or of philosophic interest to navigation, or other branches of science.

In Dr. Franklin's time, the navigator guessed as much as he calculated the place of his ship—vessels from Europe to Boston frequently made New York, and thought the land-fall by no means bad. Chronometers, now so accurate, were then an experiment. The Nautical Ephemeris itself was faulty, and gave errors of thirty miles in the longitude. The instruments of navigation erred by degrees quite as much as they now do by minutes; for the rude "cross staff" and "back staff," the "sea ring" and "mariner's bow," had not yet given place to the nicer sextant and circle of reflection of the present day. Instances are numerous of vessels navigating the Atlantic in those times being 6°, 8° and even 10° of longitude out of their reckoning in as many days from port. Our means therefore of properly conducting a system of observations upon the currents of the sea, and for following up the investigations of Franklin, are much more ample and complete than they have ever been with navigators before. Therefore what society so appropriate as this, the National Institute of his country—what time more fit,—what occasion more suitable than the present for maturing a plan of operations, and for setting on foot a system of observations upon the Gulf Stream and its kindred phenomena of the sea?

As commendable in some respects as is that utilitarian spirit among us which is so apt to try our undertakings with "cui bono?" it is not wise always to start this question; for, the apparently trifling facts by which the laws of nature are often revealed to the philosopher and are made subservient to our purpose, will not, at all times, brook the inquiry.

When the Italian Philosopher commenced his experiments, what utilitarian saw in the fact elicited from the legs of a dead frog, the important consequences to which it has led us, and to this day continues to lead us? The principles deduced from his simple discovery, after having led to many important and valuable results, are now, at the end of half a century, being applied for our purposes in such a manner, that words spoken in yonder capitol, may be conveyed to other cities with the speed of lightning, and caught up there as they fall here from the lips of the speaker.

When our own Franklin flew his kite in the storm, who would have thought that the inkling which he then caught as to a law of nature would enable us to turn aside the artillery of heaven?

Or when, at another time, he dipped his thermometer into the sea, how could the most keensighted utilitarian have perceived that the fact thus discovered would shorten the average passage across the Atlantic, at least one third; would bring the old world and the new nearer together by many days, and would wonderfully improve and benefit Navigation?

To the philosopher, every newly discovered fact, in physics, however trifling to others it may seem, is a gem. Our knowledge of nature and her laws is but a number of such facts, brought nigh and placed side by side. As they accumulate, they reflect light upon each other, and each generation becomes wiser and wiser, for every such fact thus gathered is but another clue placed in our hands, which, if carefully followed up, will lead us further and further out of the labyrinths of ignorance, and bring us nearer and nearer to the doors of everlasting knowledge. Therefore, in the proposed undertaking, let not the utilitarian's question be sprung too soon, or too loudly upon us.

No part of the world affords a more difficult or dangerous navigation than the approach of our Northern coast in winter. Before the warmth of the Gulf Stream was known, a voyage at this season from Europe to New England, New York, and even to the Capes of the Delaware or Chesapeake, was many times more trying, difficult and dangerous, than it now is. In making this part of the coast, vessels are frequently met by snow storms and gales which mock the seaman's strength and set at naught his skill. In a little while, his bark becomes a mass of ice; with her crew frosted and helpless, she remains obedient only to her helm, and is kept away for the Gulf Stream. After a few hours' run, she reaches its edge, and almost at the next bound, passes from the midst of winter into a sea at summer heat. The ice disappears—the sailor bathes his stiffened limbs in tepid waters; feeling himself invigorated and refreshed with the genial warmth about him, he realizes out there at sea, the fable of Antæus and his mother Earth. He attempts to make his port again, and is again as rudely met from the North West; but, each time he is driven off from the contest—he comes forth from this stream like the ancient son of Neptune, stronger and stronger, until, after many days, his freshened strength prevails, and he at last enters his haven in safety. I might name instances, for they are not uncommon, in which vessels bound to Norfolk or Baltimore with their crews enervated in tropical climates, have encountered, as far down as the Capes of Virginia, snow storms, that have driven them back into the Gulf Stream time and again, and have kept them out for 40, 50, and even for 60 days, trying to make an anchorage.

The number of shipwrecks that occurred on our coast during one month in the winter of '41, amounted to not less than three a day. How many were saved by seeking refuge with their frosted and disabled crews in the warm waters of the Gulf

Stream, is matter of conjecture. Before their temperature was known, vessels thus distressed, knew of no place of refuge short of the West Indies; and the newspapers of that day,—Franklin's Pennsylvania Gazette among them,—inform us that it was no uncommon occurrence for vessels, bound for the Capes of the Delaware in winter, to be blown off and to go to the West Indies, and there wait for the return of spring before they would attempt another approach to this part of the coast.

Accordingly, Dr. Franklin's discovery of the Gulf Stream temperature was looked upon as one of great importance, not only on account of its affording to the frosted mariner in winter a convenient refuge from the snow storm, but because of its serving the Navigator with an excellent land mark or beacon for our coast in all weathers. And so viewing it, the Doctor concealed the discovery, for we were then at war with England. It was then not uncommon for vessels to be as much as 10° out in their reckoning. He himself was 5°. Therefore, in approaching the coast, the current of warm water in the Gulf Stream, and of cold water on this side of it, if tried with the thermometer, would enable the mariner to judge, with great certainty and in the worst of weather, as to his position. Jonathan Williams afterwards, in speaking of the importance which the discovery of these warm and cold currents would prove to Navigation, pertinently asked the question—"If these stripes of water had been distinguished by the colors of red, white and blue, could they be more distinctly discovered than they are by the constant use of the thermometer?" And he might have added, could they have marked the position of the ship more clearly?

When his work on Thermometrical Navigation appeared, Commodore Truxton wrote to him: "Your publication will be of use to Navigation, by rendering sea voyages secure far beyond what even you yourself will immediately calculate, for I have proved the utility of the thermometer very often since we sailed together.

"It will be found a most valuable instrument in the hands of mariners, and particularly as to those who are unacquainted with astronomical observations; * * these particularly stand in need of a simple method of ascertaining their approach to or distance from the coast, especially in the winter season; for it is then that passages are often prolonged, and ships blown off the coast by hard westerly winds, and vessels get into the Gulf Stream without its being known; on which account they are often hove to by the Captains supposing themselves near the coast, when they are very far off, (having been drifted by the currents.) On the other hand, ships are often cast on the coast, by sailing in the eddy of the stream, which causes them to outrun their common reckoning. Every

These obstructions to Navigation in winter must therefore have operated strongly against the commerce of the North, and in favor of that of the South. And as far as Philadelphia is concerned, which was the commercial emporium of the North at that day, the list of arrivals there in winter, 60 or 70 years ago, shows that such was the case in an eminent degree.

Though the warm temperature of the Gulf Stream was discovered in 1775, yet, for political reasons, the discovery was not generally made known 'till 1790. Its immediate effect in Navigation, was to make the ports of the North as accessible in winter as in summer. What agency this circumstance had in the decline of the direct trade of the South, which followed this discovery, would be, at least to the political economist, a subject for much curious and interesting speculation. I have referred to the commercial tables of the time, and have compared the trade of Charleston with that of the Northern cities for several years, both before and after the discovery of Dr. Franklin became generally known to Navigators. The comparison shows an immediate decline in the Southern trade and a wonderful increase in that of the North. But whether this discovery in Navigation and this revolution in trade stand in the relation of cause and effect, or be merely a coincidence let others judge.

These statistics are given, and the subject is mentioned in this connection, not because it is proposed the National Institute should roam at large in such a field; but because they give point to illustration, and show how ramified and important in its bearings, is one single fact gathered from nature.

In 1769, the commerce of the two Carolinas, equalled that of all the New England States together, it was more than double that of New York, and exceeded that of Pennsylvania by one third.* In 1792, the exports from New York amounted in value to two millions and a half; from Pennsylvania to $3,820,000; and from Charleston alone to $3,834,000.

But in 1795, by which time the Gulf Stream began to be as well understood by Navigators as it now is, and the average passages from Europe to the North were shortened nearly one half, while those to the South remained about the same, the customs collected at Philadelphia alone amounted to $2,941,000,† or more than one half of those collected in all the States together.

Moreover, it may stay upon the lips of some ultra utilitarian, the untimely "cui bono," with its implied objections to the proposition now before the Institute.

Nor did the effects of the Doctor's discovery end here. Before it was made, the Gulf Stream was altogether insidious in its effects. By it, vessels were frequently drifted many miles out of their course without knowing it, and in bad or cloudy weather when many days would intervene from one observation to another, the set of the current, though really felt for but a few hours during the interval, could only be proportioned out equally among the whole number of days. Therefore Navigators could have only very vague ideas, either as to the strength, or the actual limits of the Gulf Stream until they were marked out to the Nantucket fishermen by the whales, or made known by Capt. Folger to Dr. Franklin. The discovery, therefore, of its high temperature assured the navigator of the presence of a current of surprising velocity, and which, now turned to certain account, would hasten, as it had retarded his voyage in a wonderful degree.

Such, at the present day, is the degree of perfection to which nautical tables and instruments have been brought, that the Navigator may now detect, and with great certainty, every current that thwarts his way. He makes great use of them. Col. Sabine, in his passage a few years ago, from Sierra Leone to New York, was drifted 1,600 miles of his way by the force of currents alone; and, since the application of the thermometer to the Gulf Stream, the average passage from England has been reduced from upwards of eight weeks, to a little more than four. This may, in some degree, be owing to the improvement in ship building, but it is less owing, I apprehend, to any increased speed of vessels, than to a better knowledge of winds and currents; for the "Constitution" and the "United States" are, at this day, the fastest ships in the Navy; and they are models of the last century.

There is a current constantly setting into the Mediterranean to supply the waste, it is said, of evaporation. Now, on account of climate, the evaporation from the Gulf of Mexico in summer, must be much greater than from the Mediterranean; moreover, the rivers which empty into the Gulf are all at low water in summer; yet the Gulf Stream is said to run with much greater velocity in summer than in winter. If so, it is reasonable to suppose that the waters of the Gulf are higher at one season than another. But we have Light houses at the Tortugas, the Balize, Mobile and Pensacola, and keepers at them who would be glad of the employment. A tide staff planted at each, and daily registered for a year or two, would show whether there be a winter and a summer level to the Gulf, and thus settle this interesting question.

The manner in which the Florida Straits open out into the Atlantic—inclining to the Westward of North, the contour of the adjacent coast, the deep indent in the shore line here, between St. Augustine and Savannah, all seem to indicate a close pressure of the Gulf Stream and its counter current upon this part of the coast.* If so, the course of the Gulf Stream as it disembogues in the Atlantic, must be a little to the West, instead of a little to the East of North as our charts represent it. My own information, derived from the observations of an intelligent brother officer, goes to confirm this opinion; should it be proved correct, it will explain the anomaly often remarked upon by Navigators with regard to a stronger current in the Gulf Stream off Cape Hatteras, than further South, for then, this circumstance may be accounted for by the Chart course leading them on the outer edge of the Gulf Stream until it reaches the Carolina Capes, where they again get into the strength of it.

The place of embouchure for the Gulf Stream, is about the latitudinal limits of the Trade winds, where calms and variables prevail; and where aid from currents is most desirable. Our West India Cruisers are continually passing up and down this part of the stream; a few turns to and fro across it, by them, would show how the thread of the current does lie, of which we are now ignorant. It might materially shorten the passage of vessels bound North from the Gulf.

The Gulf Stream, as it issues from the straits of Florida, is of a dark indigo blue; the line of junction between it and the roily green water of the Atlantic, is plainly seen for hundreds of miles. Though this line is finally lost to the eye as the stream goes North, it is preserved to the thermometer for several thousand miles, yet to this day the limits of the Gulf Stream, even in the most frequented parts of the ocean, though so plainly marked, are but vaguely described on our charts. Thousands of vessels cross it every year; many of them make their observations upon it, and many more, if invited would do the same. But no one has invited coöperation; consequently there is no system, and each one that observes, observes only for himself; and when he quits the sea, his observations go with him and are to the world as though they had not been.

Captain Manderson of the Royal Navy published, many years ago, "An examination into the true cause of the Florida stream," which he ascribed to the Mississippi and the floods of the other rivers emptying into the Gulf. But judging from what we see going on daily in the Mediterranean, the water from the rivers, especially in summer when the Gulf Stream runs at the greatest velocity, are not sufficient to supply the waste of evaporation. Taking the hypothesis of the English officer for granted, it was asserted by another writer, that the velocity of the Gulf stream might be determined by the freshets in the Mississippi. Capt. Livington put these theories to rest by showing that the volume of waters discharged through the Gulf Stream, exceeds what is emptied from the Mississippi by more than three thousand times.

Upon the ruins of this hypothesis which Capt. Livingston had so completely overturned, he advanced the opinion that the velocity of the Gulf Stream "depends on the motion of the sun in the Ecliptic, and the influence he has upon the waters of the Atlantic." To this day our books on navigation quote this opinion without comment.

The most generally received opinion, however, is the one repeated by Dr. Franklin, that the Gulf Stream is the escaping of the waters that have been forced into the Carribbean sea by the Trade winds; and that it is the pressure of those winds upon the water, which forces up into that sea a head, as it were, for this stream.

We know of instances in which waters have been accumulated on one side of a lake, or in one end of a canal, at the expense of the other. But they are rare, sudden and partial, and for the most part confined to sheets of shoal water where the ripples are proportionably great. As far as they go, the pressure of the Trade winds may assist to give the Gulf Stream its initial velocity; but is it of itself adequate to such an effect? To my mind, the laws of Hydrostatics as at present expounded, appear by no means to warrant the conclusion that it is, unless the aid of other agents also be brought to bear.

Supposing the pressure of the waters that are forced into the Carribbean sea by the Trade winds to be the sole cause of the Gulf Stream, that sea and the Mexican Gulf should have a much higher level than the Atlantic. Accordingly, the advocates of this theory require for its support "a great degree of elevation." Major Rennell likens the stream to "an immense river descending from a higher level into a plain." Now we know very nearly the average breadth and velocity of the Gulf Stream in the Florida pass. We also know, with a like degree of approximation, the velocity and breadth of the same waters off Cape Hatteras. Their breadth here is about 75 miles against 32 in the "Narrows" of the Straits, and their mean velocity is 3 knots off Hatteras, against 4 in the "Narrows." This being the case, it is easy to show that the depth of the Gulf Stream off Hatteras is not so great as it is in the "Narrows" of Bemini by nearly 50 per cent, and that consequently, instead of descending, its bed represents the surface of an inclined plane from the North, up which the lower depths of the stream must ascend. If we assume its depth off Bemini to be 200 fathoms, which are thought to be within limits, the above rates of breadth and velocity will give 114 fathoms for its depth off Hatteras. The waters therefore, which in the straits are below the level of the Hatteras depth, so far from descending, are actually forced up an inclined plane, whose submarine ascent is not less than 10 inches to the mile!

The Niagara is an "immense river descending into a plain." But instead of preserving its character in Lake Ontario as a distinct and well defined stream for several hundred miles, it spreads itself out, and its waters are immediately lost in those of the Lake. Why should not the Gulf Stream do the same? It gradually enlarges itself it is true; but instead of mingling with the ocean by broad spreading as the "immense rivers" descending into the Northern lakes do, its waters, like a stream of oil in the ocean, preserve their distinctive character for more than 3,000 miles.

Moreover, while the Gulf Stream is running to the North from its supposed elevated level at the South, there is a cold current coming down from the North; meeting the warm waters of the Gulf midway the Ocean, it divides itself and runs by the side of them right back into those very reservoirs at the South, to which theory gives an elevation sufficient to send out entirely across the Atlantic a jet of warm water said to be more than three thousand times greater in volume than the Mississippi river. This current from Baffin's Bay has not only no trade winds to give it a head; but the prevailing winds are unfavorable to it, and for a great part of the way it is below the surface, and far beyond the propelling reach of any wind. And there is every reason to believe that this polar current is quite equal in volume to the Gulf Stream. Are they not the effects of like causes? If so, what have the trade winds to do with the one more than the other?

It is a custom often practised by sea-faring people to throw a bottle overboard, with a paper stating the time and place at which it is done. In the absence of other information as to currents, that afforded by these mute little Navigators is of great value. They leave no tracks behind them, it is true; and their routes can not be ascertained. But knowing where they were cast, and seeing where they are found, some idea may be formed as to their course. Straight lines may at least be drawn, showing the shortest distance from the beginning to the end of their voyage, with the time elapsed. I hold in my hand a chart representing in this way the tracks of more than one hundred bottles. From it, it appears that the waters from every quarter of the Atlantic, tend toward the Gulf of Mexico and its Stream. Bottles cast into the sea midway between the old and the new worlds, near the coasts of Europe, Africa and America, at the extreme North or furthest South, have been found either in the West Indies, or within the well known range of the Gulf Stream.

Of two cast out together in South latitude on the coast of Africa, one was found on the island of "Trinidad," the other on Guernsey, in the English channel.

In the absence of positive information on the subject, the circumstantial evidence that the latter performed the tour of the Gulf, is all but conclusive.

Another bottle thrown over off Cape Horn by an American master in 1837, has been recently picked up on the coast of Ireland. An inspection of the chart and of the drift of the other bottles seems to force the conclusion, that this bottle too went even from that remote region to the so called higher level of the Gulf Stream reservoir.

Midway the Atlantic, in the triangular space between the Azores, Canaries and the Cape de Verd Islands, is the Sargasso Sea. Covering an area equal in extent to the Mississippi valley, it is so thickly matted over with Gulf weed (fucus natans) that the speed of vessels passing through it, is often much retarded. When the companions of Columbus saw it, they thought it marked the limits of Navigation and became alarmed. To the eye, at a little distance, it seems substantial enough to walk upon. Patches of the weed are always to be seen floating along the Gulf Stream. Now if bits of cork or chaff, or any floating substance be put into a basin, and a circular motion be given to the water, all the light substances will be found crowding together near the centre of the pool, where there is the least motion. Just such a basin is the Atlantic Ocean to the Gulf Stream, and the Sargasso Sea is the centre of the whirl. Columbus first found this weedy sea in his voyage of discovery, there it has remained to this day, and certain observations as to its limits extending back for fifty years, assure us that its position has not been altered since that time. This indication of a circular motion by the Gulf Stream is corroborated by the bottle chart and other sources of information. If, therefore, this be so, why give the endless current a higher level in one part of its course than another?

Nay more. At the very season of the year when the Gulf Stream is rushing in greatest volume through the straits of Florida and hastening to the North with the greatest rapidity, there is a cold stream from Baffin's Bay, Labrador, and the coasts of the North, running to the South with equal velocity. Where is the Trade wind that gives the high level to Baffin's Bay, or that even presses upon or assists to put this current in motion? The agency of winds in producing currents in the deep sea must be very partial. These two currents meet off the Grand Banks, where the latter is divided. One part of it underruns the Gulf Stream, as is shown by the icebergs which are carried in a direction tending across its course. The probability is, that this "fork" continues on towards the South and runs into the Carribean Sea, for the temperature of the water at a little depth there, has been found far below the mean temperature of the earth, and quite as cold as at a corresponding depth off the Arctic shores of Spitsbergen.

More water can not run from the equator, or the pole, than to it. If we make the trade winds cause the former, some other wind must produce the latter; but these, for the most part, and for great distances, are submarine and therefore beyond the influence of winds. Hence, it should appear that winds have little to do with the general system of aqueous circulation in the Ocean.

The other "fork" runs between us and the Gulf Stream to the South as already described. As far as it has been traced, it warrants the belief that it too runs up to seek the so called higher level of the Mexican Gulf.

The power necessary to overcome the resistance opposed to such a body of water as that of the Gulf Stream, running several thousand miles without any renewal of impulse from the forces of gravitation or any other known cause, is truly surprising. It so happens, that we have an argument for determining, with considerable accuracy, this resistance which the waters of this stream meet with in their motion towards the East. Owing to the diurnal rotation, they are carried around with the earth on its axis towards the East with an hourly velocity 127* miles greater when they enter the Atlantic than when they arrive off the banks of New Foundland. In consequence of the difference of latitude between the parallels of these two places, their rate of motion around the axis of the earth is reduced from 925† to 758 miles the hour.

Therefore this immense volume of water, in passing from the Bahamas to the Grand Banks, meets with an opposing force in the shape of resistance, sufficient in the aggregate to retard it two miles and a half the minute, and this only in its Eastwardly rate. There is, doubtless, another force quite as great, retarding it towards the North, for its course shows that it is the resultant of two forces acting in different directions. If the former resistance be calculated according to received laws, it will be found equal to several atmospheres. And by analogy, how inadequate must the pressure of the gentle trade winds be to such resistance, and to the effect assigned them? If, therefore, in the proposed inquiry we search for a propelling power no where but in the higher level of the Gulf, we must admit, in the head of water there, the existence of a force capable of putting in motion and of driving over a plain, at the rate of 5 miles the hour, all the waters as fast as they can be brought down by 3,000 such streams as the Mississippi river—a power at least sufficient to overcome the resistance required to reduce from two miles and a half to a few feet per minute, the velocity of a stream that keeps in perpetual motion one fourth of all the waters in the Atlantic Ocean.

* In this calculation the earth is treated as a perfect sphere, with a diameter of 7925.56 miles.

† Or 915.26 to 758.60. On the latter parallel, the current has an East set of about 1½ miles the hour—making the true velocity to the East and on the axis of the earth about 760 miles the hour at the Grand Banks.

The facts, from observation on this interesting subject, afford us at best, but a mere glimmer of light, by no means sufficient to make my mind clear as to a *higher level of the Gulf, or as to the sufficiency of any other of the causes assigned for this wonderful stream. If it be necessary to resort to a higher level in the Gulf, to account for the velocity off Hatteras, I cannot perceive why we should not, with like reasoning, resort to a higher level off Hatteras also, to account for the velocity off the Grand Banks; and thus make the Gulf Stream, throughout its circuit, a descending current, and by the reductio ad absurdum, show that the Trade winds are not adequate to the effect ascribed.

When facts are wanting, it often happens that hypothesis will serve, in their stead, all the purposes of illustration. Let us, therefore, suppose a globe of the earth's size, having a solid nucleus and covered all over with water 200 fathoms deep! and that every source of heat and cause of radiation be removed, so that its fluid temperature becomes constant and uniform throughout. On such a globe, the equilibrium remaining undisturbed, there would be neither wind nor current. And the poet's picture would apply to every sea:

"Still as a slave before his lord
The Ocean hath no blast;
His great bright eye most silently
Up to the moon is cast."

Let us now suppose that all the water within the tropics, to the depth of 100 fathoms, suddenly becomes oil. The aqueous equilibrium of the planet is thereby disturbed, and a general system of currents, and counter currents is immediately commenced—the oil in an unbroken sheet on the surface running towards the poles, and the water in an under current, towards the equator. The oil is supposed, as it reaches the polar basin, to be re-converted into water, and the water to become oil as it crosses Cancer and Capricorn, rising to the surface and returning as before.

Thus, without wind, we should have a perpetual and uniform system of tropical and polar currents. In consequence of diurnal rotation of the planet on its axis, each particle of oil, were resistance small, would approach the poles on a spiral turning to the East, with a relative velocity greater and greater, until, finally, it would reach the pole and whirl about it at the rate of nearly a thousand miles the hour. Becoming water and losing its velocity, it would approach the tropics by a similar, but inverted, spiral turning towards the West. Owing to the principle here alluded to, all currents from the Equator to the poles should have an Eastward tendency, and all from the poles towards the equator, a Westward.

Let us now suppose the solid nucleus of this hypothetical globe to assume the exact form and shape of the bottom of our seas and in all respects, as to figure and size, to represent the shoals and islands of the sea, as well as the coast lines and continents of the earth. The uniform system of currents just described would now be interrupted by obstructions and local causes of various kinds, such as unequal depth of water, contour of shore lines, &c.; and we should have, at certain places, currents greater in volume and velocity than at others. But still there would be a system of currents and counter currents to and from either pole and the equator. Now do not the cold waters of the North, and the warm waters of the Gulf made specifically lighter by tropical heat, which we see actually preserving such a system of counter currents, hold, at least in some degree, the relation of the supposed water and oil.

Apparently, in obedience to the laws here hinted at, there is a constant tendency of polar waters towards the tropics and of tropical waters towards the poles. The Exploring Expedition crossed one of these hyperborean currents 200 miles in breadth at the equator. There is also one near our own coast, another on the West coast of South America, as well as several others elsewhere known to exist; but for obvious reasons they are, for the most part, submarine and but little understood.

Counter to these are the Gulf Stream and the Lagullas current, besides numerous others more gentle and partial and therefore less marked in their character. But why one of these currents should always run from the Gulf of Mexico and the other along the coast of Africa, seems to demand the presence of other agents. Perhaps these may be found in local causes, such as the contour of coasts, the constant force of Trade winds, high temperature of the Gulf, &c. These would give the first impulse, and may be adequate to the initial velocity of the Gulf Stream.

Assuming its maximum velocity at 5 knots, and its depth and breadth in the Narrows of Bemini, as before, the vertical section across would present an area of two hundred millions of square feet moving at the rate of 7 feet 3 inches per second. The difference of specific gravity between the volume of Gulf water that crosses this sectional line in one second, and an equal volume of water at the ocean temperature of the latitude, is fifteen millions of pounds. If these estimated dimensions (assumed here—as throughout this paper they have been—upon the best authority, but merely for the purposes of illustration,) be within limits, then the force per second, operating here to propel

* The Gulf, or Carribean Sea, may have, towards the channel of Yucatan, a higher level of a few inches and such only as is due to any other large stream of 3 or 4 knots when deflected in its course, as the Carribean currents are, between their entrance into that sea and their exit from the Gulf.

the waters of the Gulf towards the pole, is the equilibrating tendency due to 15 millions of pounds of water in the latitude of Bemini.

In drawing up a plan for investigating the currents of the seas, such agencies should be taken into account. As a cause, I doubt whether this one is sufficient of itself to produce a stream of such great velocity as that of the Gulf; for, assuming its estimated discharge to be correct, the proposition is almost susceptible of mathematical demonstration, that to overcome the resistance opposed in consequence of its velocity, would require a force at least sufficient to drive, at the rate of 3 miles the hour, ninety thousand millions of tons up an inclined plane, having an ascent of 3 inches to the mile.* Yet the very principle from which this agent is derived, is admitted to be one of the chief causes of those winds which are said to be the sole cause of this current.

But, in addition to this, may there not be a peculiar system of laws not yet revealed, by which the motion of fluids in such large bodies is governed when moving through each other in currents of different temperature. That currents of sea water, having different temperatures, do not readily commingle, is shown by the fact already mentioned: that the line of separation between the warm waters of the Gulf and the cold waters of the Atlantic is perfectly distinct to the eye for several hundred miles; and even at the distance of a thousand miles, though the two waters have been in contact and continued agitation for many days, the thermometer shows that the cold water on either side still performs the part of river banks in keeping the warm waters of the stream in their proper channel.

In a winter's day off Hatteras, there is a difference between these waters of near 20° . Those of the Gulf being warmer, we are taught to believe that they are lighter; they should therefore occupy a higher level than those through which they float. Assuming the depth here to be 114 fathoms, and allowing the usual rates of expansion, figures show that the middle of the Gulf Stream here should be nearly 2 feet higher than the contiguous waters of the Atlantic. Were this the case, the surface of the stream would present a double inclined plane, from which the water would be running down on either side, as from the roof of a house. As this ran off at the top, the same weight of colder water would run in at the bottom; and thus, before this mighty stream had completed half its course, its depths would be brought up to the surface, and its waters would be spread out over the ocean. Why then does not such a body of warm water, flowing and adhering together through a cold sea, obey this law, and occupy a higher level? That it does not, we may infer from the silence of Navigators on the subject, as well as from other circumstances. If it did, the upper edges of its cold banks would support a lateral pressure of at least 100 lbs to the square foot; and vessels, in crossing it, would sail over a ridge as it were; on the East side of which, they would meet an Easterly current; and on the West side, a Westerly current. The resolution of the forces of each of these currents, with the Northwardly set of the stream itself, would induce Navigators to report a North Eastwardly current as they ascend the other side of this ridge, and a North Westwardly current as they descend on this; yet never was it heard that the Gulf Stream runs North West.

Should this roof current be too superficial to be felt by a vessel, the Gulf weed and all the floating substances borne by the stream across the Atlantic would run off on either side. But there is little or no Gulf weed along its Western edge, and its prevalence on the Eastern side may be readily accounted for by the operation of quite another law. Why this warm water therefore should not appear lighter than cold water is a curious phenomenon that, as far as I know, has never been considered. It is worthy of investigation. Nor should the paradox as to a higher level—a double inclined plane in the Gulf Stream itself, escape attention. Dr. Lardner assures us, and such too is the doctrine not yet exploded from our popular works,* that sea water expands according to the laws of fresh; and from this circumstance he argues that the fish in polar seas are preserved by the cold water being on top and the warmer below. But deep sea soundings do not confirm this. With a surface temperature of 34° , Northern voyagers have obtained a temperature at the depth of several hundred fathoms of 25° , which, according to the received laws of expansion, should have the specific gravity of water at 55° . And a thermometer thrust down the throat of a fish caught in polar seas, has been said to stand at Zero. The journals of arctic cruisers assure us of the fact, that the deeper we go down in the Northern seas of America, the colder the water, while the warmth off the shores of Northern Europe increases as we go down; thus showing a warm stratum of water to be lighter than the cold in one part of the Ocean, and in another contiguous to it, to be heavier.

But to return to the mingling of the waters.—We know from a familiar experiment,† that oil placed on water in a state of rest exerts an obvious and sensible force to put itself in motion; and it is a fact well known to iron founders, that cold and therefore heavier iron,‡ will not sink in the

* Dr. Marcet shows that sea water contracts until it freezes.

† If a bit of paper cut in the shape of a comma be dipped in oil and laid on water, the oil, in running off, will cause the paper to spin round.

‡ A cannon ball dropped into a ladle of melted iron will not sink till it expands, grows red hot, and becomes lighter.

melted material. May there not exist between cold and warm sea water a tendency similar in some degree to that between oil and water? Seeing how great is the resistance encountered by the Gulf Stream in its Eastward motion, and how insufficient is any head of water in the Gulf to give it its Northward tendency, may there not exist between the waters of the stream and their fluid banks, always heaving and moving to the swell of the sea, a sort of peristaltic force, which, with other agents, assists to keep up and preserve this wonderful system of ocean circulation? We know that undulatory motion varies with temperature in certain other substances, and why should it not vary in water also?

Sir Isaac Newton has demonstrated, that the velocity of waves is in the subduplicate ratio of their breadths. Therefore, if two vessels in a calm, one in, and the other outside of the Gulf Stream, would each count the waves that pass, or the times that the vessel rolls from side to side, in any given time, we should have an argument for determining whether the oscillation of a wave in the Gulf Stream, be shorter or longer, whether its rise and fall be greater or less, or whether there be any difference whatever between a warm wave and the cold one from which it is generated. That the waters of the Gulf Stream are more troubled than those of the Atlantic we all know from the "ugly seas," which Navigators so much complain of there. Almost the last, if not the very last word heard from the unfortunate schooner Grampus, was contained in a letter stating how greatly that vessel was distressed by them.

But it is facts and not theory that we want. We have not enough of the former to build up any theory at all! Nor should I undertake the structure if we had. In planning a system of observations in this magnificent field, instructions should cover the whole ground, and the attention of observers should be directed to every point from which it is possible for light to come. Therefore, in throwing out these suggestions, sailor like, I have but cast over my bottles; perhaps they may be picked up at some distant day, perhaps they may never be heard of again.

In its course to the North, the Gulf Stream gradually tends more and more to the Eastward, until it arrives off the banks of Newfoundland, where its course is said to become due East. These banks, it has been thought, deflect it from its proper course, and cause it to take this turn. Examination will prove, I think, that they are in part the effect, certainly not the cause. It is here, that the frigid current already spoken of, with its icebergs from the North, are met and melted by the warm waters from the Gulf. Of course the loads of earth, stones and gravel brought down upon them are here deposited. Captain Scoresby, far away in the North, counted 500 icebergs setting out from the same vicinity upon this cold current for the South. Many of them loaded with earth, have been seen aground on the banks. This process of transferring deposits for these shoals has been going on for ages; and, with time, seems altogether adequate to the effect described.

Nay more, a geodetic examination as to the course of the Gulf Stream, does not render it by any means certain that it is turned aside by the Grand Banks of Newfoundland at all; but that, in its route from the coasts of Georgia as far towards the shores of Europe as its path has been distinctly ascertained, it describes the arc of a great circle as nearly as may be. Following the line of direction given to it after clearing the Straits of Florida, its course would be nearly on a great circle passing through the poles of the earth. That it should be turned from this and forced along one inclining more to the East, requires, after it leaves these straits, the presence of a new force to give it this Eastward tendency. And have we not precisely such a force in the rate at which different parallels perform their daily rounds about their axis? In consequence of this, the stream, when it first enters the Atlantic from the Gulf, is carried with the earth around its axis at the rate of two miles and a half the minute faster towards the East than it is when it sweeps by the Grand Banks of Newfoundland.

That this explanation as to its Eastward tendency should hold good, a current setting from the North towards the South, should have a Westward tendency. Accordingly, and in obedience to the propelling powers, derived from the rate at which different parallels are whirled around in diurnal motion, we find the current from the North, which meets the Gulf Stream on the Grand Banks, taking a South-Westwardly direction, as already described. It runs down to the tropics by the side of the Gulf Stream, and stretches as far to the West as our own shores will allow. Yet, in the face of these facts, and in spite of this force, both Major Rennell and M. Arago make the coasts of the United States and the shoals of Nantucket to turn the Gulf Stream towards the East.

The maximum temperature of the Gulf Stream is 86° , or about 9° above the Ocean temperature due the latitude. Increasing its latitude 10° , it loses but 2° of temperature. And after having run 3,000 miles towards the North, it still preserves, even in winter, the heat of summer. With this temperature, it crosses the 40th degree of North latitude, and there, overflowing its liquid banks, it spreads itself out for thousands of square leagues over the cold waters around, and covers the ocean with a mantle of warmth that serves so much to mitigate in Europe the rigors of winter. Moving now more slowly, but dispensing its genial influences more freely, it finally meets the British Islands. By these it is divided, one part going into the polar basin of fresh water. Capt. Scoresby relates, that on the coast of Greenland, in latitude 72° , the temperature of the air was 42° —of the water 34° , and 29° at the depth of 118 fathoms. He there found a current setting to the South, and bearing with it this extremely cold water, with vast numbers of icebergs whose centres, perhaps, were far below zero. It would be curious to ascertain the routes of these under currents on their way to the tropical regions, which they are intended to cool. One has been found at the equator 200 miles broad and 23° colder than the surface water. Unless the land or shoals intervene, it no doubt comes down in a spiral curve.

Perhaps the best indication as to these cold currents may be derived from the fish of the sea. The whales first pointed out the existence of the Gulf Stream by avoiding its warm waters. Along our own coasts, all those delicate animals and marine productions which delight in warmer waters are wanting; thus indicating by their absence the cold current from the North now known to exist there. In the genial warmth of the Sea about the Bermudas on one hand and California on the other, we find, in great abundance, those delicate shell fish and coral formations which are altogether wanting in the same latitudes along the shores of South Carolina. The same obtains in the West coast of South America; for there, the cold current almost reaches the line, before the first sprig of coral is found to grow.

A few years ago, great numbers of bonita and albacore—tropical fish—following the Gulf Stream, entered the English Channel, and alarmed the fishermen of Cornwall and Devonshire, by the havoc which they created among the pilchards there.

It may well be questioned if our Atlantic cities and towns do not owe their excellent fish markets, as well as our watering places, their refreshing sea bathing in summer, to this stream of cold water. The temperature of the Mediterranean is 4° or 5° above the Ocean temperature of the same latitude, and the fish there are very indifferent. On the other hand, the temperature along our coast is several degrees below that of the Ocean, and from Maine to Florida our tables are supplied with the most excellent of fish. The sheeps-head, so much esteemed in Virginia and the Carolinas, when taken in the warm coral banks of the Bahamas, loses its flavor and is held in no esteem. The same is the case with other fish: when taken in the cold water of that coast, they have a delicious flavor and are highly esteemed; but when taken in the warm water on the other edge of the Gulf Stream, though at a few miles distant, their flesh is soft and unfit for the table. The temperature of the water at the Balize reaches 90° . The fish taken there are not to be compared with those of the same latitude in this cold stream. New Orleans therefore resorts to the cool waters on the Florida coasts, for her choicest fish. The same is the case in the Pacific. A current of cold water from the South sweeps the shores of Chili, Peru and Columbia, and reaches the Gallipagos Islands under the line. Throughout this whole distance, the world does not afford a more abundant or excellent supply of fish. Yet, out in the Pacific, at the Society Islands, where coral abounds, and the water preserves a higher temperature, the fish, though they vie in gorgeousness of coloring with the birds, and plants, and insects of the tropics, are held in no esteem as an article of food. I have known sailors, even after long voyages, still to prefer their salt beef and pork to a mess of fish taken here. Therefore, let those who are curious as to the migratory habits of fishes, join hands in the proposed system of observations upon currents—for the few facts which we have bearing upon the subject, seem to suggest it as a point of the inquiry to be made, whether the habit of certain fish does not indicate the temperature of the water; and whether these cold and warm currents of the Ocean, do not constitute the great highways through which migratory fishes travel from one region to another.

Navigators have often met with vast numbers of young sea-nettles (medusæ) drifting along with the Gulf Stream. They are known to constitute the principle food for the whale; but whither bound by this route has caused much curious speculation; for it is well known that the habits of the whale are averse to the warm waters of this stream. An intelligent sea captain informs me, that two or three years ago, in the Gulf Stream on the coast of Florida, he fell in with such a "school of young sea-nettles as had never before been heard of." The sea was covered with them for many leagues. He likened them, in appearance on the water, to acorns floating on a stream. But they were so thick as completely to cover the sea. He was bound to England and was five or six days in sailing through them. In about sixty days afterwards, on his return, he fell in with the same school off the Western Islands, and here he was three or four days in passing them again. He recognized them as the same, for he had never before seen any like them; and on both occasions he frequently hauled up buckets full and examined them.

Now the Western Islands is the great place of resort for whales; and at first there is something curious to us in the idea, that the Gulf of Mexico is the harvest field, and the Gulf Stream the gleaner which collects the fruitage planted there, and conveys it thousands of miles off to the hungry whale at sea. But how perfectly in unison is it with the kind and providential care of that great and good Being which feeds the young ravens and caters for the sparrow!

Our information as to the Sargasso Sea is most barren. Whence comes the weed with which it is covered, or where its place of growth may be, is matter of dispute among learned men. But as for the office which it performs in the economy of the Ocean, conjecture even is almost silent. Certain it is however, that that sea of weeds was not planted in the middle of the Ocean without design. The marks of intelligence, displayed throughout the whole system of terrestrial adaptations, forbid the idea. Botanists tell us of certain "nodding flowers" which, at a certain stage of growth, bend their heads, that the dust from the anthers may fall upon the stigma; when the necessary impregnation is accomplished, they become again erect. Now it is clear, if the stalk were stronger or weaker, if the force of gravity, or the size of the earth were greater or less, this operation could not take place, the flower would not yield seed after its kind, and the species must become extinct. Such is the delicate snow-drop of our garden walks. Therefore, at creation, when this little flower was put forth, the mass of the earth and the force of gravity must have been taken into account.

"There is something curious," says Professor Whewell, and he might have added profitable and instructive too, "in thus considering the whole mass of the earth, from pole to pole, and from circumference to centre as employed in keeping a snow-drop in the position most suited to its vegetable health." How much more forcibly must this adaptation and the necessary terrestrial arrangements apply to this sea and to the Gulf Stream, peopled, as no doubt they are, with myriads and myriads of living creatures! Even as to the depths of this sea we are ignorant; and as to the animals which the Gulf Stream conveys from one part of the Ocean to another, observation has told us scarcely a word. This is a fit subject of inquiry, and comes within the scope and reach of the plan proposed.*

* The Sargasso sea is an immense pool, in which are gathered in great quantities, gulf weed, drift wood, wrecks, and all the floating substances cast upon the Atlantic. Waters from the Indian ocean, by the Lagullas current—from the frozen regions beyond Cape Horn, through the ice-bearing current from the Antarctic seas—waters from the Arctic Ocean, through the Labrador current—all find their way into the Atlantic, and deliver whatever floating substances they bear, up to the Gulf Stream—whence, like the fucus natans, it gradually finds its way into this weedy sea, which is a basin in the Atlantic, between the Cape de Verdes, Canaries, and Western Islands, quite equal in extent to the Mississippi valley.

Three hundred and fifty years ago, Columbus passed over this sea. It was then covered with weeds, as it now is, and as it no doubt had been for ages and ages before. What its depth, or the character of the bottom may be, we know not—we are even ignorant as to the place of growth for its weeds. Yet to the geologist, this is a volume brim full of unread studies and mysterious things—it is a type on a grand scale, of the gathering together the materials for his ancient coal formations—and to such an one, the round world no where else affords a parallel. It is the only page any where to be found, where time, with his everlasting characters, is now writing his commentary as

The contemplated system of observations will be of high interest also to the meteorologist, whose science at this time is attracting so much attention. The fogs* of Newfoundland, which so much endanger Navigation in winter, doubtless owe their existence to the presence, in that cold sea, of immense volumes of warm water brought by the Gulf Stream. Sir Philip Brooke found the air on each side of it at the freezing point, while that of its waters was 80°. "The heavy, warm, damp air over the current produced great irregularities in his chronometers." The excess of heat daily brought into such a region by the waters of the Gulf Stream, if suddenly stricken from them, would be sufficient to make the whole column of superincumbent atmosphere ten times hotter than melted iron.

With such an element of atmospherical disturbance in its bosom, we might expect storms of the most violent kind to accompany it in its course. Accordingly, the most terrific that rage on the Ocean have been known to spend their fury in and near its borders.

Our nautical works tell us of a storm which forced this stream back to its sources, and piled up the water in the Gulf to the height of 30 feet. The Ledbury Snow attempted to ride it out. When it abated, she found herself high up on the dry land, and discovered that she had let go her anchor among the tree tops on Elliott's Key. The Florida Keys were inundated many feet, and the scene presented in the Gulf Stream was never surpassed in awful sublimity on the Ocean. The water thus dammed up, is said to have rushed out with woeto the manner and the means by which nature collected in her store houses the coal measures of the mountains.

This weed is not strewn over the sea in an unbroken sheet; it is arranged in seams and longitudinal sections, corresponding to the layers of coal in the coal basin. The sea is even free, in a great degree, from storms, and if we imagine that these weeds in the process of time, gradually wither, contract and sink, we shall have here a beautiful illustration as to the manner in which the coal seams were arranged in layers as we now see them among the mountains.

The bowsprit of the "Little Belt," lost in the West Indies, was found not long afterwards near the edge of the Sargasso.

In a former voyage, I once met upon its borders a rough spar of yellow pine, probably grown in one of our Southern States. It was covered with a beautiful crop of anasifes, interspersed with crabs, and surrounded by a school of dolphin. It had evidently been in the water a great while, for it was so water-soaked, that the wood had become translucent—almost as much so as thin slips of very "fat" oak wood. Receiving a still heavier load of barnacles and molluscs, it would in time have reached this sea, and been borne down to the depths below with its load of inhabitants, there, before the next hour, be marked on the globederful velocity against the fury of the gale, producing a sea that beggared description.

The great hurricane of 1780 commenced at Barbadoes. In it, the bark was blown from the trees, and the fruits of the earth destroyed; the very bottom and depths of the sea were uprooted, gical time-pieces, to be elaborated into the most beautiful and rare among fossils.

This basin is the great centre and receptacle of Atlantic drift. The moss and the lichen of the extreme North, brought down to the Grand Banks, are handed over on icebergs to the Gulf Stream, to be borne on towards this central whirl and lodged by the side of the larch and the fir of the farthest South, conveyed also by the ice-bearing* currents from Cape Horn. There too, in the caverns below, are to be found the flora and vegetables, with land shells, insects, etc., borne along with the drift wood from the river Gambia and the coast of Africa, from the Amazon and the Orinoco, the upper Missouri and lower Mississippi. In short, by reason of these currents and this sea of weeds, we have before our eyes the means of grouping in that basin, the most extended, varied, and magnificent collection of vegetable and animal matter that is known in any of the formations that have yet become geological.

That the drift wood from these regions should not be more often met with at sea, is not at all surprising. Barely floating at best, the prolific waters of the Gulf Stream soon load the floating trees with immense numbers of barnacles and shell fish. Many of them possess the power of expansion in a greater or less degree, and by a sort of concert of action, such as we see among corals and other fish, may possess the power of floating their shifting domicile at any depth. Finally reaching the Sargasso sea, the temperature of the water and other conditions become unfavorable to their animal health; they die, and thus the weight of the shells is sufficient to carry the whole tree, with its branches entire, down to the lower deposits, and place it there in the most gentle manner.

This process requires a very short time; hence it is, that floating drift-wood has not been met with in larger quantities in this sea. But some idea may be derived of the quantity of drift which is thus conveyed, from the fact, that the place of light house keeper at the Tortugas islands is considered one of the most profitable on account of its jet-^{ty}sum. The value of the copper and lead to be collected from the fragments of boats wrecked on the Mississippi, and landed on the Tortugas, is considered by the keeper quite equal to his salary from the Government. Now these islands are on the very edge of the stream, and the materials from wrecked boats bear but a small proportion to the drift-wood brought down that river. Let therefore the imagination picture the mass of materials, that in the process of ages upon ages would be thus transported from the Mississippi valley, from the plains of the Orinoco and the head waters of the Amazon, from the banks of the St. Lawrence and the forests of Africa, from central America, the West Indies, and shores of Labrador, into the Sargasso sea.

This sea can be looked upon in no other light than as the germ of a future coal basin or peat bog, in which, at some remote day, when we perhaps shall have become fossils, and this part of the sea dry land, other geologists will roam, to mine, speculate and dispute. Indeed, it requires but little stretch of the imagination to conceive that nature, with her corps of earthquake sappers and volcano miners, now at work there, laying her train for a grand geological display of uplift and heave. Teneriffe and the Azores are and the waves rose to such a height that forts and castles were washed away, and their great guns carried many yards; houses were blown down, ships were wrecked, and the bodies of men and beasts lifted up above the earth and dashed to pieces in the storm. At the different islands not less than volcanic; and but a few years ago, as if in warning, or to give note as to the state of preparation below, an island was cast up from the bottom, to sink again in this very sea.

But while the currents of the sea in one place are busied with the work of collecting and hiding in the middle of the ocean this vast assemblage of vegetable remains, they are employed on the out-skirts in collecting and arranging the materials for a formation of quite another sort. The ice-bearing currents from the North and the South bring down icebergs laden with earth, boulders and the carcasses of animals, to be deposited at one place upon the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, and at the other upon the Lagullas banks of South Africa. These are the places at which nature bids the tepid currents of the torrid zone to meet the icebergs from either pole, and to relieve them of their frigid loads of rocks and gravel. Are there not similar banks, at greater or less depth, near the junction of every ice-bearing current, with its equatorial counterpart?

Geology, through its mineral wealth and interests, it has been said, is at the bottom of the anti-corn law league in England. It certainly has something to do with the tariff doctrines of Pennsylvania; for without the iron and the coal of that and other States, legislators would argue less the question of home industry, tariff and protection. The learned chairman of this association had occasion a few weeks ago to point out the connection between geology and experiments upon the ballistic pendulum.* This all pervading science, through the currents of the sea, is quite as closely allied to navigation as, through the mineral wealth of the land, it is to legislation, custom-house laws, and Government revenue. Whose pursuits would seem to be farther apart than that of the geologist among the cliffs of the hills and the outcrops of the valleys, and that of the mariner among the billows of the sea? Meeting on the crest of two waves, they join hands across the Gulf Stream; the "weedy sea" is common ground, and the iceberg a volume of classic lore and high import; to one it is a type of ancient formations, to the other an index pregnant with meaning. In short, the facts collected by one are to the other points of the most valuable information.

The line of meeting between the waters of the Gulf Stream and the Atlantic is distinct to the naked eye for several hundred miles. This unreadiness of cold and tepid sea-water to commingle has been often remarked upon, and seems to impart to one current the power of dividing and turning others aside. Thus the Gulf Stream bifurcates the Labrador current, one part of which underruns the Gulf Stream, and the other takes a southwestwardly direction along the coast.

The reverse happens with the current from the Indian ocean, of which the Lagullas is a part. Here the cold current divides the warm one—one branch of which, as the Lagullas, after passing the Cape of Good Hope, is even turned back towards the northwest, while the other, the Australian, pursues its natural course to the southward and eastward, passing the island from which it takes its name.

Perhaps it was upon the tail of this or some other equa-

* In his paper before the National Institute, Captain Mordecai stated, that the sand used as a core in the pendulum had been compressed by impact from the ball, so as to adhere and present the appearance of sand-stone.

20,000 persons lost their lives on shore, while further to the North, the "Sterling Castle" and the "Dover Castle," men-of-war, were wrecked at sea, and fifty sail driven on shore at the Bermudas.

Several years ago, the British Admiralty set on foot inquiries as to the cause of the storms in certain ports of the Atlantic which so often rage with disastrous effects to Navigation. The result may be summed up in the conclusion to which the investigation led: that they are occasioned by the irregularity between the temperature of the Gulf Stream and of the neighboring regions both in the air and water.

Connected with and dependent upon this great artery of the Ocean, are numerous veins in the shape of eddies, counter currents, drifts and sets, all of the highest importance to Navigation, and to the neglect of which many frightful disasters among sea-faring people, are to be ascribed.

In 1804, H. M. ship "Apollo," left the cove of Cork with 69 sail under convoy for the West Indies. They encountered a current in the tail of the Gulf Stream of which they were not aware, and on the 7th day out, the "Apollo," with 40 of the convoy, were wrecked on the coast of Portugal.

It is the Navigator's ignorance of the force of currents on the coast of Africa that has done so much towards supplying the wandering Arabs of the desert with slaves, and that has given to the world such thrilling narratives as that of Adams wrecked in the "Charles," of Riley in the "Commerce," and of Paddock in the "Oswego." To this ignorance are attributed those horrid and revolting scenes enacted on the raft which was made from the wreck of the French frigate, "La Medusa." Hundreds of others whose wretched fate only is told in silence, by the plank upon the shore, owe their loss to our ignorance of currents.

In 1825, 800 sail of British shipping were lost at sea. And upon an average, one American and two British ships are wrecked every day the year round. Most of these losses are owing to the effects of unknown currents. I doubt whether a subject, more important in its bearings, was ever presented for the consideration of this Institution.

The field of investigation is most magnificent; when rightly understood, the system of marine currents and Ocean circulation cannot fail to open to us an arrangement not less beautiful and harmonious than the "music of the spheres." Though I have only glanced at some of the currents in the Atlantic, there are others, both there and in the Pacific, not less interesting and scarcely less important than these. Among them, circumstances seem to invite inquiry as to the probability of a "Gulf Stream" in the North Pacific. The resort of whales about Japan, as about Newfoundland in the same latitude—the European-like climate of Oregon—the thunder storms encountered in high Pacific latitudes out of season—the absence of whales in the torial current that Captain Ross struck which enabled him to reach so much farther South than the American Expedition was enabled to do. This warm current—warm there only by comparison—was not perhaps strong enough to be detected by the log. It could only be shown by the thermometer; for if Captain Ross found a higher temperature than was found upon the same parallel by the vessels of the American Expedition in another part of the ocean, it would be fair to infer that the warmer waters were not made warmer on that parallel, but that they were drifted there from warmer regions. I have not seen either of the journals, nor have I heard a word as to any difference of temperature found by the two. It appears from the general system and arrangement of currents, that a flow of tropical water, of course of greatly reduced temperature, but still higher than that of the surrounding sea, should and ought to be found near the longitude by which Captain Ross approached the Antarctic. And I hope to have an opportunity of comparing temperatures. No doubt but the south pole is approached in some region by one or more, perhaps several tropical currents. Before attempting another voyage there, it would be highly desirable first to ascertain the route of that which is greatest in volume. Witness the effects of the Gulf Stream upon the temperature of the polar basin about Spitzbergen, as compared with the temperature at the same parallel in the North American seas.

In studying out the currents of the sea the mind has presented to it a most sublime subject for contemplation. It would be doing violence to the wisdom every where displayed through nature, to suppose that they are governed by other than wise, certain, harmonious and fixed laws. Through these laws, when rightly understood, the system of ocean circulation will present for contemplation an order and arrangement as beautiful and imposing as the geological column itself. Therefore this subject recommends itself for its beauty and grandeur to every well-balanced and cultivated mind. The "wonders of the deep" are more often alluded to in Holy Writ, and are more frequently used there in illustration of the power and greatness of the Creator than any other portion of his handy-work.

Therefore devout men—for the undevout geologist is as mad as the undevout astronomer—will receive from the proposed system of observations, many an instructive and profitable lesson. In never ceasing motion the waves of the sea lift up their voice continually. Whether heard in the raging of the storm or in the mute eloquence of the calm, they teach man his littleness, and tell of the power and attributes of the everlasting God.

Gentlemen here, and good men every where, can do much to aid this plan by giving it their countenance, and using their influence with masters by inducing them to send to Washington an abstract of their logs, though it contained but the track of the vessel, with the winds and temperature. Even this would be valuable, and any thing additional would be much more so. Our whalers do collect and have at their power to give much truly valuable information. That which they collect concerns the meteorologist, the naturalist and others, not less than the navigator and geographer. Indeed, the ocean, with its almost unsealed book of mysteries, presents to the votary of science, whatever be the name of his association, a common highway, upon which each society, like every nation, may make its ventures and return, like them, in vessels laden with treasures to enrich the mind and benefit the human race.—Extract from "Paper on the Currents of the Sea as connected with Geology," read before the association of American Geologists and Naturalists, May 14, 1744—by M. F. Maury, Lt. U. S. N."

same region, all appear to indicate between North Western America and North Eastern Asia, the presence of a large body of warm water. The probability of such a current there seems to become stronger and its similarity to the Gulf Stream more striking, from the fact that the extreme cold of North Eastern Asia corresponds with our North Eastern climate, indicating thereby the existence of a cold current from the North, corresponding to that on our Atlantic coast, where certain cold water fish are known to resort.

If there be such a warm current from Sumatra and the China seas, perhaps it is spread out over a larger space, and does not by any means reach Gulf Stream velocity. Nor is it likely that it would be met in much force, so low down as vessels bound to China from Western America would cross it. As far as the collecting of facts from observations is concerned, this is a barren sea. Our standard directories of the Ocean do not inform us whether there be so much as a current* throughout the whole extra-tropical extent of the North Pacific. The time is fast approaching when that part of the Ocean too will become a great highway for ships. And any information that this Institute can collate in relation to it, would be highly valuable and most acceptable to Navigators. We have seen how useful currents become in the economy of the Ocean, and how important to its safe and speedy Navigation is a knowledge of them. In the beautiful system of cosmeical arrangements and terrestrial adaptations, by which we are surrounded, they perform active and important parts: they not only dispense heat and moisture, and temper climates, but they prevent stagnation in the sea, and by their active circulation, transport food and sustenance for its inhabitants from one region to another, and people all parts of it with life and animation. Yet, on this interesting subject, former observations have thrown just light enough to make visible the darkness through which we are groping.

"The discovery," says the Baron Humboldt, "of a group of uninhabited islands is less interesting than a knowledge of those laws which bind together a considerable number of facts."

Therefore be diligent—let the plan of observations cover broad grounds, and occupy the whole field. The perfection to which chronometers have been brought; the nicety of our instruments; the accuracy of the nautical ephemeris; the convenient arrangement of the requisite tables—and, above all, the intelligence and skill of the multitudes of laborers that now stand idle, but ready, all combined, enable us to conduct a system of observations upon the phenomena of the sea, with advantages which no other age has afforded since the world began.

It may be asked how a society, in its very infancy and without means, can occupy with observers a field like this, as wide as the poles and as broad as the sea!—In answer, I would point to the Navy and our commercial marine—with such materials and with its honors and the hope of its honorary rewards rightly applied, the moral influence of the Institute can accomplish more than the mines of Potosi.

In whatever may tend to the improvement of Navigation, or redound to the credit of their country, the officers of the Navy have always been ready. Any plan, therefore, for collecting facts and systematizing observations in the fields proposed, is sure to receive from them the most zealous and hearty coöperation, when it does not interfere with their more immediate duties.

The commercial marine of no country in the world can boast of ship masters superior to the Americans as Navigators and in general intelligence. Their industry and enterprize warrant the expectation that they too would join hands in the undertaking most readily. Personal knowledge of them warrants the belief, that at the invitation of the Institute they would undertake a series of observations upon any plan the society may propose.

A BIVOUAC IN THE DESERT.

BY MARY E. HEWITT.

"After the battle of the Pyramids, the whole way through the desert was tracked with the bones and bodies of men and animals, who had perished in these dreadful wastes. In order to warm themselves at night, they gathered together the dry bones and bodies of the dead, which the vultures had spared, and it was by a fire composed of this fuel that Napoleon lay down to sleep in the desert!"

[Miot's Memoirs.

The ploughshare of the conqueror passed
Across the burning desert plain;
While on the sower followed fast,
And scattered in the bright red grain.

And tracking on that welded blade,
Forged from their countless battle-brands;
Far o'er the broad, deep furrow made,
On swept his trained Prætorian bands.

The vulture is the desert's king!
And what of conquerors recketh he!
Who bounds his empire by his wing,
Reigneth, I ween, right fearlessly!

'Twas night—the conqueror's harvest night—
No star in heaven its glories hid;

And poured the moon her radiant light
On desert, tent, and pyramid.

The reaper's blade its toil forsook—
And in the glittering river Nile
The plumed and turban'd Mameluke
Slept with the scale-armed crocodile.

Oh, Isis! Thou adored of old
With mystic rite, and symbol rare;
Rude hands have rent thy veil's dark fold,
And lain thy hidden altars bare.

The crescent gleams from Moslem tower,
High o'er the walls of Ptolemy;
And naught but thine own lotos flower,
Oh, Nilus! bends to worship thee.

Where 'mid the tombs their grandeur raised
Her Pharaohs slumber, all forgot;
Remnant of Egypt's pride abased,
The Copt her power remembers not—

Ages of sceptred glory gone,
Your sculptured records time hath kept Where'er to conquest thundering on,
To victory, aye Sesostriis swept.*

Egypt! Nile's suckling! Thou that wast
Throned in the old world's infancy—
While yet on her kind, fostering breast
The teeming earth encradled thee—

How, through all time, a doomed lot
Hath been thine own—devoted land!
For aye the scourge that wearied not—
For aye, for aye the foeman's brand!

Sleep they, the hosts thy sands that trod?
Lo! with their centuries, vanquished all!
Yet, where the conquering Persian stood,
Where warred the Assyrian, wars the Gaul!

The jackal and the wolf are out,
A phantom army holds the plain;
Why pales the conqueror? Is't with fear
His blood runs chill through every vein?

Fear! Was't a word for him who played
The sword 'gainst crown and sceptre old?
Write FEAR where drave his furrowing blade
Who trembled but beneath the cold!

Ho! Ye that reaped the ripened field—
What left ye to the gleaner's hand?

* "We are assured on the personal evidence of Herodotus and Strabo, that the pillars erected by the Egyptian leader, to mark his conquests, still remained in their days, and that they were even personally inspected by them in Syria, Palestine, Arabia and Ethiopia. The inscription which these proud monuments every where bore, was to the following effect:—"Sesostriis, King of kings, and Lord of lords, subdued this country by his arms."—Civil History of Ancient Egypt.

Her stubble let the desert yield,
To cheer this wide, unvarying sand!

For leagues away, the barren plain
Nor tree, nor shrub, nor verdure owns—
Where they had sown the blood-red grain,
They gleaned but blanched, and mouldering bones.

And where of old the cloud and fire
Led on the wandering Israelite,
They heaped the pile—till far the pyre
Reared its red column on the night.

And fast the fanning night-wind came,
And high the scroll accusing swept;
While 'neath that uplift tongue of flame,
The "Lion of the Desert"* SLEPT!

* "Napoleon," says Sir Walter Scott, "was pleased with the flattery which derived his christian name from two Greek words, signifying the "Lion of the Desert."

PRESENT STATE OF LETTERS.

TO WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS, Esq.

DEAR SIR, It is little more than a year since I had the pleasure of a prolonged and interesting conversation with you, in Charleston, on the subject of American Literature. This conversation may have passed from your memory, for to you it was merely the easy enunciation of thoughts long entertained, and, doubtless, frequently expressed before. I shall not as readily forget it, for it has been to me the germ of much subsequent reflection on the nature of Literature in general, and more especially of the Literature of this country. The seed which you cast lightly on the soil has sprouted, put forth leaves and fructified, and, though the fruit so produced may be crude, still it may be suggestive of profounder and more mature views to others, able to devote more time and ability to the investigation of the subject than I can. In resolving to give publicity to my meditations, I have preferred the epistolary form to that of the more imposing essay, as I design expressing my views in that loose and desultory manner in which they rise, and which is perhaps the most suitable for the utterance of opinions for whose soundness I will not vouch, and which future reflection may possibly induce me to modify, or even to abandon. And I do not think that I can address my remarks to any one with greater propriety than to yourself, for you were the original cause of their formation—you have devoted much care to the examination of the subject—and you have been lately illustrating kindred topics with signal ability. Moreover, I know that you will overlook any crudity which may be incident to this inartistic expression of my opinions, and to the undigested nature of the speculations themselves. I shall, therefore, presume your indulgent consideration, even in those instances in which you may be disposed to dissent altogether from my conclusions; and having anticipated your favor I shall be less apprehensive of a failure to obtain that of others.

It is always an interesting and profitable employment to cast a glance over the existing state of letters; but there are many considerations which will render such an examination peculiarly instructive at the present time. There is an indecision, a vagueness, and I may add an apparent incoherence in the literature of the day, which, at first sight, might threaten to baffle all successful scrutiny into its nature, and to some observers might seem to indicate nothing but the progressive and rapid decline of the literary eminence of nations. Many, indeed, might be preserved from any such apprehension, by the habit, now grown natural to them, of considering quantity as the correlative of quality and of assuming the multitude of recent publications to be conclusive evidence of the vigor, the excellence and the vitality of the present order of things. Neither of these views can be sufficient to any but the most superficial minds; they are both incorrect, and sweeping deductions from a few prominent facts grossly misunderstood: but if any distinction is to be made between their degrees of error, the latter conclusion is the more unphilosophic of the two. To those who are content to rest upon such misapprehensions of the subject, the signs of the times will be incapable of any lucid explanation. True it is, that a close inspection of the phenomena around us will furnish evidence of disintegration and gradual decomposition taking place in the fabric of the literary world: but to a deeper scrutiny this disintegration will appear only as one of the phenomena preparatory to and indicative of a coming change. For those who examine carefully will perceive that among the crumbling materials the seed leaves of new systems are every where unfolding themselves, and, though the frequent and unskilful upturning of the soil may often cover and hide them for a time; yet, by their vital energy, they again thrust themselves through the superstratum thus thrown upon them, and unfold their leaves with a new life. A few moments devoted to the investigation of these phenomena to a study of their nature and of the causes which have produced them will not be wasted.

I hold the position, that every social and intellectual development, and, consequently, every social and intellectual change is a natural growth of human character acted upon by the variety of human events—they are invariably the product of individual energies and the external circumstances of society combined. There are other modifying influences, which, as they are slight in civilized periods, it would be tedious here to enumerate. This is a doctrine, which, though feebly enunciated before, has not been very strongly or intelligently insisted upon until of late years, and has not yet received its full consideration. It will be wholly unnecessary for me to illustrate its significance, or to point out its importance to you. The immediate corollary from it is, that any existing state of society, with all its phenomena, must be attributable to certain determinate events prior in time; and, if the phases themselves be apparent, the probability is that the causes can not be very recondite, but may be discovered, weighed and appreciated by a little attention and diligence. Therefore, whatever be the present condition of letters, there must previously have been cognizable causes to which it may be referred: and by an examination of these we may attain some insight into the subject of our present speculations. At any rate, I will venture upon making the attempt.

In the earliest stages of the French Revolution, the liberal minded of all countries fancied that a new Avatar had descended upon the earth for the regeneration of society, in all its multiplex departments. There were few who had the prescience and sagacity of Burke, or who were able to scent the tainted atmosphere from afar. A few years—nay, a few months, and the tremendous overthrow of all old systems, produced by the excesses of the French people at home, together with that mad and feverish lust of conquest which threatened the institutions of the rest of Europe, spread throughout all countries terror and alarm for the existence of civil society itself. The revulsion of feeling was as great as it was sudden—people became alarmed for their persons, their property, and those social forms under which they had grown up, and to which they were attached. The conservative energies of humanity on which alone it appeared that reliance was capable of being placed, and even their activity, it was feared, might prove insufficient to resist that increasing frenzy of innovation, which was regarded as equally overwhelming and equally destructive with the invasion of the Northern Barbarians, at the commencement of the Middle Ages. From one extreme men had passed to the other. This terror and its consequences have gradually faded away. The French Revolution, though its advance was through a sea of blood on which floated the wrecks of a thousand cherished associations, is now regarded with a more calm and sober judgment, and can, accordingly, be more justly estimated. We now acknowledge it to have been the greatest and most radical social change since the Reformation of Luther, perhaps we might say, since the establishment of Christianity. It is admitted that it has sapped the foundations of all old systems, that it has undermined many and overthrown many, but we recognize this very destruction as the necessary prelude of some great and catholic change already commenced, though not yet fully revealed to us. The exact nature and limits of this great mutation, the periods and the modes of its accomplishment are still hidden from us, but we can see that it is universal in its operation, and we are not debarred from obtaining some proximate knowledge of its meaning.

When every thing else in society was so radically affected, it would have been surprising if Literature should alone have escaped beyond the reach of its influence. By Literature I understand all that is composed for publication under the form of letters. The Literature of a country is the most delicate and universal expression of its various thoughts and feelings, and, hence, is that department of human intellect in which change is usually first displayed. The writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot and the rest of the Encyclopædistical school had indicated the French Revolution, so far as it was founded upon opinion, long before it had visibly commenced, or was generally anticipated; and like phenomena, though in a less degree, might have been detected in the Literatures of other countries. But if Literature be the precursor by its varying hues of political and social change, it is not less affected thereby itself. The ages of Æschylus and of Pericles at Athens, of Augustus at Rome, of Elizabeth in England, and of Louis XIV. in France, might teach us this without any labored argument, and without any recurrence to the example of the French Revolution. But the latest instance is the most instructive of all: the rise of the Byronic and the Lake Schools of Poetry in England, and the appearance of the modern French Literature as soon as the fanaticism of social change had subsided into a less violent ferment in France, show how suddenly and how profoundly political convulsions operate upon the literary world. Byron and his imitators were the highest and last expression of a system which was passing away; but mingled with this, and in much bolder prominence, was the utterance of those feelings of dark uncertainty, of scepticism and of despair, produced in apprehensive minds by the whirl and confusion of tottering creeds and crumbling institutions, which filled the world at the time when they wrote. Wordsworth and his partisans were the Evangel of a change in progress. Shelley, with a still bolder flight, projected himself far beyond the known into the boundless abysses of the future: his voice sounds like the anticipated and inverted reverberation of sounds which shall greet no mortal ear until a very distant day. Such being his spirit, his utterance was necessarily dark, mystical, perplexed and involved—it was the oracular prophesying of a Pythoness, who, with strained eyes, perceived strange shapes in the recesses of futurity, which, with difficulty, she could depict in the known forms of language, and which she could only imperfectly reveal to a generation whose thoughts were unfamiliar with such possibilities of a fevered imagination. These three, Byron,

Wordsworth and Shelley, were equally in harmony with their own times, and with the social phenomena succeeding the out-burst of the French Revolution, but they regarded the world around them from different points of view, and hence arose the stronger features of their dissimilarity. Byron was, however, the truest as well as the most rhythmical exponent of his age. He uttered the common but indistinct feelings of men of that day in their most beautiful and poetic form—the melancholy occasioned by the departure of a former system—the full intelligence of the discord and ruin around—and a sad despair of any better fruits, but only the fear of deeper and deeper degradation:—these were the feelings which gave inspiration to Byron, but to them was added new poignancy from the unhappy events of his life, which never suffered him to be in harmony himself with the external world around him. To use his own words, his experience made him feel that

Our life is a false nature, it is not in
The harmony of things.

That doubt which found an oracular voice in Byron has not yet passed away: perhaps the doubt itself is now more widely diffused, though less intense, and considerably modified in its nature; but we have no longer the agony which at first accompanied it, nor have we the same despair of better things, for we are now confident of a brighter day than the former, as soon as the sun has fairly appeared above the horizon. We are still in the gloom of twilight, but we know that the day will soon break, so that our uncertainty manifests itself under less exaggerated forms; but it exists not the less on this account. As far as the poetry of doubt is concerned—that is irrevocably gone—Byron's harp is unstrung; the fountain once so prolific of melody is musical no more—the dead bones can not be revived by the wand of any enchanter—that phase of society of which he was the utterance can never return—the sources of his poetry are exhausted, and his poetry belongs to the past. The same may be said, though in a different degree, of Wordsworth and Shelley. The circumstances—the age which produced them have departed, and though they are rather the prophets of the future than the reproducers of the past, yet when another birth of poetry shall be vouchsafed to us, it will have its own peculiar characteristics, as it will be due to its own peculiar causes. As poetry is the earliest flower to bloom in the gardens of Literature, so it is the first to fade. The generation of great poets produced by the French Revolution are now no more—they have fulfilled their glorious mission and have left the stage—all that we now have of poetical are but the echoes, more or less melodious, of their 'dying fall.'

The phenomena are more or less analogous in the other departments of Literature; but in proportion as they recede from poetry their development has been more or less retarded. The change in novel-writing, introduced by Sir Walter Scott, followed so close upon the resuscitation of poetry that it might be almost said to have accompanied it. It was, however, of later growth, but its longer continuance in a flourishing state may be attributed to its having been previously a less hackneyed field, perhaps as much as to its more tardy development. But every one who has studied the indications of the literary world must have perceived that the palmy days of novel-writing are over, and that prose fiction is gradually losing its interest and its power, though we may not as yet be able easily to recognize its diminished hold on the public mind. Were it not that the true taste for works of fiction had almost expired, and been replaced by a prurient avidity for excitement without any reference to the artistic merits of execution, we might not have had to regret your abandonment of this department of letters. Bulwer, too, has withdrawn from the field: and though Cooper, James, Marryat still occasionally write, yet how much of their former spirit is fled; and as for the host of petty stars that still shine on, how unlike are they to the brilliancy that is passing away! That taste which appreciates excellence in novel-writing, and enjoys just in proportion as it appreciates, no longer exists as the general characteristic of the reading public. The failure of the product and the failure of the exciting cause are correlatives and consentaneous; the one may always be taken as evidence of the other. Novel-writing has run its race, and the lust for novel-reading is already on the wane; not that, by any means, I would assert that novel-readers will ever cease to be numerous, or that I would deny the possibility of a revival in the department of fiction, but before the latter can be feasible, there must first have been a new impregnating spirit which will render the succeeding literature of romance a revivification of the present, rather than a continuation of it. The old corporation has expired by the death or resignation of its members: it can not again discharge its legitimate functions until it has been re-chartered.

The present condition of Philosophy, Political, Moral and Intellectual, is scarcely less significant. Even Bentham and Mills, though infinitely more profound than the Scotch school to which they succeeded, belonged, like them, rather to the by-gone system than to any new one. They were the last word of Paley's scheme; and though their works may be a rich mine of materials for subsequent structures, though much may be discovered in their writings which the coming age will gladly seize upon and embody, yet even that will be found there in a rude and chaotic state. At most, they appertain to a season of preparation, when old fabrics are overthrown, their materials examined, and fresh masses cut out from the quarry to be afterwards fitted into their appropriate places. In other Philosophy, the works produced have been all nearly of the same cast; much has been attempted, nothing satisfactorily achieved—they are in part the highest and ultimate expression of an effete system—in part the menstruum in which float about the timbers of an incipient structure; but to a still greater extent they are subversive of every thing which preceded them.

One particular department has, indeed, of late years raised its head above the waters of the deluge which covers the ruins and crumbling foundations of a former world. I mean Historical Philosophy, and under this head I would include much of what Victor Cousin and his followers have produced, as well as the more obvious publications of Guizot and the recent Historical school of France. Even these, however, have not as yet built up any finished edifice—their efforts have been rather a vague tentative, from whose partial success we may form vast anticipations, and augur most favorably of the future, than either satisfactory in themselves, or initiatory of any permanent and sufficient system. But to this point we hope to have an opportunity of returning on some subsequent occasion.

The changes of Science are less easily observed beforehand than those in the other departments of intellect, on account of the general abstruseness of the subjects with which it is concerned, and its confinement, for the most part, to the closets of a few retired votaries. For the same reason it is less liable to be affected suddenly by the revolutions which convulse the rest of the world, and is accordingly much later in receiving the permeating influence of a spirit of general innovation. But that a disintegration is at this moment taking place in the recognized systems of science, and a great mutation impending, is evident, if from no other fact, yet from this, that numerous attempts have been made of late years to classify and re-organize the physical sciences upon a new and more comprehensive basis so as to make them articulate intimately with each other, and to fuse them into one great, harmonious and homogeneous whole—a magnum integrum et unicum curriculum scientiarum. Some of these attempts have been rude and outré enough; but their very existence, their very possibility of conception is significant of the general consciousness of present imperfection, and of the vague desire of a radical and universal reintegration. I do not allude here to the reformation of the science of optics, in accordance with the discoveries of Young and Fresnel, nor to the prospective adunation of Electricity, Magnetism, Galvanism and the cognate sciences, because as these are either partial changes, or new discoveries, and as their immediate influence is limited to the departments in which they have arisen, they might exist and be carried on independently of any Great Instauration. (You will excuse me for so frequently employing Baconian terms.) But in stating this disorganization of Science, and its impulse towards a reformation of itself, we are not left solely to inference from facts, however pregnant of meaning. Inference might be fallible though the indications of the spirit it would suppose were never so strong. But writers on Science themselves, the Levites of the inner Temple, a class of men the last to recognize the approaches of any universal change, have frequently and expressly declared, in late years, their consciousness of a revolutionary movement within their own borders. Nay, Professor Whewell himself, in his late instructive works on the Inductive Sciences, has composed and published two ponderous treatises in a full reliance upon this faith, and has even attempted, in imitation of Bacon, to assume the office of herald of the approaching change, though seriously he can not be considered as much more than the fly on the wheel.

If any thing further were wanting to prove the chaotic state of the intellectual world at the present time, the proof is before us in all the grand departments of social life. It may be seen in the violent antagonism of political opinions, in the conscious want of a new spirit in legislation, with a concomitant ignorance, on the part of legislators as well as others, as to the means to be adopted for giving practical form and accomplishment to their desires. It may be seen no less in legal changes; but more than all in the dissensions and convulsions which are now agitating the body of every organized ecclesiastical system. In the Church the elements are at work, and every thing portends a second reformation and a new birth in religion as soon as some Luther may arise to dispel the clouds which are now lowering upon us. I might dwell upon this subject—I might show how the Great Reformation was partial, how its principles were not fully seized by the Reformers themselves, how they have been perverted, misapplied and misunderstood by all subsequent churches styling themselves Protestant; but I am afraid I have travelled somewhat out of my path in noticing these phases of the moral world, and, moreover, the subject would demand a dissertation for itself. But I would ask, can any stronger indications of the present disintegrated state of the intellectual world be required, any more convincing proofs of the revolution which is now in progress to end with a great Reformation in all Literature?

I have by no means exhausted my subject, but I have exhausted my paper, and perhaps your patience. I think I have shown enough, however, to prove in what point of view we should at the present moment regard Literature. I must reserve for subsequent communications the exposition of the many points connected with this subject, and of those reflections for the sake of which they have been introduced. In the mean time, I have much pleasure in subscribing myself,

Very sincerely and respectfully,

Your obliged and obedient servant,

GEORGE FREDERICK HOLMES.

Orangeburg, S. C.

TO A MOCKING-BIRD,

HEARD DURING SICKNESS.

Oh! sing again, sweet bird, Oh! sing again,
Thou know'st not how thou cheer'st mine hours of pain!
The changing notes thou warblest out so clear,
Bring my forsaken woodland home so near.

Then, sing again! how oft I've heard that song,
In our green forests burst forth full and strong,
Whilst I have silent stood and breathless heard:
And now, each note seems like a household word.

Must I plead in vain? wilt thou sing no more?
Music's dream in thy heart perhaps is o'er,
Thou canst not sing in the city's scant shade,
For the lone deep forest thy notes were made.

Like thine, oh bird! my songs are faint and few;
I pine sweet nature's sounds to hear and view,
In all their majesty and winning grace,
Her glorious scenes, her beauties "face to face."

I remember one smiling summer morn,
When music and happiness seemed twin-born,
I early strayed the fields and groves among,
Whilst every grassy spire with gems was hung.

A dove was sighing in an elm's dark shade,
Beneath, a streamlet with the flowers played;
Those mournful tender accents thrilled my soul,
And tears, ah! not of grief, mocked my control.

Near to the lake, far down the verdant dale,
Where yet the mist hung like a silver veil,—
A swelling chorus suddenly uprose:
Now soft—now higher, up to Heaven it soars.

Intent I stood, yet not a sign could see
From which to trace this burst of minstrelsy.
But lo! the sun swept off the mist,—behold
The veil from the choristers is unroll'd.

Perched on each lance-like stalk a small brown bird
Poured forth the mystic music I had heard,
And sang and sang, as though they strove to fill
The air, which trembled with a rapturous shrill.

The vale I left, and climbed the green hill's slope,
When, buoyant as youth's fresh exulting hope,
A lark with mirth and music upward flew,
And singing, rising, vanished from my view.

A little farther on perched o'er a glen,
So wild and lone 'twas seldom trod by men,
A giant of the forest stood alone
Half with the moss and lichen overgrown.

Its topmost bough was black with death; the rest
No bird could wish a greener, thicker nest.

Bright sunbeams fell on the dark unsightly thing,
And there a mock-bird sat and plumed his wing.

Wheeling and settling with sweet trilling note,
He seemed in a graceful waltz to float.
And e'er 'neath his wings, as he upward flew,
A snowy scarf waving around him threw.

Soon the waltz was done; from the blighted bough
Each wild forest minstrel seemed warbling now.
Free as new found vent for a hidden spring
Through the clear bright air did that mimic chant ring.

I listened, my wrapt heart filled with delight,
By the minstrel gay and the sky so bright,
And thanked my Father for the happiness born,
The heartfelt bliss of that musical morn.

*E. D. TO J. B. D.
Leon to Dabney.
TO THE EDITOR OF THE S. L. MESSENGER.*

Dear Sir,—The two last No.'s of the Messenger have contained a "Reply to E. D. and Mr. Simms," in the form of an able and elaborate Essay, evidently the production of a skilful and practised writer; and, as one of the parties interested in the controversy, I must claim of your courtesy the privilege of a few words in reply.

It is neither my desire nor intention to enter into an elaborate discussion of the question of Literary Property upon which "J. B. D." has exercised so much labor and ingenuity; since the question, so far from being a new one, as he seems to regard it, is in fact a very hackneyed one; the arguments both pro and con, having been fully set forth and exhausted upwards of one hundred years ago in the celebrated case of Millar and Taylor, at the trial of which Lord Mansfield presided; where all was said that could be said on the subject by himself, the two assistant Judges, and Sir William Blackstone on the one side, and by Chief Justice Yeates on the other: afterwards it was re-considered by the whole bench of Judges in the case of Donaldson and Beckett; from thence transferred to the House of Lords, and there fully discussed by Lord Kames, Lord Camden, and others of equal ability. In our own country it has been made the subject of one of the decisions of our Supreme Court, and ably discussed in several numbers of the American Jurist, published at Boston. It would, therefore, be next to impossible to say any thing new on the subject, and as I presume, most intelligent readers would prefer, in the words of Horace, to those sources I would respectfully refer them for information on the subject. But whilst acknowledging the courtesy and ability manifested by the writer of the "Reply," I must yet be permitted to correct some statements affecting myself, which that piece contains; nor do I think that "J. B. D."

"Petere fontes, quam sectari rivos,"

displays his wonted kindness and courtesy in some of his introductory paragraphs, to which I would call the attention of yourself and readers.

He states in the commencement of his article, that he "Would not have ventured to have mingled in the controversy, had not the partizans of this legislative novelty in a spirit of wholesale defamation, charged the American people with an obliquity of moral perception and criminal indifference to the sacred rights of property, because they have been slow to embrace a scheme fraught with the most disastrous consequences to the cause of popular education and the interests of the American publisher."

Thus constituting himself the champion of the American people against the assaults of those "outside barbarians," E. D. and Mr. Simms, and winding up with a charge against my unfortunate self, of endorsing the stale slanders of British tourists, because I have ventured to hint that my countrymen had not quite reached perfection, and have alluded to some unfortunate facts which he himself in the next paragraph admits and deplures.

If an attack upon a few venal and hungry publishers can be construed into an attempt to hold up the American people to contempt, I must plead guilty to the charge, but not otherwise; since in my remarks, I limited their application to a particular class of publishers, the cheap ones, in contradistinction to the old established houses of Harpers, Carey & Hart, and others; and as J. B. D. talks much of "the argument of Epithet," I would advise him to be certain of his position before launching his thunders at the heads of those obstinate individuals who can not be persuaded that

"Black's not black,
Nor white so very white,"

nor induced to regard the perpetrators of Literary Larceny as benefactors to their country.

As regards the charge of my having urged "a want of faith as a national characteristic," is a misapprehension of my meaning on the part of J. B. D., as may plainly be perceived by a reference to the context wherein the passage occurs; and I doubt not that his own candor will induce him to admit the error into which a hasty perusal of my Essay has naturally led him. For the words used by me were these:

"The great want of this country is a want of faith, we do not mean religious faith, but use the term in its most comprehensive sense of confidence in human integrity and honesty, without which enlarged views and liberal feelings can not exist among a people."

Which charges our countrymen only with being a suspicious people according to the definition there given of the term "faith." The meaning, however, might easily be mistaken.

And here I must be allowed in all good temper, to point out to J. B. D. an inconsistency of which he himself has been guilty, since he is so critical as regards others. In the commencement of his Essay, he pounces fiercely down upon Mr. Simms for expressing a jealousy of the designs of English authors, yet, on the very next page, he himself attributes the excitement on the subject of International Copyright to the "cupidity of English authors, who wish to engross our literary market; and hence their animosity against every man who has the hardihood to question the validity of their claims to such a lucrative monopoly," although how a "monopoly" could be created by placing American and English authors on precisely the same footing, would (I think) puzzle that proverbially acute individual, "a Philadelphia lawyer," to explain. I do not desire to appear captious in these strictures, more especially towards a writer, who has accorded me more praise than is justly my due, and whose skill in the defence of a weak cause has proved how ably he could defend a strong one; but I feel bound to justify myself from imputations I have not merited; and really esteem it rather hard, to have braved the displeasure of a large and influential class, for (as I believed) the public benefit; and in return, to be held up to that very public as one of its traducers and maligners.

I well knew that it would have been a far more pleasant, as well as more popular task, to have pampered the vanity of the "dear public," and fed them upon the sugared words of flattery, in place of proclaiming hard and unpalatable truths; but I would scorn myself, could motives such as these deter me from openly expressing, and boldly proclaiming what I believe to be the truth.

My strictures upon the system of literary piracy, dignified with the name of "cheap publication," were severe; they were intended to be so. I believed that a corrupt and rotten system was to be attacked, one which had wormed itself, under false pretexts, into the confidence of the people, who were blind to its enormities—that a great moral reform was to be wrought—and that, in the words of the French statesman, "revolutions were not to be made out of rose-water:"—therefore, I spoke out plainly; and that my strictures were felt to contain some truth is evidenced by the fact, that they have returned to me in the newspapers from almost every section of the Union. This is the head and front of my offending; and, to use the words of a great man for a small occasion, "if this be treason, make the most of it."

And here I had intended to close this letter; but the skill displayed by J. B. D. in "making the worse appear the better reason," and the plausible manner in which he has arrayed popular prejudices against the rights of authors, induce me to venture to tax the patience of your readers a little further; though I shall be "curst brief," as Sir Toby Belch has it.

J. B. D. is evidently a lawyer, (or should be one if he is not,) since his Essay is the most ingenious piece of special pleading it has been my fortune to meet with recently; he commences his argument with a "petitio principii," and after very liberally conceding to himself his own premises, proceeds to establish thereon his several propositions; which lead him safely and triumphantly to his conclusion; which is, that an International Copyright would be unjust and inexpedient, would work great injury to the American people, by causing the publishers to pay for what they now "appropriate," and would in fact be "granting a monopoly to English authors," by allowing them the fruits of their own labors; a process of reasoning which I confess myself unable to comprehend, and which reminds me forcibly of the old fable of the boys and frogs, the American publishers representing the boys, and the English authors the frogs, who will obstinately croak their dissent to the "fun" of the publishers, and ungratefully refuse to accept puffs (on paper,) as a substitute for bread.

But to proceed to the main point on which this whole matter rests, the argument for an International Copyright is of a two-fold character, and is based both on its justice and its expediency; supposing the first ground to be universally conceded, the second was made the basis of my Essay on the "Character and tendencies of Cheap Literature," and I only incidentally touched upon the other, which, however, is much the stronger of the two, involving as it does the question of moral honesty.

Since, however, J. B. D. has voluntarily chosen this broad platform of right to stand on, I am well content to meet him there; and waiving immaterial matters, will devote the remainder of this letter to a reply to his argument on the right of Literary Property.

In order to explain fairly his views, I will state the question in his own words.

"The notion that the rights of authors as defined by the new school of Dickens and Carlyle, rest on the same principles of natural right with property in general, and should in justice be placed upon the same footing, has never been recognized by any government in practice, and if persisted to its legitimate results, involves the most startling conclusions; though E. D. contends that to deny it, would be to strike at the root of all literary labor, and to make the very existence of Copyright a continued injustice."

And again—

"The position of the friends of International Copyright is, that this artificial ownership, thus cautiously limited, is not a mere contrivance of policy, but is analogous in all its features and incidents to other descriptions of property, and founded like them in the paramount laws of nature and justice."

And on this great question of the right of Literary Property, I join issue with him, since he expressly waives the question of expediency in the following just and forcible words, in the truth of which I heartily concur.

"Expediency can never enter into the discussion of a just claim, except with those who make utility the basis of all moral obligation."

In the very statement of the case, he falls into an error; since this "notion," as he contemptuously terms it, is by no means the offspring "of the new school of Dickens and Carlyle," but has obtained the sanction of such names as those of Hale, Hardwicke, Mansfield, Blackstone, and other great English lawyers; and in our own country of Madison, Story, Webster, Thompson and innumerable others. It is not a "Yankee notion," but a good old English one; a genuine article, and no counterfeit.

He is mistaken, too, in supposing that "it has been recognized by no government in practice;" for it was not only recognized, but acted upon under the British Government, until the passage of the Statute of 8 Ann, which restricted and limited the exercise of the right to a certain specified time, as I am prepared to prove; it has been recognized and acted upon in Norway and Sweden, where the Copyright is perpetual; in Russia, where every author or publisher has the exclusive property during his life; and after his death, his children or heirs; with the additional privilege, that no printed or manuscript work can be sold for the payment of the author's debts; a similar provision to which was made by Louis XV. of France in favor of Cr billon, proving that the same right then existed there.

The Copyright is also perpetual in Germany, and it certainly has not operated as a restraint in that country on the diffusion of knowledge. It was one of the earliest acts of the French Revolution, to acknowledge Literary Property, on a comprehensive principle; and Dr. Lieber, whose erudition and candor no one can doubt, states that "he does not remember any modern constitution which does not acknowledge it; if there are any they must be in South America, and might be easily accounted for by the little attention this property may have yet attracted in some of these states."

But J. B. D. in another passage comes out still more boldly, and proclaims that

"Copyright is in truth the mere creature of legislation, produced and fashioned exclusively with a view to the interests of the community where it is established, and which should endure no longer than is consistent with those interests. It is a gratuity, a bounty," &c.

This is liberal enough to the community, but the unhappy author is totally lost sight of and forgotten, and to sustain his view of the matter, he refers to the history of the past; yet from the very same source will I prove to him that this right is coeval with all other rights; and has been restricted and cramped by the selfish policy of modern legislation far below its legitimate boundaries. Before the invention of printing, when copies of MSS. were slowly and laboriously multiplied by transcription, there was not the same facility in appropriating the fruits of another's intellect, as there has been since that momentous invention; and, therefore, the question of Copyright was not apt to occur; such MSS. were then expensive luxuries, to be enjoyed only by the wealthy, or collected in public libraries at great cost. Neither the opportunity nor temptation was therefore presented of filching literary property; yet that the Romans attached the same value to literary property, that they did to all other species, is evidenced by many facts, such as the well authenticated sales of literary copies, for recital, by Martial, Statius and Terence.

It is true, that by the Roman law, if a person wrote any thing upon the parchment of another, the writing was considered to belong to the owner of the blank material, a rule which had reference to the mechanical operation of writing only, and which did not apply to works of genius and invention—as in painting upon another's canvass—in which case, the same law gave the canvass to the painter, as Blackstone well observes.

When in the fifteenth century the art of printing was invented, and an infinite number of copies could be speedily made of an author's work, Copyright first became of consequence. And it was the universal opinion, that an author had the exclusive right of printing his own work, and that he might transfer the right to others. John Otto of Nuremberg, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, is said to have been the first who made contracts for Copyright, as publisher, and some years after there were two dealers who set up in the same way at Leipsic. (American Jurist.) In the very infancy of printing, Martin Luther thus proclaims the right: "What does that mean, my dear gentlemen printers, that one robs so publicly the other, and steals from him what is his own? It is a manifestly unfair thing, that we shall sacrifice labor and expenses, and others shall have the profit of it, we however the loss." And again, he calls the piratical printing of his translation of the Bible, "a right great robbery which God assuredly will punish, and is ill-befitting any honest Christian soul," (quoted by Lieber.) I imagine that J. B. D. would find it rather difficult to discover the statute under which Luther claimed, unless it should be one written by the finger of Divinity upon the heart of man; yet no one then dared dispute his title to the rewards of his own labor. John Milton, too, in his glorious "speech for the liberty of unlicensed printing," although an enthusiast for the liberty of the press, yet speaks of "the just retaining of each man his several 'copy,' which God forbid should be gainsaid." "And yet," as Judge Willes remarks, in commenting on this passage, "this Copyright could at that time (1644) stand upon no other foundation than natural justice and Common Law. Those who were for, and those who were against a licenser, all agreed, that literary property was not the effect of arbitrary power, but of law and justice, and therefore ought to be safe:" (4 Burr. Reports, 2,314.)

This would seem conclusive on the subject, and for the proper understanding of Milton's precise meaning, it may not be amiss, to give Lord Mansfield's definition of the technical meaning of the word "copy," as understood at that time. In the case of Millar and Taylor, to which I shall presently refer the reader, he says :

"I use the word 'copy' in the technical sense in which that name, or term, has been used for ages, to signify an incorporeal right to the sole printing and publishing of somewhat intellectual, communicated by letters." "The property in this copy is equally detached from the MS., or any physical existence whatever."

And again—

"The property in the copy thus narrowed, may equally go down from generation to generation, and possibly continue forever, though neither the author nor his representative, should have any MS. whatsoever of the work, original, duplicate or transcript."

So that Luther, Milton and Lord Mansfield, must all have been mistaken, if J. B. D.'s statement be correct, that

"Copyright is in fact the mere creature of legislation, produced and fashioned exclusively with a view to the interest of the community where it is established," &c.

Justice Willes also in the same celebrated case thus speaks :

"The name 'copy of a book' which has been used for ages as a term to signify the sole right of printing, publishing and selling, shows this species of property to have been long known, and to have existed in fact and usage as long as the name:" (this was in 1769.)

And the strongest proof of the existence of literary property under the Common Law, is afforded by the fact, that Lord Hardwicke granted an injunction against printing the Paradise Lost of Milton: the title to which was derived by an assignment from the poet himself seventy two years before; the statutory time having long run out.

The existence of literary property was recognized by various decrees of the Court of Star Chamber, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and by several acts of Parliament in the seventeenth century, as we learn from the English law books; and in the entries of the "stationers' companies," there are persons fined for "printing other men's copies." (American Jurist.)

"As late as 1769 in the great case in which was involved the right to print 'Thomson's Seasons,' (4 Burr.) one of the questions discussed was, whether at Common Law an author has the sole and exclusive Copyright in himself, or his assigns in perpetuity; and it appears from the verdict of the jury in that case, that it had been the custom to purchase from authors the perpetual Copyright of their books, to assign the same from hand to hand for valuable consideration, and to make the same the subject of family settlements for the provision of wives and children." (American Jurist.)

That it is not a "monopoly" as J. B. D. calls it, and never has been so considered, is proved by the fact, that in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., when the most bitter and unsparing war was made upon all "monopolies," "copies" of literary works were protected, and were not viewed in the same light as a trade, manufacture, or mechanical inventions.

I have been thus minute, I fear tediously so, as to the true nature of Copyright, because it is a matter of vital importance to the interests and the dignity of authors, that it should be placed upon the proper ground of right and justice; and not be deemed as a "bounty or gratuity," when in fact it is their own by right and law, in the enjoyment of which, so far from having been fostered by legislation, they have been wronged and despoiled; and like Sampson of old, made the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the benefit of their legal Philistines, who have blinded their eyes and fettered their limbs. The act of 8 Ann was intended only as declaratory of the Common Law, having been passed upon the prayer of the publishers and proprietors of Copyright, who wished for a more summary and full remedy than was attainable at Common Law, and in 1710 that act was passed, which for a long time was regarded only as declaratory of the Common Law, but which finally was adjudged to have superseded it, though this decision was in opposition to the opinion of two of the most famous English lawyers, Mansfield and Blackstone.

In our own country, under the Federal Constitution, the right of literary property was recognized by the several States in their legislation on the subject of Copyright; most, if not all of them having passed acts to secure their Copyrights to authors and publishers, thus pre-supposing the existence of a right which they wished to secure. But the matter is not left to conjecture. Mr. Madison, who introduced a resolution, as chairman of a committee to Congress, on the 27th May, 1783, by which the several States were recommended "to secure to authors, their executors, administrators and assigns, the Copyright of their books," thus expresses his own opinion in the 43rd No. of the Federalist. "The Copyright of authors has been solemnly adjudged in Great Britain, to be a right at Common Law."

Judge Story in his Commentaries, expressly admits the Common Law right of authors. (3d Story, 481.) Chancellor Kent gives no positive opinion. But the most important recognition of this right of property in authors, independent of legislation, is to be found in the report of the committee of Congress, which accompanied the presentation of the Copyright Law of 1831, (our present law on the subject.) The chairman of the judiciary committee, Mr. Ellsworth, made a report, a portion of which I will quote, as showing the basis of our Copyright Law and the conclusions to which a thorough examination of the subject unavoidably led them.

"Upon the first principles of proprietorship in property an author has an exclusive and perpetual right in preference to any other to the fruits of his labor. Though the nature of literary property is peculiar, it is not the less real and valuable. If labor and effort in producing what before was not possessed or known, will give title, then the literary man has title, perfect and absolute, and should have his reward; he writes and he labors as assiduously, as does the mechanic, or husbandman. 'The scholar who secludes himself and wastes his life, and often his property, to enlighten world, has the best right to the profits of those labors—the planter, the mechanic, the professional man, can not prefer a better title to what is admitted to be his own. It can not be for the interest or honor of our country, that intellectual labor should be depreciated, and laborious study terminate in disappointment and poverty."

That the committee did not report a bill for perpetual Copyright in consonance with the views expressed in the report, is easily accounted for, from the fact of the public mind not being sufficiently prepared for it; from want of due consideration of the subject, which is only brought home to the minds of the authors, who feel the injustice of being deprived of their rightful property; and of a few literary dabblers, like myself, who have no interest in it, further than that which every honest man and good citizen should feel in promoting the cause of truth and justice.

From hence it appears, that although J. B. D. has never "heard of this principle having ever been adopted by any government in practice," it was in fact at the bottom of the English Law of Copyright, and was made the inducement, and motive cause of the passage of our act of 1831; and if this was considered as an act of simple justice to our authors, it should apply equally to those of other countries who reciprocate with us; unless our government is disposed to adopt the Roman policy, with whom the same word was used to signify a stranger and an enemy.

But "J. B. D." goes still further, and proceeds to say,

"No where has it been admitted as a claim of right, or put upon the same footing in point of character, or extent with other possessions."

The fallacy of this statement has been already proved; but he continues as follows:

"Even in England, where his claim of right has been first set up, it was solemnly adjudged as far back as 1774, by the highest legal tribunal of that country, in the case of Donaldson vs. Becket, that at Common Law, an author has no exclusive Copyright in his writings, and holds only a temporary interest in them, under the authority of statutes. Here, an opposite principle been decided in that memorable case, it would have followed that by the Common Law of England and of this country, which is essentially the same system, Copyright was perpetual; that it must be subject to the same rules, and guarded by the same sanctions with other property."

The conclusion he arrives at in the last sentences, is precisely similar to that which I have been laboring to establish; though the case, he has quoted would seem conclusive on the opposite side. But unfortunately for his cause, J. B. D. has been misled by the marginal note to that case, in which the real point of the decision is misstated, no uncommon occurrence, as any one in the habit of consulting Law Reports must have had frequent occasion to observe. The real point decided in that very case is this, that by Common Law and universal usage, an author was entitled to his Copyright in perpetuity, but that the statute of 8 Ann had limited and restricted the exercise of that Common Law right to a certain fixed and definite time; and even this latter point was decided, contrary to the opinions of Lord Mansfield and Sir W. Blackstone, the two greatest lawyers England has ever known, who regarded that statute only as declaratory of the old and established Common Law right.

As the whole question of literary property was fully discussed in these English cases by the most learned and acute lawyers in the realm, I trust that courteous individual, the general reader, will forgive me, if following in the footsteps of J. B. D., I should lead him for a time from the pleasant fields of literature, into the thorny paths of law; and request his presence at the celebrated case of Millar and Taylor, (4 Burr. Rep. 2302), tried in the Court of K. B. in 1769, at which Lord Mansfield presided, with three assistant Judges; and which was argued by such lawyers as Dunning, Thurlow and Blackstone.

So far from the question being even then considered a novel one, the reporter commences with the following remarks:

"This case was a revival of the old and often litigated question concerning literary property, and it was the first determination which the question ever received in this Court of King's Bench."

That is, the first time it was contested, the previous proceedings being by injunction in chancery; for as early as 1680, an injunction was had, to restrain the publication of "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress," whereby the proprietor lost the profit and benefit of his "copy." In this case of Millar and Taylor, the subject matter of which was the publication of "Thomson's Seasons," Lord Mansfield and two of the assistant Judges declared in the strongest terms, the Common Law right of an author to the Copyright of his own work in perpetuity, after as well as before publication; and Justice Yeates alone dissenting, delivered an opinion which contains all that could be, or has since been urged against this right; the arguments in which have since been reiterated by M. A. C. Renouard in France; the Austrian publishers in their country, by the cheap ones here, and recently by J. B. D. in the columns of the Messenger. The leading argument is simply this, that property can not be predicated of thought, and that the term Literary Property, ought to be banished from the language of the law; but that, nevertheless, the sole right of multiplication ought to be bestowed upon the author for a limited time, on account of his merit and the benefits he confers upon society! "But," as it has been well remarked in reply, "although property can not be predicated of thought, yet it can be of composition, of work, and so far from the author's abandoning his right on publication, he only then first avails himself of the value of his property by publishing his work. And for all civil intercourse property is as though it had no existence, so long as the owner can not affix exchangeable value to it. To say then, that a composition is the property of the author, so long as he chooses to keep it in his desk, but that he forfeits the ownership as soon as he publishes the composition, is saying, 'this is your property, but the act itself of availing yourself of this property, deprives you of it!' which is absurd!" (Lieber.) This argument appears to me unanswerable, and is very similar to that urged by Lord Mansfield in the case above referred to, to which we will now return; keeping in mind the technical meaning of the word "copy," as defined by Lord Mansfield, quoted in a previous part of this letter.

After a full hearing of the arguments on both sides, and when the inferior Judges had delivered their opinions, two being in favor of "copy" and one opposed to it, Lord Mansfield proceeded to deliver the opinion of the court, on the following questions, giving at the same time his reasons for such decision:

"1st. Whether an author's property in his own literary compositions is such as will entitle him, at Common Law, to the sole right of multiplying the copies of it.

"2ndly. Whether the Copyright by his own publication of the work is necessarily given away, and his consent to such gift implied by operation of law.

"3rdly. Whether it is taken away from him, or restrained by the statute of 8 Queen Ann?"

These are his words,

"From premises either expressly admitted, or what can not be, and therefore never have been denied, conclusions follow, in my apprehension, decisive upon all the objections raised to the property of an author in the copy of his own work by the Common Law." "This property is equally detached from the MS. or any other physical existence whatsoever." "The property of the 'copy' thus narrowed, may equally go down from generation to generation and possibly continue forever, though neither the author nor his representatives should have any MS. whatsoever of the work, original, duplicate, or transcript."

He then proceeds to consider the second question; of course my limits compel me to give only extracts; but none have been garbled, or their meaning perverted:

"All objections which hold as much to the kind of property before, as to the kind of property after publication, go for nothing; they prove too much; from what source, then, is the Common Law drawn which is admitted to be so clear in respect of the 'copy' before publication? From this argument, because it is just that an author should reap the pecuniary profits of his own ingenuity and labor: it is just that another should not use his name without his consent. It is fit that he should judge when he will publish, or if he ever will publish. It is fit that he should not only choose the time, but the manner of publication. But the same reasons hold after the author has published."

And after giving a long list of reasons, thus concludes:

"For these and many more reasons, it seems to me just and fit to protect the 'copy' after, as well as before publication. There is no peculiar objection to the property after, except that the property is necessarily made common after the book is once published. The argument turns in a circle, 'the copy is made common because the law does not protect it, and the law cannot protect it because it is made common?' The whole then must finally resolve into this question, whether it is agreeable to natural principles of moral justice, and fitness, to allow him the 'copy' after publication, as well as before?"

"The general consent of this kingdom for ages is on the affirmative side. The legislative authority has taken it for granted; and interposed penalties to protect it for a time. The single opinion of such a man as Milton, speaking after much consideration, on the very point, is stronger than any inferences from gathering acorns, and seizing a vacant piece of ground, &c." "The judicial opinions of those eminent lawyers and great men, who granted or continued injunctions in cases after publication, not within 8 Queen Ann, uncontradicted by any book, judgment or saying, must weigh in any question of law."

On the third question, he says, in relation to the statute of 8 Ann,

"The bill was brought in on the petition of the proprietors to secure their property forever by penalties, and the alteration was made in committee to restrain the perpetuity into a temporary security. Had there been the least intention to take or declare away every pretence of right at the Common Law, it would have been expressly enacted, and a different preamble from the one as it now stands."

He concludes his opinion with the following impressive-words:

"The subject at large is exhausted, and therefore I have not gone into it. I have had frequent opportunities to consider of it. I have travelled in it for many years. Many of the precedents were tried by my advice. The accurate and elaborate investigation of the matter in this cause, and in the former case of Tonson and Collins, has confirmed me in what I always inclined to think, that the Court of Chancery did right in giving relief upon the foundation of a legal property in authors, independent of the entry, the term for years, and the other provisions annexed to the act."

Judgment was accordingly given for the Plaintiff, and an injunction issued. This was in 1770; four years afterwards the matter came before the House of Lords upon an appeal from a Decree of the Court of Chancery founded upon this judgment, in the case of Donaldson vs. Becket, quoted by J. B. D. Upon this appeal certain questions were propounded to the 12 Judges, to which 11 responded, Lord Mansfield giving no opinion, "it being unusual," says the reporter, "for a Peer to support his own judgment on an appeal to the House of Lords, although it was known his opinions had not changed."

These questions were the same as set forth above in the case of Millar and Taylor; and on the first question 8 Judges voted in the affirmative, and but 3 in the negative.

On the 2nd, 7 to 4; and, on the 3rd, 5 to 6. So that had Lord Mansfield voted, they would have been equally balanced upon the 3rd question, upon which the case was decided; the majority on the other question being decisive of their opinions, that literary property did exist under the Common Law both before and after publication. On these answers the House of Lords reversed the decree; although the highest legal authority in the realm was in its favor.

The reporter goes on to say, that

"The Universities were so much alarmed at the consequences of this determination that they applied for and obtained an Act of Parliament, establishing in perpetuity their right to all the copies given them heretofore, or which might hereafter be given to or acquired by them."

In commenting on this decision, the late Judge Thompson, of the Supreme Court, remarks,

"That the law of England has not been considered as settled in conformity with the vote on this last question is very certain; for it is the constant practice in Chancery to grant injunctions to restrain printers from publishing the works of others; which practice can only be sustained on the ground that the penalties given by the statute, are not the only remedy that can be resorted to."

At the risk of being tedious, I have quoted largely from these old cases, because they contain the true doctrine of literary property, and are the fountain heads from whence correct ideas of the rights of authors are to be drawn. I do not think that I owe any apology to the reader, for giving him the lucid and powerful arguments of Lord Mansfield, in lieu of my own crude conceptions, since I am more than willing, that the advocate should be entirely overlooked, so that the glorious cause can only enlist that attention, which its importance and justice challenge at the hands of the American people, a people who need only know the right, to pursue and embrace it.

There are many plausible but specious arguments adduced by J. B. D. in support of his view of the case, which I should take pleasure in answering; but being well aware that most controversies, whether laical or polemical, are far more interesting to the parties concerned than to the public at large, I fear to prolong this letter which has already far exceeded the limits to which I had intended to restrict it.

As, however, the whole argument of J. B. D. is predicated upon the assumption that there is no such thing as literary property independent of positive legislation, which position, I trust, has been proved fallacious, it follows that the rest of his argument must go for nothing, since the superstructure can not stand after the foundation on which it rested has been removed.

So skilfully has he argued the question of expediency, that I would have devoted a few words to an answer, had J. B. D. not enlisted in this quarrel, my accomplished friend, Mr. Simms, whose superior abilities will do more justice to the subject than could have been effected by my feeble pen.

There are, nevertheless, one or two positions laid down by J. B. D. which I can not refrain from briefly commenting on. In an early part of his elegant Essay, he "defies the most subtle and ingenious advocate of Copyright to distinguish on the principles of natural justice between property in thoughts promulgated in books, and thoughts orally communicated;" and dexterously applying the "reductio ad absurdum," extends it to common conversation. Now really it seems to me that the distinction to be drawn between a careless conversation and an elaborate composition is so obvious as to strike the meanest capacity; and although laying claim neither to "subtlety nor ingenuity," I can explain the difference between them in a few words. The distinction is simply this: into the one, labor enters and gives it a value; into the other it does not; the manifest design in the one case, is to attach a value and to make it permanent; in the other to give it away. The latter is the peel of the orange which is carelessly thrown away; the former, the fruit itself carefully retained for the use and benefit of the owner. And that property may be predicated of composition even orally communicated, has been established beyond doubt by the injunctions which, have been issued to restrain the publication of lectures orally delivered; an instance of which occurred in New York but a few years since, in the case of a publication of the lectures of a celebrated Surgeon from the notes taken by a student.

As to the fear expressed by J. B. D., that "insuperable barriers will be opposed to the diffusion of knowledge" by according to every author the exclusive property in his own works: besides being a waiver of the question of right, it is refuted by the very nature of the property itself, since the only profitable use an author can make of his works, is by diffusing and multiplying the copies of them; for if shut up in his desk, they are perfectly valueless.

The analogy which J. B. D. attempts to establish between the enjoyment of light and air, and of thought, is too subtle and ingenious to be allowed to pass without comment. A moment's reflection will suffice to show that it is far more plausible than solid, since the enjoyment of the former is restricted to no one place or people, but by the gift of a benevolent Creator is diffused throughout all space, and is not created by human labor, but received as a boon from on high. While the other owes its very existence to human effort and human toil, and may be either promulgated or suppressed at the will of the individual within whose brain it is generated and brought to light; and to say that his right is alienated by the only means he can adopt to avail himself of its use, would be to advocate a glaring and palpable injustice.

I have but a single word more to add, and it is of regret, that one so acute as J. B. D. has proved himself to be, should be driven by the weakness of his cause to adopt the miserable, turgid fallacy of Lord Camden, "that glory alone should be the reward of science, and those who deserve it should scorn all meaner views," making the very merits of authors "the whip to scourge them with," advocating their starvation, because no reward could be given adequate to their deserts; for such is the sentiment he expresses in the following paragraph:

"They felt like Milton when he sold the Copyright of Paradise Lost for the paltry sum of twenty pounds, that fame was not to be weighed against pecuniary emolument; that the noblest recompense of intellectual effort consists in the contemplation of its beneficent effects, and in the grateful applauses of mankind."

True! such is the noblest, but should it be the only recompense? because it is beyond price, shall it therefore command no price at all? The illustration he has chosen is a most unhappy one for his cause, for never was the world's injustice to literary men more signally displayed than in the case of Milton! Was the sale of the Copyright alluded to a voluntary thing on his part, when "old, blind and poor, with darkness and with dangers compassed round;" or was that "paltry sum" the greatest he could wring from a niggard publisher, and necessary to keep him and his household from starvation?

It is a sad subject to be merry on, but reasoning of this kind always reminds me of Falstaff's "soliloquy on honor," "will it set an arm or a leg?" So might I ask, will the shadow of a distant fame answer the poor author as a substitute for the comforts or the necessities of life? It did not in the case of Camoens who perished miserably in a hospital; it did not save Cervantes from the knowing agonies of hunger; nor the thousand other martyrs of mind, to number whom would be as endless as to count the sands upon the sea-shore. Was it for glory or for bread that Shakspeare wrote his undying plays? They were written to fill the Globe Playhouse. What induced Johnson to write his Rasselas? To defray the funeral expenses of a dying mother. A thousand other instances might be cited to show that the stimulus of fame great and powerful as it is, and ever has been, has not been the sole inducement to literary production, nor its contemplated reward; and that minds of the most ethereal temper chained to gross, earthly bodies, must act with reference to their wants and cravings. Even Samuel Johnson, one of the mightiest intellects England has ever known, when in squalid poverty he wandered at midnight through the streets of London, with a friend as wretched and poverty-stricken as himself, gnawed by the fierce cravings of hunger and despairing wretchedness,—had the choice been then presented him, would have chosen one good substantial meal, and a happy home, instead of the loudest blast that ever echoed from the trumpet of fame.

And now, having I fear sorely taxed the reader's patience, I will bid him farewell, with the promise that on this subject I shall not trouble him again; and in concluding, I can not avoid doing justice to the great ability and courtesy, manifested by my respected opponent, J. B. D., who, if he has "lost his cause, has gained his end," by proving, how much talent can strengthen a weak argument, and lend dignity to a feeble cause. With an apology to yourself and readers for occupying so much of your time and attention,

I remain, &c.

GROUPED THOUGHTS AND SCATTERED FANCIES.

A COLLECTION OF SONNETS.

By the author of "Atantis," "Southern Passages and Pictures," &c.

ADVERTISEMENT.

I have entitled these little poems "Sonnets," for no better reason than that they contain fourteen lines. They better deserve the appellation in the English, than the Italian, sense. They have grown upon me in the progress of years. Some of them are of very early, and some of recent, composition. All of them have grown out of passing suggestions, and belong to that class of occasional productions, which naturally fall from the pen of a professional author in the intervals between his regular labors. The earlier poems have had the benefit of late revision.

I.

Spirit that dwellest in the opening flower,
And bathest in the morning's earliest dew,—
Thou that hast wings to hurry on the hour,
And makest that lovely which were else but true;
Yielding fresh odor for the hungering sense,
Teaching the zephyr mournful eloquence,
And, when he brings his worship to the rose,
That givest such heavenly sweetness to his tone,
That fancy straightway deems it music's own!
Come to me, spirit, from thy far domain—
Fain would I, with a tenderness like thine,
To her I love, of her I love, complain;
For she hath beckon'd me to seek her shrine,
Beholds me there, yet nothing heeds my pain.

II.

I will breathe music in the little bell
That cups this flower, until it takes a tone
For every feeling human heart has known:
Though hearts their secrets may not often tell,
Mine is the charm to win them: I will wake
Strains, which though new to men, they shall not fail
To tremble as they hear,—as an old tale,
Will with new joy the absent wanderer take,

Moving his spirit with a strange delight !
 Love will I win from friendship—the old lure
 Will I make new, and all the new secure ;
 And beauty never thence shall fade from sight !
 Think not I mock thee—spells of higher power
 Are gathered in the blue depths of this flower.

III.

Sweet Lady ! in the name of one no more,
 Both of us loved and neither shall forget,
 Make me thy brother,—though our hearts before,
 Perchance, have never in communion met ;
 Give me thy gentle memories, though there be,
 Between our forms some thousand miles of sea,
 Wild tract and wasted desert :—let me still,
 Whate'er the joy that warms me, or the thrill,
 That tortures, and from which I may not flee,
 Hold ever a sweet place within thy breast !
 Is this my spirit shall be more than bless'd—
 And in my prayers,—if, haply, prayer of mine
 Be not a wrong unto a soul like thine,—
 There shall be blessings from the skies for thee.

IV.

They tell us—whom the Gods love, die in youth !
 'Tis something to die innocent and pure ;
 But death without performance, is most sure,
 Ambition's martyrdom—worst death, in truth,
 To the aspiring temper, fix'd in thought,
 Of high achievement ! Happier far are they,
 Who, as the Prophet of the Ancients taught,
 Hail the bright finish of a perfect day !
 With fullest consummation of each aim,
 That wrought the hope of manhood—with the crown,
 Fix'd to their mighty brows, of amplest fame,
 Who smile at death's approaches and lie down,
 Calmly, as one beneath the shade tree yields,
 Satisfied of the morrow and green fields.

V.

Let us escape ! This is our holiday—
 God's day, devote to rest ; and, through the wood,
 We'll wander, and, perchance, find heavenly food,
 O, profitless it shall not pass away.
 'Tis life, but with sweet difference, methinks,
 Here, in the forest ;—from the crowd set free,
 The spirit, like escaping song-bird drinks
 Fresh sense of music from its liberty.
 Thoughts crowd about us with the trees—the shade
 Holds teachers that await us : in our ear,
 Unwonted, but sweet voices do we hear,
 But with rare excellence of tongue persuade :
 They do not chide our idlesse,—were content,
 All our wanderings were as innocent.

VI.

Arch is profuse in violets—at our feet
 They cluster,—not in pride but modesty ;
 The damsel pauses as she passes by,
 Looks them with smiles, and calls them very sweet.

But such beguile me not ! The trees are mine,
 These hoary headed masters ;—and I glide,
 Humbled, beneath their unassuming pride,
 And wist not much what blossoms bud or shine.
 I better love to see yon grandsire oak,
 Old Druid, patriarch, lone among his race,—
 With blessing, out-stretched arms, as giving grace,

When solemn rites are said, or bread is broke :
 Decay is at his roots,—the storm has been Among his limbs,—but the old top is green.

VII.

The pine with its green honors ; cypress gray,
 Bedded in waters ; crimsoning with bloom,
 The maple, that's irreverently gay,
 Too soon, methinks, throws off his winter gloom ;
 The red bud, lavish in its every spray,
 Glowing with promise of the exulting spring,
 And over all the laurel, like some king,
 Conscious of strength and stature, born for sway.
 I care not for their species—never look
 For class or order in pedantic book,—
 Enough that I behold them—that they lead
 To meek retreats of solitude and thought,
 Declare me from the world's day-labors freed,
 And bring me tidings books have never taught.

VIII.

Woods, waters, have a charm to soothe thine ear,
 When common sounds have vex'd it. When the day
 Grows sultry, and the crowd is in thy way,
 And working in thy soul much coil and care,—
 Betake thee to the forests. In the shade
 Of pines, and by the side of purling streams
 That prattle all their secrets in their dreams,
 Unconscious of a listener,—unafraid,—
 Thy soul shall feel their freshening, and the truth
 Of nature then, reviving in thy heart,
 Shall bring thee the best feelings of thy youth,
 When in all natural joys, thy joy had part,
 Ere lucre and the narrowing toils of trade
 Had turn'd thee to the thing thou wast not made.

IX.

The mighty and the massy of the wood
 Compel my worship : satisfied I lie,
 With nought in sight but forest, earth and sky,
 And give sweet sustenance to precious mood !—
 'Tis thus from visible but inanimate things,
 We gather mortal reverence. They declare
 In silence, a persuasion I must share,
 Of hidden sources, far spiritual springs,
 Fountains of deep intelligence, and powers,
 That man himself pursues not ; and I grow
 From wonder into worship, as the show,
 Majestic, but unvoiced, through noteless hours,
 Imposes on my soul, with musings high,
 That, like Jacob's Ladder, lift me to the sky !

These haunts are sacred,—for the vulgar mood
 Loves not seclusion. Here the very day
 Seems in a Sabbath dreaminess to brood,
 The groves breathe slumber—the great tree-tops sway
 Drowsily, with the idle-going wind;
 And sweetest images before my mind
 Persuade me into pleasure, with their play.
 Here, fancies of the present and the past Delight to mingle, 'till the palpable seems Inseparate from the glory in my dreams,
 And golden with the halo round it cast:
 Thus do I live with Rosalind, thus stray
 With Jaques; and churning o'er some native rhyme,
 Persuade myself it smacks of the old time.

XI.

There have been earnest fancies in my soul,
 A wilder summons,—deeper cares than these,
 That now possess my spirit and control,
 Subduing me to forests and green trees;
 Thoughts have assailed me in my solitude,
 Of human struggle!—and within mine ear,
 Still and anon as whispering voice I hear,
 That mocks me with my feebleness of mood;
 The puny toil of song—the idle dance
 Of metaphor, and shadows of romance!
 Points to superior struggle—paints the cares
 Of Empire,—the great nation in the toils
 Of impotence, that still in blindness dares,
 And what it cannot elevate despoils.

POEMS:

BY PROFESSOR S. H. DICKSON, OF SOUTH CAROLINA. 1844.

We scarcely do right, we of the South, in passing heedlessly by the occasional performances of our amateur writers. Suppose there has been a sort of aristocratic indifference on their part, to the honors of authorship, which makes them rather anxious to avoid publicity or notoriety, when they put their thoughts in print! It is for us not to suffer them to escape so easily. We have too few authors among us—we take too little part in the great concerns of literature—not to make us solicitous of all who contribute, in however slight a degree, in furnishing our quota to the national stock of belles-lettres. We must go out of the way, if needs be, to gather up the unconsidered trifles of our professional men—not forgetting how many of the favorite writers of England were of this class—men who turned aside, as if from graver labors, and loitered in the gardens of the muse.

Here now is a little volume, the author of which clearly comes under this classification. Professor Dickson, of the Medical College of South Carolina, is too well known to the whole country to render it necessary that we should say what are his claims as a scientific man. He is also well known as a polished and skilful reviewer and a graceful essayist. There are few subjects of interest upon which his mind cannot throw light and to which his taste could not impart grace and beauty. As an orator, he has honored some of the most venerable desks in the Union. At home, he is deservedly recognized as the urbane and accomplished gentleman. It is not so well known, however, that he engages in frequent and fortunate dalliance with the muse. Our sister State of Carolina has produced several poets, of whom, in Virginia, we know little or nothing. Dickson is one of them. In Carolina, one of his songs has acquired a peculiar popularity. It has been adapted to music by a Southern composer, and is mormured by rosy lips on happy evenings. It is a Southern ditty, and we may claim the application of some of its images.

SONG:—"I SIGH FOR THE LAND."

I.

I sigh for the land of the cypress and pine
 Where the jessamine blooms and the gay woodbine;
 Where the moss droops low from the green oak tree—
 Oh! that sunbright land is the land for me.

II.

The snowy flow'r of the orange there,
 Sheds its sweet fragrance through the air;
 And the Indian rose delights to twine
 Its branches with the laughing vine.

III.

There the humming bird of rainbow plume,
 Hangs over the scarlet creeper's bloom,
 While midst the leaves his varying dyes
 Sparkle like half-seen fairy eyes.

IV.

There the deer leaps light through the open glade,
 Or hides him far in the forest shade,
 When the woods resound in the dewy morn
 With the clang of the merry hunter's horn.

V.

There the echoes ring through the live long day,
 With the mock-bird's changeful roundelay,
 And at night when the scene is calm and still,
 With the moan of the plaintive whip-poor-will.

VI.

Oh! I sigh for the land of the cypress and pine,
 Of the laurel, the rose and the gay woodbine;
 Where the long grey moss decks the rugged oak tree,
 That sunbright land is the land for me.

1830.

Here is something in a bolder and more enthusiastic spirit. The subject is one of a kind to demand a vigorous muse.

THE MOUNTAINS.

I.

The mountains! The mountains! Amidst them is my home.
 To their pure and sparkling fountains impatiently I come:
 Their bleak and towering summits invade the dark blue sky,
 But o'er their rudest ridges my fancy loves to fly.

II.

The mountains! the mountains! rock-ribb'd and firm they stand,
 Their sons a hold and hardy race, the bulwarks of the land;
 Freedom reluctant may be driven from vale and fertile plain,
 But here she finds unconquer'd hearts her banner to sustain.

III.

The mountains! the mountains! when summer strews her flow'rs,
 And bird and bee with hum and song enjoy the genial hours,
 How sweet to climb the gentle slope while glows the parting even,
 And watch each planet as it springs from forth the blackening heaven!

IV.

The mountains! the mountains! on their sides I love to roam,
 To listen to their dashing streams, to see their waters foam:
 The sunlight flows more radiant hence to gild the scenes afar,
 Brighter the silver moonbeams glance and fairer every star.

V.

The mountains! the mountains! when clouds the day deform,
 And through the air resistless sweeps the wild and wintry storm,
 Unmoved amid the fierce uproar their foreheads dare the sky,
 And the fury of the tempest in its maddest rage defy.

VI.

The mountains! the mountains! they lift the soul on high,
 And fill the mind with thoughts sublime of vast infinity,
 Frowning and massive as they stand, wide spreading all abroad,
 They show the strong majestic hand of their Creator—God!
 1842.

Here is something on an old text. The inscription on a French sun-dial suggests the theme to the Poet.

"L'heure passe et nous aussi."

TO M ———.

I.

Fair girl! whose joyous morn of life shines brightly,
 Scarce with a cloud o'ercast;
 While onward still thy golden hours glide lightly
 Lost to the voice that bids t' employ them rightly:
 The cloudless dawn may bring a gloomy noon,
 Evening and night impend and follow soon,—
 The longest summer day is quickly past.

II.

Love, hope and joy pass swift—their every ray
 But for a moment gleams;
 It is man's doom—to pain and fear a prey—
 It is his doom to seek his devious way
 Through the vague shadows of a doubtful day,
 By Fancy's meteors often led astray,
 And vex'd with hideous dreams.

III.

Swift pass the hours, nor ever they return:
 And so we pass away.
 The glorious orbs hung o'er us high in heaven
 Roll through the paths of space, and glowing, burn,

With intermitted lustre, kindly given,
 To bless alternately our longing eyes:
 Though they subside awhile in western skies,
 As we revolve, again by night they rise,
 Again adorn the day.

IV.

But we pass hence forever; the deep grave
 No visitor gives back:
 We pass—as o'er the restless ocean-wave
 Plunges the fated vessel, idly brave;
 Resistless round her sides mad tempests rave,
 No eye to pity, and no hand to save—
 Moaning she sinks; wild waters sweep her deck,
 And while they merciless engulf the wreck
 Efface her foaming track.

1830.

Our author might have drawn a less gloomy moral from his inscription. If we pass with the hours, we are renewed with them. If we share the vicissitudes and suffer from the storms of time, we are also sure of eternity. Our shipwreck secures us the haven, and if we use the passing hour as we should, it is one which we should delight, even at the hazard of mortal shipwreck, to attain. But we are subsiding into common place.

The tone of Professor Dickson's verse is uniformly sad. His sentiments sometimes plaintive, sometimes mournful, is too frequently gloomy. We would not that this were so. Take the following cheerless, almost hopeless dirge for example.

I.

I seek the quiet of the tomb,
 There would I sleep;
 I love its silence and its gloom
 So dark and deep.

II.

I would forget the anxious cares
 That rend my breast;
 Life's joys and sorrows, hopes and fears—
 Here let me rest.

III.

Weep not for me, nor breathe one sigh
 Above my bier—
 Depart and leave me tranquilly,
 Repose is here.

IV.

Mock me not with the lofty mound
 Of sculptured stone;
 Lay me unmarked beneath the ground,
 All—all alone!

We do not know but that we have been overstepping the bounds of propriety in taking these liberties with this little volume, which is unpublished, and intended, by its amiable and accomplished author, only for his personal friends. But our apology must be found in the desire to extend this circle—and to treasure up in our pages, in successive issues, the amateur performances of the South. Our purpose is acquisition,—not criticism—from which, of course, an unpublished volume is always sacred.

THE PRIZE TALE.

STEPHANO COLONNA, OR LOVE AND LORE.

A TALE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER V.

St. Mark's clock had chimed the midnight hour, and Stephano lay on a luxurious couch dreaming of love and Leonore, when a rude hand shook him from that pleasant slumber.

"You are summoned to the tribunal of the State," said a harsh voice.

He started up, and after a moment said, "It must be a mistake, my good friend, I am a stranger in Venice, and but this last evening arrived."

"Aye, are you not Stephano Colonna of Rome?" "I am."

"Then follow; for you I was sent," was the stern reply.

"But what is my offence?"

"Your judges will tell you."

Stephano knew how vain the effort to elude the commands and officers of that fearful power which held Venice in chains, and he surrendered himself without farther questioning, whilst doubt and fear reigned in his mind. Without his door, he found twenty other officers in waiting. They immediately surrounded him, and silently and rapidly proceeded to the ducal palace. When they reached the foot of the "Giant stairs," the first officer only ascended with him, and through many a winding gallery, and lofty hall they entered that where the council of ten held their sittings. That room, the theatre of so many fearful scenes, was hung with black. With the same mournful hue the inquisitors, and the long table before them were clothed. Long waxen tapers burnt before them, casting but a dim light through the gloomy room. Behind them stretched the folds of a dark curtain. Every eye was bent on Stephano, as he fearlessly strode towards them and proudly said,

"I am here at your bidding, Signors, but why you have summoned me, am ignorant."

"The State has fitting cause, bold youth," said Count Gian, with a dark scowl. "First, you are accused of dealing with the forbidden arts of magic, a crime in itself punishable with death; next, with laying a spell of witchcraft on Leonore D'Este, Princess of Ferrara, depriving her of sleep: this was found to-night within the Lion's mouth."

"Know, Guardians of the State, that one Stephano Colonna, a Roman by birth, but now visiting your city, is in league with forbidden powers, and a week since was brought by one Antonio, a fisherman, from the accurst isle of Triptolemus, where he had passed the night; he is also charged with bewitching Leonore D'Este, of Ferrara, so as to deprive her of sleep;—proofs of his guilt may be found on his person."

Stephano gazed around in mute astonishment, as Gian read these words:—he felt how cunning was the net in which his foes had enveloped him, but he also knew the injustice of the charges, and fiercely demanded.

"Who are mine accusers? Let them appear, and prove these charges."

Slowly the dark curtain behind the council was drawn back, and Azzo D'Este and Antonio, the fisherman, stepped forth.

"Let his person be searched," said the Prince.

The command was obeyed, and soon the ruby amulet and cabalistic scroll lay on the table before the ten.

"Whence are these, Signor Colonna?" said Gian.

"The amulet I purchased of the great Fabricio, and the scroll"—

"Aye, what of it?"

"—Was given me in the vision of a night, but what it contains I know not, as I was commanded to wait its interpretation; Count Gian himself wears an amulet!" said he, as he caught the glitter of a cross suspended to a chain, which had fallen from the Count's bosom, and was beaming against his dark robe,—"Is my offence greater?"

"The cross is a sacred emblem all may wear," said Gian with another scowl. "No magician uses its sacred form."

"Nay, but priestcraft does, and doubtless his holiness, the Pope, has blessed that bauble!"

"Beware, rash youth, how you speak lightly of the power of the church."

"Far be it from me, I mean but to show that I am not the only one who wears an amulet;—but of bewitching the most beautiful Princess Leonore, I am innocent; lay not this to my charge."

"Three nights ago, I heard your converse with my child, the Princess Leonore, as ye sat in the balcony behind the eastern tower of my palace in Ferrara. I heard thee tell her of the delights of forbidden lore, and urge her flight with thee to scenes, where undisturbed ye might together pursue your unhallowed studies," were the stern words which now fell on Stephano's ear from the haughty Prince of Ferrara.

"You left Venice a week since for Ferrara," said Gian, "and the night before, you spent on the island of Triptolemus, whence this fisherman brought thee."

Antonio stood trembling and devoutly crossed himself at these words. Stephano answered not, and Gian said, "The charges are proved, and according to the laws of Venice, Stephano Colonna is judged!"

"Beware," interrupted he, "how you inflict death thus summarily on a Colonna. Ye know well the power of my name, and though by scabla arts ye have found cause to accuse me, if I fall, my death will not be unavenged."

Gian summoned the officer, and said, "Take Stephano to I Pozzi." Stephano was conducted down a dark and narrow stairway, through a long gloomy gallery to the covered bridge, which leads across the Rio Palazzo to the State Prison. Here the officer unlocked a low door, and bade him enter. All was darkness beyond, and Stephano found himself standing in water to the depth of two feet. The door was locked behind him, the receding footsteps of the officer died away in the distance, and the cavalier was alone in a cell dark, damp and silent as the grave. A faint light now glimmered through a narrow window barred with iron, cut near the top of this gloomy abode, and Stephano, after some moments, distinguished a wooden platform raised three feet from the floor. On it was a rude straw bed. This was all the cell contained, and Stephano seated himself and pondered over his strange situation. Hour after hour wore on, and he heard but the gurgling sound of the waters of the canal as they poured through the iron gratings of these dungeons of horror, and the shriek of madness, or groan of despair from some fellow prisoner, immured around, above, or below him. Anon, the light grew clearer through his narrow window, and a far-off hum of many voices and sounds betrayed that day had dawned. Presently, the jailer came, and putting down some water, and miserable broth and bread, left him again to solitude.

Gradually the light grew dimmer, night's darkness and silence were again around him, as he still sat on the wooden trestle in sorrow and gloom. He had not tasted his wretched food, but huge water-rats and reptiles were busy over the feast. Despair possessed his spirit and he laid down on his pallet of straw with a brain burning with madness. At last sleep threw her magic spell over him and he dreamed of Leonore and far-off isles of light and bliss. But dread his waking! A cold substance touched his hand, and as he opened his eyes a slimy snake crawled off and dropped into the water. A loathsome bloated toad clung to the damp wall, and fixed on him its still and shining eye. He longed for the meanest of human kind, for the music of the rudest speech; and now came the terrible thought that he was immured for life! What had he to hope! He knew the ruthlessness of his judges; and was not an enemy of his house his accuser, besides other foes unknown! What would the influence of his family avail! He was shut up in a dungeon and they in ignorance, and Leonore,—she might now be given up to the Count, and in ignorance of his fate, and he raved in madness. Another day passed slowly away like its predecessor, his food and again been silently set down by the grim jailer. Night again and with it deeper despair, was around him. But in its darkest hour he heard footsteps approaching. The harsh grating of a key in the lock followed, and the officer again stood before him to conduct him to the tribunal. Stephano sprang up with a feeling of thankfulness, for death was preferable to that living tomb. Again he stood in the presence of his judges and calmly awaited his sentence—Gian said,

"For the crimes of which you were accused and found guilty, you deserve death, but in consideration of your youth, and the services of your illustrious house, it is transmuted to banishment for life. If after six days you are seen in any part of Italy, your life will be the forfeit."

Stephano's cheek grew pale as he heard these words, and thought of Leonore and his home; but a smile curled his lip at the craftiness of the sentence. "My youth, and services of my house! Nay, 'twas fear, ye dared not thus take the life of a Colonna," muttered he as he proudly left their presence and resought his lodgings. The morning hour found him far out at sea, in a vessel bound for Rome. On it he found Petro Trono, a young Roman, and a friend. To him he told his mournful story, and charged him to seek the Princess and tell her his fate.

"And what course will you take, Stephano?"

"I know not," was his melancholy response. "Heaven will guide me, oh! that I might once again behold Leonore, but I dare not, Ferrara belongs to Venice, and my greatest foe, the Prince, is there." Long before the slow-sailing caraval reached Rome the time had expired, and Stephano dared not land to bid his home farewell.

The world was then ringing with the intended expedition of the bold Genoese to discover a new kingdom for the sovereigns of Arragon and Castile. The enthusiastic spirit of Stephano hailed with joy the news of his speedy sailing. Banished from his home, and her he loved, he determined to seek a glorious name by attaching himself to this expedition. At Rome he found a caraval bound for Flanders, and the captain promised to land him at Palos. He embarked to join the bold adventurer. "Farewell, Pietro," said he to his friend, "remember to seek the Princess and tell her I go to seek a name with which Prince Azzo shall be proud to claim alliance; bid her be true, and we shall yet be happy."

He reached Palos the evening before Columbus sailed, and seeking that noble and benignant man, told him his mournful story, and asked permission to accompany him. Columbus had been the victim of disappointment for 18 years, during which time he had endeavored to interest various sovereigns in his plans without success, and his heart used to suffering, could sympathize with the sorrows of the disconsolate youth. He gladly received him, for few were the hearts that willingly accompanied him in his bold enterprise—the scoff of all save a few kind hearts and wise heads.

CHAPTER VI.

On the 3rd of August all was ready—the sun shone brightly on their ocean path—the sky was serene above. Gentle breezes filled their sails, and all nature promised them prosperity. But tears and lamentations alone met the ear. Those few men were gazed upon by friends and relatives as devoted victims to the wild and visionary schemes of a madman. No heartfelt joyous tones bade them “God speed,” but mournful cries and outstretched hands, as the wind bore gallantly on their fragile fleet. Stephano stood with folded arms on the deck of the Santa Maria, seemingly unconscious of life. He gazed on the crowded shore, none there wept for him, but in her splendid home, he knew that Leonore wept bitter tears, and he felt that he might trust in her pure and fervent prayers. But the thought of the months, years perhaps, that would pass ere he could again behold her! The agony of this separation, which might be eternal, filled his soul with sorrow. He felt that her heart would be true to him, but force might make her the wretched bride of Count Eccelino. Hope pointed to the enterprize in which he had engaged. His ardent mind exulted in the anticipation of penetrating into an unknown world. There was something in the mystery peculiarly attractive to him; he would win glory and Leonore might yet be his own! Then, the visions in the tower of Fabricio recurred to his mind, and he thought, perchance, love had been thus denied him, and he forced to seek the path of glory: yet he felt without Leonore’s love, how valueless it would be, and gloom again darkened his brow. The silent abstraction of his youthful companion was not unheeded by the Admiral, and he often joined him as he stood in mournful thought in the midnight watch. Stephano’s obedience and devotion to himself attached Columbus to him, and he unfolded to him his secret misgivings, or painted his glowing hopes, and he found the enthusiastic dreamer ever ready to lend a willing ear, and aid where it could avail. In their first trial in the calm which arrested them off the Azores, he animated the drooping spirits of the sailors with words of hope and his cheerful mien; and when, after many wearisome days and nights, still no land appeared, and eager eyes were dim and ached with straining, and longing hearts heavy and sick with repeated disappointment—when the tensely drawn chords of spirits in suspense were ready to snap and recoil upon their leader, Colonna put to shame the craven spirit of his shipmates by his cheerful obedience, and sustained the anxious soul of his noble commander, with words of hope and prophecies of success.

When the curiously carved staff and those tangled weeds came floating lazily and carelessly by, how eagerly were they snatched from the briny wave, and how anxious was every heart and eye of those despairing men! how hope and fancy awoke with more than youthful vigor, in the breasts of those who a few days before meditated deeds of bloodshed and dishonor! But these cheering manifestations passed like sunbeams on an April sky, and again Columbus saw the cloud of discontent and heard the muttered thunder.

The 11th of October dawned clear and bright; the endless sea still stretched its glassy bosom before them; the shades of night closed around Columbus as he stood above the cabin of the Santa Maria, eagerly scanning the western horizon. What would that morning bring to him? The realization of his theory and proud hopes, or the humiliation of a dreaming fanatic! But though his noble countenance bore traces of sorest anxiety it was oftener lighted up with the pride of imagined success. He watched the free, pure waves dashing up their foam-wreaths around his vessel; those waters never before divided by a ship’s prow. Above him the bright watchers of the sky moved slowly to the west. Stephano placed himself beside Columbus, but did not break the silence his commander saw fit to preserve. His eyes were fixed on a star that blazed brightly in the western sky, but his heart was with Leonore. Love and glory filled those two hearts, and silence brooded over all.

“Look!” said Columbus suddenly. “at that light, it moves, now rising—now falling; it is a fisherman’s torch on the waves, or a light carried by some person walking on shore; see! Colonna, what think you?”

“It is certainly a light, and carried in one of the ways you have mentioned.”

Columbus called Pedro Gutierrez, “Signor, do you see a light out to the west?”

“Yes, my Lord Admiral.”

“We may still be deceived by excited imaginations, call Rodrigo Sanchez.”

When he ascended, the light had disappeared: after a few moments Columbus said, “There! look out towards the west, do you not see a light, Rodrigo?”

“Yes, my lord, what do you take it to be?”

“We must be near land.”

“I fear not, my lord.”

“Nay! have we not in the last three days received many strong proofs? Remember the flocks of field-birds; they were too feeble of wing to fly far, and the green fish, and the wreaths of plants: trust me, good gentlemen, our hopes will soon be realized.”

“Our commander is right,” said Colonna, “see! there is the light again!”—but the other gentlemen were incredulous and soon retired, leaving Columbus and Stephano alone.

“Now,” thought the Admiral, “shall my hopes and wishes be realized. The balmy odors which load these western breezes betray their wandering in the spicy groves of Cipango, where gold and gems are profuse, and wealth and splendor reign. Now, shall I be able to recover the Holy Sepulchre from the impious hands which have profaned it. I shall have wealth enough to fit out an invincible crusade—but perhaps I approach a land of frightful monsters and awful scenes; all is unknown and mystic before me—yet I will give a world to mankind; those cold scoffers shall yet worship the visionary and feel the humiliation that burns the cheek with blushes of shame, when the boasted wisdom of presumptuous ignorance is refuted and proved false; whilst the trusting and wise will receive a world new and strange, as a recompense for their consideration of the despised Columbus. Nations yet unborn shall bless my name. Holy Mother, who hast thus far guided me, grant the fulfilment of my desires."

And Stephano, what were his thoughts? of the glory of this enterprise in which he would be a sharer? Doubtless these things were present with him, but there was an eye that beamed afar, which was the pole-star of his trembling heart; a gentle being whose slightest word was life or death to him. Her approving smile, his wreath of glory; her censure crushing shame.

Morning dawned, and the fast sailing Pinta gave the joyful signal of land! Land! how was that word echoed by every tongue! what rapture filled each breast! Nearer and nearer they approach the shore; nature beautiful and glorious bursts upon them, a realm of verdure, fragrance, bloom and fruit. A brilliant sun lights up the new and gorgeous scene. The boats leave the ships. In the Admiral's is the green-cross flag. That banner has waved over Moslem and Saracen fields wet with gore and ghastly with death—what does it, midst these pure and peaceful shades?

Columbus has reached the land. Well might the natives and his crew regard him with reverence, as he kneels on the long-sought shore, his rich scarlet robe sweeping the wet sands, his noble face now turned to Heaven with words of thanksgiving and praise on his lips, now bent to earth as he kisses the virgin soil. His example is followed by the crews, and he takes possession of the country in the names of Ferdinand and Isabella.

The timid natives had fled at the first sight of the fast coming ships. When the boats landed with strange beings of a "marvellous whiteness," clad in gaudy robes, or glittering steel armor, awe-stricken and wondering, they sought refuge in their thick groves. But soon emboldened by the gentle manners and kind tones of the Spaniards, they approach and reverently touch their white faces and hands, and handle their long beards, with many gesticulations of wonder.

Nor did the Spaniards marvel less at the strange complexion and beardless faces of the natives; they saw but one woman. The inhabitants of the old world knew not how completely the Indian is

"monarch of all he surveys," till they saw the women employed in all the labor, whilst the men hunted, or lay at ease in the shade of the beautiful trees that covered these islands.

The Spaniards spent several months in these delightful island homes, and the life there enjoyed of luxurious ease and plenty, made them contrast unfavorably the toil and care with which pleasure and comfort were purchased in the old world, with the innocent idleness of this paradisaean clime. Swiftly flew the days in that delicious land where the air was so fresh and buoyant, that it was joy but to breathe it, and sweet the siesta, that necessary luxury to the Spaniard, where the senses were lulled by singing birds, and the languid limbs fanned by gentlest breezes.

They had left San Salvador some months, and were coasting among the islands. One day they entered a fine harbor, which Columbus called St. Thomas, and were visited by a large canoe, bringing messengers and presents to Columbus from a grand cacique, who lived on the coast farther eastward. His name was Guacanagari, and he requested Columbus to visit him. Contrary winds prevented his compliance, but he sent an armed boat commanded by the notary of the squadron, who returned with so favorable an account of the country and the hospitality of the chieftain, that Columbus determined to visit him. He soon after set sail. One night the helmsman left the ship in charge of a boy, and retired to rest. Soon after the crew were awakened by a strong collision, and then came the rushing waters. Columbus was first on deck, and found that the ship had been carried by the strong current ashore, and lay rolling on a sand bank. The terrified crew refused to aid Columbus and sought the Nina. Pinzon would not suffer them to come on his vessel, but manned his own boat, and hastened to the Admiral's assistance. Every effort to save the Santa Maria proved vain, and Columbus finally abandoned her and took refuge in the Nina.

At daylight he sent messengers to Guacanagari, informing him of his misfortunes. The kind-hearted cacique shed tears, and assembling his people, sent off canoes to assist Columbus in bringing off stores from the wreck. When their effects were safely landed, he established a guard over them, and entertained Columbus and his crew with the most munificent hospitality. So enchanted were the Spaniards with this beautiful island, and the mode of life, that many entreated permission of Columbus to remain. He had thought of planting a colony in the new world, and gladly acceded to their proposition. Preparations were immediately made for building a fortress, and with the assistance of the natives it was soon completed. The simple hearted cacique and natives did not oppose this movement, but rejoiced in it; so much enamored were they of their strange visitors, and with so deep an awe had the feats and arms of the Spaniards inspired them.*

"Stephano," said the Admiral, "you are banished from your country, will you remain here? You shall be first in command of the garrison."

"Accept my most grateful thanks, most noble Admiral, for the high honor you offer me, but permit me to decline it; I must see my home, my Leonore again. The fame of this discovery in which I am a small sharer, may cast in the shade my faults and I may be pardoned."

"But may not the Princess already be the bride of another?—Nay, be not angry Colonna," he continued, as the youth's brow became crimson, "I mean not to say the lady will be false, but the father might compel."

Deep gloom overspread the face of Colonna, as he said, "Then—I will return to these islands forever."

"Well, my young friend, we will hope for better things; and be assured, if needed, my influence shall not be wanting to aid you; you have oftentimes cheered and comforted my heart." Colonna silently and reverently bent before Columbus and kissed his hand.

A few hours later he stood in the deep shade of one of those beautiful groves. The sunbeams straggled through the thickly woven foliage and formed a golden net-work on the rich green turf beneath; a silver stream went splashing over the smooth pebbles in its bed; fragrant flowers bent from its enamelled banks, to kiss the fleeting wavelets which bore on a lovely freight of fragrant bloom, scattered from orange and myrtle trees above; midst their glossy leaves sweet birds, warbled and fluttered, and one seemed crazed with delight, as it poured forth its exulting and ever varied notes. Stephano threw himself on the turf entranced, and listened to the wild bird's song. He thought of his early dreams, and Fabricio's vision of Love. "Here," said he, "might we realize all our fondest, purest hopes. Oh! Leonore, Leonore! if thou wert here, midst these peaceful, enchanting shades, how blissfully life would pass! These gentle natives would love us and look to us for protection, and we would have a kingdom of love! I will seek my country and thee. Should the dark fate which threatened us pass away, we will be happy there; if not—and thou art free—we will fly to this land of freedom and bliss. Oh! for the hour, when I shall again feel that heart beating against mine own."

In his earnestness of passion, he had risen, and extending his arms, he then clasped them to his breast. A slight rustling startled him, and turning he saw a young and beautiful Indian girl. She stood looking earnestly on the youth, her bright dark eyes radiant with tenderness and awakened love. The language of passion is always understood, and the gestures and tones of Stephano had strongly excited the maiden. What a vision of innocence and beauty stood before him! Her long silky hair was her only dress about the neck and bust, and a white cotton robe fell gracefully from the waist to the knee. Her slender and finely moulded form was elastic and agile as the wild deer of the forest. She gazed a few minutes longer on Colonna, and then her eye became humid; the animation on her face was subdued; she approached the astonished Colonna, folded her hands meekly over her breast, and kneeling before him, attempted to place his foot on her bowed head. Colonna now understood her actions, and raising her from the earth, placed her gently from him, laid his hand on his heart, and pointed to the east across the sea. The girl rose, looked earnestly, mournfully upon him a moment, and then with a look of despair bounded like a wounded deer far into the depths of the forest.

CHAPTER VII.

How had these months passed to Leonore!—In sorrow, amidst the pleasures and amusements of her splendid home. In vain her father endeavored to interest her in them, in vain did the sanguine Fidele strive to rouse her. She sat listless in her room, or wandered with a lingering step, that betrayed the weary heart, along the shore of the river. Prince Azzo knew not whither Colonna had gone, but Pietro Trono had faithfully though secretly delivered his message to Leonore, and not even to Fidele did she confide it. Thus her hopes, her fears, were borne alone; and who knows not how grievous a thing it is to bear sorrow and fear in silence!

At her earnest request Prince Azzo had obtained permission from the council to defer her marriage with Eccelino.

The last day of this allowed period had arrived, and Leonore sat in her chamber in the stillness of despair. Hitherto hope had whispered, though but faintly. "Stephano will return and save thee." But now, this star had gone down, and not a lingering beam remained to brighten the darkness of her gloom. Fidele had striven with gentle assiduity to cheer her hapless cousin. Now, even her hopeful spirit failed to brighten the falling shadow.

They sat by an open window. Leonore's cheek was white and cold as the marble sill on which she leaned; the full dark eyes beamed no more with lustrous light, but large tears gathered, and slowly swelled over their silken fringes. The beautiful mouth was painfully compressed, and the delicate hands were clasped and rested moveless before her. Fidele sat gazing silently and mournfully on her fair sad face. The door opened and Prince Azzo entered. Leonore closed her eyes and sank back in her chair.

"Leonore! my child, you are free! Eccelino is dead!"

"My father!"—and as though an iron hand had loosened its grasp on her heart, she heaved a long sigh, and half rising, sank down again insensible.

Prince Azzo folded her to his bosom, and covering her brow with kisses, frantically besought her to live and bless him. Fidele's aid and apt appliances soon restored Leonore to consciousness, and when she saw her cousin quietly lying on her couch, whilst a soft smile wreathed her lips, she turned to the Prince and said,

"But how, my uncle, did the wicked Count meet his death?"

"Irritated by the compliance of the ten, with my request, that his marriage might be deferred, he uttered rash words against their justice, and threatened to betray the city to the Turks. The next morning when the palace doors opened, the headless body was seen with this proclamation, 'Eccelino Di Romagnolo, beheaded for crimes against the state.' He has expiated a life of bloody deeds and blackest crimes, by a frightful death."

"And you would have given your child to one you esteemed thus," said Fidele, with reproachful indignation.

"Knowest thou not, maiden, that magic arts and dealings with spirits are punished by death? Could I give my child, a Princess of D'Este, up to an ignominious death? Proofs of her guilt were in Eccelino's possession, and I could not refute them."

"My father, will not the council still enforce their fearful threat," said Leonore wildly.

"Fear not, my child, gold is their magic spell, Eccelino's threatened your life, mine has saved it."

CHAPTER VIII.

Gentle but steady breezes filled the sails of the homeward-bound adventurers. They had bidden adieu to their comrades who had chosen the new world for their home, and though heaviness endured for a moment, the bliss of again seeing friends and country soon filled every heart.

After a few days these favorable winds ceased. On the evening of the 13th of February, vivid flashes of lightning in the north north east foreboded a tempest. It soon burst upon them, and their fragile vessels drifted at the mercy of wind and wave.

For some time the ships kept together, but as the storm increased, the signal lights of the Pinta gradually disappeared, and the despairing crew in the ship of Columbus, left alone in an unknown and stormy ocean, gave way to clamorous grief and execrations of their commander. He bore a calm and self-possessed brow, whilst his heart was tortured by anxiety, deeper than that of those around him. Like them, he might never again see country or friends, but mankind would pity them as victims, whilst they execrated his memory as a fanatic who had "perished in pursuit of a chimera." The object of his hope and toil for years, seemed about to elude his grasp when he had achieved his design and almost reaped his reward. The Pinta had gone, and on his frail vessel hung his only hope of proclaiming to the world the success of his bold enterprize. In the midst of these torturing reflections, a thought of consolation arose. Calling the still faithful Stephano, he prepared to write on parchment an account of his discovery and his taking possession of the country in the name of the Spanish Sovereigns. The furious tossings of the vessel rendered writing difficult, and Stephano held the parchment firmly outstretched upon the table whilst Columbus wrote. After writing a brief account of his discovery and taking possession, he sealed and directed it to the Sovereigns, superscribing in their name a promise of a thousand ducats to whomever should deliver the packet unopened to them. He wrapped this document in a waxed cloth, placed it in a cake of wax which he enclosed in a cask, and cast into the sea. A similar memorial thus preserved he placed on the poop of his vessel.*

Strange was the spectacle on that helpless tossed bark! The noble countenance of Columbus earnestly bending over the trembling parchment, perseveringly striving to wrest the precious knowledge of the success of his enterprize from the contemptuous oblivion that threatened it, and committing it to the treacherous waves of a tempestuous ocean; the face of his youthful friend expressing the sympathy he felt with the feelings of his commander, as he followed with anxious eye the wavering progress of the pen, and then, as some fiercer wave, or louder war-note of the storm burst over them, the shadowy fear of losing the cherished hope of his heart, passing across his upturned face:—and around them, the groans of despair, the wild appeals for mercy, the penitential promises and humiliating vows of the terrified crew!—Well might the storm-spirit poise on his wing and arrest the lightning arrow that threatened the devoted ship.

The hour of despair passed. A single beam of light in the western sky woke hope in their sinking hearts. Hope came from that west, so much dreaded and despised.

A few days after land was seen. Land! oh! what a shout of joy swelled every heart—but sorrow awaited them. The island was St. Mary's, one of the Azores, and belonged to Portugal. After acts of inhospitality, and several ineffectual attempts on the part of the Governor to secure the person of Columbus, the weather becoming favorable, they again made sail for Spain. Again tempests overwhelmed them. During the last fearful night the cry of land was heard; but fearing to strike a rock, Columbus kept to sea. Morning found them off the coast of Portugal opposite the mouth of the Tagus. Though rendered suspicious of this people by his treatment at St. Mary's, he was obliged by the shattered condition of his vessel, to run into the Tagus to make some repairs. He was joyfully and kindly welcomed by the Portuguese, and many nobles visited him. After receiving the honors and princely entertainment of King John, at Valparaiso, Columbus set out for Palos. Here his triumph was signal. To Palos he first came a despised wanderer on foot, begging bread and water for his child at the convent gate. Now the honors of a conqueror awaited him! The air was joyful with the sound of bells, and the rest of a Sabbath in all places of labor.

Learning that the Court was at Barcelona, he despatched a letter to the Sovereigns, and repaired to Seville to await their commands. In due time, he received a gratifying response and an invitation to proceed to Barcelona.

This discovery was matter for rejoicing throughout the world. Men of science and letters everywhere hailed it as presenting a new field for their labors. Among those who journeyed to Barcelona to see the discoverer and hear his wondrous account, were Prince Azzo and Leonore. The Prince was also led thither, by the to him mysterious entreaties of his daughter and the hope of making still brighter the fresh roses that had begun to bloom on her pale cheek. He wondered much at her animation as they neared their journey's end. But fear sometimes whitened Leonore's cheek, and silenced the joyful accents of her tongue. She knew not whether Stephano had returned with the victorious Columbus. That noble heart which had beat so warmly for her might be still forever, his head resting on its last low pillow, unwept, in a strange land, or in sunless cavern beneath the sea. Such thoughts haunted her, and when the spires and domes of the city glittered in the last rays of evening, her heart sickened with suspense and fear.

They arrived on the eve of Columbus' entrance into the city. Busy and crowding thoughts drove sleep from Leonore's pillow. With the gloom of night came shadows over her soul, but as morning's roseate pencil painted the sky, so revived Hope spread roses on the face and brightened the aspect of the trembling maiden. Its glorious light and free fresh air chased away nights cold shades, and the heart's despondency. All was bright and beautiful.

To receive the noble Admiral with greater honor, the sovereigns had the throne placed in the open air under a canopy of cloth of gold. Beneath this now sat Ferdinand and Isabella, with the youthful prince Juan; around were noble princes and ladies in rich attire. Columbus' progress to Barcelona had been that of a conqueror enjoying a Roman triumph. Every village poured forth its inhabitants to hail him, and nobles and proud biddagos joined his cortège. Now, on it came to the city, with music and waving banners, and nodding plumes, the tramp of mettled steeds, the gleaming of rich and many colored robes, and the flashing of steel arms and armor.

Conspicuous among this splendid throng was Columbus, mounted on a white charger, whose proud step and arched neck almost persuaded the beholder that the spirited animal was conscious of the noble burden he bore. Columbus' white hair was uncovered and floated back from his high brow, and a smile of gratification dwelt on his benevolent countenance. In front of the procession, were the six Indians decorated with chains and coronets of gold, and the animals, birds, and other curiosities brought from the new world. But after the first rapid glance Leonore saw nothing of these. Her eyes were rivetted on a noble youth who rode on a jet black steed by the side of Columbus.

He saw her not. They came nearer and nearer, till she could see the very waving of his raven hair. Then his eagle eye glanced rapidly over the crowd and rested on the brilliant, joy-lit face of his Leonore. A flush of surprise and delight mounted to his brow, and with one earnest look on that loved one, he raised his eyes in mute thanksgiving to Heaven. Now, amidst that busy and gorgeous pageant, their eyes sought but each other; their hearts throbbed but with their own feelings. . . .

That day of glory and rejoicing was closing; the soft twilight of April, beneath a Castilian sky, had made the open air the favorite resort of most of the revellers. Here and there in grove and garden were groups, and couples, wandering 'neath the orange trees with lagging footsteps. Among these were Stephano and Leonore. They had wandered farther and farther from all around, till they stood alone in a little dingle, shut in by the thick foliage of old orange trees. A pebbled stream glided noiselessly along. The silvery beams of the "fair young moon" glimmered on the dewy blossoms and leaves. Here the lovers rested on a moss-grown stone, and as Fabricio had shown long before to Stephano, in the vision of trusting love, thus rested the maiden on his throbbing heart. But they had forgotten magic and magician now, beneath the potent spell of Love. Their bliss-intoxicated hearts beat wildly, and the overflowing happiness of confiding reciprocated affection nearly stopped the current of speech and thought. They but existed. But how priceless such existence! It is felt but once. When first the fond heart has borne separation, long and in silence, again to see the fervent light of unabated love burning in the eyes, to hear the tender words of cherished affection warm and true as at the parting hour, to see breathing and loving before us, the one in whose life our own is bound,—oh! this is bliss! Earth has nothing—nothing that can approach it. Believe it, scoff at the power and happiness of love.

Such was the happiness of those moments of existence to the lovers.

At length Stephano said, “and you are still mine own, mine own, and mine only, sweet Leonore, oh! tell it me again and again.”

“We have nothing now to fear, dearest, no magic horrors torture us,” said the soft trembling voice, but the bedewed eyes answered better the enraptured youth.

“And Eccelino!—what of him—has he relinquished all claim to thee!”

“Death freed me,” said the maiden solemnly.

“Death! he seemed invulnerable in field and hall; the foeman’s sword and treachery’s poison were harmless to that fearful man of blood. He had antidotes and protectives innumerable; in what guise came death to him?”

“By the rashness of a hasty tongue he perished; he denounced the council for want of justice and threatened betrayal to the Turks, because they had granted my father’s prayer to defer his marriage.”

“And your father, Leonore?”

“Will make us happy, fear not. I reign again in his heart, and now let’s seek him, dear Stephano, and tell him all—fear not—he will surely grant our prayer,” and the lovers returned to the city.

CHAPTER IX.

’Twas midnight and Prince Azzo stood at the window of his chamber, looking out on the beauty of the night. A soft hand was laid on his arm, and a sweet low voice murmured in faltering tones, “My Father, I have suffered much of late, would you heal my wounded heart?”

“With the price of my life, sweet child; I know thou hast suffered and borne much; what shall I do for thee, dear Leonore?”

“Colonna has returned and is here, oh! father, bless our love.”

“Colonna! bless thy love for a Colonna! a Ghibeline—usurper of the rights due my father’s house! Maiden, thou dreamest! Whence came this presumptuous youth again?”

“With Columbus from the new world; he is his valued friend and rode by his side to-day. Oh! my father, hear me, do not make me miserable,” and she sank weeping at his feet.

Prince Azzo gently raised her, and pressing her in his arms, said, “seek your couch Leonore; if I can grant your wish without tarnishing the honor of my house, I will.”

The next morning Columbus, having been told by his young friend of his meeting with Leonore, and his fears of her father’s refusal to grant their request, sought Prince Azzo; and the praise of the Admiral did more for the cause of the lovers, than the tears of an idolized daughter. So do men bow their wills to the praise of one “whom the king delighteth to honor.” * * * * *

The morning sun streamed brightly through the richly painted window of the royal chapel. The Sovereigns and a noble suite were there, and at the altar, Pedro de Gonzalez sat in his sacred canonicals. A slight rustling broke the impressive silence, and a bridal train swept down the broad aisle, and stood before the altar. Columbus stood by, and Prince Azzo placed the trembling hand of his only and cherished daughter, the pride of his house, in that of the son of the Ghibeline enemy of his fathers, but happiness alone found place in the hearts beneath that sacred roof, and congratulations flowed from every lip. Columbus made honorable mention of the obedience and love of Stephano to the Sovereigns, and he was munificently rewarded. The sympathy expressed for the youthful pair was universal, for their romantic story awoke an echo in every heart. The Prince thought it best that they should remain awhile in Spain. The influence of the Sovereigns and Columbus extended not to the nefarious council. Isabella gave to Leonore a beautiful castellated villa near Barcelona, in which the happy couple were soon domiciled, and Prince Azzo left for Italy.

Years passed—the pride and glory of beautiful Venice were laid low, and with her overthrow perished the infamous ten. Many were the deeds of horror laid open to the eye of day, when this fearful tribunal was destroyed.

From a few fishermen’s huts on marshy islands sprang Venice. Like the Queen of Beauty of old from the sea, thus rose she to be Queen over that element which once covered with slime and weeds, her infant foundation. A kingdom of Beauty, Elegance, Power and Terror.

“Thus did Venice rise,
Thus flourish, till the unwelcome tidings came,
That in the Tagus had arrived a fleet
From India, from the region of the sun,
Fragrant with spices; that a way was found,
A channel opened, and the golden stream
Turned to enrich another. Then she felt
Her strength departing, and at last she fell,
Fell in an instant, blotted out and razed.”

Peace for a little while brooded over distracted Italy; and in the midst of the refinement and cultivation of Ferrara often found an asylum, yea, a cherished home.

In a hall of a noble castle, one of these homes of peace, one sweet summer eve, sat a cavalier past the prime of life, but with its beauty and dignity still resting on his brow. On his shoulder leaned a noble looking matron, but her thoughts and eyes were given more to a beautiful young girl, who sang to a harp with all the gushing joy of early youth, a gleeful air, than to the book with which her husband’s mind was engaged. The song ceased—the golden strings no longer vibrated to her fairy fingers. She leaned her head for a moment thoughtfully against her harp, then suddenly raising it, looked on the cavalier. Presently she rose, and gently put aside the book. “Dear father, read no more now, but tell me some legend of old.”

“What shall it be, my Leonore! Of your mother’s magic spell, in early life?”

“No, no, something fresh and joyous, a tale of the new world, or the villa in Spain, or some such glowing picture of happy life and love.”

And Stephano sat in the soft twilight and wove legends for his daughter, whilst Leonore listened with a face lighted by gentlest smiles. Years dimmed not the bright jewel of love they wore in their hearts, and the faith and love of Stephano and Leonore was the oath by which lovers swore and the pledge which maidens gave.

RECOLLECTIONS OF SIX DAYS' JOURNEY IN THE MOON.

BY AN AERIO-NAUTICAL MAN.

Inasmuch as this terrestrial world of ours has lately been so thoroughly explored by all sorts of ingenious and inquisitive travellers, who have left nothing for those that may come after them either to describe or invent, it has happened that those who, like myself, are fond of new sights and new sensations, can find little or nothing here below to awaken their wonder or produce any excitement. Even the remotest regions of the earth have been so thoroughly explored, that it may be said with perfect truth, of my countrymen most especially, that they are more intimately acquainted with the interior of Asia and Africa than the land of their birth, and know a great deal more about Paris, London, Florence and Rome, than any of our great emporiums.

Being a devoted lover of travelling, partly on account of the agreeable dissipation of mind it produces, but more especially the dignity and consequence derived from breathing the air of foreign lands, I have been seriously aggrieved at this lamentable exhaustion of novelty, and more than once, like Alexander, sat down and wept that there were no more worlds to explore. The planets and other heavenly bodies most especially attracted my attention, and of these the Moon, which is at the bottom of so many sublunary influences, and without whose aid the adepts of Natural Philosophy would be so often at a loss to account for various phenomena, appeared to me the most interesting. I wished, if possible, to ascertain the fact of such influence, and the mode in which it is exercised on the tides, the growth of grain and vegetables, and above all, the wits of mankind; and I was anxious for an intercourse with the Man in the Moon, who from his great age, and other collateral circumstances must, notwithstanding the perpetual insinuations about his ignorance, have acquired a prodigious mass of knowledge and experience. In short, I became exceedingly unhappy at that mysterious non-intercourse which it would seem had been rendered eternal between the different planets, and to tell the honest truth, nearly lost my wits in devising expedients to surmount it, by applying some of the new principles of science to this interesting object.

While in this painful state of mind, I accidentally saw in one of the public papers a notice of some ingenious experiments in a new and hitherto unknown science, called Aeriostism, or the faculty of self-suspension in the air. It immediately occurred to me that I might convert this interesting discovery to my purpose, and pursuing the hint, I instituted a series of experiments which finally resulted in complete success, and enabled me to accomplish my long cherished object of a visit to the Moon, from which I have just returned, after a most refreshing tour of six days, five hours, and forty-seven minutes. No time has been lost in laying the results of this journey before the enlightened public, of late so surfeited with all kinds of fictions, that it must needs feel a desire for a little wholesome truth, if only for the sake of novelty. I can not but flatter myself the information communicated will be entirely new, as hitherto we have known nothing of this planet, except from Astronomers and anonymous scribblers; of the former of whom I wish to speak with all possible respect, but who, I must be permitted to say, have told some strange stories about volcanoes and what not. As to the latter, I pledge my word to my readers I am the first native of this world who ever visited that planet, without losing his wits irrevocably; and that these egregious romancers know no more of the subject, than divers of those English travellers who have deluded mankind with pretended accounts of their discoveries and inventions, know of this country.

It is not my intention to disclose the progress and final success of my experiments in Aeriostism, inasmuch as I contemplate extending my visits to all the other planets in succession, and do not wish to be forestalled by others, since it can not be doubted that were I to divulge the secret, they would all in a short time be overrun by inquisitive Englishmen, who, according to custom, would leave the poor people scarcely a remnant of character, especially, as judging by those of the moon, they are far more refined, polite, moral and intelligent than those of that country, and withal better fed and more comfortable. It will be sufficient, I trust, to insure the utmost confidence in my veracity, merely to state, as the basis of my process, that I followed the example of the aforesaid travellers, more especially the renowned "Box," in procuring through the exertions of my numerous friends and admirers, divers public demonstrations of admiration, and a prodigious number of complimentary notices, whereby I at length became so puffed up with self-conceit, that I grew specifically lighter than the air, and felt just as I have sometimes done in my sleep, when dreaming of flying over the heads of my fellow creatures with a pair of imaginary wings. I became so light and airy, that I could not keep my feet to the ground without great difficulty, and was once blown across Cayuga Lake by a sudden gust of wind. I was fain to wear heavy leaden soles to my boots, by means of which, though sometimes blown down, like the little witches bought by children at the toy-shops, I always popt up again in an instant, my head being so much lighter than my heels. Having thus surmounted the great obstacle of specific gravity, the next difficulty was to propel myself forward, and above all govern my motions while in progress through the air. I succeeded beyond my most sanguine anticipations, by an ingenious application of machinery and mesmerism, which I shall keep a profound secret, lest future travellers should follow in my track, and contradict all I say, as they are too apt to do, in order to appear wiser than their betters.

Having perfected my machinery, and furnished myself with a bladder bag of a whip-syllabub, the lightest food I could think of, together with a map of the Moon, and some cheap publications to supply me with light reading by the way, I left this world, on the night of the sixth full Moon, in the year 1844, when there was not a cloud in the sky and the air was calm, and commenced my daring undertaking. The first step, I found was every thing; I rose slowly and with great difficulty, until gradually receding from the attraction of the earth, I was borne along with such inconceivable swiftness, that had I not provided against the contingency, by an ingenious process of shortening sail, I should soon have left my breath behind me. As I rose in the air, I also found the great advantage of the Bozzian process I had undergone, for had not my head been already as light as a feather, I should inevitably have become so dizzy in looking down from such a fearful height, that I might probably have lost all consciousness, or at least become totally incapable of distinguishing truth from falsehood.

For the same reason that I have not explained the minutæ of my machinery, I shall refrain from all detail of the particulars of my journey through the air, the dangers I encountered and my expedients for avoiding them. It is sufficient to my purpose at present, merely to state, that after having encountered a vast deal of difficulty in crossing the milky way, where the stars are as close together as the thousand islands in the St. Lawrence, and having my whiskers scorched by too near an approach to the Dog star, I proceeded on at a great rate, but was much alarmed to find that the Moon sailed much faster than I did, and seriously contemplated lying to in her track and awaiting her coming round again. Fortunately however, while debating the subject, I suddenly found myself rapidly approaching the land, and just at the dawn of day distinctly heard the cocks crowing. In a few minutes I was so near, as to be obliged to shorten sail, and immediately after landed, where I found the Moon, like a fly in a spider web, so entangled in the beard of the comet which was marauding through the skies about this time, that she could not budge an inch. Had it not been for this providential circumstance, I verily believe I should never have overtaken her. I had almost forgot to mention having been nearly demolished by a falling star which just grazed my head, and gave a great light, but no heat that I could discover. It may be proper also to state that I reached the Moon in two days and ten hours, in consequence of its being caught by the beard of the comet, being exactly half the time it would take, according to the calculations of Astronomers, for the planet to fall to the earth, if let go suddenly. Admitting then, that the Moon was thus arrested half way on her nightly course, I must have travelled at a pretty good rate, to overtake her in so short a period. As this planet is said to be unequal in its motions, it is possible however it did not travel at this time as fast as usual.

Having a great deal of business on hand, as I contemplated a visit to the other planets, and had but little time to do it in, I determined to proceed in my inquiries into the state of the country and the character of its inhabitants without delay. Accordingly, availing myself of that facility of locomotion, I had acquired by applying the principles of Aeriotism to practical purposes, I managed in the course of six days, to distance all previous travellers, even those who have heretofore visited my own country, and become miraculously acquainted with its morals, manners, institutions and government, as it were by intuition.

Beginning with the geography of the country, I shall content myself with stating that the map of the Moon I carried with me, and which exhibited all the latest discoveries in the science of astronomy, is extremely inaccurate in many essential particulars. The physiognomy of this planet strikingly resembles the human face on a great scale, and hence doubtless the vulgar error of the Man in the Moon, who I assure my readers is only a creature of the imagination. The sockets of the eyes are two large seas, and the protuberances of the cheek bones and nose, nothing more than high mountains, one of the latter of which, having a redish appearance, has doubtless been mistaken for a volcano by the astronomers. I pledge my word, however, there is no such thing as a volcano in the whole planet. I had also occasion to notice that the portion of the moon which astronomers call the land is water, and their water good solid terra firma. Numerous other blunders have been committed, which I forbear to notice out of respect for the learned.

The Moon comprises several states and kingdoms, the former republican, the latter generally, though not always despotic. These mutually abhor each other, and are perpetually quarrelling, and not unfrequently falling together by the ears, about which is the most enlightened and happy, or other matters still more difficult to decide, or still more insignificant. On one occasion, I found two nations cutting each other's throats most valiently, and mutually desolating fields and habitations without mercy. On inquiring the occasion of this violent animosity, I found the people knew nothing at all about it, except that they were ordered to do so by their respective sovereigns, one of whom was an infant, the other a madman. In another part of the Moon, I found them at loggerheads about the honor and interests of the country, concerning which scarcely any two agreed in opinion; or rather there were two parties who differed altogether on the subject, one maintaining that the honor of the nation consisted altogether in its interests, the other that the interests of the nation consisted entirely in its honor. I was not a little struck with the resemblance I observed in these and many other particulars between the inhabitants of the earth and those of the Moon, which at first I ascribed to that family likeness which is found in all creatures of the same species. Further inquiries have however satisfied me, that the people of the Moon are the genuine descendants of Adam and Eve, and that their ancestors were certainly accomplices in erecting the Tower of Babel. The proofs and deductions through which I arrived at this conclusion, I shall, however, reserve for a separate dissertation.

The most remarkable kingdom in this planet, I found to be an island, called the Isle of Engines, in what is vulgarly supposed to be the left eye of the Man in the Moon, which, as I observed before, is a great sea of salt water. It is not so large as some of the other states, but has extended its dependencies to the utmost bounds of the great ocean in which it lies. I heard so much of it, at every step in my progress, that I became extremely anxious to pay it a visit, and accordingly took the first opportunity that offered, embarking on a magnetic steamboat, which progressed at the rate of an hundred miles an hour, against winds and currents. Touching this word, Progressed, I would observe that it is in general use among all classes, is incorporated with all their dictionaries, and recognized as legitimate by the most learned and illustrious of all their academies, which is exclusively composed of persons who have lost their wits in searching for the Philosopher's Stone, Perpetual Motion, the wisdom of Congress, and the first principles of Political Economy.

This island which is called by its inhabitants the most free, happy, and enlightened of all the countries of the Moon, I found not a little worthy the study of an enlightened traveller. Every thing is done there by machinery; and the men themselves, if not machines, are as much their slaves, as the genius of Aladdin's lamp. These machines have in a great measure taken the place of men, and snatched the bread from their mouths, because they work so much cheaper and faster. I saw several which I was assured by the proprietor of a manufactory who was reckoned worth millions, could do the work of a thousand men. I asked what became of the thousand men in the meantime; upon which he entered into a long dissertation to prove, that they were infinitely benefitted by the cheapness of every thing occasioned by these labor-saving machines. I took the liberty of observing that the capital of a large portion of mankind was labor; and that if they could get no work, or were deprived of its adequate rewards, it was of little consequence to them that things were cheap, as they would have no money to purchase them. The millionaire looked at me with surprise, mingled as I thought with contempt, and answered rather superciliously, "my good friend, I perceive you don't understand the first principles of Political Economy." I acknowledged my ignorance, and begged him to enlighten me: whereupon, he went on to entangle himself in a web of knotty arguments, sufficient to confound the whole universe, but by which he imagined that he had demonstrated his whole theory. "You see," concluded he, "the thing is as clear—as clear as"—"mud," said I, perceiving he halted for a comparison.

Believing, however, in the truth of the old proverb, "that the proof of the pudding is in the eating," I determined to see a little further into this matter; so I left the Political Economist, and proceeded through the various departments of his immense establishment, where I found hundreds, I might almost say, thousands of men, women and children, male and female, employed in tending the machinery. They could not be said to govern, but to be directed by it; and it seemed that their very souls had transmigrated into the Steam Engines and Spinning Jennies. There were a great many female children, not more than seven or eight years old, half-clothed, and, if I might judge from their wretched squalid appearance, less than half-fed, but who, as I understood, labored sixteen or eighteen hours of the day, at this monotonous employment, which seemed to consist in perpetual watchfulness, and all for a pittance which I am afraid to name, lest no one should believe me. As I stood contemplating the scene, the millionaire came suddenly behind me, and said, "ah!—Mr.—Mr.—I forget your name—I think you said you came from the United States. I think I have heard of such a place some where or other, though I can't tell where. They say it is a large country almost as big as this; but it is a great pity they tolerate slavery there. Now, in this free and happy land, there is no such thing as a slave. The moment a man, woman, or child touches this sacred soil of freedom, the chains fall from their limbs, and they stand redeemed, regenerated and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of universal emancipation." At this moment of sublime exultation, it happened that a little pale, emaciated girl, apparently worn out with toil and hunger, or both, was observed to fall asleep, as she was standing watching the evolutions of a Spinning Jenny. Upon this a fellow came up and pinched her until she awoke with a scream, and the millionaire directed that a deduction of three pence should be made from her wages, which, on inquiry, I found amounted to two shillings a week.

I had the curiosity to follow a family to their home. It consisted of the husband, his wife, and three children, two of them girls, neither apparently over ten years of age. They had labored eighteen hours a day for months past. Yet returned to a wretched home, where two other families beside themselves lived in the same room. The weather was cold, yet they were without fire and almost destitute of any other clothing than dirty rags; their food was of the most miserable kind, and entirely insufficient to satisfy the cravings of hunger; a wretched straw bed lay in one corner, when they had eaten their scanty meal, they laid themselves down altogether, supplying the want of covering by a mutual communication of animal heat. Turning from the scene in sickening disgust, mingled with indignation, I proceeded towards my lodgings, when I was attracted by a concourse of splendid equipages, before the doors of a great public building, into which a considerable number of people were entering. Prompted by curiosity, I followed the crowd into a splendid hall, where I found a large assemblage of distinguished persons, who, as I soon learned, were holding a meeting to raise funds for some philanthropic society, whose name I forget, but whose object was enlightening the minds or relieving the necessities of people some where at the antipodes. A Royal Duke, as I afterwards learned, presided on the occasion, and a most eloquent address was delivered, in which the orator lauded the philanthropy of his country to the skies, and praised the illustrious individuals there met together, for their munificent liberality. After this, several thousand pounds were subscribed; the meeting broke up, and I observed that as his Royal Highness came forth, a family similar in wretchedness, ignorance and poverty to that I have described, begged his charity. But he had done enough for one day; he had got his name before the public as a Prince of unparalleled humanity, and passed on muttering something about the poor rates. For my part, I honestly confess, that I went away with my respect for that much calumniated maxim, about charity beginning at home, greatly increased.

I look upon this island to be the best study in the Moon, for a politician, a philosopher, and a philanthropist; but the desire to anticipate other travellers who may possibly find their way to that planet and forestall my work, obliges me to curtail it in many interesting particulars, which I may probably supply in a future edition. At present I shall only say, that while this nation pretends to be the freest under the sun, it abounds in a species of slaves more abjectly wretched by far than those of any other country; that while it affects to take precedence of the rest of the world in learning, science and knowledge, a large portion of the people of all ages are in a state of most unparalleled ignorance; that while its power and glory are said to have reached far above all that have gone before it, such are the discontents of the people that the laws can only be executed by a military force; and that finally while boasting of its happiness, it comprises a portion of actual misery, greater than that of any other nation of the Moon or the Earth.*

SONG.

Inscribed to one about to form "a Marriage of Convenience."

BY L. J. CIST.

Lady! Why seek troth to plight
Where not, too, Love is sought?
Never should cold hands unite,
Where hearts are wedded not!
They who join, without Love's flame,
Mock the sacred rite;
They are wedded but in name—
Words will not hearts unite!

Lady! Why thyself wouldst bind
To one, in Hymen's chain,
In whom thou dost not look, to find
Thyself giv'n back again?
Fearest thou, perchance, that none
Else thy hand may sue?—
Doubt not Lady! many an one
Yet shall come to woo!

Lady! thou hadst better far,
With the peaceful dead
Who forever quiet are,
Make thy lonely bed,
Than invoke that fearful curse—
Thine to bind alone—
Promethean-like, but worse,
Chained to living stone!

PROFANE GENESIS.

BY C. B. HAYDEN.

CHAPTER I.

Origin of Idolatry.—We thus find that the nations of antiquity, though ignorant of the Bible, were acquainted with the truths which it reveals, and in their primitive creeds agree with it in acknowledging the existence of one God, possessing the attributes ascribed to him by Christians, and recognizing him as the object of that reverence and worship which the Bible enjoins.

"Father of all! in every age,
In every clime adored,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord."

But how, it will naturally be inquired, did these creeds degenerate from their original pure monotheism, to a corrupt and complicated system of polytheism? To answer this question in all its details, to trace the corrupt stream up to its fountain head, and show each successive source of impurity, may not be practicable. But it will be easy to point out the general source of this fatal change and apostacy, and by showing many of these sources of corruption, throw a collateral light on others. We have seen that the primitive creeds recognized the overruling and superintending agency of God; it was therefore natural to associate with him those secondary agents through which this controlling power was affected, and by which it was manifested. Deity was regarded not merely as "the source and ruler of creation, but also the warm and vivifying essence that became life in the animal and vegetation in the plant; that infused into matter itself the properties of spirit, and gave to spirit, at the same time, the properties of matter, as though neither could exist without the other; and as it bestowed feelings on the soul of man, it lent also, and equally, lustre to the flower at his feet. Every part of existence became an actual ray of divinity." The material objects connected with man, the elements and all natural phenomena influencing his happiness, would be regarded as the material representatives of Him of whose power they were considered the manifestations. Those great elementary powers which under God govern the world, whether the moon and stars, the lesser lights that rule by night, or the sun dispensing light and life by day, or the rain-giving cloud, or the food-producing earth,—all would be considered as typical of their author, and as through them the blessings were sent, so through them thanks were returned to the Divine Giver. But in process of time, the representative character of the emblem was forgotten, and adoration was no longer offered to it as the visible symbol of God, but as God himself; just as the brazen serpent originally preserved in commemoration of the miraculous cures in the wilderness, was afterwards worshipped by the Israelites. In the language of the Book of Wisdom "either fire, or wind, or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven," were considered as "the Gods which govern the world." The thing formed was worshipped for Him who formed it. They changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator. The change once commenced would spread with fearful rapidity—every object, animate and inanimate, having any real or fancied influence over man would become the object of his prayers. Not only would every natural phenomenon and physical object be erected into an independent existence, and be regarded as Gods, but every pain that racked his body, every fear that haunted his imagination would be personified and erected into a Deity. This perversion of symbols and personification of natural objects and events is undoubtedly the most prolific source of paganism in all its protean forms. Accordingly, the heavenly bodies, the elements, and the most prominent natural phenomena and objects known in common to all nations, are common objects of worship to idolatrous nations, while those phenomena and objects confined to particular countries, are locally worshipped in the regions to which they are peculiar. Thus the sun and moon are almost universal subjects of adoration among idolatrous nations. The sun was worshipped as Mithras by the Persians, as Belus by the Assyrians, as Moloch in the form of a calf, typifying the sun or fire, by the Phenecians, as Phré by the Egyptians, as Surya by the Hindoos, as Nahuatzin by the Mexicans and as Sol and Apollo by the classics. The Peruvians also, as is well known, worshipped the sun. The moon was worshipped by the Egyptians as Ioh and Isis, as Chandra by the Hindoos, as Astarte by the Phenecians, and as Luna, Diana and Astarte by the classics. Of the elements, the earth was adored by the classics as Gaia, Ceres and Terra, by the ancient Germans as Hertha, and as Prithivi by the Hindoos. Fire was represented in the classic mythology as Vulcan, in the Egyptian as Phtha, and in the Hindoo as Agni. Neptune, the classic symbol of the sea, was represented by Varuna among the Hindoos, by Hai-Vang among the Chinese. In the east, Kartikeya presides over war, in the west Mars; there the winds are under the dominion of Vayu, here of Eurus; there the thief invokes the aid of Ganesa, here of Mercury; there Cama sways the heart, here the love-inspiring Venus. This parallelism might be carried further between these creeds as well as extended to others, had not the source of the introduction of "strange gods" been sufficiently illustrated. The general adoption of the great elementary powers, and the more prominent natural phenomena by the primitive idolatrous nations, and their subsequent introduction into the derivative creeds show the operation of a common influence. To the deities thus derived common to all, each nation would add others peculiar to itself, originating in its local customs or situation. Thus, from the influence of the Nile upon the agriculture of Egypt, this river plays a prominent part in the mythology of that nation. Similar causes modified the creed of other nations, impressing peculiar characters upon each. Benevolence and gratitude, so natural to the uncorrupted human heart, would see in every favor the gift of some presiding genius. The benefactor, if national, would be placed among the public Penates in the temple; if private, among the guardian Lares of the domestic hearth. Each nation's traditions and national history would thus furnish its creed with its peculiar heroes and demigods. Those animals beneficial to man would, in their symbolical character, be gratefully advanced to a niche in the temple, laying the foundation of that wide-spread animal worship which tainted the creed of so many nations, and which subsequent causes so widely extended. Animals were also worshipped from other causes; thus the Bull, deified among so many nations, from its connection with agriculture was typical of it, and was hence, in different countries, consecrated to those deities believed to preside over this art. Thus, in Egypt, the bull Apis as well as Mnevis was dedicated to Osiris, who, according to their mythology, taught them husbandry. Osiris was emblematical of "the active generating and beneficent force of nature and the elements." The Ram and Serpent were respectively the symbols of Ammon, the great Demiurgos of the Egyptians.

From some fancied resemblance, or as arbitrary symbols, both animals and plants were frequently regarded as typical of natural objects, or consecrated to some national benefactor, frequently regarded, as we have seen, as the representatives of Deity, and hence, in this secondary symbolical character, these animals and plants became the subjects of adoration. The Lotus, from its peculiar method of fructification, was, throughout the east, adopted as emblematical of the "productive power of the waters which spread life and vegetation over the earth." "The Egyptians are said to have represented the pervading spirit or the ruling Providence of the Deity by the black beetle, which frequents the shores of the Mediterranean sea." "It is of the Anchogynous class, and lays its eggs in a ball of dung or other fermentable matter, which it buries in the sand, where the joint operation of heat and moisture matures and vivifies the germs into new insects." The butterfly, from the series of gradations it undergoes, was assumed as the symbol of the soul, "The butterfly, breaking from its torpid chrysalis and mounting in the air, afforded a natural image of the celestial soul bursting from the restraints of matter, and mixing again with its native ether."* This personification and spiritualization of nature would be aided by that warm imaginative character so natural to man in his early stage of civilization. The bards and poets, the first historians and teachers, would introduce into their poems and sagas the national deities in that allegorical dress so natural to the poet, and thus would be gradually formed a system of mythology. In subsequent ages the allegorical and poetical character of these mythic fables would be forgotten, and they would be literally interpreted. Schlegel in his Philosophy of History, ascribes the strong condemnation of Homer and Hesiod by the Greek Philosophers, to their literal interpretation of the mythic theology, which, when thus understood, had a tendency to corrupt and materialize the national religion. Many of these myths, when viewed in their proper signification and apart from their mystic or allegorical character, lose their wild absurdity and revolting cruelty, and become beautiful personifications symbolic of nature. Thus the fable of Chronos or Saturn devouring his children merely signified the consuming power of Time, of which this deity was typical. Adonis is represented in the myth as beloved of Venus, but preferring the pleasures of the chase he was killed by a wild boar. Venus inconsolable for his loss gained the consent of Proserpine, (who, according to Knight, symbolized the heat which, pervading the earth, was the source of its fecundating power,) that Adonis should spend alternately six months with her on earth, and the remaining six in the shades. "Adonis was an oriental title of the Sun, signifying Lord: and the boar supposed to have killed him was the emblem of winter; during which the productive powers of nature being suspended, Venus was said to lament the loss of Adonis until he was again restored to life." The fable "merely signifying the decrease and increase of the productive powers of nature as the Sun retires and advances."† Zeus or Jove was typical of the air or ether. To live under Jove, Sub Jove, is to live exposed to the elements or in the open air. "What is Zeus doing," is the same as "what kind of weather is it." This Deity was regarded as superior to the others, and, as we have seen, it was to him they ascribed the attributes of God.—As frequent occasion will hereafter occur, it is unnecessary here to enlarge upon the allegorical and symbolical character of the ancient Mythologies. ‡Schlegel says, "the old Heathenism had a foundation in truth, and thoroughly examined and rightly understood, would serve for a confirmation of the same:—were it possible, or could we succeed in separating the pure intuition into nature and the simple symbols of nature that constituted the basis of all Heathenism, from the alloy of error, and the incumbrances of fiction, those first hieroglyphical traits of the instinctive science of the first men would not be repugnant to truth and to a true knowledge of nature; but on the contrary, an instinctive image of a freer, purer, more comprehensive and more finished philosophy of life."

From the importance and interest which all nations attach to their early history, the individuals conspicuous in the Nation's annals, the events marking eras in its progress, would stand forth prominently in its Mythology. As Genesis professes to give an account of the origin and early history of the human family, it, if true, must correspond with the traditions and mythic history of the primitive nations. These coincidences, in relation to the belief in one God and his attributes, have been already pointed out: the correspondence in reference to the other subjects treated of in Genesis will be alluded to under their respective heads. So striking is the parallelism, that some have advanced the opinion that ancient Mythology was founded on Scriptural history, of which it was a corruption, disguised and mystified by its allegorical dress.—Cræsius in his "Hebrew Homer," and Williams in his "Homerus," contend that the Illiad is a fabulous and allegorical representation of Scriptural events: that Troy is Jericho, Agamemnon and the Greeks, Joshua and the Israelites, and Nestor is Abraham. Scriptural events have undoubtedly contributed extensively to the formation of the ancient systems of Mythology, but they are probably but secondary sources subsidiary to the primary one, a perversion of symbols, giving rise to a spiritualizing and personifying of nature, which nature-worship is probably the foundation of idolatry. The passage last quoted from Schlegel shows that this opinion has the support of this celebrated German scholar. Sabiism, or the worship of the host of heaven so frequently alluded to in the Scriptures, was most probably the first form of idolatry. It has, with much plausibility, been suggested that fire was originally worshipped as symbolical of the planets, thus laying the foundation of the fire-worship so extensively practised in the East. Calmet quotes from the Desatir, an ancient Persian work, the following passage—"Make figures of all the planets, and deem them proper objects to turn to in worship—that they may convey thy prayers to Mezdam." It will be seen that the planets are not recommended as the direct objects of worship, but merely as the medium of prayer, corresponding to the view already taken. Moses frequently cautions the Israelites against the worship of the host of heaven, and it was probably with the same view that he alluded so frequently to God as the creator of the planetary host, that they might worship the Creator and not the creature. Frequent allusion is made in the Scriptures to the worship of the true God under the form of an image; thus the golden calf made by Aaron at the request of the Israelites, was symbolical of the God who brought them out of the land of Egypt. How natural the identification of the symbol with the object itself, we have lamentable proof in the Romish church, whose image worship, originally merely typical, has degenerated into gross and sensual idolatry. This attempt to show the origin of the ancient systems of Mythology in a common primitive creed corresponding with that of Genesis, may appropriately be concluded with the following confirming quotation from Schlegel's introduction to Prichard's Egyptian Mythology. "In contemplating the religions of the ancient world, so many points of resemblance press upon the observer as immediately to suggest the idea that this agreement of Nations, who in part were far separated and estranged from one another, or who have been strangers time out of mind, may be best attributed to a common origin of their faith or superstition, their sacred customs and laws, in some unknown home and remote antiquity." "The more I search into the ancient history of the world, the more am I convinced that the cultivated nations commenced with a purer worship of the Supreme Being; that the magic influence of Nature upon the imaginations of the human race afterwards produced polytheism, and at length entirely obscured the spiritual conceptions of religion in the belief of the people, whilst the wise men alone preserved the primitive secrets in the sanctuary."

ENDYMION.

BY HENRY B. HIRST,

AUTHOR OF "ISABELLE," "THE BUREAU OF BEOS," &c.

(Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1844, by Henry B. Hirst, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.)

Love gives itself, but is not bought.

Longfellow's Endymion.

I.

Through a deep dell with mossy hemlocks girded—
A dell by many a light-heeled Dryad prest,
Which Latmos' lofty crest
Flung half in shadow—where the red deer herded—
While mellow murmurs shook the forests grey—
Endymion took his way.

II.

Like clustering sunlight fell his yellow tresses,
A purple fillet, scarce confining, bound,
Winding their flow around
A swan-like throat that thrilled to their caresses,
And trembling on a breast that beamed as white
As sea foam in the night.

III.

His fluted tunic swelling, yielding, floated,
Moulded to every motion of his form,
And with the contact warm
Round charms on which the Satyrs might have gloated,
Had he been buskined Nymph; but being man,
They loved him like to Pan.

IV.

His girdle held his pipes—those pipes that clearly
Through Carian meadows mocked the nightingale
When Hesper lit the vale:
And now the youth was faint, though stepping cheerily,
Supported by his shepherd's crook, he strode
Toward his far abode.

V.

Mount Latmos lay before him. Faintly gleaming
A roseate halo from the twilight dim
Hung round its crown. To him
The rough ascent was light, for, far off, beaming,
Orion rose, and Sirius, like a shield,
Shone on the azure field.

VI.

Yet was he faint—faint with fatigue and drooping:
Through the long day unwearyed he had kept
Watch, while his cattle slept;
And now the sun was like a falcon stooping
Down the red West, and Night from out her caves
Walked, Christ-like! o'er the waves.

VII.

And from the South—the yellow South! all glowing
With blindest beauty, came a gentle wind
Breathed from the lips of Ind,
Which, like an unseen vapor, lightly flowing Athwart his brow, cooled his hot brain and stole
Like nectar to his soul.

VIII.

Endymion blessed the breeze! his bosom swelling
While his parched lips drank in the luscious draught;
His eyes even as he quaffed
Brightening; his stagnant blood again upwelling
From his warm heart, and freshened, as with sleep,
He trod the rocky steep.

IX.

At last he gained the top, and crowned with splendor,
The Moon, arising from the Latmian sea,
Steps over the heavenly lea,
Tinging her misty glances, meek and tender
As a young virgin's, o'er his marble brow
That glistened with their glow.

X.

Beside him gushed a spring that in a hollow
Had made a crystal lake, by which he stood
To cool his heated blood—
His blood yet fevered, for the fierce Apollo
Throughout the long, the hot, the Tropic day,
Had kissed him with his ray.

XI.

Beside the water, like a mirror gleaming,
A willow stood in Dian's rising rays,
And from the woodland ways,
Feathered, lance-like leaves were gently streaming
Along the lakelet's face, their emerald tips
Kissing its silver lips.

XII.

And still the moon arose, her lustre hovering,
Dove-like, above t' horizon. Like a queen
She walked in light between
The stars, her lovely hand-maids, gently covering
The vale, the world, the mountain and the plain
With glory showered like rain.

XIII.

Endymion watched her rise, his bosom burning
With princely thoughts, for though a shepherd's son,*
He knew that Fame was won
By high aspirings, and a lofty yearning
From the green verdure of his boyish days,
Made his deeds those of praise.

XIV.

Like her's, his course was tranquil: he had gathered
By slow degrees the glorious, golden lore
Hallowing his native shore;
And when at dewy even his flock was tethered,
He read the stars, and drank, as from a stream,
Great knowledge from their gleam.

XV.

And still the moon arose, and now the water
Gleamed, like the golden Galaxy, star on star,
And down, deep down, afar
In the Lasulian lake Latona's daughter
Imaged, reclined, breathing forth light that rose,
Like mists at evening close.

XVI.

Endymion yet was heated: sudden turning,
He loosed the clusters of his hyacinth hair
And shook them on the air;
Laid down his pipes; unbound his girdle, burning
The while with August heat; his tunic now
He drew above his brow.

XVII.

There, in the moonlight radiantly gleaming,
Lovely as morn he stood; the swelling veins
Seeming like purple stains
Along his limbs, which, like a God's, were streaming Serenest light; for Dian's glances fell
Around him like a spell.

XVIII.

And now her purple zenith reaching, brighter—
Lovelier than ever shone the Queen of Night
Where, trembling at the sight
Of one whose perfect limbs were rosier, whiter
Than Indian pearl, or even her bosom's snow,
She paused and gazed below.

XIX.

Slowly Endymion bent, the light Elysian
Flooding his figure. Kneeling on one knee
He loosed his sandals, lea
And lake and woodland glittering on his vision,
A fairy land, all bright and beautiful
With Venus at her full.

XX.

His pearly feet gleaming in emerald grasses;
The moon-ray's trembling on his whiter neck;
His breast without a speck;
While the dim woods around, the mossy masses
Of rudest rock, the bronzed and Titan trees
Looking on Latmian leas,

* Keats makes him a Prince, when he was a peasant.

XXI.

Took from his light a darkness dim and holy;
 For like a marbled God, the shepherd youth
 Stood in his simple ruth!
 At last, with gentle steps retiring slowly,
 He paused beside a rude, rough, laurel brake
 A bow-shot from the lake.

XXII.

White-footed, then he passed the crimson clover,
 Like a swift meteor gleaming on the night,
 Streaming in silver light,
 His arms uplifted and his hands flung over
 His noble head;—a single spring he gave,
 Then flashed beneath the wave.

XXIII.

Down as he sank, a flood of yellow glory
 Shot from the moon, as if the moon had dropped,
 And on the mountain stopped;
 And then the moon itself grown grey and hoary
 As though with age, slid slowly 'neath a cloud
 That wrapped it like a shroud.

XXIV.

Then, like a ghost of some unwedded maiden
 On whose pale lips life seemed to strive with death,
 Hushing, as 'twere her breath,
 A glorious figure wreathed with vapor laden
 With delicate odors, stood with yearning eyes,
 To see Endymion rise.

XXV.

A crescent on her brow—a brow whose brightness
 Darkened the crescent; and a neck and breast
 On which young Love might rest
 Breathless with passion; and an arm whose whiteness
 Shadowed the lily's snow; a lip the bee
 Might dream in, and a knee

XXVI.

Round as a period; while her white feet glancing Between her sandals shed a twilight light
 Athwart the purple night.
 Cycling her waist a zone, whose gems were dancing
 With rainbow rays, pressed with a perfect grace,
 Her bosom's ivory space.

XXVII.

Endymion rose and on the lakelet lying
 Flang out his arms, sank, rose and sank again;
 Pale Dian in her pain
 (For it was Dian's self who watched him,) sighing
 Gazing upon him, and her breath came short
 And heavy from her heart.

XXVIII.

She saw not Eros, who on rosy pinion
 Hung 'neath the willow's shadow—did not feel
 His subtle, searching steel
 Threading her very soul; the youth's dominion
 Circled her breast, and what to her was heaven
 If from Endymion riven?

XXIX.

Nothing; for love flowed in her, like a river,
 Flooding the banks of Wisdom; and her soul,
 Losing its self-control,
 Waved with a vague, uncertain, tremulous quiver;
 And like a lily in the storm, at last
 She bent to passion's blast.

XXX.

She knelt; and thus to awful Jove complaining,
 Poured her deep voice upon the night's still ear;—
 "Father, dread Father, hear!
 Look down upon thy daughter; see her waning
 And fading as the night before the day—
 Let not thy child decay!

XXXI.

"Hear me, O! hear me, Thou, Who swayest the thunder!
 I must possess Endymion or I die.
 O! hearken to my cry—
 Hearken, or I shall perish!—Never was wonder
 So great as he; white-breasted, like a God,
 He treads the emerald sod!"

XXXII.

A star shot from the cope of heaven, weaving
 A myriad rubies through the azure air,—
 The answer to her prayer!
 Then rising from her knees, her bosom heaving,
 Her lips adamp with dew, while through her frame
 Discoursed a tingling flame.

XXXIII.

She gazed again upon Endymion, bending
 Toward him from the willow's lowest limb;
 Her radiant eyes as dim
 As twilight when the night is slowly blending
 Shadow with shadow, and her heaving breast
 Throbbing with sweet unrest.

XXXIV.

She waved her hand, and straightway leaped a fountain
 Showering dissolving pearls, and round the hill,
 Beside the murmuring rill,
 About the lake—the lawn that crowned the mountain,
 From the cleft rocks and in the waving bowers,
 Arose a myriad flowers.

XXXV.

First sprang a leaf, then, stems and limbs succeeding Each upon each around the grassy ways;
 Then, bursting in a blaze,
 Budded the ruby rose and amaranth bleeding;
 While tressed hyacinths and violets blue,
 Sparkled with crystal dew.

XXXVI.

And there were lilies, white and crimson-spotted;
 Tube-roses snowy as a moon-lit cloud;
 Blue-bells that tolled aloud,
 With fragrant voices, music; poppies dotted
 And flaked with fiery gold, and acronite
 Alive with purple light.

XXXVII.

And there were vines rose clustering o'er the bushes,
 Circling the lawn with interwoven green,
 Which, with a shining sheen
 From blossoms roseate as Aurora's blushes,
 Filled up the picture, forming from the spot
 A kind of flowering grot.

XXXVIII.

There was the vault above, the breathless azure,
 Dispersed and dotted with its countless lights;
 The lawn, a sight of sights!
 Whose mossy carpets seemed a monarch's treasure
 Glowing with blossoming fires; the sleeping lake:
 The vined and laurelled brake;

XXXIX.

All standing, like a crown upon the giant,
Titanic hill; the Goddess like a gleam
Of light in Poet's dream;
The swimming youth, whose beauty seemed defiant
Of Saturn's touch, floating like one asleep,
Along the rippling deep.

XL.

The shepherd sought the shore, Dian retreating
Deeper in shadow as he neared the strand.
He touched the mossy land
And stood erect, when, with a heavenly greeting,
The flowers unclosed their buds, and fragrance meet
For Gods rose at his feet.

XLI.

Around the mount it rose, an odor fairer
Than ever mortal flowers had known before—
From the lake's lillied shore—
From the thick grass—diviner, richer, rarer
Than even the mellow light, its vapory chains
Fettering his throbbing veins

XLII.

With bliss so sweet, 'twas pain. He dreamed him dying,
Feeling a God was nigh, yet could not see
Bright Dian, for the tree
Shadowed her still, nor could he hear her sighing
For the low ripple of the lake that played Adown the grassy glade.

XLIII.

Then, like the music of a pipe low uttered
When the dim-day is drawing to its close,
Floating around him, flows
A cadence, gentle as though it were muttered
A mile or more away,—“Endymion, why—
Why hast thou sought mine eye?”

XLIV.

He turned amazed and saw the fountain leaping,
The myriad flowers, but Dian saw he not,
For darkness veiled the spot;
While all the while the fragrant scent was steeping
His brain in luscious languor, leading him
Toward Lethe dark and dim.

XLV.

Then sheeted shadows of old stories, buried
Long in his memory, weird, and wan, and pale,
Rose, and with solemn wail
Told how of Old were demons, who had hurried
At night from blackest caves, with spells to win
Man's erring soul to sin.

XLVI.

He turned to fly, but feared the demon's anger
And paused; then knelt, and murmuring a prayer,
Rose with a trembling air
And turned to fly again; but now the languor
That bound his limbs had so oppressive grown,
He stood like rooted stone.

XLVII.

Well over swell it rose as though the blossoms
Breathed out their very lives—swell over swell
In mist along the dell,
Pheaved, like odorous sighs from maidens' bosoms;
While, like a bark, Endymion stood embayed
In fragrance fairy made.

XLVIII.

Dian looked on: she saw her spells completing,
And sighing, bade the sweetest nightingale
That ever in Carian vale
Sang to her charms, rise and with softest greeting,
Woo from its mortal dreams and thoughts of clay
Endymion's soul away.

XLIX.

Endymion wondering, struggled; never dreaming
What hushed his senses—when a burst of song
Swept like a stream, along
The enchanted air, flooding the lakelet gleaming
With liquid light, and sinking in his ears
Till his eyes swam with tears.

L.

He saw no more; those bright orbs shut: entrancing,
Dim, indistinct, but loveliest shadows slid
Beneath each fringed lid!
Music was in his heart, his pulses dancing,
Like Nereids to a shell; and violet sleep Took him in gentlest keep.

LI.

A moment pausing, in its passing sinking,
He lay in dreams along the odorous blooms,
When, from the willow's glooms,
Her rosy zone unbound, her large eyes drinking
Rapturous joy, with softest love entranced,
Dian in light advanced.

LII.

Like the freed soul when death's last pang is over,
Standing contemplating the breathless clay
Before she soars away
Through starry spheres, so Dian o'er her lover,
Wreathed with the mist, purpureally bright,
Stood, trembling with delight.

LIII.

Endymion stirred; his bosom swelled, for near it
His heaving heart averred there stood the one
He thence should love alone;
And though his lips were moveless, still his spirit
Spoke with a lute-like voice ringing and clear
To her secretest ear.

LIV.

“Divinest Dian, lily-breasted Dian!
Look down on me and bless me with thy love,
Thou! that hast round me wove
Such heavenly dreams, that though a simple scion
Of one thy radiant peers may deem a clod,
I seem to grow a God!”

LV.

She glanced above; the curious stars seemed brighter,
Peering with laughing eyes; and whispers crept
From where the wood-lands slept;
The flowrets shook; the very night grew lighter;
The lake seemed smiling at her, 'till her frame
Tingled and blushed with shame.

LVI.

She waved her rosy fingers; gently welling
Rose from the lake, the fountain and the ground,
A mist which soared around,
Shrouding the scene, flowing and floating, swelling
In fitful forms, wave over wave, on high Spirally to the sky.

LVII.

Orange and amethyst, emerald and yellow,
 Crimson and violet, deep and dimly blue
 As heaven's delicious hue,
 It rose; and then a cadence sweet and mellow
 Swept from it like a lark,—“unveil thine eyes, Endymion—love, arise!”

LETTERS OF PLINY THE YOUNGER.

FISH STORY; CHRISTIANS, &c.

(Translated for the Soc. Lit. Mass.)

Phil. Howard.

TO CANINIUS.

I lately chanced to hear a true story, which is very like a fiction, and worthy of your own playful and romantic imagination. I heard it at the supper table, when many wonderful tales were told by various persons present. The story is well attested—but what cares a poet for authority? yet my informant's word is a sufficient voucher even for the most scrupulous historian. There is on the coast of Africa a colony called Hippos; and near it a small navigable lake, with an estuary proceeding from it like a river, through which the sea advances, or recedes with the advancing or receding tide. To this lake persons of every age resort to fish, sail or swim, as gain or pleasure urges; and especially boys, who come to seek diversion here in play time. Among these, emulation in swimming runs high; and he is victor who leaves both the shore and his competitors far behind. In one such contest, a certain boy, more intrepid than the rest, ventured forth far in advance of his comrades. Here he was met by a dolphin, which played round him in every direction, swimming sometimes before, sometimes behind, and sometimes on either side. At length the fish passed under and took him on his back, then replaced him in the water, and then taking him up again, first carried the trembling boy out into the deep, but afterwards returning, restored him to the land and to his wondering companions. The fame of this incident spreads through the colony; and crowds assembling, gaze at the boy as a prodigy, and inquire, hear, and in turn, relate his wondrous adventure. Next day they blockade the shore, watching anxiously the sea or whatever resembled it.* The boys swim as usual, and among them our hero, but less boldly than before. The dolphin re-appears at his previous hour, and again approaches the boy, who, with his comrades, scrambles to the shore in great alarm. The dolphin, as if inviting their return, leaps from the water, dives, rolls over and displays various amusing gambols and fantastic evolutions. A similar scene was exhibited the next and the third and many successive days, till these hardy sea-bred boys began to be ashamed of their fears. They approach him therefore, swim round him, and speak to him. At length they venture to touch him, and then, emboldened by his gentleness, play with him familiarly. Foremost among these is our hero, who swimming up to him, scrambles on his back, and is borne about over the lake by his sea friend, who he thinks has learned to recognize and love him, and whom he loves warmly in return. Neither fears or is feared, and confidence and kindness increase on both sides. Other boys accompany them, swimming on either hand, giving advice and encouragement. And strange to tell, another dolphin attended the first, but as a companion and spectator merely, for he neither acted like him, nor permitted such familiarities, but came and went with his companion as the boys did with theirs. It appears farther (what is hardly credible, but as true as the rest) that this dolphin, the boys' playmate and friend, suffered himself to be drawn out upon the beach,* and waxing hot and dry on the sand, would roll back into the water. It also appears that Octavius Avitus, the proconsul's legate, moved by some weak superstition, poured ointment over him as he lay; on which the dolphin, not used to such civilities, and disliking the strange odor, bolted hastily into the deep; nor re-appeared for many days, when he came back apparently sick and dispirited. His health and strength returned however, and with them his frolicsome mood and wonted kind offices. Meanwhile, governors from the neighboring provinces, attended by their suites, came to see the wondrous sight; and their protracted visits seriously impaired the means of this small commonwealth: and at length the place itself, once quiet and sequestered, became the scene of crowds and tumults. To remedy these evils, secret orders were given that the dolphin should be killed. In what a sublime and pathetic elegy will you celebrate his death! Yet the tale needs no addition or embellishment, but requires merely that the truth be fully told.

* “Prospectant mare et si quid est mare simile”—an affected phrase, referring doubtless to the lake.

Farewell.

* The dolphin of the ancients appears to have been what we call a porpoise,—an animal belonging not properly to the fishes, but to the mammalia, all which have lungs constructed for breathing atmospheric air; and therefore the story of this dolphin's having lain upon the beach without inconvenience is not absolutely impossible, however improbable it may be deemed.

TO THE EMPEROR.

It is part of my religion, my lord, to refer all questions of difficulty to you; for who can better resolve my doubts or instruct my ignorance? I have never been present when christians were tried, and therefore know neither the character of the offence nor the proper measure of punishment. I have deliberated much whether to make any distinction of ages, or to deal with those of tenderest years, as with the more robust; whether pardon should be offered to repentance, or whether return from error should profit him nothing who has once been a christian; whether the name itself detached from guilt, or guilt cohering with the name, is to be punished. Meantime, with respect to those brought before me as christians, I have pursued the following method. I inquired of them whether they were christians; if they confessed it, I repeated the question a second and a third time, threatening punishment; and if they persisted, I ordered them to be led forth. For I did not doubt that, whatever such confession might imply, their perverse and inflexible obstinacy certainly merited punishment. There were others possessed with the same madness, whom, because they are Roman citizens, I have determined to send to the capitol. Meantime, many classes of men have incurred the same guilt, for in this, as in other cases, the vice is diffused by opposition and debate. A bill of accusations has been preferred anonymously, containing the names of many who denied that they were or had ever been christians, to prove which, repeating after me, they invoked the gods, and kneeling before your image, which, for that purpose I had ordered to be placed among the statues of the deities, they worshipped with wine and frankincense, and, moreover, blasphemed Christ;—none of which things, it is said, can they ever be compelled to do who are christians in reality. I therefore thought it proper to discharge them. Some of those designated by the informer first confessed themselves christians and then denied it; others said that they had been formerly, but had since ceased to be, some three years before, others still earlier, and a few as much as twenty years back. All these worshipped your image and the statues of the gods, and also cursed Christ. They affirmed, however, that their crime or error consisted solely in this, that they were accustomed to assemble on a stated day before light, and among themselves alternately, to chant a hymn to Christ as to a god,* obliging themselves by oath, not to any crime, but to avoid theft, robbery and adultery, and never to break their faith, or fail to restore a pledge when demanded. These rites ended, they would disperse, and afterwards reassemble to take food, promiscuously indeed, but inoffensively; and even this they have ceased to do since my edict, in which, by your direction, their conventicles were prohibited. In this uncertainty, I deemed it necessary to force the truth even by tortures from two maids called deaconesses;* but I discovered nothing but a depraved and excessive superstition, and therefore, delaying the prosecution, I hastened to consult you. The subject indeed appears worthy of consultation, especially when the number of persons accused is considered; for many of every rank and of both sexes have already been and will be endangered by such accusations. Nor has the distemper pervaded cities alone, but villages and even country neighborhoods have been infected. Yet it would seem that the evil is not irremediable, since it appears that the temples, once almost desolate, begin to be frequented again, and their solemn-services resumed though long disused, and victims every where sold, of which, till recently, scarce a purchaser could be found. And hence it is easy to conceive what a multitude might be reclaimed if a place were given to repentance.

* "Carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem."

THE REPLY.

You have pursued the proper course, my Secundus, in declining the cases of those brought before you as christians; for no judicial rule can be given having a certain definite scope and applicable universally. Make no inquisition for them: if brought before you and convicted, let them be punished; provided, however, that if any deny themselves christians, and make it manifest in actual deed, that is, by offering prayers to our gods, they shall obtain pardon by repentance, whatever their forepast conduct may have been. For the nameless informer, let no charges made anonymously be heard in any criminal trial; for the precedent is most pernicious, and belongs not to our age.†

* "— ex duabus ancillis quæ ministræ dicebantur."

† In the first book of Tertullian's Apology, amid much stern and bitter declamation, he thus comments on this rescript of Trajan.—"But we find inquisition against us forbidden; for when Pliny governed a province, he condemned certain christians to death and attainted others of rank, and then, alarmed by the number, inquired of the emperor what he should do with the rest; declaring that, besides their obstinate refusal to sacrifice, he had discovered nothing in regard to their religion, except that they held meetings before day, at which they sung to Christ as to a god, and bound themselves to observe a discipline forbidding murder, adultery, fraud, falsehood and other crimes. Then Trajan wrote back that this sect should not be searched out, yet punished if brought before him. What a sentence! contradictory by a sort of necessity! He forbids inquisition, as against innocent men, yet directs them to be punished as if guilty. He is both clement and cruel, at once spares and persecutes. Why incur inevitable blame by such a dilemma! If guilty, why not search them out? If innocent, why not discharge them?"

Notices of New Works.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF WINTHROP MACKWORTH
PRAED: now first collected; By Rufus W. Griswold—
H. G. Langley, N. York, pp. 187, 12mo.

We confess to a partiality for what in Charles the Second's reign, were called "copies of verses." It often happens that in poetry, as in affairs, the "attempt confounds the deed;" in other words, the more effort the less success, the greater the design the more ineffective the execution. Some of the most clever stanzas in English Literature have been the least premeditated. We are not advocating that easy writing which has been justly called the hardest reading; but simply maintain that when by culture and native powers, a bard is fitted for his vocation, the more freely he yields his mind to the inspiration of scenes and events, the happier often will be the result. There has been enough of formal and artistical verve of late, to make a volume of off-hand rhyme very acceptable. This is the characteristic of Praed, whose numerous occasional poems have just been collected and arranged by that indefatigable literary purveyor, Rufus W. Griswold, and published in an elegant volume, by Henry G. Langley of New York. Every one is familiar with Praed's vivacious epistles, half-friivolity, and half-sentiment, yet withal so very natural. To these are added "Lillian" and three or four other fanciful poems, remarkable for curious invention, and overflowing both with humor and pathos. It is not requisite for a reader to be either imaginative or enthusiastic, to admire Praed. He appeals to our every-day capacities, and entertains the man of the world not less than the romantic school girl. Of this work, the New York Tribune, whose feuilleton, as it were, often contains what is well worth adopting, thus highly speaks:

"The Editor and Publisher have here done the public a real service. Especially those who with us were boys fifteen to twenty years ago and in their leisure hours, hung enraptured over the pages of the British Reviews and Magazines, then radiant with the scintillations of Genius from the pens of MACAULAY, JEFFREY, LAMB, HUNT, HOOD, HAZLITT, PRAED, MAGINN, Mrs. HEMANS, Miss LONDON, &c. and whose memory still treasures the delight with which they first quaffed the sparkling wit of 'Lillian,' the 'Every-Day Character,' 'Palinodia,' 'Twenty-Eight and Twenty-Nine,' &c., &c., will thank them fervently. In the way of epigrammatic point and richness, pleasant satire, and quiet humor, varied by occasional flashes of true poetic feeling, English Literature has scarcely a superior to Praed.

"Of Praed personally little can be added to what his readers will have inferred from his Poems. He was born in or near London, of an opulent and respectable family; he was first educated at Eton, with John Moultrie, H. N. Coleridge, and other boys of future eminence, where he was principal editor of 'The Etonian,' one of the best College Magazines ever published. From Eton he went to Cambridge, where he ran a brilliant career, winning many of the honors of that renowned University. On leaving Trinity College he was connected with Macaulay and other young men of rare talent in the conduct of 'Knight's Quarterly Magazine.' After the discontinuance of that work, he wrote for the New Monthly and the Annuals, and was in Parliament, and deemed a rising member for some years before his death, which occurred July 15th, 1839. His age was about 40, and he died a bachelor. No collection of his works has ever been made in England, owing, we understand, to some dispute respecting the copy-right; and to the industry and taste of Mr. Griswold is the public indebted for a most delightful book, of which the materials were widely scattered, and only to be obtained with difficulty. Even now he informs us that there are probably as many Poems circulating privately among his friends as he has been able to glean from all the periodicals in which they, from time to time, appeared."

After quoting "School and School Fellows," "Eutopia" and "Palinodia," the writer adds:

"And now an old favorite in a different vein, to show that Praed could write otherwise than in epigrams. We think the following are not generally understood to be his by those who admire them:

TIME'S CHANGES.

"I saw her once—so freshly fair
That, like a blossom just unfolding,
She opened to Life's cloudless air;
And Nature joyed to view its moulding:
Her smile, it haunts my memory yet—
Her cheek's fine hue divinely glowing—
Her rosebud mouth—her eyes of jet—
Around on all their light bestowing:
Oh! who could look on such a form,
So nobly free, so softly tender,
And darkly dream that earthly storm
Should dim such sweet, delicious splendor!
For in her mien, and in her face,
And in her young step's fairy lightness,
Nought could the raptur'd gazer trace
But Beauty's glow, and Pleasure's brightness.

"I saw her twice—an altered charm—
But still of magic, richest, rarest,
Than girlhood's talisman less warm,
Though yet of earthly sights the fairest:
Upon her breast she held a child,
The very image of its mother;
Which ever to her smiling smiled—
They seemed to live but in each other:—
But matron cares, or lurking woe,
Her thoughtless, sinless look had banished,
And from her cheek the roseate glow
Of girlhood's bulmy rosy had vanished;
Within her eyes, upon her brow,
Lay something softer, fonder, deeper,
As if in dreams some visioned woe
Had broke the Elysium of the sleeper.

"I saw her thrice—Fate's dark decree
In widow's garments had arrayed her,
Yet beautiful she seemed to be,
As even my reveries portrayed her;
The glow, the glance had passed away,
The sunshine, and the sparkling glitter;
Still, though I noted pale decay,
The retrospect was scarcely bitter;
For, in their place a calmness dwelt,
Serene, subduing, soothing, holy;
In feeling which, the bosom felt
That every louder mirth is folly—
A pensiveness, which is not grief,
A stillness—as of sunset streaming—
A fairy glow on flower and leaf,
Till earth looks like a landscape dreaming.

"A last time—and unmoved she lay,
Beyond Life's dim, uncertain river,
A glorious mould of fading clay,
From whence the spark had fled for ever!
I gazed—my breast was like to burst—
And, as I thought of years departed,
The years wherein I saw her first,
When she, a girl, was tender-hearted—
And, when I mused on later days,
As moved she in her matron duty,
A happy mother, in the blaze
Of ripened hope, and sunny beauty—
I felt the chill—I turned aside—
Bleak Desolation's cloud came o'er me,
And Being seemed a troubled tide,
Whose wrecks in darkness swam before me!"

The general resemblance between this and a much and deservedly admired song of Haynes Bayly is almost too striking to be a mere coincidence.

dence. That great Lyrist, however, deserves no little praise for his exquisite condensation and embodiment of these lines of Præd. Besides the general similarity, there are some features of special resemblance.*

Another work issued by the same publishers, commends itself on different grounds from Præd's. We allude to the Poems of Mrs. Ellis. The Prose works of this lady are very popular, and among the most useful of the day. The present and last volume comprises her fugitive poetry. Her muse is neither bold nor original, but pure, religious and calm. Her admirers will greet these effusions with cordiality.

SEATSFIELD.

"Life in the New World," translated from the German, by Hebbe and Mackay. New-York, J. Winchester & Co. 1844.

Since the notice of this Germanico-American author in our last number, we have had a better opportunity of forming a correct estimate of his merits. They seem to have been greatly overrated; and some of our journals have misled the public taste. It requires considerable patience to read some portions of his American sketches; there is a general indistinctness in his narrations, and a confusion in his dialogues. We have already stated, that there was consistency in his characters; but he is almost entirely destitute of the high but necessary faculty of grouping the various parts and personages of the scenes which he undertakes to portray. Many of the incidents which he uses as characteristic of American Society, are not only not new to us, but have been told and retold, in prose and verse, and only; often in far better style. This is particularly the case with some of his hits at the Yankees. Who has not heard of the impossibility of getting a direct answer from Jonathan? Many a better illustration of this has been given than in Seatsfield; and yet the evasions of the Yankee, whom Howard and Richards met one night, in the West, have been quoted as something superior. There is a story of a Yankee pedler, who hired a negro to let a box fall on his leg, that the pedler might recommend his unrivalled salve, by instantly curing it. The pretended groans of cuffie and the whole scene are ridiculous, not ludicrous. This same pedler is to be found in one of the works of the distinguished Southern Novelist, Mr. Simms. In "Guy Rivers," he is called Jared Bunce; in Seatsfield, Jared Buxell—scarcely a change of name. Besides, Bunce and Buxell both cheated the good people with their worthless coffee-pots, and, by a strange coincidence, assign the same reason for their worthlessness. (Life in New World, part 2, p. 64-5. Guy Rivers, vol. 1, 3rd edition, p. 71.)

Seatsfield is said to be a "native American." He is certainly much indebted to our native writers, and a greater part of his skill is shown in destroying the traces of those upon whom he has laid his hands. He borrows the general spirit of his sketches of the early French settlers in the S. West, from Judge Hall's popular writings. He is essentially light and sketchy, not creative. There is some forced impersonation in his descriptions. But they remind us of the liberty which former European writers have taken in the wild forests of America, when they wished to indulge their imaginations in their Rousseau-like admiration of Nature.

Our public have never been so favorably prepared for the advent of any Literary worthy, as that of Seatsfield; except à propos reception of the "American Notes," the public admiration of the former is likely to be checked, if it was in the case of the latter, though from far different reasons; unless the remaining works of Seatsfield should greatly enhance his claims.

"North and South," by the same author, has been translated by J. T. Headley, Esq., and either has been, or soon will be issued. From what we know of Mr. H., we are prepared for a better translation than that of "Life in the New World," which a friend of ours denied that it was ever written in German.

YOUNG KATE; OR THE RESCUE.

By a Kentuckian. Harper and Brothers. 1844.

We do not pretend to judge of this work solely upon its abstract merits; for we would not, if we could, destroy that medium of State pride and respect for its excellent author, through which we view it. The scene is laid principally in Western Virginia, which was then comparatively unsettled. The various classes of its inhabitants are well depicted, and the romantic and sublime scenery of the New River graphically described. The wild hunter, the Virginia gentleman, the land-shark, the murderous squatter, the counterfeiter, the delicate maiden, the daring youth, are all portrayed and linked together by chains of pleasing fiction. The work by no means lacks incident, but there is great want of artistical skill in interweaving and combining—in plot and counterplot.

Mr. Ballenger, a broken merchant of Alexandria, retires to his wild lands in Kanawha, which his debtors have given him as his security. Of their value he is entirely ignorant; and Isaac Foster, a general land agent, much confided in, forms a deep plot to defraud him of them, and at the same time, pays his addresses to an only daughter, betrothed to a young Virginian, then in Europe. Foster is in league with a gang of counterfeiters, who greatly annoy an honest pedler, that sold his wares in that section. The faithful Ben Bramble, a hunter, tries to excite Mr. B.'s suspicions of Foster, but Foster's insinuating address in great measure allays them. Before Mr. B., however, closes the desired contract with Foster, he despatches his son into the neighboring State of Kentucky, with letters to some of his friends, to inquire into the value of his extensive lands. He is hospitably entertained by a Mr. Hugh Terrell, (who, we learn from the Louisville Journal, is Hubbard Taylor, one of our own ancestry,) from whom he obtains much valuable information. He ascertains that the value of the lands is enormous, makes sales, which greatly relieve the pressing necessities of his father, and elate with joy, returns to his home, unconscious of the danger that had threatened his life, from one of Foster's baffled emissaries. In the mean time Foster's suit is rejected; the pedler becomes still more troublesome, is suddenly slain near the residence of Mr. Ballenger, and the circumstances are so strong that Mr. B. is arrested and imprisoned for trial, at Lewisburg. His daughter left alone and disconsolate, wanders on the brink of the river, where her shoe is found, and at the same time her bonnet seen floating on the stream. The faithful negro, old Tom, a favorite with the reader, is almost crazed with grief. He dives in the relentless waters until he is exhausted, but finds no body. William returns, learns this dread intelligence, hastens to the arms of his father. He is soon on his way to old Virginia, where he employs Mr. Wickham and other eminent counsel. The time for the trial arrives; and the prisoner is arraigned. The witnesses are sworn and examined and the fate of the accused seems sealed. Just then, the lost daughter rushes into the arms of her father; and soon after, she is folded in the embrace of her constant lover. The character and designs of Foster are exposed—he is branded as the murderer. He had instigated a reckless, but not abandoned youth, to strike the honest pedler, for charging him with circulating counterfeit money. The young man was drunk; Foster killed the pedler and imputing it to the blows of this youth, drove him by his fears to take refuge across the Atlantic. He there meets with Victor Carrington—but has first discovered his own innocence. His tale is told, the two hasten back together and arrive just in time to rescue the prisoner. Ben Bramble was one of the witnesses and resolved to hunt, with his companion, on their way to Lewisburg. His favorite hound, young Kate, much devoted to Miss Ballenger, discovers the opening to a den. Attracting the attention of her master, he peeps in and descries the long lost maiden. Foster had seized and dragged her to this den of infamy; but all his efforts to bend her to his will proved abortive. Firm as virtue she defied his arts and his threats, and his promises to save her father. Measures are taken to secure the gang of counterfeiters; but the true hearted hunter is killed in the conflict. Matilda now rescued flies to her father. He is saved. Foster hangs himself. William marries the daughter of an excellent neighbor to whom he has been long devoted. Young Kate is fondly caressed and a monument erected to the memory of her master, which is daily wept over by the blooming bride of Victor Carrington.

The wild lands rapidly appreciate in value and they are enabled to enjoy all the pleasures and comforts of well-applied wealth.

The author is a man of great sincerity, which is displayed in his work; his style is not particularly adapted to novel writing; but it is free from affectation and pretension. For us to notice at any length the multitude of novels issuing from the press would be endless—and we can only make an exception, when something particularly claims our attention, as in the one before us. Its merits will be appreciated by the reader; its faults we will leave to the blank page upon which we noted them.

LETTERS ON THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE, the Smithsonian Legacy, the Fine Arts, &c. By John Carroll Breat. Washington, J. & G. S. Gideon, 1844.

The subjects of these letters are exceedingly interesting and important, and we are glad to find them taken up by one who has treated them so well. The letters first appeared in the National Intelligencer, but are now collected in a neat pamphlet, for which the author will please accept our thanks.

HARPER & BROTHERS: New-York, 1844.

OBSERVATIONS IN EUROPE, principally in France and Great Britain. By JOHN P. DURBIN, D.D., President of Dickinson College—2 vols.

Some one has said of this work, "what's new in it is not good; and what's good is not new." Whilst we may not go thus far, and are willing to say that much entertaining reading may be found in it, yet we do greatly distrust the observations of any man, who can pursue the blind and intolerant course lately persisted in and defended by Dr. Durbin, in the General Conference of the Methodist Church. Such men see but one way, and very often through an entirely perverted medium. To show how far his prejudices and pre-conceived ideas have swayed his mind, would require an intimate acquaintance abroad and a close comparison with other travellers; but we utterly discard "the spectacles" of any traveller who makes before our eyes the exhibition that this one has done so recently. Dr. Durbin, unassisted even by a father's benediction, has educated and elevated himself to his present position. This we can appreciate and commend. But we certainly urge him to a little more Christian sense and worldly wisdom. Among the contents of the volumes are a description of the fortifications of Paris, with a plan; and a curious French love-letter of the Great Franklin. There are also views of Public Edifices, and other embellishments.

THE POEMS AND BALLADS OF SCHILLER. Translated from the German: with a life.

BY SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON.

Our Public are greatly indebted to the translator and to the enterprising publishers, for this very neat and attractive volume. The obligation to Sir Edward rests principally upon the fact of making a translation. His style is not the poetical, though so rich and flowing in the general estimation. How little does it suit Lyrics and Ballads! Not but that he can write, and has written some very pretty lines, and might even perpetrate a fair Lyric or Ballad; but the characteristics of his style are not adapted to such compositions. There is a certain kind of swelling, declamatory poetry which it suits, and there is some such in Schiller;—

but he can not catch and translate the dreamy and subtle spirituality of the German, and make it speak as Schiller did. To sympathise with an author—even to feel as he does—will not enable one to translate him. That sympathy and feeling must have a similar vent and be able to assume a similar poetical garb. Merivale, without the taste and smoothness of Bulwer, has far surpassed him in the truth and nature of his translations. Every specimen of Merivale that we have seen is superior to the corresponding one of Sir Edward. But the former has only translated a part; the latter the whole.

The Life is and must be interesting; for Schiller's life was Poetry and Romance. But the one before us is written in a half novel, half biographical style, which it may have been difficult for the author to avoid; but which is by no means commendable.

For a just appreciation of Schiller's scepticism and philosophy, we would rather take Schlegel than Sir Edward, whose mode of talking about "Destiny" and other matters, is by no means after the true spirit.

The translator has placed the latter poems first, because he did not wish to give to the productions of the undeveloped poet the place of distinction. We wonder he didn't commence the memoir with his Death and come on down to his boyhood and birth. Had we space we would make extracts and compare them with Merivale's.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

LETTER IV.

Views in regard to an extension of the privileges of Copyright in the United States, to the citizens of other countries, in a Letter to the Hon. Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, member of Congress. By the author of "The Yemassee," "The Kinsmen," "Richard Hurdia," "Damsel of Darien," &c.

HON. I. E. HOLMES:

House of Representatives, Washington.

The discovery of printing took the world by surprise and authors not less than all the rest. Its wondrous effects were not so obvious. In the infancy of the art it was necessarily cumbered with imperfections. Its agents were rude, its appliances were ill-fashioned. Its performances were comparatively slow. Printing was expensive, and its benefits were not universal at first, for the sufficient reason that readers were still few, when compared with the immense numbers who remained in a condition of almost primitive ignorance. The first publications were of works with which the public were already partially familiar, the authors of which were generally dead—Froissart for example. The living authors saw nothing in the new invention to alarm, and, commonly more heedless of their selfish interests than other men, might be supposed very naturally to have slept somewhat upon their securities. But, in truth, their rights were not invaded for a long while after the discovery of printing. The printers had quite enough to do to appropriate the waste literature of preceding ages. The ancient classics and histories—the contemporary productions of France and Italy, in particular—gave long and constant employment to the English press; and, in truth, the great protection of the author was found in the fact that, because of reasons already given, the press of the country did not so much address its labors to the great body of the people. The teachers of the multitude were properly the dramatists. Frequent reference has been made in the discussion of this subject of Copyright, to authorities drawn from the supposed practice of the dramatic writers of Great Britain. Their prodigality—their want of caution in all things—their desultory modes of life—the slipshod manner in which they wore their reputation—might well make us chary of any reference to the customs of business supposed to prevail among them. But, even these seem to me to have been very much misunderstood. Let us look a little more closely into this history. It has been frequently, and, perhaps unnecessarily, a subject of wonder and remark with critics, that such great writers as Shakspeare, should have shown so little seeming solicitude about the proper publication of their writings. They argue from this that they were equally heedless of fame and money. But a nearer examination shows the error of all this. The first mistake of these persons is in confounding publication with mere printing. Undoubtedly, the printing of a play is calculated, in the end, to give it more extensive circulation, but of this the dramatist was yet to be aware, and to this his necessities made him indifferent. The only publication which he or the managers regarded was that from the stage. They bought his manuscripts from him for the theatre, and they remained the property of the theatre forever after. The stage publication in that day was more thorough than that of books, and far less expensive. A thousand hearers were gratified at the same moment with a work, where a printed edition of five hundred copies would perhaps linger for years in its progress through the hands of the booksellers. The mode of publication, from the stage, was the legitimate result of the primitive custom of diffusing knowledge or amusement by popular lecture or recitation. The orator was the parent of the actor. His vivid and varied declamation originated histrionic display. From the performance of one person, whose action and utterance were made to harmonize with the particular tenor of the thing spoken, the transition was equally easy and natural to an entire group of speakers, each taking his part, particularly when the story of the poet, as in the case of the Iliad, frequently presented to the spectator all the essentials of compact dramatic action. Unquestionably, at such times, the declaimer labored to give to each particular speech, threat, entreaty, interrogation or reply, the appropriate tone and gesture, look and emphasis, which the language seemed to require, and this naturally suggested the division of the story into parts; and hence—the drama. The peculiar mode of publication, therefore, was from the boards; it is only in modern times that the absurdity occurs of writing tragedies and comedies, not to be acted—and the author, even after the Elizabethan period, very frequently took one of the parts of the dramatis personæ. That Shakspeare did so, we are told, and we have every reason to recognize the truth of the assurance. The dramatic author never printed his play if he could help it. Its chief value accrued to him only while it remained in an unprinted state. If it were damned by the audience, he then hurried with it to the printers, by way of making appeal to the more deliberate judgment, not of the people, but of the educated classes. Shakspeare collected and printed his poems and not his plays. The value of a dedication (which originally meant the presentation of the manuscript) as shown in his case, with reference to these poems, may afford sufficient reasons why the author should not care about Copyright. For this dedication, we are told, that he received £1000 from the Earl of Southampton. Most probably the poet, in such a case, would deem it unworthy on his part to seek for more compensation, and the Earl, by such a purchase, may be assumed to have given the copy to the public. It was not the policy of the dramatist to suffer his play to reach the hands of the printer so long as it kept its place upon the stage. In a late narrative, Mr. Cowell gives us an amusing anecdote, within his own experience, which will tend to illustrate, in some measure, the correctness of this policy. There was a play to be acted in New-York, the author of which, (M. M. Noah,) determining to have fair play for his play, had it printed and distributed among the audience. The effect was fatal to the piece and the performance. Each reader became a critic, and when the curtain rose, the eyes of the spectators were divided between the book and the stage. It was to the imminent peril of the actor, who, on that occasion, departed from his text. There were other reasons against the practice.

The sale of the piece to the manager precluded all publication by the author, and printing was of little consequence to the former as long as the piece brought a house. For one purchaser of the book, there were hundreds who preferred to see it in living letters, done to the life, for a sixpence, at the Globe, with all the glitter and glory which the judicious use of theatrical properties could produce. The author, in selling his manuscript, contemplated no other form of publication than the stage. He would not have done so had book publication been as profitable then as it has become since. In destroying theatres, bull-rings, cock-pits and all the ordinary resources of popular taste, books have risen into a degree of importance, and acquired an interest, which make it necessary that we should inquire anew, as to what shall be the means of securing to him who makes them, some portion of the profits which they bring. The decline of the drama in modern periods, is referrible chiefly to the almost universal capacity of the people to read. The excellence and superiority of the drama, in those days, was really due to the ignorance of the people. They craved knowledge, and there was but one way in which it could be bestowed by genius and talent. They constituted the great majority, and hence the willingness to teach and to amuse them on the part of men of genius. Hence, too, the confidence, the freedom, the audacity, with which the latter spake and wrote. To have addressed an audience of their equals, might have chilled their enthusiasm, as certainly as it must have disarmed their confidence, and this is the misfortune of an age of mediocrity. The author who knows his reader to be his equal, is always rather less solicitous of the thing which he says than of the manner in which he says it.

The reserves of dramatists with regard to the press, which have been argued to betray their indifference to fame and fortune, was simply due to their preference of the primitive mode of publication as that which was the most profitable. Indeed, with their hands full of foreign and ancient literature—the first Anglo-Saxon writers—the rhyming chroniclers—the metrical romances—the contemporaneous French and Italian legends and fictions—the wars of Chivalry—Froissart—which Lord Berners had already translated—and the writings of famous travellers, of whom Sir John Maundeville may be considered a sufficient specimen—the printers had no desire, as they had no motive, to trespass upon the domain of the native author. When his writings became desirable, we shall see that, not only was the author prepared to insist upon their value, but that the publishers were not indisposed to admit his claims. At all events, it will be seen that no one at that time disputed the right to be in himself—in him only—and it was bought, as a right in perpetuity, from him by the publisher.

The true reason why the writings of the dramatic authors have reached us in such wretched condition is that their property was no longer in themselves. When the increasing tastes for letters, on the part of the public, rendered it a profitable speculation that their works should be printed, the power of revision was no longer in their hands.

Most of them were dead; their manuscripts were swept by hungry printers from the desks of defunct managers, and, full of copy marks, alterations, interpolations, stage directions and marginal improvements, with all their imperfections on their heads, were hurried to the press. When the authors themselves printed, they commonly revised their writings carefully, and were quite as solicitous of the regards of immortality as the merest pretender of modern times. On this head there is a great deal of bald, disjointed chat, which should go for nothing, though from the hands and under the sanction of certain of the bigwigged gentry. Shakspeare, for example, has shown as much anxiety for fame as Milton, and has expressed this anxiety in language almost equally emphatic. His poems are full of those yearnings, claiming and impatient to be heard, which may naturally be supposed to fill the bosom of the great genius, conscious of his endowments, and striving, in obedience to his destiny, to make others conscious of them also. These poems are highly polished compositions, as elaborate in the artifices of verse, as full of proofs of the labor lima, as any thing now issued from the press; and the ordinary reader would be confounded could he see one of the original copies of the "Hamlet" as submitted to the players—how inferior in all respects to that which we have—how crude in its first conception—how wanting in that exquisite finish which marks, at this time, its expanded soliloquies and favorite dialogues. Even when printing his productions, the author adhered to the practice of preceding times, of choosing a patron for his volume; and the printed, in place of the manuscript copy, graced with the name of lord or lady, secured for him a gift from the individual thus honored, which probably surpassed in value the profits of the whole edition. The profits arising from the printed plays—which were not intended for the reader—were very small almost to the days of Dryden, in comparison with those which followed the successful performance. But even these sources of income were not overlooked or neglected. Copyrights were sold at a very early period to the publishers, who continued to use them as a perpetual property, and transmitted them to their assigns accordingly. It has been argued against the right of the author, that the claim to protection was usually urged on the behalf of the bookseller, or publisher; but this has no bearing on the case, unless it can be shown that the purchaser bought only a limited right from the author. This we know was not the fact. The author sold his right as if it were a perfect one; and if he got little for it, as in the case of Milton, this proves only that his necessities were great, and that the publishers, in those days, were not as liberal as they are said to be in ours. They took advantage of necessities, as tradesmen, which they had not the soul to sympathize with as men. If, after a certain period of use, the copy was abandoned to the public, either by author or publisher, it was in consequence of its own diminished value in public estimation, and not because of any patriotic desire to make it common on the part of the proprietor. Such liberality is seldom shown where the work will pay. For that matter, hundreds of copyrights may be procured now, for which the authors expect nothing; but shall we argue from this against the rights of those who, as their productions still command a price in the market, prefer that the money should find its way into their pockets rather than into those of persons who have as few claims upon the public as upon them? Authors who happened to be noblemen, or persons of great wealth, generally wrote as amateurs, without expecting compensation for their works; not unfrequently incurring even the expense of publication themselves, and, if not, bestowing the entire Copyright upon the publisher who did so. The Surry's and the Wyatt's published after this fashion. Milton and Lord Bacon have been frequently referred to. A word with regard to these writers, which will have its application to hundreds more. Milton did sell his poems, though he got little for them. His emphatic testimony in favor of the right of the author to his works is on record. "God forbid," he says, "that it should ever be questioned;" and this was said in his areopagitica, a speech expressly uttered in behalf of the liberty of the press. It never occurred to him that the liberty of the press could be construed to mean the appropriation, by a bookseller, of an author's writings to his own use, and this, too, on the impudent plea of the common benefit. Milton was never a professional author. If he derived a living from his writings, they were those that fell from him in a political character, as Secretary to Cromwell and as defender of the commonwealth. His poetry was little known and less valued among the Puritans. His great poem was written late in life, and the returns from it were so pitiable that it must be evident they were not regarded as a means of subsistence. That the trifle which he received for the Paradise Lost, may have helped him in a moment of emergency, is a point which, if it affects the question at all, supports our view of it, since, however trifling, it was demanded and obtained.

The labors of Lord Bacon rank in the same relation. He was a public servant. His resources were not derived from his writings in any degree. They were gathered in other ways, some of which, unhappily, were not quite so legitimate. Nothing can be drawn from such examples. These were men, independent of letters, who wrote in the intervals of leisure from those vocations, from which their means of life were drawn. They could well afford to bestow their writings as they pleased, and their doing so, without charge upon the public, should not be suffered to affect the claims of those who live only by their productions and had no other means of subsistence.

It did not in ancient times. The right of the author to his copy was not denied,—was entertained beyond dispute. The common sense of mankind, their sense of right, justice and common honesty, settled the matter; and, as before printing they recognized in the author an exclusive right to multiply his copy, in writing, so they recognized the same right, when, by a fortunate discovery of science, he was enabled to multiply his copies by machinery, in printing, and without being subject to the former painful manipulations. The principle controlling the subject remained essentially the same. Printing only furnished an additional facility to him for doing that which he before confessedly held an exclusive right to do. To yield thus much to him did not in any way impair any public privilege. On the contrary, as it enabled the people to obtain his labors at more moderate expense, which before were so costly as to be wholly beyond common reach, it was clearly within their policy to recognize his right, else he might have been compelled to continue the old practice, and, like the ancient orator, or the modern dramatist, prefer keeping his work in manuscript to be delivered by himself, orally, to the people, whenever occasion offered. The policy went with the morality and propriety of the admission; and it does not appear that the right of the author was disturbed until the reign of the first Charles. The turbulence of that reign, and of the dynasty which followed, might have been supposed as unfavorable to literary securities as it was to that repose of society which the arts are said to love; but this was not the case. The right of the author was maintained even in the most stormy periods of British History, insisted upon in the time of Charles I. and frankly admitted during the protectorate.

The Common Law Right is asserted in the strongest language by Mr. Justice Willes and Lord Mansfield. "It is certain," says the former, "that, down to the year 1640, (printing was introduced into England by Caxton in 1474,) copies were protected and secured from piracy by a much speedier and more effectual remedy than actions at law and bills in equity. No license could be obtained "to print another man's 'copy'—not from any prohibition, but because the thing was immoral, dishonest and unjust. And he who printed without a license was liable to great penalties." From the erection of the Stationer's Company in 1556, copies were entered as property and pirating punished. Sometimes the license was qualified specially, as "if it be found that any other has right to any of the copies then the license, &c., shall be void." "It is remarkable," says Mr. Justice Willes, "that the decree of the Star Chamber in 1637 expressly supposes a Copyright to exist otherwise than by patent, order or entry in the register of the Stationer's Company: which could be only by common law."

In 1640, both houses of parliament, abolishing the proceedings of the Star Chamber, expressly take for granted that Copyrights could only stand upon the Common Law. The ordinance, therefore, prohibits printing without consent of the owner; or importing, (if printed abroad) upon pain of forfeiting the same to the owner. All parties, in 1644, whether for or against unlicensed printing, concurred in the conviction that "literary property was not the effect of arbitrary power, but of law and justice, and therefore ought to be safe." In 1449, the Long Parliament made an ordinance which forbids printing any book legally granted, or any book entered, without consent of the owner, on pain of forfeiture, &c. In 1662, the licensing act repeats the prohibition in the same terms, the penalties being forfeiture of the book and 6s. 8d. on each copy. The act supposes ownership at Common Law, and the right itself is recognized in a clause which forbids the Chancellor and Vice Chancellor of the Universities to "meddle with any book or books, the right of printing whereof doth solely and properly belong to any particular person or persons." The sole property is acknowledged in express words as a Common Law Right, "and," says Mr. Justice Willes, "the Legislature who passed that act could never have entertained the most distant idea that the productions of the brain were not a subject matter of property." We are wiser, however, in our generation, than the children of light.

Lord Mansfield says, "From premises either expressly admitted, or which cannot, and therefore never have been denied, conclusions follow, in my apprehension, decisive upon all of the objections raised to the property of an author in the copy of his own work by the Common Law. I use the word 'copy' in the technical sense in which that name or term has been used for ages, to signify an incorporeal right to the sole printing and publishing of somewhat intellectual, communicated by letters."

Copyright, in short, means neither more nor less than the right to make and sell copies, and thus, in three syllables, embodies the substance of the claim more compactly, perhaps, than in almost any other property-definition. Mr. Justice Aston says, "This idea of an author's property has been so long entertained, that the copy of a book seems to have been not familiarly only but legally used as a technical expression of the author's sole right of printing and publishing that work; and that these expressions, in a variety of instruments, are not to be considered as the creators and origin of that right or property; but as speaking the language of a known and acknowledged right," &c. The truth is, the phrase came from the earliest periods, from the original practice of the author of selling copies in manuscript long before printing was discovered. The discovery of printing only increased his facilities for doing so, not so much for his own as for the popular benefit, and his right could not be impaired by the discovery. The authorities quoted by Lord Mansfield and the two Justices, Willes and Aston, are numerous and would seem to be conclusive in favor of the right of the author at Common Law, and because of the common usage.

It is but fair to say that Mr. Justice Yates disagreed with his learned associates. His views and arguments strike us as being rather sophistical and subtle than profound or true. He speaks rather as the advocate of a side than a judge—is more solicitous to make out a case, than determine rightly the one before him. We have seen, at an early passage in this letter, reference made to one of the arguments by which he attempts to show that there is no Common Law Right—namely, that where he reasons against the immemorial usage, on the ground that the introduction of printing itself was not, at that period, immemorial. This point has, I trust, been sufficiently answered in the hurried history which I have endeavored to make of the several known kinds of publication. The strongest argument of Mr. Yates is derived from the fact that publishers applied to the Legislature for a statutory provision in their favor, and for the further protection of their rights. "Why," is the question of the Justice, "if they had protection at Common Law should they seek it from statute?" To this the answer is easy. The protection at Common Law was inadequate. The object of the application was two fold, and the reasons of the Legislature in the enactment of the statute, are, upon a little examination, sufficiently apparent. At Common Law the proprietor of Copyright could recover no more costs against the piratical publisher than he could prove damage, and thousands of illegitimate copies might be sold where he could only prove the sale of ten or twenty; and in the next place, the person in those days guilty of such piracy was seldom as respectable person as now*—he was most usually a pauper from whom no damages could be obtained—he could continue his evil practices even in prison, and, so far from the plaintiff obtaining a remedy at Common Law, he was subjected to all the costs of prosecution. The true remedy was in making the pirated copies themselves liable, and this remedy could be afforded by statute only. These arguments are urged by the Copyright proprietors themselves in 1703. "We therefore pray," say the applicants for a Bill, "that confiscation of counterfeit copies be one of the penalties to be inflicted on offenders." The reasons for "entering Copyrights" as required by the statute should be equally apparent. It was to prevent mistake. There were, by this time, thousands of works, the printing and publishing of which were common in England—works, as we have seen, translated from the writings of foreigners, works taken from the stage, when there were neither authors nor managers to claim them—for the protectorate period was particularly fatal to dramatic interests—works of amateur and noble authors, who, superior to want, had never been at the pains to assert a right to their productions—and ancient writings, from the earliest periods of Literary History, in Europe, the very authorship of which was doubtful, and for none of which did there remain a claimant. It was important that there should be certain legal indicia by which the innocent publisher should be warned to forbearance. The reason of Copyright entry, in an office assigned for the purpose, was the same with that which requires similar record of all other proceedings which relate to the acquisition of other kinds of property, whether held by grant, gift, sale, bequest or inheritance—simply that the proof of property should be easy—that any transfer of it should be soon made known—that nobody should be misled—nobody taken by surprise through ignorance,—the dishonest kept from evil practice,—the innocent from being overreached. So far from its being held to impair the original right of the author, by showing that the right was unoriginal, it was simply a mode by which his property was put upon an equal footing of security with that of all other persons. The fact that this security was for a limited period did not impair any rights which the statute itself did not affect. Such limitations are consistent with the general, and I may add the proper, policy and practice of Legislators, who are naturally reluctant to enact laws which shall bind too remotely their successors. The reasons upon which a law is based may change—the circumstances vary—the necessities of the case may render new and very different proceedings necessary;—and hence the wisdom and propriety of caution in a particular, where much evil may be the result of a too imperative and precipitate legislation. These principles, however, affect the general practice only. That they apply to the present case is not apparent, nor should we consider them farther in this connection.

But the right of the author to the sole profit arising from the sale of his productions, is fortunately grounded upon principles which are very far superior in authority to any which may be drawn from the practice of a nation at any period, and particularly of nations and periods which have been distinguished in history by frequent violations of all right—by equal uncertainties of principle and practice—by the caprices and commotions of war—by the infancy of civilization and by the most tyrannous stretch of royal prerogative. It is well and wise to regard the Common Law of a country, for the sufficient reason that Common Law, in its choicest signification, is, in reality, nothing less than common justice. It is the common sense and the moral sense of a people conjoined—the matured fruits of the thought and experience, the received convictions of successive generations, rendered venerable by time, and forming the great and inestimable basis of a national character. Verily, it is of vast importance to a country, that this common sense and common law should lead to common justice—should rise superior to fictions and self-delusions—should have regard to something more than the momentary profit and performance—should discard with scorn and indignation all mean and slavish suggestions, whether these appeal to its miserable appetites, or more miserable vanities,—and, steadfastly stretching forward to the good, the true and the immutable, should regard, as of the highest value and importance, the transmission to the infant generations of a capital, in conscience, superior to any in trade, which shall stand them in stead equally in the sight of God, as in that of his frail and erring creature, man! It is well that the Legislature should have an eye to the doings and the convictions of the past, but he must not be satisfied to confine himself to this survey alone. Man is an ascending, uplooking animal. The only true proof of his civilization is in his progress. He cannot bind himself entirely to the past. He builds upon the foundations of his fathers precisely as he builds above their heads. To be satisfied with what they have been, is to forfeit what they have left. To hold merely to what they were, is to sink from what we are. We must go forward, not to lose ground,—upward, not to descend. To remain stationary is to lose our hold upon present possessions. To set a God Terminus to our moral boundaries is to invite the arms of the “outer-barbarians,” as in the case of modern China. There is a part in the history of every civilized nation which is necessarily great and glorious. It consists of that period when its own labors wrought out its civilization. Such a period is one, certainly, of great authority, so far as it stimulates its successors to like exertions. But the present must always arbitrate for itself, if it would assert its own individuality. To be content with this part, however grand or glorious, is to forego the exercise of the very qualities which rendered it memorable. The legislator has always before him much higher standards, as well of sense as of morality, than his ancestor ever possessed. They are furnished by the labors of his predecessor. To reject the use of these advantages, and stubbornly to look back upon their progress, to the guide stones which they have left behind them, is to retrace the axe marks in the wilderness of the very implement which we carry on our shoulders. The proper question for the lawgiver is not so much what has been, but what should be—not what is done, but what ought to be done—what, in brief, is right, fit, becoming, in him to do. And these questions are not of temporary interest. They affect concerns by which successive races are to be influenced—by which they are to triumph or be overthrown—stand or fall—live and grow, great and glorious, or sink, mean and infamous, the loathing and reproach of other nations.

This question of literary property must be examined on intrinsic grounds. It is a question, from its peculiar nature, very much by itself. It is one from which any attempt at analogous cases would only serve to mislead us. It is absurd to regard it with a constant reference to old definitions and ancient practices—definitions conceived when man was a savage and knew nothing of letters—and practices adopted and pursued when might was every where triumphant over right—when the strong arm was an abler pleader than the eloquent tongue—when the bribe outweighed the principle—and when merit, literally in the court of “dusty feet,” begged from power as a privilege, that which had been denied to any prayer of the petitioner in the character of justice. We are not to ask what certain lords and lawyers may have said at such periods, though some of these, the very noblest of their order, have spoken as they should, in consonance and strict agreement with the common laws of sense and justice. What is the truth, is our only question, and if, unlike Pilate, we have only the patience to wait, it is possible we may procure an answer.

It is an error to say, or to suppose that the object of Government is the greatest good of the greatest number. Were this so, no man would enter society at all. Society would be fatal to his individuality. The greatest number can take care of itself—will take care of itself—and asks nothing from society. If numbers were the object of Government, the smallest would be the creature of its consideration. Its true object is the security of the individual man. Let the other principle prevail, and there would be no freedom, since there would be no safety in a minority. Such a doctrine, in our federal relations, would surrender the small states to the tender mercies of the large. We can very well conjecture, from what we know, what might be expected from these. The political jealousies and constant watchfulness of the smaller communities does not suffice to save them now, with all their safeguards and checks, as devised by the federal compact. Under the social contract—I have no reference to Rousseau in the employment of this phrase—laws are framed, not for the mass, but for the individual. It is individual life and property which needs and claims protection. In the United States, we also guarantee to the individual the pursuit of happiness.—A guaranty which, generalizing too largely, has scarcely any practical application in our policy. These objects constitute the substance of all the duties which society is required to perform. It is to protect the life, and secure the possessions of the citizen and to give a sanction to his labors, and guard him in their fruits. It matters not what may be the character of those labors,—whether they consist of brick-making or book-making. The free choice of pursuit, according to the endowment of the individual, is guaranteed, we may presume, by every Government under the rather vague phrase, “the pursuit of happiness.” All that society has a right to require is, that this pursuit shall not conflict with the happiness of any other of its children—shall impair the rights of none other, shall hurt no man in his life, his limbs or his possessions.

The definition of property, however various its forms and objects, is as simple and perspicuous as that of life. Ordinarily, it is one of those practical subjects which demand no definition. What is peculiar to one's self is one's own, whether it be the creature of one's ingenuity, or industry. It does not matter that the object should be one of market value, or of general utility. It is enough that it is susceptible of claim and identity—that it was gotten without detriment to the right of another—that the claimant establishes in behalf of his right a better title than any other can assert. In primitive periods this, with some exceptions, was the case. The vulgar sense of the useful limited the definition of property to such objects only as came under the narrowest meaning of that term. Objects of taste and fancy, were not considered worthy of protection. Land, cattle, horses, sheep, the implements of husbandry and the chase, constituted, at such periods, the only objects of social protection. And even these were only secured to the owner while he was in their actual possession. The moment he vacated the land, or the dwelling, that moment it might be seized on by another. The moment his cattle, or sheep, strayed from the fold, they were counted wild, in fera natura, and might be taken by the first comer. Hence, in Jewish history, the immediate pursuit of the stray lamb—the constant watch of the shepherd and the watch dog, and the nightly tale by which the missing were to be detected. The truth is, at such periods, the right of property, depended for half of its virtue upon the constant vigilance of the proprietor, and the strength of arm with which his possessions were maintained. It was a step towards security, and so to civilization, when the branding of cattle was introduced as a practice; when the slit in the ears of dog, hog, sheep or cattle, determined their ownership, and left no roguish appropriator any pretext that the property was abandoned. Civilization made another progress, when beauty, forming an alliance with taste, won to her lures, and tamed to her hand, the favorite bird of the forest, whose song and plumage made it an object of delight to fancy;—when the young hunter, laid at her feet the petted fawn which he had snared in the distant thickets. These, as they became desirable objects of possession, were recognized as objects of property also. Where they escaped, and were held by others, the failure of the owner to recover them, was not owing to any reluctance of the laws to regard them as such, but simply because they were of that class of objects which were not easily distinguishable one from another. The proof and identification were next to impossible. The owner could not show that they were peculiar to himself. To remedy this defect, the same, or a similar process, was adopted in the case of the bird, the deer, the dog, which was employed for the proof and security of cattle. Some badge, proper to the owner, was fastened about them; and in this way, little by little, society proceeded to confirm the rights of the individual to all objects of sight, upon which, without infringing the previous rights of another, he had laid his hands and impressed his peculiar signet.

Now, whether the right of the author to his book is less valid than that of him who first enters upon lands, who first tames the wild cow or the horse, who first takes the deer, who first snares the bird? His right is based upon the peculiar and personal labor and skill by which his books have been made. They are emphatically his works. They are not yours. The very terms which we are compelled to employ in stating the simple fact of authorship embodies the very clearest notion of property. Nay, it is as his works, and not as their own, that they are valuable to the publishers who appropriate them against his will. Unlike other stolen goods, the marks of the owner, so far from being obliterated and erased, are preserved with care, and earnestly insisted upon, as constituting the highest recommendation to the purchaser. When, therefore, with this fact before their eyes, it is insisted by the appropriator that the work which he reprints is not peculiar—that the ideas are common—might have occurred to any man—we are prepared to acknowledge instantly that such base ingenuity deserves nothing better than the horsewhip. “I confess,” says Mr. Justice Aston, “I do not know, nor can I comprehend any property being more emphatically a man's own—nay, more incapable of being mistaken than his literary works.” And this is the language of every honest mind—of every man not selfishly interested to prefer falsehood to truth, or simply anxious, as in the case of all new fledged sophists, to exercise ingenuity, in making out a case, at the expense of conscience. What author's works have ever been mistaken in this manner. What bookseller confounds Ben Johnson with Shakespeare, Marlowe with Fletcher, Dekkar with Rowe, Tickell with Addison, Dryden with Pope? Which of them, simple as he pretends himself, ever put forth an edition of Dryden, with the title page of Settle? or the writings of Milton with the name, as author, of Sir Richard Blackmore. What purchaser is it that buys a book and avows a total indifference to the name of the author, being satisfied that ideas are things in common, and those of one man quite as proper for the market as another? Both parties take precious good care of this. The right of the author to his book is never denied when the chapman is about to sell it to his customer—only when the author himself appears to urge his demands for a small portion of the profits growing out of his labors and his fame.

The right of the author to the property in his productions, so far from being questionable, is really superior to that of all other producers. His works depend less upon extraneous assistance. They do not result from the application of his industry to physical substances—such as ores, lands, clay or lumber—things, which, in the possession of any artist, may be fashioned into peculiar forms, showing the hands of the maker, and which he thus converts into a means of profit. He is, under God, their sole creator, almost without agent or implement of any sort. They spring at his bidding from sources of which no man may obtain the control—of which no man suspects the abundance. The fountain of their being is in himself—never was, and never could be, in the possession of any but himself, of which no man can have been depossessed—of the very existence of which none but himself has any knowledge. He is as peculiarly the thing he makes as the spider is of his web of gossamer; spinning from his brains and his sensibilities, as the latter from his bowels, the structure which he endows and inhabits. Thus then, above, we find him the sole proprietor. The technical language of the law, which, of old, according to Verulam, recognized theft as one of the modes for acquiring property (a recognition, by the way, which the age, entitled, par excellence, that of chivalry,—which Burke deplored and which Bayard did not represent—certainly did much to sanction)—has none more legitimate than that of the author. In his claim lie all the essential elements of a just definition of property. His work is the fruit of his sole industry—made out of materials entirely his own—wrought into shapes, devised and designed by himself; its appropriation to his own use, hurts no man—takes from no man's right. It is a thing of value—a thing of eager desire among men,—and yields a profit in the market, to which no man but himself pretends a right. It is a thing of public use and benefit, and furnishes means of knowledge and happiness to thousands. Indeed, it is only because of the immense value of his labors that the effort is made to deprive him of them entirely—to bestow upon him as a gratuity a temporary use in them which wresting the right from his possession, and when he would desire to have this better understood, in order to the ends of justice—when, like the house-builder and house-holder, he would be made secure in his property so long as it shall last,—he is visited with all sorts of opprobrious censure by the very persons that fatten on his fruits. He is called a monopolist—that vulgar catch word of the cunning, meant to prejudice in the ears of the selfish and the ignorant those rights which are otherwise unassailable. The author, a monopolist—the author a selfish, grasping, mercenary creature—he who has grown into a proverb from the recklessness of his career, his notorious inattention to his own interests, and the looseness with which he squanders the pittance, which his necessities receive from those who roll in luxuries solely gathered from his improvident but prolific genius. The very pages in which his claims are denounced and derided, are crowded with the usual drivel about his distresses; yet they do not see that these very distresses are mainly due to that denial of justice, which now, for the first time in America, he is beginning impatiently to demand.

But suppose he is a monopolist? If the property be his, as I hope has been sufficiently shown, why should he not enjoy it, as all other property is enjoyed by other men? Why should not his books yield him an annual income, as well as his money or his lands? They have an annual demand in the market. There are persons ready to buy who do not complain of his prices. It is by multiplying the copies of his works that the author's returns are derived; and this fact is all-important to a just comprehension of what is due by the government of a country to the proper protection of his property. The country takes the life of the offender who forges the name of the merchant—the same country is pledged to secure to her citizens who pursue any form of business, an adequate protection, though, in doing so, she employs new agents for the purpose. This is the vital principle upon which the author relies in the assertion of his claim. His property is a peculiar one. It would be valueless if he were not permitted to use it in the only way in which it will yield him profit. When his writings were delivered by recitation, the very mode of publication, as we have seen, secured him against spoliation. Perfect copies could not be taken from his lips, and the partial appropriations only served to whet the appetite of the hearer, for all the rest. When written copies were furnished to individuals, prior to the discovery of printing, he had like securities in the ignorance of the community, and the extreme costliness of the labor by which copies only could be made. This latter fact, by the way, is the one which answers all analogies addressed to the case, drawn from the inventors of orreries and other expensive efforts in machinery;—the cost entering into the mere physical structure, being the chief expense to the purchaser. We contend that printing the book in copies, does not alter the case, or lessen the exclusive right of the author to the multiplication of his copies in that way, any more than by writing them with his own hands—that the putting of these individual copies on sale, is not, by this act, an abandonment of the work to any person who may think proper to appropriate it. And such was the understanding of the British public. To this day, the decision of the British judges, is of prime authority, which determined the ownership of the MS. to be in the writer, though actually sent by him, in the form of letter, to another; a decision which controls manuscript compositions as well as private correspondence. Among the judges so deciding, we are able to recall at this moment Lord Hardwicke, Lord Mansfield, and more recently, Lord Eldon. But the principle is not denied by any. On this point it is ruled by Lord Mansfield, that “no disposition, no transfer of paper upon which the composition is written (though it gives the power to print and publish) can be construed a conveyance of the copy, without the author’s express consent ‘to print and publish,’ much less against his will.” Now, printing does not substantially affect this principle. Printing is nothing more than a more rapid means of multiplying copies. To employ this agent, instead of his pen, certainly changes none of the author’s relations with the public, affects none of his rights in his labors. But, according to Mr. Justice Yates, and others of his creed, publication, through the medium of the press, implied an abandonment of his right, by the author, to the public. But by what reasoning is this conclusion reached? By what implication is it made? The point involves a fact to be established. The onus probandi is upon the defendant in this issue. The author denies any abandonment! The consent cannot be implied. An express showing of the abandonment must be made. It cannot be inferred from publication, since copies in writing were publications; and recitations from the stage, are publications, and neither of these words was ever supposed to indicate such an abandonment. The several modes, declaiming recitation first, manuscript copies next, and printing last, were employed by the author in realizing from his production whatever profit it would bring. “Without publication,” says Mr. Justice Aston, “’tis useless to the owner, because without profit. Property without the power of use and disposal, is an empty sound. In that state ’tis lost to the society in point of improvement, as well as to the author in point of interest. Publication, therefore, is the necessary act, and only means to render this confessed property useful to mankind and profitable to the owner. In this they are jointly concerned.” “But,” said the opposite counsel, “when a man buys a book it is his own.” Reasoning, from common analogies, such would be the case. It is certainly the case where a man buys horse, or house, or farmstead. But the cases are without proper parallelism. The application of the law depends somewhat upon the nature of the property. The objects must be the same in character which you place under the same rules and definitions. The definition must be adapted to suit the interest, and not the interest the definition. The intention of the seller, as to the object sold, and the extent of interest which he conveys at sale, is a condition declared or understood at that time between the parties. This must be taken into consideration here. What is it that the author sells? Not his book, but a copy of it. Hence the peculiar term “Copyright,” or the right of making and multiplying copies—a right which he keeps,—which he refuses to sell,—a right peculiar to him who owns the original, as first maker, first finder, first worker, first discoverer! Not to recognize this right, would be fatal to all authorship—would put an end to all publication,—~~it~~ would impose upon the author the necessity of some legal stipulation, specially made, with every purchaser, at the very moment of sale,—a proceeding which would very greatly enhance the cost of the publication. “What,” says Mr. Justice Aston, “is there no difference between selling the property in the work and only one of the copies? To say ‘selling the book conveys all the right,’ begs the question. For, if the law protects the book, the sale does not convey away the right from the nature of the thing, any more than the sale conveys it where the statute protects the book.” “Can it be conceived, that, in purchasing a literary composition at a shop, the purchaser ever thought he bought the right to be the printer and seller of that specific work? The improvements, knowledge or amusement, which he can derive from the performance, are all his own, but the right to the work—the Copyright—remains in him whose industry composed it. The buyer might as truly claim the merit of the composition by his purchase, as the right of multiplying the copies and reaping the profits.”

Another passage from Justice Aston requires to be particularly read by all that class of publishers who claim still to defer to something of a moral law. It may be also, in some degree, useful to that class of sophists, who, in their passion for ingenious argument, are but too apt, in the exercise of an exquisite mental, to forget the uses of a moral sense. “The invasion of this sort of property is as much against every man’s sense of it, as it is against natural reason and moral rectitude. It is against the convictions of every man’s own breast who attempts it. He knows it not to be his own. He knows he injures another, and he does it, not for the sake of the public;” (of which, by the way, how wondrous, patriotic, and earnest are the considerations of printers and paper makers,) “but mala fide et animo lucrandi.” A truly conscientious publisher, reading this language of some of the first minds in Europe—if there be any ~~modesty~~ in his composition—will rather pause in his career, whatever may be his own convictions, and ask himself, seriously, if it may not be the case, that the love of gain blinds him to the strict requisitions of honesty; whether his powers of reasoning are not somewhat impaired by his cupidity, and, whether it would not be more prudent, in a matter in which his interest is too great to allow him an unprejudiced judgment, to give heed to the counsels of those, equally renowned for wisdom and morality, who, at the same time, are totally uninfluenced by the results of their own decision.

However peculiar may be the nature of the property—however differing in its characteristics, and the securities which it asks, from every other kind of property, it is only necessary to show it to be such, and to show where the right lies, to compel a new definition so as to compass the interest. The legislator has this peculiar province committed to his care; and it is to meet the constant variations in the condition of society, its interests and securities, that the business of legislation is required to go on pari passu, with all other social employments. The mode in which an interest is to be employed arises from the necessity of its peculiar case; and from the recognized right of every man to sell just as much, or little of his property as he pleases, and to couple the sale with whatever limitations he may think proper to impose upon it. Were this not conceded in the case before us, there could be no sale from the author in the first instance, for no publisher would buy, and no books would be printed, except those of the amateur. The author, or publisher, in the words of Lord Mansfield, could "reap no pecuniary profit, if, the next moment after his work comes out, it may be pirated upon worse paper, and in worse print, and in a cheaper volume"—and farther, from the same great legal and moral authority: "The author may not only be deprived of any profit, but lose the expense he has been at. He is no more master of the use of his own name. He has no control over the correctness of his own work. He cannot prevent additions. He cannot retract errors. He cannot amend or cancel a faulty edition. Any one may print, pirate and perpetuate the imperfections to the disgrace, and against the will of the author; may propagate sentiments under his name, which he disapproves, rejects and is ashamed of. He can exercise no discretion as to the manner in which, or the persons by whom his work shall be published." I must make a few more extracts from Lord Mansfield. "If," says he, "the copy belongs to an author, after publication; it certainly belonged to him before. But if it does not belong to him after publication, where is the Common Law to be found, which says, 'there is such a property before?' All the metaphysical subtleties from the nature of the thing may be equally objected to the property before. It is incorporeal—it relates to ideas detached from any physical existence. There are no indicia: another may have had the same thoughts upon the same subject, and expressed them in the same language, verbatim. At what time, and, by what act, does the property commence? The same string of questions may be asked, upon the copy before publication: is it real or personal? Does it go to the heir or to the executor? Being a right which can only be defended by action, is it, as a chose in action, assignable or not? Can it be forfeited? Can it be taken in execution? Can it be vested in the assignees under a commission of bankruptcy?" It was with difficulties such as these that the mere technical lawyer environed the subject with difficulties, which grew out of his slavish deference to arbitrary dicta in cases no ways analogous. The mind of Mansfield, grasping the subject itself, rejected with scorn the employment of mere supposititious cases, of imperfect parallels, and sophistical problems which never pierced the core of the difficulty. "From what source then," he asks, "is the Common Law drawn, which is admitted to be so clear, in respect of the copy before publication?" His answer to this question might fitly conclude these papers. "From this argument,—because it is just that an author should reap the pecuniary profits of his own ingenuity and labor. It is just that another should not use his name without his consent. It is fit that he should judge when to publish, or whether he ever will publish. It is fit he should not only choose the time, but the manner of publication; how many; what volume; what print. It is fit he should choose to whose care he will trust the accuracy and correctness of the impressions; in whose honesty he will confide, not to foist in additions: with other reasonings to the same effect. I allow them sufficient to show 'it is agreeable to the principles of right and wrong, the fitness of things, convenience, policy, and therefore to the Common Law, to protect the copy before publication. But the same reasons hold after the publication.'" "For these, and many more reasons, it seems to me just and fit, to protect the copy after publication.'" "All objections which hold as much to the kind of property before, as to the kind of property after publication go for nothing. They prove too much. There is no peculiar objection to the property after, except 'that the copy is necessarily made common, after the book is once published.' Does a transfer of paper upon which it is printed, necessarily transfer the copy, more than the transfer of paper upon which the book is written? The argument turns in a circle. 'The copy is made common because the law does not protect it; and the law cannot protect it because it is made common.' The author does not mean to make it common; and if the law says, 'he ought to have the copy after publication'—it is a several property, easily protected, ascertained and secured. The whole then must finally resolve in this question,—‘whether it is agreeable to natural principles, moral justice and fitness to allow him the copy, after publication as well as before. The general consent of this kingdom, for ages, is on the affirmative side. The legislative authority has taken it for granted; and interposed penalties to protect it for a time! The single opinion of such a man as Milton, speaking after much consideration, upon the very point, is stronger than any inferences from gathering acorns and reising upon a vacant piece of ground, when the writers, so far from thinking of the very point, speak of an imaginary state of nature before the invention of letters. The judicial opinions of those eminent lawyers and great men, who granted or continued injunctions, in cases after publication, not within 8 Queen Ann, uncontradicted by any book, judgment or saying, must weigh in any question of law; much more in a question of theory and speculation as to what is agreeable or repugnant to natural principles. I look upon these injunctions as equal to any final decree.”

Yet, thus regarding them, with the natural veneration which one great mind unhesitatingly yields to another, we find no surrender of private judgment and original inquiry on the part of Lord Mansfield. It would please me to give the whole of his opinion. I commend it to the reader. It will do him good to see the ease, the strength, the dignity, with which the direct and analytic mind disperses the flimsy sophistries which the merely ingenious and the tortuous have thrown around the subject. You see at a glance that, while the one obscures, the other simplifies the problem,—strips it of unnecessary details, and referring it to the just principles by which it is governed, subjects it to the application of tests by which its claims, necessities, and laws, are made apparent to the simplest understanding. I shall now, without loss of time, hurry to the closing considerations which our analysis involves.

Having reached one of the natural divisions of my subject, I propose, at some hazard of repeating myself, to advert to the several points which it has been the aim of the preceding pages to establish. I have shown, I trust conclusively, that, agreeable to all the laws of justice, common right, common reason, and, consequently, Common Law, the original author or composer of a book, has an inherent right in the property thereof—that this right is totally exclusive of the claims of any other—and, that, according to all the rules of common honesty and common sense, it should be as little obnoxious to alienation, by the operation of law, as that which the citizen maintains in any other property,—that it demands equally the protection of law,—that the law-giver is equally bound to afford it—that no question of the expedient should enter into the inquiry as between the author and the community in which he lives; but that the latter is quite as much bound to recognize his claims as those of any other citizen—nay, the very fact that his profession requires peculiar securities, establishes in him, peculiarly, the exclusive right to his labors—since, what is peculiar to him is, for that very reason, secure against any opposing interest or right of any other person. I have also endeavored to show that it is no less the policy than the duty of the community to yield this recognition; and, by a brief history of the career of American letters, the surprising rapidity of their growth, and their almost equally rapid rise to a comparative perfection,—have shown their absolute importance to the independence of the national mind. It has also been my purpose to prove, as will be seen by a reference to the second letter of this series, that even the minor considerations of public interest and economy would not be unfavorably affected by a recognition of the leading principles and the policy urged in the extension of the privileges of Copyright. But the important matter lies in the question of the author's inherent right to the productions of his own pen and intellect. If this right be conceded, as, indeed, we can not well see how it can be denied, by any but the sophistical and basely interested, it follows, as matter of course, that the whole question is concluded; since, I take it, that no member of the American Congress will pretend that the public may discriminate between the absolute rights of the citizen, and while fully acknowledging those of one class, subject the other to wholesale privation and denial. This concession made, we are naturally brought to the demand made by the stranger without our gates, to equal security for this property with the citizen within. Copyright—the entering of the title of one's book in an office set aside by law for the purpose, does not, as we have seen, confer a right but a security. The office, thus established by law, is precisely in the nature of an office of ordinary, of means conveyance, of the Secretary of State,—or any other department, through which a private act, legal in itself, is made known to the public. It is in not perceiving this point that our opponents have made all their blunders. Assuming that the statute for the protection of authors conferred rights which did not otherwise exist, they have ascribed to the benevolence of a community, what was the result of its convictions of right. Convention confers no such benevolences at its own expense; and if the rights of the author had not been felt and acknowledged, the security would never have been accorded. The statute, as already shown, was only an additional remedy against a wrong which existing laws could reach in no other efficient manner; and did not, and could not be construed to take away, or lessen a right, which, as such, was wholly independent of it before. Assuming, on the other hand, that the whole right of the author—(in his own works, made by his hands, and branded with his peculiar name)—came from the benevolence of the community, nothing would be more natural than that the American publishers should question the propriety of conferring this benevolence upon the foreigner. "But," says the writer of a pamphlet before me, "a British writer is no citizen of the world; he has become a component part of a body politic, and thereby surrendered no small portion of his original rights; and, what is more to the purpose, he has, so far as foreigners are concerned, merged his private property in the general stock." This proves a little too much if it proves any thing. The same argument will justify you in taking any other property of the foreign citizen that you can lay hands on. This very moral proposition only proves the laxity of our modes of thinking, since it is clear that the person who thinks in this manner would not scruple to possess himself of any foreign property. That he confines himself to that of the author rather than the iron-monger, only results from the facility with which he can steal and the safety with which he can carry off the stolen goods. But, to apply the general principle thus alleged, more directly to our case. The British author surrenders something of his rights to the British government as a condition for the protection of the rest. What he surrenders then may be safely appropriated; but not that which he retains! He reserves a privilege of Copyright, according to the British Law, and this proves none of the common property of that country. This is the property of the individual, as much so as his horse or his lands. The argument, according to the principle laid down by our opponent, is decidedly against his appropriation of the property while the author has an interest in it. It is urged as an objection also, that this privilege should not be conferred upon one who incurs none of the responsibilities of citizenship—who contributes nothing to the country which yields the privilege. As if the books themselves, the wisdom and science which they afford, the enjoyment which they bring, are not compensation fully equal to the protection which we are required to bestow. But these are really inferior points. The question must be argued from first principles. If there be a natural right of property in the English author, we are as certainly guilty of violating the laws of God and Justice, in divesting him of the actual profits of his writings, as we should be in divesting him of any other property. The proposition is not to be gainsayed. All depends upon the simple inquiry—does the author, whether English or American, who, by his industry, ingenuity, skill or genius, composes and invents a book, poem or history, acquire such a peculiar right therein—in the values, profits and results of such a performance—as similar labor, industry and ingenuity, exercised in other ways, and upon other productions, confer upon other persons by the common consent of mankind! This is the simple, but at the same time, the highest and noblest principle by which we recognize a right to property. The work of one's hands confers a more sacred right to one's possessions, legitimate, by the very first law of God to man, than any other mode of acquisition. We say that society every where admits this—that nobody has ever yet questioned the peculiar property of the book to be in the maker of it, and that the very statutes in every country, by which its fruits are secured to him, though for a limited period, are yet conclusive proofs of a general recognition of his claim, as superior to that of all other persons. The idea that the Copyright confers a benevolence—a charity—in giving the maker a privilege to use the very thing he makes, is a pure impertinence, the very terms of which are as offensive to the common sense, as to the moral sense, of every just-minded person. We, in America, concede this right to the author for twenty-eight years, and a further term of fourteen years, if either he, his wife or children survive that period. In France, the property in a work is secured to the author for his life, to his widow for her life, and after their death to their children for twenty years. In Holland and Belgium, Copyright is secured to the author for life, and to his heir for twenty years after his death. In Prussia, he enjoys the right for life, and his successors for thirty years from his death. In the greater part of Germany the Copyright extends the property in a work for a certain period beyond the death of an author for the benefit of his heirs. In Denmark, the Copyright is perpetual. In Spain it is perpetual. In the two Sicilies the law is believed to be the same as that of France. In Russia, it is during the author's lifetime,—for twenty-five years after.—and a farther term of ten years, if an edition shall be published within five years before the expiration of the first term. In the Russian code, we also find an enactment confirming certain titles of rank and honor, on corresponding degrees of success in literature. The English Law confers the right for twenty-eight years. The "International Copyright Bill" of Mr. Talfourd, secures to "foreigners Copyright in their works there [in England] where the government to which these foreigners belong, allows to British subjects printing in their dominions, similar rights." But the British Law is still unsettled, and the public mind, like our own, very much unsettled in regard to it.

In all countries which have made any advances to civilization, an author's right of property has been recognized in his productions. Indeed, such a recognition, and the degree of security which it confers, may be regarded as a very fair comparative test of the moral progress of the several nations. If, then, this be a property in all countries, it is a property apart from convention. The universality of the acceptance declares it to be such; and as such, it is imperative upon the moral sense of every nation to put it on a like footing of security with every other species of property. There can be no evasion of this simple requisition of justice. There can be no plea to the effect that it is a property easily appropriated, not easily protected, and very profitable to the appropriator. The language of the moral law is imperative:—"Fiat justitia, ruat cælum."

I have endeavored to show that the "right of copy" should be conceded to the foreign author, as a matter of policy for the protection of the native. This word "protection" has been made something of a bugbear, and as few modern philosophers go more than skin deep in the dissection of their subjects, it has been found sufficient to terrify some of the advocates of the free-trade doctrines. I use the word now with some reluctance. I am too much of a free-trader myself, not to avoid any seeming sanction given to principles and a practice, which I regard with antipathy. But the word "protection" here, is not that sort of protection which the manufacturer desires. While the latter would exclude foreign goods, or only admit of their entry upon hard conditions, it is the prayer of the American author, that his foreign competitor should be put upon the very same footing with himself—should come into the market free of duty—on the same terms with the native,—the latter asking nothing more than a fair field and no favor. The peculiar working of the existing system, by which he is moved to this prayer, is sufficiently developed in my first and second letters. This concession is demanded by what is due to native authority—by the kindred character and language of the applicant, and by the requisitions of natural justice. If, thus admitted, the superior ability of the British can drive the native author entirely from the shops of the publisher,—be it so! we shall have no reason to complain, and certainly no right to do so. But such a fear is entertained only by those who oppose the objects of our application. It is an argument due to their excessive, and, as we believe, overstrained sympathies for an interest, to which, in our thinking, there are no worse foes than themselves.

The arguments against the measure are chiefly drawn from expediency. They are sometimes slender enough, and, not unfrequently, inconsistent with each other. Among others which lie before me now, are those of Mr. John Campbell, who is understood to be a manufacturer of paper;—we trust that his reasons are more fair and much stronger than his arguments. Something he says against the right of the author to his own wares, but nothing much,—his chief force lying in the argumentum ad crumenam—certainly the very best mode of influencing the Anglo-Saxon nature whether in Great Britain or America. I should much prefer to deal with the uncommitted report of Mr. Berrien, to which this writer refers with some earnestness, since it is always more grateful to encounter those who take the higher and more permanent views of a subject; and I object, in limine, to the attempt to prejudice a case by any reference to the supposed opinions and arguments of any distinguished individual, from whom we have nothing tangible. I am not sure that Mr. Berrien would be such an authority on the subject of the literary interests of this country, as to justify his acceptance, by the popular mind, in preference to that of its domestic writers. The truth is, the quarrel of the latter with the members of Congress, is that so little consideration has been yielded to the subject. A farther reproach is, that when they did attempt its examination, they suffered themselves to be surrounded and influenced by the active partisanship of persons, who, by their own showing, were deeply interested in opposition to the measure. Such persons as the writer of the pamphlet before us, were not adequate authorities. I must confess, I see not why they should have been referred to at all. Were the subject that of paper-making instead of book-making, the reference might be legitimate enough,—but there ends. Congress might well be distrustful of opinions volunteered with so much pains-taking and at some expense, by parties not themselves engaged in the business of authorship. They might well distrust those persons of whom the authors of the country distinctly allege that they are interested to maintain things in their present condition. The latter have rather forborne pressing their arguments upon the law-giver, simply because it might naturally be assumed that governing considerations of duty would, of themselves, have led the representative mind of the country to every inquiry, in every quarter, which was requisite to a just comprehension of the interest under adjudication. They might naturally take for granted that, of all persons, they were the very first who should have been applied to in preference to paper manufacturers and publishers;—and this for reasons, some of which have become proverbial;—the sufficient one being, that they constitute a liberal profession. It does not need to show, since the whole history of literature declares it, that they have worked liberally and have generally remained poor. It seems they were mistaken in this calculation. Senators seem to have expected that the literary men of the nation should throng the lobbies, cheek by jowl, and cap in hand, with the busy crowd of interested expectants which ordinarily inhabit there in deference to place. The policy or propriety of this forbearance—shall we call it pride? may well be questioned, when it is found that such performances as the one before us are suffered to prejudice and impair their rights. But that I am told that this pamphlet has had some sway with members of Congress, I should scarcely suppose that it needed any answer, since a moderate amount of thought and inquiry would soon lay bare its deficiencies, as an argument to any understanding. Mr. Campbell is one of those persons who work in figures,—a mode of discussion, which, in spite of the commercial proverb, is, of all others, the most likely to be disingenuous and dishonest. His figures have this character. To much of his opinions and statements, a sufficient answer will be found in the preceding papers. But, it may not be amiss, at the risk of saying things a second time, to consider them once more, seriatim.

"Surely," says Mr. Campbell, "an act which would greatly and injuriously affect the current literature of an entire community, and a community so numerous, and so generally capable of reading, as are the inhabitants of these United States, will not be passed unadvisedly by their representatives?"

I hope not. We concur in this aspiration of Mr. Campbell;—for really, the complaint of the American author is that, what has been done by Congress, in the present interest, has been done under very bad advice. But what is meant by the "current literature of an entire community?" Current prices of books is probably the thing intended to be said, for the current literature of a community must be its own, unborrowed; and that, as I have sufficiently shown, and as every body knows, has been injuriously affected,—nay, destroyed, by the existing condition of things among us;—as we assert, by the absence of a proper law of Copyright. Be as ingenious as you will, argue as profoundly,—yet, at the close, the truth stares you still in the face—native authorship is very fairly at an end. The native writer no longer finds entrance to the office of the publisher, and the very heat among us, are now compelled to publish for themselves, remain in abeyance, or turn to some other branch of business. There must be something terribly wrong, and needing prompt remedy, in a condition of things which drives a whole profession from a department of industry, to which they have hitherto addressed their lives. Their books are no longer published, and what have we in their place? Let the Representatives of the country ask themselves that question, and ask, further, in what degree the national mind and morals would be the worse for its total exclusion from the national press? But this writer argues improperly in another respect, indeed, the whole sentence is a begging of the question. He argues as if books were not to be published again—as if we were to deprive the people, at one fell swoop, of all their literary aliment—as if we were not only to exclude all modern British authors, but, as if no American were to take their place;—and as if the whole world and wealth of past British Literature—myriads of volumes, than which none better could be furnished to any people, were no longer attainable by the domestic publisher.

"Can, then, reasons be adduced which are sufficient to warrant such a procedure? It is thought not: the more particularly when it is recollected that in an arrangement between government and government, where much is conceded, something approximating at least to an equivalent is always expected in return."

Thus Mr. Campbell: In answer, we have to say, first, that we have no right to expect any thing in return for an act of simple justice. Next: we concede nothing to the British Government at all. That Government simply proposes to treat with us, on behalf of certain individuals of her community—as every good Government, considerate of the interests of its citizens should—and these individuals alone reap the benefits of the treaty. Thirdly. It is not true that there is to be no equivalent. It is an assumption in the face of the fact. The equivalents are twofold. In the first place, the books are themselves an equivalent, in the lessons which they teach, the knowledge which they bestow, the amusement they afford. Surely, if the American people had paid ten cents to Walter Scott for each work of his genius which they bought, instead of paying the whole profit to the American publisher, they would have had ample equivalent for the outlay in the treasures which they have gathered from his hands, and for which no return was ever given. For the second mode of equivalent let me refer you to my first letter, where I have shown you, from the excellent tables of Mr. Putnam, that, for many years, up to 1834, the original works, produced and published in America were equal to the number of European reprints in the same space of time. What, if a mutual system of Copyright prevailed in both countries, would it prevent the American author from disposing of his Copyright in Europe, on the same footing with the Englishman? We are told that the British prefer their own literature. Grant this to some extent, and yet, even after all allowance for British prejudice, the quid would be given us in very fair proportion to our claims. We have proof of this already—Cooper and Irving are writers who have always been in demand, and always well paid by the British publisher;—others might be named; and we see by the same tables of Mr. Putnam, that hundreds of American works have been republished in England, without the privity of the author, frequently without his name, and sometimes with a most base perversion of it to make it pass for original and European. Our reviews, magazines and newspapers, have, in this way, been furnishing occasional material, for many years, to the British journalists of corresponding character. In short, if the mutual system of Copyright prevailed, an American book would appear in England without any distinctive marks of its origin, other than those afforded by its contents. The publishers would offend no prejudices, if there were any, among the people. They are a class, very much alike, we suspect, in both countries—taking care to do nothing which should impair the sale of publications, which, if likely to be successful, they would accept at any hands. These British prejudices, we may add, do not seem particularly incorrigible, since I have before me a list of no less than fifty-six American novels, published as such, with the authors' names, by a single house in London. I have every assurance too, that they were bought and read with avidity. But, even if we had no authors, there would be no force in this objection of Mr. Campbell;—for we are not to argue against the capacity of a people to create, who have hitherto been denied by law the use of this capacity. This is arguing in a circle. We discourage them from making books, and then argue from their non-performance against their ability. Free the same people from these restraints—suffer them to enter equally into the same field with their competitors, and only then would the reproach and argument be legitimate in the event of their failure. Fettered by necessity, by convention, and the inappreciating and hostile opposition of such persons as Mr. Campbell, at home, and there is no occasion for wonder at their non-performance. That they should do any thing is the miracle. Leave it to our paper-manufacturers, and the chance is, that we should never possess a native volume for publication in either country.

“But the mischief which would arise from granting to transatlantic writers the exclusive privilege of republishing their works in this country, is by no means limited to a balance of dollars and cents. The rich might, and doubtless would, continue to purchase at the enhanced price, but what would be the condition of the middling and lower classes of our population, whose characteristics, be it remembered, is intelligence; and whence do they derive that intelligence which so honorably and happily distinguishes them from persons abroad in corresponding spheres of life? Why, from the circulation, to be sure, of every species of knowledge in the cheapest form put forth by rival publishers striving to supply the intellectual market on the lowest possible terms.”

This is plausible,—but nothing more. The ad captandum is easily disposed of. We take it, that the intelligence of our people was found and famed long before the era proverbially known among us as that of cheap literature. They are not much indebted for their wisdom to the labors of Sue and Dickens. If mere books were the sources of their intelligence, they have, as before suggested, the funded wealth of British Literature, from the days of St. Columbanus to those of our modern saint, Columbus—to descend no later;—Heaven knows a sufficiency for any appetite seeking knowledge and that moral succor which the soul and the affections demand at the hands of the intellect. These writings, in millions, are in our possession, and can not be taken from our grasp by the operations of any law of Copyright. So far, therefore, as the materials for making men wise are concerned, we are already endowed with very vast abundance. It is not then for the wisdom of the moderns, but the amusement which they offer that we demand their books. Well, the poor man confessedly has as much right,—perhaps a greater right,—to be amused, than any other person. But what is the value of the sort of amusement to him, his wife and innocent daughter, which is offered by much of the very cheap literature of the present day—and how much time has the poor man for reading the myriads of closely printed pages that are hourly set upon the shelves of the bookseller? Doubtless, the estimate of the paper manufacturer, on this subject, is very much the creature of his hope. He sees millions of sheets consumed in a single month—he fancies they are bought and read by the poor. He is mistaken, and we now begin to see, that these millions cease to be printed. Cheap books are getting to be less numerous. There may be too much of a good thing; for, after all, let the man be able to buy what he may desire, he still finds it a physical impossibility to spare the time for its perusal. Reducing the price to the most miserable standards, it was not only necessary to print in the most wretched style, but to put forth the most enormous quantity, in order to secure a moderate profit. The consequence is, that public appetite is gorged, and turns, with loathing, from the surfeit. There is, after all that is said of the intelligence of our people, a limit to the number of readers. Failing this calculation, our cheap publishers have been playing the game of the Kilkeny cats with each other—a matter, which, in all probability, will produce a very considerable change of opinion, before another year is well over, in the opinion even of some of our adversary pamphleteers. Let me not be understood as adverse to a cheapening of book publishing, having reference to prices as they were anterior to 1839, or '40. The error is in having made them too cheap. The present system is destroying publishers, and disgusting readers; and, by the way, when we look back to the circulating libraries, which the cheap system has broken up entirely, we are at a loss to see in what the popular intelligence could have reason to complain under the old prices. A good book might be procured from these libraries at twelve cents—a book in two volumes. The whole library was free to the student, at prices ranging from three to five dollars per annum. Here, the books were of superior character, of good print and paper, clear, open type, and the poor man might read just as much, or just as little, as he pleased. Now, he buys the book for something more than it cost him to read it then,—but what a book it is! He scarcely preserves it after one perusal, and the library copy was probably quite as cheap to him as the volume which he is now compelled to purchase. A little increase in price, would give him a book which he might place honorably upon his shelves, in his own little collection. In this way, it would frequently undergo perusal. The book that he now buys, he is not apt to read a second time. The very type and paper are opposed to such a performance. He reads it in the first instance, only for its novelty: and, with this object, the old circulating library, at five dollars per annum, would be the better form of publication for him.

To show how great the passion is for reading among our people, and, in this way to work upon the country members, the following ridiculous passage is taken by our pamphleteer from one of the speeches of Mr. Dickens, while in this country. Alluding to the heroine in one of his tales, he says, "I had letters about that child in England from dwellers in log-houses, among the morasses and swamps of the far west. Many a sturdy hand, hard with the axe and spade, and browned by the summer's sun, has taken up his pen and written to me."

Now, if Mr. Dickens' head had not been unhappily turned by the gross adulation which he received in this country—had he not been so grossly ignorant, and so wanting in all philosophical respects,—he would never have permitted himself to speak this nonsense. I happen to know the source of some of these letters to Mr. Dickens,—nor to him alone—for they are written to every foreign author as soon as his name becomes tolerably well known among us. They come from no hard-handed laborers of the country, "hard with axe and spade and browned by the summer's sun." Their writers use few heavier implements than comb, and brush, and cane, and goose quill. They may be traced to clever young professional adventurers in villages, half trading and half rural, where idle time is in abundance, and where a restless vanity begets an itch for notoriety which makes the possessor but too frequently forgetful of what is proper. There is a large class of this sort of foolish people who actually correspond with all British authors of any repute. They would be unknown else. This is their ambition and they make the most of it. The foreign author, pleased with the expression of an adventurer—(which is seldom qualified by propriety or sense)—from an individual in a distant country,—and assuming our western country to be a sort of wilderness—ignorant of the character of the letter writer, and of the motive for his expressed admiration, considers the compliment—as Lord Byron did—as a sort of foretaste of immortality. It is the homage of posterity to him. The motive of this "dweller in log-houses" is really the vanity of the individual, seeking a miserable notoriety, by boasting of the correspondence with distinguished persons. English writers are thus frequently imposed upon, and made to form improper notions of people and country, which leads, sometimes, to their grievous disappointment when they come among us. Mr. Dickens, himself, found out his mistake as to the position of his correspondents long before he got back to England. He found that they were neither hard-handed farmers, nor yet persons occupying respectable positions in the literary ranks of the country. In short, his tributes were not those of a heart, overburdened with delight and admiration, but with vanity and weakness—they were not the spontaneous effusion of a simple, worshipping people, but of inane and shallow youth, with a passion for notoriety, which their slender wits enabled them in no other way to gratify. These persons are really a most shocking nuisance. They do not confine their attentions to the foreigner, but bestow them very equally upon the native. I fancy there is scarcely an American writer, of any repute, male or female, who has not been pestered, by letters complimentary, congratulatory and soliciting, from persons of whom they know nothing, and whose only avowed object is the pouring forth of their full hearts in tribute to one to whom they profess a world of gratitude, which they can show in no better way than by—increasing his—bill of postage. Had not Mr. Dickens been blinded by his self-delusions while in America, he would have forborne this petty egotism, in conjecturing the real character of his "hard-handed" correspondents. At all events, we must not be deluded in like manner. Our Senators in Congress must not share the error of the foreign author, and legislate solely in reference to the sale of seven-penny pamphlets to a people, who, for the use they make of them, would be just as likely to buy them at seven pounds.

"Now, it may be asked," continues Mr. Campbell, "how did these intelligent farmers of the far West obtain the pleasure and reap the advantage of perusing the productions of our gifted guest? By purchasing his Copyright works—every one a guinea!"

This question has been repeatedly answered. The point will be found elsewhere noticed in these letters. The assumption here, that English prices would influence the American market, in the event of a cession of Copyright to the foreigner, is an absurdity which should be obvious to a little examination. The very fact which Mr. Campbell himself shows, that, at a guinea a copy, the work would not find purchasers, in this country, is conclusive that such a price would never be demanded. The publisher in every country asks just what he is likely to get, and no more. His prices would be regulated by those of the American writer, and by the ability of the American people. If he demanded more than the former, he would be driven from the market entirely, subjected to a competition which now he does not feel. In the event of the passage of a mutual Copyright Law, hundreds of British writers would be besieging the American publisher, and the choice afforded him by their numbers, would place them very much as the native author is now, at the mercy of the tradesman. The advantage to the native author would be, simply in being placed on the same footing with his competitor. He might even possess another. The domestic publisher, required to pay as well for his foreign as native material, might then very naturally allow his patriotism to influence, in some degree, his choice in favor of his countryman. When Mr. D'Israeli says, (on dit) "Give us this law, and the people of America shall never read my books for a less price than my own countrymen," he speaks very much like a simpleton; but I doubt the whole story. Mr. D'Israeli must see that such a declaration involves an absurdity. He must suppose that his writings are so absolutely essential to the American public that they will have them at any price. Now, the fact is, that the American public know nothing of Mr. D'Israeli's books until they are printed and put before them, at shilling prices, by the American publisher. They can spare better men than himself and be conscious of no loss. But this paltry anecdote is very fitly employed to introduce the following disingenuous statement. Here are some samples of lying figures:—loquitur, Mr. Campbell:

"To illustrate the prices which the public would have to pay for English books, protected by an American statute, a few examples will suffice: The publishing price of the Pickwick papers, illustrated, in

England, is	-	-	-	$5 00
The same work published here, is	-	-	-	2 00
Nicholas Nickleby in England,	-	-	-	5 00
" " " " America,	-	-	-	2 00
" " " " plain edition,	-	-	-	75
D'Israeli's Amenities of Literature, English,	10	00
" " " " American,	1	75

And in the more serious and important departments of literature the difference is equally great:

Jay's Morning Exercises, English,	-	$5 00
" " " " American,	-	1 00
Jay's Prayers, English,	-	2 25
" " " " American,	-	25
Rowland Hill's Memoirs, English,	-	2 50
" " " " American,	-	87½
Hannah More's Life, English,	-	5 00
" " " " American,	-	1 50
Turner's Sacred History, English,	-	10 00
" " " " American,	-	1 35
Scott's Bible, English,	-	20 00
" " " " American,	-	5 00
Southey's Poetical Works, English,	-	12 50
" " " " American,	-	3 50

Again: from the appendix, "where," says the writer, "a few additional examples are given because they illustrate, although they can not strengthen truths already beyond the reach of cavil." We shall see this hereafter. But with the "example."

"The publishing price in England of Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, &c., is	-	$14 00
The same work here, is	-	5 00
Alison's History of Europe, English copy,	45	00
The same work here,	-	4 50
Brande's Encyclopedia of Sciences, &c.
(English,) - - -	-	14 00
The same here, - - -	-	3 00
D'Aubigne's Reformation, English,	-	8 00
" " " " American,	-	3 00
" " " " cheap,	-	1 00

These may be facts, so far as they go. But facts are not truths, and figures, true in themselves, may yet, in the course of an argument, be made the instruments of very wholesale lying. Facts will make truths if you can get enough of them. Unfortunately, our author has here omitted to bring forward some, which belong to the collection, and which are vitally important to our issue. Giving him due credit for an acquaintance with his subject, I am constrained to think that he was not wholly ignorant of the effect of his omission at the time of making it. In short, his statement of the case is a most disingenuous one. Let further facts show. Undoubtedly, his object is to prove, by those given, that the monstrous disparity between the English and the American prices, is the result of Copyright—comes from the fact that the amount demanded by the author occasions the greater expensiveness of the work in England. This is the only point material to the argument, since the object is to dissuade the American Congress, for this very reason, from giving the Copyright privilege in this country to the foreign author. Now, what shall we say to this, when we are told, that the authors of several of these works named, never received a cent for their Copyrights; and that, when they are paid, the amount received forms one of the smallest items in the outlay of the publisher, and makes scarcely a perceptible difference in the price to the public. Thousands of novels, such as Bulwer's, Dickens', James', &c., are published at a guinea in London, for which the author never gets a stiver. American books republished there, have brought a guinea, though the author here never received even a copy of the work by way of recompense. You must look for some other cause for this disparity of price. It must not be saddled upon the author. Fortunately, it needs but a glance at the respective editions, English and American, to reveal the true nature of, and occasion for, the difference. It consists in the superior beauty and costliness of the English edition. The two heaviest items in the publication of every book are the type-setting and the paper. The cost of the former diminishes with every additional copy printed, while that of the latter remains the same. The English publisher addresses himself to the wealthier classes of the country—for Europe has no poor reading public like the United States—a reading public commensurate, in some degree, with the population in all our densely settled communities;—puts forth small editions, ranging from five to fifteen hundred copies, and distinguished by all the luxury of large type, broad margin, and thick, white, linen paper. The American publisher, addressing himself to a poorer, but more extensively reading people,—stereotypes the publication, so that he can publish countless copies from fixed plates, compresses the English work from three, or even five, volumes, into one, by means of the smallest possible type, and issues his editions of from two to twenty thousand copies. If the English publisher had to deal with an American instead of an English public, he would pursue the same course, work in like manner, and publish just the same editions. He would soon learn what our people can best afford; and, as his policy is precisely that of our own publisher, to adapt his works to the market, and find a ready sale, he would very soon ascertain its resources and necessities. For that matter, you have only to take off your duties upon English books altogether—let them come in free of duty, and, my life on it, neither English nor American authors would ever trouble you farther on the score of International Copyright. What the domestic manufacturer might say is quite another matter. It would then only suffice to secure Copyright in the one country—England—there would be little danger of piracy here. If English mind is good enough for us, English print certainly is. Their books would then come to us in far better style than our own, at much less, or equally low prices. They would underwork paper-maker and book-maker, in such a fashion, as to leave both parties absolute time enough for pamphleteering. To illustrate what I have been saying, suppose we look to a few additional figures. They have been gathered hastily in an application to one of the importers of European books in this city. Some of the examples of Mr. Campbell have been left unnoticed, simply as the English editions are not to be procured among us;—but enough is known of all of them, to determine, as I have said, that the disparity of price is the result of the mechanical execution only,—that the price of Copyright has nothing to do with it. But, to our table:—

Jay's Exercises, English edition,	-	2 vols.	8 vo.
" " American, "	-	1 "	12 mo.
" Prayers, English, "	-	1 "	8 vo.
" " American, "	-	1 "	18 mo.
Turner's Sacred History, English edition,	-	3 "	8 vo.

Turner's Sacred History, American edition,	-	-	2 "	18 mo.
Southey's Works, English edition,	10	"	12 mo.
" " American, "	-	1	"	8 vo.

Now, I assert, without fear of contradiction from any honest publisher who knows his business, that a single glance at these respective editions will be enough to account satisfactorily for the difference in their prices—nay, to make it greater;—for the American publisher's edition is, of the two, by far the most profitable. The Copyright, even when paid, forms one of the most insignificant items, and does not perceptibly influence the cost of publication. The difference, in the style of all these works, is prodigious, and to be understood only by subjecting them to the familiar examination of touch and sight. The English books are invariably of large open print, on fine, white, linen paper, which will endure for ever. The American are on very inferior paper, much of it dingy, all of it flimsy, and without any durable properties whatever. The type is miserably small and hurtful to the eye. The difference of cost in paper, type and press-work, will be easily understood by a reference to the relative size and number of these pages, in the two styles of publication. I take a work, for an example, to which Mr. Campbell has made special reference—the History of Europe by Mr. Alison. The English edition is quoted by Mr. Campbell at $45; the American at $5. A wonderful disparity indeed,—but less striking, upon examination, than it seems at first sight. Let me indicate some of the discrepancies. Forty-five dollars is the price of the English work, only in the American market. In London, it may be got for a fraction over $30. A part of the additional 50 per cent, which attaches to the imported work, is the duty—our tariff—for which, my dear Mr. Holmes, we are somewhat indebted to yourself and your brothers in Congress, who let in rail road iron free of duty, while the charges on foreign books are absolutely rated by the pound. Fifty per cent is the usual addition by the American bookseller, to the cost of English books imported, to cover duty, insurances and difference of exchange. The English Alison, then, lowered to $30, and it becomes, in one sense, a far cheaper book than the American at $5. Look at the difference in manufacture. Indeed, they are not the same books. The English Alison is a splendid octavo in ten volumes. The American is contained in four. The English type is lead; the American close. The English is twice the size of the American type. There is a spacious margin to the page instead of a narrow one, and the paper is fine, stout and made of linen. The American, though a very good paper, according to our notions, is yet very far inferior. The superior quantity of paper consumed by the English copy may be understood by the fact that, though the page of both editions is precisely the same in size, yet the English copy is spread over no less than 8,275 pages, while the American is crowded into less than 2,500. When you have compared and contrasted the quality of the paper, and the number of sheets respectively consumed in the two works, you will see that the "figures" and "tables" of Mr. Campbell are a miserable delusion, which could impose upon nobody at all disposed to look closely into the matter. Our pamphleteers rely very much upon the little interest which Senators in Congress take in matters which do not excite the national mind. All the difference in price, between the books of the two countries, is due to the fact that the publications referred to are not the same in both. Our pamphleteer has contrasted, not compared the several publications. He has put in opposition the most splendid issues of the English press—works, costly because of the great excellence and beauty of their manufacture,—with the most cheap and unattractive of the American. Nor has he given English prices as I am able to give them. I have before me now a beautiful English edition of D'Aubigne, in 3 vols., quoted by him at $8, for which I pay but $3 50 in Charleston. By an English circular which now lies before me, I find that Ure's Dictionary is sold in England at $11 12 instead of $14;—Southey's Works $11 12 instead of $12 50, and a similar discrepancy exists in the prices of nearly all the rest. In comparing these wholly dissimilar things, the writer must have calculated largely on the indifference of the American Senate to the subject. A few American samples may not be amiss, to show the mistake—to call it by the least offensive name of which he has committed. For example, I can procure an American edition of Scott's poetical writings for fifty cents. Another edition of the same works is before me now, costing $9. An American Shakespeare may be had among us for $2, while there are other American editions which cost $15. Again, I have an English Spenser, which cost me but $2. There is an American edition of the same work which sells for $18—if it sells at all. It would be an absurdity, not to say impertinence, to report these prices as determining any thing with reference to this argument, and hence the miserable balderdash contained in a farther table of examples, where Mr. Campbell proceeds to show the price of American books as influenced by Copyright. Let us quote them:

"Sparks' Washington,	-	1 vol.	-	$4 50
Bancroft's United States,	-	3 "	-	6 50
Irving's Columbus,	-	3 "	-	7 50
" " cheap edition,	-	2 "	-	3 50
Prescott's Ferd. & Isab.	-	4 "	-	7 50
Stevens' Travels in Central Am.,	-	2 "	-	5 00

Had Mr. Campbell been disposed to make his case a fair one he should have shown

Meyer's Mexico,	-	1 vol.	-	$2 00
-----------------	---	--------	---	--------

Bradford's Antiquities,	-	1 vol.	-	75
Norman's Yucatan,	-	2 "	-	1 00
Headley's Italy,	-	1 "	-	25
Cooper's Novels	-	1 "	-	50

Not to speak of numerous original works, at 25 cents and even lower. All these are Copyright works as well as the preceding, and neither table has any bearing upon the question. In both cases, the cost of Copyrights, forms one of the least essential items. If the works quoted above, by Mr. Campbell, had been shown to be in the same inferior style as the English reprints which are shown to be so much cheaper, there would be something in the argument;—but this is not the case. Let the reader compare the American editions of English books with those of the native authors thus quoted, and he will discover an immeasurable difference between the mechanical aspect of the two. The works of Bancroft, Sparks, Irving, Prescott and Stephens, are on beautiful paper, full of costly plates and maps, and done up very much in emulation of the English style. It is this mechanical difference which constitutes the real occasion for the difference in price; and, though it is unquestionably true, as Mr. Campbell asserts, that publishers find it pleasanter to sell 1,000 copies of a book at $5, than 5,000 at $1, still, I am prepared to believe that the latter price, and the cheaper mode of publication, would, in the end, be much more profitable for the author. He would make more money. He has very little or nothing to do with the style and prices with which his book is set forth. These depend almost wholly upon the publisher, who knows what the market will bear, and upon what class of books he may expend his skill and fix high prices. You will do well to note the fact, that all Mr. Campbell's examples, in this table, have been drawn entirely from works of American history. This is a department of letters in which the laborers are necessarily few, the publications are unfrequent, and of a class to discourage competition. The subjects of this nature are soon exhausted. These works require labor and erudition, rather than the creative or endowing faculty. They may almost be said to belong to the fixed sciences, and one good work, on either of the subjects named, will suffice a people for a century. It is only to assure the public of the faithfulness of the historian, of his industry in accumulating the proper facts, of his skill in displaying them, and there is little danger of any rival treading in his footsteps. Such is the condition, such are the securities, of all writers of history. Such is peculiarly the security of the American. The exceptions to this security, are when the historian becomes a partisan, and provokes into dissent the representative minds of persons thinking differently of the facts from himself, denying his authorities and conclusions, and travelling over the same ground in order to reverse his decisions. Such were the labors of Hume, on the one hand, and Lingard on the other, in their several histories of Great Britain. The recent history of Mr. Alison, representing the aristocratic party of Europe, will undoubtedly have the effect of compelling the democratic analysis of the same materials, with the view of counteracting the influence of that able, but jaundiced and bigoted performance. American writers of history have confined themselves chiefly to their own country. With this, they are naturally more familiar—more deeply interested in the subject, they have yielded it more attention than is likely to be accorded it by foreign writers;—and with little present occasion for partisanship, in narrating the events of the past, they are not likely to provoke competition in their labors, either at home or abroad. It is on the strength of these circumstances that the publishers rely, when they put forth costly editions and charge for them accordingly. But these reasons do not apply to the writers of poetry and romance, or of any of the departments which call chiefly for the original and creative faculty. These depend upon the individual genius of the author, and are liable to floods of foreign competition. To show that such is the case, let us draw attention to the price of this class of books, as well before, as since the era of cheap literature. The American works of fiction have been always nearly as cheap as the English reprints in America. For example, English novels in 2 volumes, printed by Lea & Blanchard, and Carey & Hart, usually sold at $1 50 or $1 75 in the stores, while those of the American, the Copyright works, never exceeded $2,—and this, so late as 1830. Walter Scott's novels, as they appeared, brought the same price as those of Fenimore Cooper, and no Copyright was paid for them. Where there was a trifle of fifteen or twenty-five cents difference between them, this may be assumed to have been the amount paid the domestic author for his copy. The difference was seldom more. Harper and Brothers first brought down the price of these reprints, taking the field somewhere about 1828, or '30, and issuing their novels at an average retail price of $1. But prices again rose, subject to occasional alternations—to an occasional fall at retail, from $1 50 to 50 cents—but only when there was a prospect of struggle between two of the publishers for the foreign spoil—when there was a supposed necessity for bringing a refractory rival to his good behavior. The substantial lowering, both of English and American books, was the result of that greater conflict among the appropriators, large and small, which we designate, par excellence, the era of cheap literature. As we did not owe the previous costliness of English books to Copyright, so we do not owe the latter-day reform in prices to patriotism. We certainly owe something to this reform. It taught us, as I have said before, that books can be made cheaper to the public, and there is no good reason why it should not be so. I repeat, that the author had little or nothing to do, at any time, with the prices imposed by the publishers. Whether they put forth rich and fine, or poor or base editions, is scarcely within his province. In fact, authors are but little regarded by the publishers in either country—their opinions are not often asked in matters of publication—but few of them are paid, and the only question which remains is, whether any shall be paid. An International Copyright Law will not increase the pay of the American author, except as it increases his employment. His true object is to get employment; an object which he now must seek in vain, so long as British books are abundant, and at the mercy of the domestic publisher. The proposed measure will cheapen books rather than make them costly. British publishers will transfer themselves to this country and enter into competition with our own. They will become our own. Editions will be issued from the same face of type, for all sorts of customers, some on fine and some on inferior paper, some bound and some in sheets. The competition between the publishers, with that which must necessarily take place between the authors,—then, for the first time, brought into opposition—will not only bring out the strength of both, but will probably have the effect of improving somewhat the manufacture of books without adding any thing to present prices. The profits will be found in daily increasing editions, and the sale of more numerous copies.

To afford some additional tables, which Mr. Campbell might not so well include in his collection, I will indicate a class of publications in England and America, by which we may better illustrate the respective difference of price of which we have been speaking—by which, indeed, we may get some tolerable glimpse of what free trade in the literary commerce of the two countries might do for us in the United States. Here, then, are the American reprints of the four reviews of Great Britain. These reprints, which are quite respectable, and really about the cheapest works issued in our country, are sold to subscribers at $3 per annum. But what if I can get the English work itself, with all its superiority of print and paper, delivered to me here, in Charleston, at $3 50! A superior style of publication, a better book for the library, better for the eyes, better for durability, with twice or thrice as many pages. Here, then, is Copyright literature, and no doubt the best paid literature in Great Britain, coming to us, with all the advantages of British costume, at prices almost equally low with the reprints of the same work among ourselves. Once more,—let Congress but remove its duties from English books altogether, and we will say no more about Copyright. But what will Mr. Campbell say?

The appendix of this pamphlet is addressed to the arguments of the American Copyright Club, with which I have nothing to do, and which needs that nothing should be said. What truly concerns this question has been sufficiently discussed in these sheets already. But I again repeat my protest against the use of the name of Senator Berrien, for the purpose of giving authority to opinions for which I no where find him responsible. I must also add my regrets, that, if the Senatorial committee "were prepared to report so decidedly against" the proposed law of International Copyright, they did not do so, and relieve themselves and the public. That a person, confessedly, deeply and pecuniarily interested in opposition to the measure, should be prepared and permitted to report his private opinions, with all the advantages of an official sanction, without subjecting the learned committee to the responsibilities of such a proceeding, is an injustice to the applicants for the law, and betrays a prejudice and partiality, which, of itself, should be sufficient to do away with the force of any adverse decision upon the subject, which they might make.

"It is proper to add," says Mr. Campbell, "in justice to the Messrs. Harpers, that they have been at all times ready to admit that the Copyright Law might be of great pecuniary benefit to them, yet they refrain from taking any active part in the controversy—not having the confidence to join in a petition to Congress for the passage of a law, which, while it would benefit themselves, would be a heavy tax upon the American people."

Harper and Brothers will scarcely tell me this. In 1835-'36, they were opposed to the measure. At this moment, J. W. Harper, one of the brothers, an amiable and sensible fellow, is a member of the American Copyright Club, and thus, one of the petitioners to Congress for the very measure in question. Only last summer, I myself had the assurance of another member of the firm, that they approved of the application, but were unwilling to show themselves active, because of their former hostility. They did not wish to receive the reproach of inconsistency. I confess myself shocked that any such reason should be furnished for their inactivity on the Copyright measure as that given in the note of Mr. Campbell—a species of canting and hypocrisy of which the sorriest publisher in any country would hardly be guilty, and might well be ashamed of.

Something is said, at the close of this pamphlet, about the abuse and blackguardism, to which our country is subjected, by British authors, in British books. An extract is given from Jack Hintoe. Nothing can be made of this fact, or of any like it, as an argument in opposition to the extension of the Copyright privilege. If this abuse were an evil to be feared, such an extension of Copyright would be a very good mode for relieving ourselves from it, since authors are not likely to abuse their customers. But does not Mr. Campbell see, and does not Mr. Berrien, with the Senate committee, see, that there can be no better security against this sort of thing than in having authors of our own? What should we say to the American statesman, who, to keep British ships from bombarding ours, should break up our own vessels, and invite those of the enemy to take their places in our waters? The cases are analogous. Our securities against foreign injustice, slander and reproach, are to be found in native authorship, as certainly as that our protection against a maritime enemy, is in having an adequate number of stout frigates of our own.

I am sir, with very great respect,

Your ob't servant, &c.,

W. GILMORE SIMMS.

NATURE'S LESSON.

BY A. B. MEEK.

The face of Nature lives with beauty,
But man neglects the bright display;
All-unobservant of his duty,
He wears a sightless life away!

How sweet the rosy morning breaking
O'er dewy lawn and wooded hill!—
Fair alchemist!—all-golden making
The waving grove, the rippling rill!

Goes with the sun imperial splendor
O'er sea and sky and festal earth;
From blue-browed noon to twilight tender,
Each way, are orbs of heavenly birth!

When far away, 'mid flashing banners,
A countless army,—sinks the sun,
What watch-fires light the blue Savannahs,
With spirit-guards 'round every one!

All through the night they burn and brighten,
The outposts of the heavenly land,
Beneath their rays the hill-tops whiten,
And still as spell-bound giants stand!

And oh the moon!—pale mother Mary!—
How fair she makes the balmy night!—
Her brow may wane, her beauty vary,
Through all her presence is delight!

Yes, ever lovely!—earth and ocean
Feel fairer in her silvery beam:—
The swan of heaven!—with stateliest motion
She cleaves her blue, star-pebbled stream!

Lo! like an arch by angels bended,
For triumph high in Spirit Land,
Enwreathed with flowers all-hued and blended,—
The rainbow o'er the valley spanned!

Almost it seems with beauty vital;
The valley glows 'neath its embrace;
And yon clear stream, with proud requital,
Slides through its deeply mirrored grace.

All things around thus tell of Eden,
If man would only list and look;
All have a beauty art exceeding,
From sunset's pomp to crystal brook.

The Seasons,—each a new creation,—
In linked circles press around;
"Let there be light!"—the revelation
Responsive clothes the ædæal ground.

When Spring o'er hill and dell is blushing,—
A country girl all smiles and flowers!—
What constant melody is gushing
From countless minstrels through the bowers!

The crimson Summer has his glory,
And mellow Autumn rainbow light,
And Winter, sear-like, all hoary,
Sparkles with gems and robes of white!

These things are given us to inspire
A love for Nature's gentle face,
Make man more willing to admire
His beauty-built dwelling-place.

Oh yes! if we would listen to it,
The anthem 'round, below, above,
Each heart would leap to life—a poet!—
Each soul be brimmed with bliss and love!

For I have learned these pregnant lessons,—
The soul is fashioned by the spheres,— Imperishable in its essence,
It still the chain of Nature wears!

By beauty into beauty moulded,
Or marred by blackness and by storm,
From influences which enfold it,
It takes its coloring and its form.

Who then would perfect strength inherit,
Must feed his soul at Beauty's fount—
The breast of Nature,—and his spirit,
In triumph, thence will starward mount.

TO MY MOTHER.

BY J. STRONG RICE.

Gentle mother hear thy child,
Listen to the song he sings,
Thou who never hast beguiled,
Bless his weak essaying wings.

Let the sweet commending word
Full of mellow thought for him,
Breaking on thy lip be heard,
In the painful interim.

'Twixt the offer and the choice,
When the Tempter whispers low,
Let thy purpose-giving voice
Nerve him to defeat the foe.

Follow in the path he takes
By the river and the rill;
O'er the realm dividing lakes
Let thy spirit keep him still.

While he struggles on with fate
Darkly in the western wild,
By thy pow'r at Heaven's gate
From the evil keep thy child.

We give below the conclusion of the Essay of one of our most valued contributors, upon "THE POLITICAL EFFECTS of the relation between the Caucasian Master and the African Slave." The "moral effects" were considered in the June Messenger. The reader is aware, that the Essay was intended to be read before the National Institute, at its general meeting in April last, in Washington. It would have presented a fine opportunity for the South to be heard upon a subject of which many are so blindly ignorant, and a proper understanding of which is necessary for the rights and security of the South. But the discussion, mild and philosophical as it is, had to be forborne. Deeply is it to be deplored that there are any interests in our Union, so dear and vital to a large portion of the States, that can not even be vindicated, on a national rostrum, and at the bar of Philosophy.—[Ed. Mess.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SOU. LIT. MESSENGER.

Dear Sir,—I send you the second part of the paper intended to have been read before the National Institute in April last. When I wrote it, I had not seen Carlyle's work, "The Past and Present." I had accidentally seen in a newspaper one passage to which I have already adverted: recently, I have met with that publication, and was agreeably surprised at the similarity between its first chapter, and the concluding portion of this Essay.

I have omitted to mention a fact that may give it an interest in the eyes of some readers. When I found that it would not be proper to read it before the Institute, I should have desisted from the undertaking, but for the request of my lamented friend, the late Secretary of State. We had frequently conversed on the subject and his views fully coincided with my own. This fact alone should have great weight with those who remember the surpassing benevolence that distinguished that wise and good man. He believed that the view that I have presented ought to influence the minds of the truly benevolent and pious; and we both hoped that it might induce many such to hesitate to pause—to inquire before taking any further steps in a crusade against an institution so much misunderstood.

We both, moreover, thought it desirable to call the attention of our own countrymen to the value of this element in our social system, as a means of facilitating the tasks of Government, and perpetuating our existing political institutions.

This is the purpose of this second part.

AN ESSAY

On the Moral and Political Effect of the Relation between

THE CAUCASIAN MASTER AND THE AFRICAN SLAVE.

Intended to have been read before the National Institute at their meeting in April, 1844.

If your minds have not rejected, as wholly fallacious, all that I have already said, I flatter myself that what I have to offer on behalf of the political effect of slavery, as it exists among us, will be favorably received. I do not propose to speak of it as an element of wealth. That branch of the subject I leave to the political economists, by whom it is generally condemned. Be it so. I am content to acquiesce in their judgment. But there is something better than wealth. It is Happiness, of which wealth is but an instrument. There are some things too more conducive to Happiness than Wealth. These are order, harmony, tranquillity, and security. The influence of this institution on these—its place and its value in the mechanism of political society are what I propose now to consider.

When God first cursed the earth for the sin of man, he commanded it no more to bring forth spontaneously the grains and fruits necessary for his subsistence, but doomed him to earn and eat his bread in the sweat of his face. To understand from this that no man from thenceforth should ever eat the bread of idleness, would be, "to make God a liar." But the fulfilment of the denunciation against the race of Adam collectively is found in this: that, though some are permitted to pass their lives in uneasy and unprofitable sloth, the great mass of mankind must spend their days in toil, or starve.

"Wisdom cometh by the opportunity of leisure," and to him "whose life is between the handles of the plough," this opportunity is denied. Hence the curse that dooms the mass of mankind to toil, dooms them also to ignorance. When the former penalty is recalled the latter may be remitted. Not till then.

You will not think me so absurd as to mean that there is no intellectual excellence, no wisdom, except among those who enjoy the advantages of regular education. We know this not to be true; and our own community abounds with examples to the contrary. But that native energy of mind, which, in its upward spring, throws off the depressing weight of poverty, is a rare endowment. He who possesses it, presently separates himself from the class in which he had been placed, by a blunder of fortune; and one of the first uses that he makes of his superior powers is to secure to himself the advantages of education, which others, misunderstanding the secret of his success, foolishly undervalue. He, whose mind God has enlightened with that Wisdom, which is the heritage of such favored beings, chooses Wisdom as his portion. The fool alone chooses folly, and remains content in ignorance. The proposition still remains true, that he whose lot is a lot of abject toil, whether he were born to it, or has sunk down to it, by his own proper weight, is necessarily destitute of that enlightened wisdom, which might qualify him to take his place in councils whose deliberations concern the happiness of millions.

The fact that instances of men rising to distinction from a low condition are more frequent in the United States than elsewhere, is but a confirmation of what I have said. The wages of labor here are such as to afford the laborer much leisure for mental cultivation, if he prefers that to idleness or dissipation. None of the walks of life are fully occupied, and for every youth, however humble, who makes any display of intellectual power, there is always a place to be found, in which he can cultivate his mind, and earn his bread at the same time. Such have been the facilities by which all such, among ourselves, have attained the vantage ground from which they afterwards mounted to eminence.

When men act together in large bodies, he who would lead must sometimes be content to follow. That he may make his wisdom the wisdom of other men, he must adopt something of their folly, just as he who would stop a falling weight, must yield to the shock. To a certain extent this is perhaps desirable. Wise men, taking counsel only of each other, might forget to make allowances for others not so wise as themselves. The presence of a few fools may be necessary to remind them, that they are acting for fools, as well as for wise men. Thus it is, that in a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom; and if fools could learn as readily from wise men, as wise men learn from fools, the multitude could not be too indiscriminate.

But, unfortunately, it is not so; and no man who has had occasion to witness what is done, in numerous deliberative bodies, can fail to have observed that much good is marred, and much mischief is done, from the necessity of conceding too much to the prejudices of the ignorant. Whatever good, wise and practical men may be able to extract from their commerce with fools, it is only under the management of the wise that good can be made of it. But take the mass of mankind, in any country upon earth, and refer, directly and without debate to the vote of a majority of these all questions of municipal regulation and foreign policy, assigning, in every instance, as much weight to the suffrage of one as to that of another, and no man can calculate the disastrous consequences that might ensue.

Something like this is done in every country, which refers the choice of its lawgivers and magistrates to universal suffrage. The effect is always mischievous. Under peculiar, and very advantageous circumstances, it is not necessarily fatal, and hence it is that we are enabled to deceive ourselves, while observing the operation of universal suffrage, in those States of the Union where it prevails. In a country where much land is unappropriated, and where a much larger proportion remains as so much dead capital in the hands of the owner, for want of purchasers to buy or laborers to cultivate it, the tasks of Government are few and simple and of easy execution. Its business is altogether with individuals—to regulate their conduct, to punish their crimes, and to adjust their controversies. It performs no function not within the competency of conservators of the Peace, Constables, and the ordinary Courts of Justice. It is little more than a loose and careless police, and a system of regulated arbitration. With men in masses it has nothing to do. The only distinctions in society are produced by the tastes and caprices of individuals. As these may prompt they will arrange themselves into cliques and coteries, but, politically speaking, there is but one class and one interest. The right of personal liberty is alike precious to all men, and, where all have property, the right of property will be held sacred by all, and the legislation which is best for some will be best for all. There will be therefore no misgovernment, but such as is produced by well-intentioned blunders. Even against these there is an important security in that state of society. There is no just ground of jealousy between the rich and poor, the enlightened and ignorant. Demagogues indeed, striving to imitate what is done elsewhere, and to rise to power by means for which society is not prepared, may seek to inspire this jealousy, but they will find it difficult to do so, until misgovernment affords occasions to deceive and corrupt the people. Until then, the natural instinct of man disposes to mutual confidence, and the blind submit to be led by those who can see, and have no inducement to lead them astray.

It is not until the progress of society has distributed mankind into different classes, having distinct and conflicting interests, that the political action of Government commences, and the wisdom of its political structure is put to any test.* To adjust these interests and to accommodate the strifes which arise from them, is the great problem for the Statesman. All experience has shown that the more powerful class will sacrifice the interests of the weaker, whenever its own can be advanced by doing so. It makes no difference what is the source or character of the power thus wielded. Such is the use that always has been, and always will be made of it.†

The temptations to this abuse of power are not always equally strong. They may be counteracted by conscientious scruples, in some cases, in some by the fear of consequences; and in others, power may be baffled by the superior intelligence and address of the weaker party, or defeated by the treachery of its own agents. All these diversities may be illustrated by the conflict of interests between the rich and poor in any community.

1. TEMPTATION. If we suppose the moral qualities of prudence and justice to be distributed alike throughout the whole, we certainly make a supposition at least as favorable to the poorer class as the history of human nature will justify. Now, under a Constitution which should lodge the powers of Government in the hands of the smaller class of wealthy men, there is certainly some temptation to abuse their power over the poor. But this is not a temptation that addresses itself strongly to the interests of the ruling party. There is, unhappily in too many, a pleasure in the indulgence of an arrogant and insolent disposition to trample on the helpless; but, from the nature of the thing, the plunder of the poor is an unproductive fund; and the little that can be gained by it would be of small value in the estimation of those already rolling in affluence. Reverse the case, and we shall see a very different result. The temptation to a hungry multitude, armed with political authority, to gorge themselves with the superfluities of the rich would be such as human nature cannot be expected to resist.

* "Clearly a difficult point for Government," says Carlyle, "that of dealing with these masses, if indeed it be not the sole point and problem of Government, and all others mere accidental crotchets, superficialities, and beating of the wind."—French Revolution, vol. 1, p. 44. Again he says, "Some happy continents, as the Western one, with its Savannas, where whosoever has four willing limbs finds food under his feet, and an infinite sky over his head, can do without Governing."—Id. p. 268.

† It is not meant that political power will be always thus abused. It may be held in check and in awe by physical power. The Aristocracy of France blindly disregarding the danger of oppressing the subject mass, defied the naked rabble of sans culottism. The aristocracy of Great Britain, made wise by their experience, treats Chartism in quite another guise, and recognises the unrepresented classes as the proper objects of the paternal care of Government. Benevolence has doubtless much to do with this; but the rod is a marvellous improver of all the virtues.

2. CONSCIENCE. The injustice of a course of legislation intended to enrich one class at the expense of another, should, in either case, deter the party in power from such a course. But how much more striking is that injustice, when the portion of the community to be plundered is already in a state of penury, and the portion to be enriched is already rich, than when the reverse of all this is the case! In the first case, no sophistry can be devised to palliate such an abuse of power. In the latter, a thousand texts may be drawn from the Bible itself, capable of being so perverted as to afford a plausible justification of it. So true is this, that in every country, where public opinion exercises a distinct influence on legislation, though the multitude be not directly represented, Charity (which from its nature should be gratuitous) is compulsory, established as a system, and enacted by law.

3. DANGER OF CONSEQUENCES. The abuse of constitutional power and prerogative in the hands of a privileged few is always dangerous to themselves. As a general proposition it may be said, that the physical power is always on the side of numbers, and the power of the few depends for its security on opinion. This opinion must not be outraged by oppression, or any thing that looks like oppression. So far from it, the ruling party must be careful that the sufferings of the poorer classes, however caused, be not imputed to Government. A sop must be thrown, from time to time, to the many mouthed and hungry Cerberus, lest he devour his rulers. So far from taking from the poor for the benefit of the rich, the rich have to tax themselves for the benefit of the poor, and the manner in which the benefit is received shows plainly enough what might be the consequence of withholding it. The power would be presently wrested from the hands of the ruling class, and the use which would then be made of it may be read in the history of revolutionary France.

There is no such check on the abuse of constitutional authority by the more numerous class. They fear nothing from the physical power of the multitude, for they are themselves the multitude, and so long as the rulers of their choice administer the Government with an eye to their special benefit, so long all is safe. They have nothing to do but to profess to make the greatest good of the greatest number the sole object of all their legislation, and to proclaim an irreconcilable war of the poor against the rich.

4. WANT OF INTELLIGENCE AND TREACHERY OF LEADERS. In such a state of things what is to save the rich from being destroyed and swallowed up? Nothing but the last of those checks to the abuse of power which I have just enumerated. Though not withheld by a sense of justice, or a fear of consequences, power in the ignorant multitude may be baffled by the superior intelligence and address of the less numerous party, or defeated by the treachery of its own agents. These agents are rarely content to remain poor after they get into power. Whatever may be wrong from the common adversary, an equal distribution among their followers is no part of their plan of operations. The allotment of plunder is confined to the leaders of the party, and to the shrewd and crafty whom it is not easy to deceive, and who will be most expert in deceiving the rest. All these soon become rich, and though they may still profess the same zeal for the poor as formerly, and, for a time, retain their place as leaders, they will take care to conduct their future operations with an especial regard to their own newly acquired interests. Hence the short-lived reign of Democracy, which never survives a single generation, and always terminates in the sole power of some Demagogue.

When a community, in the gradual and sure progress of society, has divided itself into classes, of which one, (and that the lowest) is more numerous than all the rest, then it is that the wisdom of its institutions and the strength of its Government are tested. If no indulgence is extended to this most numerous class; if its few rights are invaded, its murmurs despised, and its sufferings insulted, we read the consequences in the history of revolutionary France.

If their rights are duly regarded, their complaints heard, their wants provided for, as far as this can be done by legislative authority, and a portion of political power is conceded to them, to appease their discontent, we may see something of the effects of this humane and wise policy in what is now passing in England. It is certainly the best that can be done. The part taken by Sir Robert Peel in these measures, considering the relation in which he stands to the laboring class, entitles him to their gratitude, and the applause of the world. But what is to be the result of such measures can not be foreseen. Happy for him if the hungry monster does not tear the hand extended to its relief.

If, instead of adopting palliatives and half measures, a bolder and franker course be taken, if all prerogatives are abolished, and all privileges renounced, and popular discontent be indulged by the establishment of perfect political equality, it is easy to foresee the consequences. Between the absolute surrender of all power into the hands of the most numerous class, and the exercise of power by the whole collectively, on a plan which shall assign to that class, which outnumbers all the rest, a weight and authority proportioned to its numbers, there can be little practical difference. In either case it is plain to see that the distinctive interest of that most numerous class (an interest peculiar to itself, and hostile to every other) would be alone consulted. The property of the rich becoming the prey of the poor, property would lose half its value from a sense of insecurity; the motives to industry would be lost, and all those innumerable evils would ensue, for which men never find a remedy but under the dominion of a Despot.

I beg pardon for dwelling on truths so trite and obvious. Yet while I feel bound to apologise for this, I fear I shall hardly be pardoned for deducing the conclusion which follows inevitably. It may not be safe to do more than to suggest a doubt whether a government, founded on the basis of equal political rights and functions, in every member of the community, from the highest to the lowest, can preserve itself from destruction, when applied to a people in that most advanced state of society in which all property is accumulated in the hands of the few, and the starving multitude must beg, and sometimes beg in vain, for leave to toil. To that condition all society tends with a rapidly fearfully hastened by modern discoveries in art and science, and to that state-free governments, above all others, tend most rapidly.

The great aim of the political economist, is to urge the advance to that state of things. He speaks to willing pupils, and public spirit and individual cupidity are every where pressing on towards it, with an instinctive eagerness which would seem to show that it is, in itself, desirable. The desideratum is, to preserve, in that condition, the same free institutions, which under circumstances less brilliant it is found so easy to establish and administer. The problem indeed is, to devise the means, by which any government can be maintained in the defence of the rights of all men, in all conditions, without establishing an inequality of political franchises corresponding to the inequalities of property, and fortifying that inequality by the sword. In France, at this moment, the necessity for this seems to be felt, acknowledged, and acted on. In Great Britain it is felt, it is acknowledged by some, and denied by others—whether it can be successfully acted upon is doubtful—what will be the consequence if it is, is not for man to foresee. There the experiment is going on, which is to decide this question.

The progress of that experiment is not so hopeful as to reconcile other nations to thought of advancing to the same point, and staking their happiness on the result. On the contrary it is the part of wisdom, in a society having within itself any element, by the operation of which the conditions of the problem may possibly be varied or modified, to study diligently the properties of that element, and direct its tendencies, as far as practicable to that important object.

Such an element, as it seems to me, is the Slave population of the Southern States. It is an old observation that the spirit of freedom is no where so high and indomitable as among freemen who are the masters of slaves. The existence of slavery in a community will always keep alive a jealous passion for liberty in the lowest class of those who are not slaves. But it is not in this point of view that I propose to present the subject. It is true that the spirit of freedom is thus kept alive, but it is not thus that the suicidal tendency of freedom is restrained.

The diligent researches of the British Parliament have furnished the world with a body of evidence, which clearly depicts the condition to which the poorer classes of the most prosperous community are necessarily reduced, in that advanced state of prosperity of which I have just spoken. In this picture we see a state of things full of the causes of revolution, total, bloody and destructive. It presents to the Government the critical alternative of extending the franchises of the suffering class, in order to appease their discontents, or strengthening the arm of power, in order to repress them. If the latter measure be adopted, the expenses of Government and the burthens of the people must be increased; the power, which is given for the purpose of repressing one class, may be dangerous to the liberties of all; and a new energy and increased severity must be imparted to the laws, imposing on all a degree of restraint otherwise unnecessary. To live under a government of laws faithfully administered is indeed to be free, but there is little comfort in freedom, where the law takes cognizance of all we do, and requires us to act by a fixed rule, whether we go out or come in, whether we lie down or rise up. A man feels little like a freeman, when abruptly accosted in the street by a watchman, and rudely questioned, and taken to the watch-house if his account of himself happens not to be satisfactory to the guardian of the night.

Now let it be supposed that the whole of that class of laborers in England, whose condition is worse than that of slaves in our Southern States were actually Negro slaves, the property of their employers. The necessity of controlling them, and the danger of insurrection would remain; but the means of averting that danger would be altogether different. Let us examine this matter somewhat in detail.

1. The whole system of police contrived to regulate and watch the movements of the laboring class would be superfluous. The authority and discipline of the master would supply its place. That system, in its indiscriminating operation, must often annoy many of those, who are not intended to be affected by it; and the freedom of numbers is unnecessarily restrained, whom the law would leave free if it knew how to distinguish them. But where there are negro slaves, no such mistakes are made. The white man's color is his certificate of freedom, and every master knows his own slaves.

2. The military force, which is kept up in times of profound peace, would be useless, and might be disbanded. At present, it seems indispensable to check the spirit of insurrection excited in the poorer class by their distresses. The effect of this in increasing the power, the patronage, and the influence of the crown, and the burthens of the people is incalculable. Some resort to force might also be necessary in the case I have supposed. But the force, in that case, would be that of private men employed by private men. The expense would fall exclusively on those who ought to bear it. It would be unattended with displays of the insolence of office, and the splendor of rank, to the annoyance of the whole community. Half a dozen armed free laborers would keep the operatives of a large establishment in order, and the assemblage of multitudes from different establishments would be prevented altogether.

3. Whenever an insurrectionary spirit is awakened in the degrading class of free laborers, of which I am now speaking, it is sure of sympathy from the class next above it, a class less numerous perhaps, but far more formidable. Hence the restraints, and discipline, and terrors of the law, are extended to these also. But where would be that nerve of sympathy, if that lowest class were composed of Negro slaves? And what need would there be of imposing any restraints on what would then be the lowest and poorest class of freemen, which we know to have less sympathy with the Negro than any other?

4. There would be less to provoke to insurrection than there now is, for interest would compel the master to provide for the mere animal wants of his slave. At present, if a laborer is starved off, his employer knows where to find another. The consequence would indeed be a diminution of profits, or rather the fruits of capital and labor combined would be more equally divided between the capitalist and the laborer. But this is precisely what the British Parliament has been trying to effect by legislation, for the last thirty years. They would have the laborer worked less and better paid. Now, if his employer has an interest in his life, he will not work him to death, and will give him necessary food, which is more than the hireling often gets for his wages. I do not mean to deny that the authority of law might be sometimes necessary to enforce this and other duties of humanity. The law now interferes for the same purpose between the free laborer and his employer. But its vigilance is often baffled, because the laborer must be employed, and will join with the employer to elude the law. If a child under nine years of age is not to work more than eight or ten hours a-day, who shall say that he is not ten years old when he and his parents all say so? But let the slave be made sure of the protection of the law, in complaining of his master (and occasional visits from proper officers would afford him this security,) and he will be sure to claim all the exemptions and advantages that the law allows him. If he is still wronged and maltreated, he may hate his master, but he will love the law that sought to protect him. The grievances of each particular stock of slaves would be their own, and an occasional murder, not a general insurrection would be the consequence. Without the blindest negligence, any thing like concert would be impossible.

5. It should be remembered, that the distresses of the laborers are greatest, and the danger of insurrection is most to be feared, when short crops, or low prices for manufactures raise the price of food, or reduce the wages of labor. But were the laborers slaves, no part of this distress would be felt by them, and no such insurrectionary spirit would be awakened. All the loss, in such cases, would fall, as it ought to fall, not on the laborer but on his employer. Not only would this be right, but it is the very result which the law would accomplish if it could.

Thus far, gentlemen, I think you will see that the exchange of the present free labor of Great Britain for that of an equal number of negro slaves, would save the community from heavy burthens and oppressive laws, and the government from the danger which at every moment threatens it. But would it not also make it safe to extend the political privileges of the people, and to grant a share in the government to some who are now, most wisely, disfranchised? The temptation of the lower classes to abuse political power would be much diminished, and the presence of a class lower than all, and more numerous than all, of a different race, and requiring equally the concert and coöperation of all for its safe control and management, would be a prominent point on which all other classes would act together in a common spirit and in perfect harmony. I do not mean to say that even that would render universal suffrage expedient or just; but the mischiefs of universal suffrage would be different in character and less in degree.

They would be different in character, for all would dread the consequences which might attend insurrection, or follow any insurrectionary movement. Any evil not intolerable would be endured, in preference to the danger of letting loose an enemy so formidable, as, in such a state of things, the slave population might become. The preservation of order and harmony among the free classes would be an object of paramount interest with all, for it would be necessary to the safety of all.

The danger of universal suffrage would be less in degree. The classes absolutely destitute of property in England, at this moment, very far outnumber all the rest. To let in universal suffrage, therefore, would be a signal for confiscation, and a general partition of property, such as took place in France fifty years ago. But take away the whole of that lowest class, in comparison with whose abject condition that of our slaves is a state of freedom and happiness, and, though perhaps the holders of property might still be outnumbered, it is probable that a little address and management might be sufficient to preserve the balance of authority.

But there is a danger of an opposite character. Even if we suppose the newly enfranchised multitude to continue to respect the rights of property, they can never be insensible to its value. If the laborers in the employment of a great manufacturer did not succeed in stripping him of his property by agrarian legislation, they would remain the same dependent beings that they now are, and he whose right of suffrage is now limited to his own vote, would then carry to the polls his thousand retainers, and give law to the county or corporation to which he belonged.

This last, gentlemen, is precisely the danger to be apprehended from universal suffrage in communities like our own. The desperate measures of agrarian misrule and confiscation, and plunder by the authority of law are not to be apprehended where the wages of labor are so high, the means of subsistence so cheap, and the facility of acquiring landed property so great as among us. The poorest man in society feels an interest in those laws which protect the rights of property, for, though he has none as yet, he has the purpose and the hope to be rich before he dies, and to leave property to his children. But this purpose and this hope do but render him more sensible to the temptations of interest. They whet his appetite for gain, and the desire of acquisition, instead of being an occasional want of his nature, which may be appeased and forgotten, becomes a permanent and inveterate craving. The man who labors from day to day for food and raiment, with no hope of bettering his condition, when he has earned his meal, eats it, and is satisfied.

"He, with a body filled and vacant mind,
Gets him to rest, crammed with distressful bread:
Never sees horrid Night, that child of Hell;
But like a lacquey, from the rise to the set,
Sweats in the eye of Phœbus, and all night
Sleeps in Elysium. Next day after dawn,
Doth rise and help Hyperion to his horse,
And follows thus the ever-running year
With profitable labor to his grave."

This is the character and condition of the laborer, who can never expect to be any thing else, as sketched by the Great Master of nature. All who are familiar with the character of the Southern slave, will see how just is this description as applied to him; and the resemblance may be taken as a proof, if any be wanting, that the substance of slavery is all—the form nothing. The man who works and must work, from morn till night for food and raiment, without hope of change, is a slave. It matters not how he became so: by what authority his servitude is imposed: by what necessity it is maintained.

The character of the man, however humble, whose labors are stimulated and directed by the hope of future affluence, is widely different. Hence, in a community where such is the condition of the lowest class, you find neither the proverbial generosity of the beggar, nor the careless apathy so well described by Shakspeare. Every man is alert and keen in the pursuit of gain, and the love of money, instead of being regarded as a sordid and degrading passion, is numbered among the virtues. There are those who teach it to their children as a duty, and they learn to look on extortion and fraud, and corruption and bribes, but as means which may be sanctified by the good end to be accomplished. It is proverbial that avarice is an appetite which grows by feeding, and the sure returns of prosperity, that reward all sorts of exertion in a free and growing country, explain the fact, that in such a country the love of money becomes a master passion, governing society through all its classes.

In such a community it is indispensable to check, in some way, the dangerous influence of wealth. This is acknowledged by all; but they differ widely about the means. Universal suffrage is the remedy which, almost every where, throughout the United States has been rashly adopted. Its advocates affect to consider the land as being the thing represented, wherever the right of suffrage is restricted to freeholders; and dabbles in political arithmetic pretend to have found out, that if the owner of twenty-five acres ought to have one vote, consistency demands that a hundred votes should be assigned to him who owns twenty-five hundred acres. This miserable sophism,—this mockery of a reductio ad absurdum, suffices to cheat many who utter, and more who hear it. If indeed the object of the advocates of such restriction were to increase the influence of wealth, there would be reason in the suggestion. But the way to accomplish that object, is by the use of a much less invidious device. Make suffrage universal, and let the owner of a large estate divide it among a hundred leaseholders, and it will be effectually attained under the cheating pretence of allowing an equal voice to every man. In that way, the landlord, in a community without slaves, would give the votes not only of his tenants, but of his menials and laborers. As it is, it is perfectly notorious, that the wealthiest landed proprietor, in a slave-holding community, does not derive from his landed estate the means of influencing the vote of a single freeholder. Some influence over men of that description is indeed occasionally exercised by men of wealth; but it is the influence of the creditor over his debtor, the influence of the merchant over his indiscreet customer, the influence of the usurer over his wretched victim. Examples of this sort I have seen, and if they prove any thing, they prove, that, as a safeguard against this influence, some farther qualification, besides the possession of a small freehold should be required. But the statesman should be satisfied with a qualification, which, in general, secures the independence of the voter although, in very rare instances, it may be found inadequate. But while we see examples of this sort, it becomes us to consider what would be the effect, if no qualification were required.

The argument is susceptible of being so presented as to wear something of the aspect of mathematical demonstration. The evil to be avoided is the undue influence of wealth in elections. Wealth is comparative, and the influence it exerts will depend on the difference between the wealth of him who wields this influence, and that of him who is to be governed by it. The greater the difference the greater will be the means of this mischievous influence, and, over him whose circumstances place him in a state of dependence on another, it is absolute. There is perhaps no community in which the number of persons so circumstanced does not exceed the number of men of small but independent property. Hence, if suffrage be universal, and the wealthy combine themselves, as a class, to accomplish any favorable objects they can have no difficulty in commanding the votes necessary for their purpose. But restrict the right of suffrage to men of independent, though moderate landed estate, and whenever the wealthy propose to themselves any thing favorable to their own peculiar interests they will find themselves in a minority.

Thus it appears that the freehold qualification of the voter, instead of being one of the franchises of wealth, is in fact the most effectual check upon its undue and dangerous influence. It is thus disarmed of its most formidable weapon. The rich man will still possess an influence over his dependents, but he can not use it for political purposes. He goes alone to the polls, and gives his single vote, which is overwhelmed by those of the small freeholders who border on his extensive property, while, perhaps, he has ten times that number of humble and devoted dependents, whose suffrages he could command, if they had suffrages to give.

In short, gentlemen, he who would place the right of suffrage on such a basis as to afford security against the undue influence of wealth, will attain his object if he can ascertain the precise qualification which will secure a majority of voters rich enough to be above corrupt influence, and poor enough to give more of their sympathies to the poor than to the rich."

It is the remark of a most profound thinker that no people ever set about reducing the qualification of the voter without going on to universal suffrage. The tendency seems irresistible. In every controversy in which the poorest class of voters happens to be outnumbered, the thought occurs to them that they would be more successful in future if they could introduce to the polls a few recruits from the class next below them. The rich man, on his part, may believe, that, among the lower class, he might find a larger proportion susceptible of corrupt and sordid influence than is to be found among the qualified voters. With opposite views, therefore, men of both classes combine to reduce the qualification. The Demagogue perceives the working of these considerations on the minds of others, and anticipates that they will prevail in the end. He seeks therefore to make the votes of the class about to be enfranchised his own, and, with that view, puts himself forward as the advocates of their claims. The change becomes daily more probable—it becomes almost certain, and then many who deprecate and dread it are eager to disarm the evil of part of its mischief by affecting to desire it. Thus it is finally introduced, with a semblance of unanimity, and each extension of the franchise thus renders farther extensions more and more certain. The more formidable the class desiring to be admitted to the polls—the greater the danger that they will abuse their franchise, the more certain is the success of their claims.

No man conversant with the change, which the alteration in the Constitution of Virginia has made in the composition of her legislature, can think with satisfaction of the effect of such an extension of the right of suffrage as would embrace the whole of her present free population. But great as that evil would be, it would be nothing to the mischief of a constituent body embracing not only these, but the whole of the abject class that must come in to take the place of the slaves if they were withdrawn. From that worst evil, from that fatal and irreparable abuse of the theory of Democracy we are saved by the existence of domestic slavery among us; and I must indeed be convinced that it is a sin, deeper and deadlier than those who most revile us consider it, before I should consent to relinquish the security it affords against a state of things, which must end in anarchy or despotism.

The morality of the institution I shall leave to the vindication I have already offered. My present purpose is to consider how it may aid us in working the difficult and complicated problem of self-government. In this the puzzle is to contrive such restraints on the sovereign will of a free people as may be necessary to the preservation of their free institutions, without annihilating the freedom they are meant to secure. The Spartans preserved their political liberty by condemning themselves to discipline as stern as that of the most rigorous personal slavery. This absurdity we should endeavor to avoid, but when we have done all we can, there is a seeming paradox in the idea of self-imposed restraints on the right of self-government. But the necessity of the thing is not the less certain. There is and must be an element in every society, which can only be restrained to its proper place and withheld from mischief by coercion. If there is strength enough in the frame of Government to make this coercion effectual, that strength may be dangerous to the freedom of all. But if society is so organized that the element in question can be restrained and directed by other energies than those of government, we escape the difficulty.

"Society," says Burke, the most profound of political philosophers, "can not exist unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere." If it be in the frame of Government, its operation may be annoying to some on whom it is not necessary to impose restraint. If it be in the frame of society itself, it may be dispensed with in that of Government; and they whose virtue and intelligence qualify them to live exempt from such control may be left in perfect freedom. None but a very presumptuous and unscrupulous man would go so far as to introduce domestic slavery with this view, on the strength of any reasoning a priori. But I account him rash, who, finding it established in the community into which he was born, should carry his regard to the abstract idea of equal right so far as to throw away, at this day, when the props and pillars of Government in all civilized nations are shaken, a security which such reasoning, backed by experience, shows to be so favorable to the harmonious combination of Order and Freedom.

To show the value of this element in our society, let me lay before you a passage from De Tocqueville's work on Democracy in America, in which he describes the political and social condition of the community as seen by him in the Northern States.

"At the present day," says he, "the more affluent classes of society are so entirely removed from the direction of affairs in the United States, that wealth, far from conferring a right to the exercise of power, is rather an obstacle than a means of attaining to it. The wealthy members of the community abandon the lists, through unwillingness to contend, and frequently to contend in vain, against the lowest class of their fellow citizens. They concentrate all their enjoyments in the privacy of their homes, where they occupy a rank that can not be assumed in public; and they constitute a private society in the State, which has its own tastes and its own pleasures. They submit to this state of affairs as an irremediable evil, but they are careful not to show that they are galled by its continuance: it is not even uncommon to hear them laud the delights of a republican government, and the advantages of democratic institutions, when they are in public. Next to hating their enemies, men are most inclined to flatter them.

"Mark, for instance, that opulent citizen, who is as anxious as a Jew of the middle ages, to conceal his wealth. His dress is plain, his demeanor unassuming, but the interior of his dwelling glitters with luxury, and none but a few chosen guests, whom he haughtily styles his equals, are permitted to penetrate into this sanctuary. No European noble is more exclusive in his pleasures, or more jealous of all the advantages which his privileged station confers upon him. But the very same individual crosses the city to reach a dark counting house in the centre of trade where every one may accost him who pleases. If he meets his cobbler on the way, they stop and converse; the two citizens discuss the affairs of the State, in which they have an equal interest, and they shake hands before they part.

"But beneath this artificial enthusiasm and these obsequious attentions to the preponderating power, it is easy to see that the wealthy members of the community entertain a hearty distaste to the institutions of their country. The populace is at once the object of their scorn and of their fears. If the maladministration of the democracy ever brings about a revolutionary crisis, and if monarchical institutions ever become practicable in the United States, the truth of what I advance will become obvious."

This passage is full of fearful meaning to those whom it concerns. Whether it is true in its application to the Northern States, where the observations of the writer were made, it is certainly not true that any such state of things exists among us in the South. Had M. De Tocqueville come among us, he would have seen the difference, and what he here predicates of the whole union would have been applied only to one section.

It amounts to this—that, while the poorer classes are secure in the enjoyment of all their rights, except so far as they may be endangered by their own caprices, the wealthier have not the same immunity. The right to fill that place in society to which the merit of the individual entitles him, and the right to discharge those public functions for which he is better qualified than other men, are indeed but imperfect rights. But they are still rights; and the latter is one which no people denies without injustice to the party, and detriment to itself. These rights, according to De Tocqueville, are not recognized in the land of free labor and universal suffrage. The passion for display, contemptible as it is, is one of those the gratification of which men propose to themselves, in the pursuit of wealth; but this, it seems, they hardly feel it safe to indulge to the utmost. To those who have had occasion to observe the force of that passion, it belongs to calculate the energy of any cause that has power to repress it. De Tocqueville likens the case to that of the Jews of the middle ages. These consented to possess their wealth in this state of imperfect enjoyment, and when we think of the tyrannical princes and rapacious nobles, who regarded them as their prey, we perceive a force sufficient to secure their tameness in this abject condition. The power which enforces the like submission to the like degradation in the Northern States, may be less palpable, but, perhaps, not less formidable. Men, who thus submit, display a consciousness that they hold, by sufferance, the rights which they are permitted to enjoy, and it is to preserve these that the rest are surrendered.

The gifts of Providence are most unjustly distributed if the acquisition of riches does not afford, at least, prima facie evidence of merit of some sort. We disparage too the advantages of free Government, if we deny that when all the avenues to prosperity are open to all, the industrious, enterprising, vigilant and enlightened are most apt to win the prize. Is there not then something radically wrong, when those who have given such indications of the qualities by which the public may be best served, are forthwith stigmatized and put under political disabilities, as a class? Is not this unjust to them and detrimental to the State? May we not be permitted to doubt whether the affairs of any people can be wisely administered, who thus, by a sweeping disqualification, discard from their service, not the ignorant, the abject and the depraved, but the wise, the prudent and the sagacious? This may be right, if the affairs of a nation will be most wisely administered by the ignorant; if the reign of Virtue will be best secured by the authority of the vicious; and if the elements of happiness will be most carefully and successfully cultivated by those who are strangers to that essential happiness whose seat is in the mind. But is there not something radically false in that which overturns the empire of Reason, inverts the order of natural society, dethrones the mind of the community from its just supremacy, and assigns the tasks of thought to the unthinking, and the authority of law to those who should be the subjects of its corrective discipline?

Again; can we cheat ourselves into the belief that there is perfect liberty, and with it the security that gives to liberty its charm and chief value, where they who succeed, by honest means, in winning the rewards of meritorious enterprise, are made to feel that they hold them by an uncertain tenure, and must be content to forego half their enjoyments, or sacrifice some of their rights, and incur the risk of losing all? If it be true, as De Tocqueville supposes, "that the wealthier members of these communities entertain a hearty distaste to the democratic institutions of their country," is there no danger to these institutions to be apprehended from that cause? Will wealth make no attempt, abortive though it must be, to secure itself, by political privileges, in its appropriate enjoyments? Will it be content to hold them by an uncertain tenure, while there is any hope of putting restraints on the rapacity that threatens it? Will a hungry multitude submit to such restraints? And will not a struggle ensue between those who would impose and those who resist them, such as has never terminated but in a short-lived anarchy followed by the rule of a Despot? If these things be so, they who have gone on to work out the problem of theoretical Democracy, to its most extreme results, may have reason to suspect that they might wisely have stopped short of absolute perfection. To say no more, it might be doubted whether a constitutional disqualification of a class, which, taken collectively, may be regarded as ignorant, thriftless and depraved, would not be better than the practical disqualification of another class, which, by a judgment founded on the most legitimate presumptions, may be considered collectively as wise, prudent and virtuous.

I have already said, that, if M. De Tocqueville had come among us in the South Atlantic States, he would have seen nothing of this. He might have found something offensive to his democratic taste as reminding him of a privileged Aristocracy in other countries. But his philosophical eye would have looked below the surface, and he would have seen that there is, in truth, no Aristocracy, because there are no political privileges. He would have seen no class of men, perhaps no single man cherishing "a hearty distaste to the institutions of his country." He would have seen, moreover, that this is so because there is no class that does not feel itself secure, not only in the possession, but in the fullest enjoyment of all its rights, whether original or acquired. He would have seen that this is so, because of the existence of an institution, which makes it impossible that the strife for political power should ever be exasperated by hunger, and makes all men in all conditions alike safe; "the high from the blights of Envy, the low from the iron sway of Tyranny and Oppression." He would have seen why it is, that universal suffrage fails to produce among us the same effect which it produces elsewhere: why is it, that the poor man here is not ashamed to manifest his gratitude to a wealthy benefactor, by a devoted attachment to his person, and a sense of his private virtues by readiness to commit to him the functions of public office. He would have seen that this is so, because universal suffrage introduces to the polls but a small number of those who have not a feeling sense of the importance and sanctity of the rights of property, and do not cherish a prevailing desire for their security. He would have seen that this too is but an effect, and that the cause is domestic slavery. The deep seated repugnance of that benevolent man to slavery, in any form, might make him hesitate to admit that any good could flow from such a source. But his candid mind might reflect that there is nothing perfect in the institutions of man, or in any of the works of his hand; and he might arrive at the conclusion, that this state of things is at least as good as that in which property is driven by the desire of security, to war against freedom, and numbers are excited by rapacity, or the fear of oppression to war against property. He must have seen, that our condition, such as it is, promises permanency; and he would hardly have denied that it is better than the anarchy and consequent despotism in which the other never fails to end.

I beg you to remember, gentlemen, that I have but proposed to consider how far this institution is capable of being used as a remedy for that distemper of the body politic, which, if not the natural and necessary end of all good government, is, at least, the prevailing epidemic of the day. That it will be so used, when the time to test its value shall arrive, I hardly dare to hope. The desire of gain will not permit it. As society approaches that point at which labor becomes a drug, mammon will hardly fail to hint to the master that he might do better, first to emancipate, and then to hire his slave. The political economist will be at hand to back the suggestion, and to prove by calculation, and to show by statistical tables that the full resources of a country can never be developed by servile hands. These truths are indeed susceptible of rigid and palpable demonstration, and they will probably prevail; and States, which have hitherto loitered in the race of wealth and improvement, will spring forward with renewed vigor, and, each in turn, and in due time, will find themselves, like the Eastern Caliph, in that hall of Eblis, where, in the midst of pomp and splendor, a consuming fire will prey upon the heart of the body politic.

Yet would I fondly cherish the thought that the people of the Southern States, checked in their career by the presence of an element in their society which is certainly not favorable to their advance toward this disastrous consummation, may learn its value before it be too late. The tie that binds the heart of the master to his slave is every day gaining strength. The calm domestic tranquillity, and the sense of security which he enjoys in his reliance on the humble and faithful friends that surround him, are every day becoming more precious. He is every day less and less disposed to exchange the cheerful, unbought, unforced obedience of willing hands and loving hearts for the hired service of domestic spies: to exchange the hereditary tie which has come down from generation to generation, for occasional contracts from month to month establishing between those who yesterday were strangers and to-morrow may be enemies, an intercourse the most confidential, and relations the most intimate. Why should he make the exchange? Every day brings tidings of the disasters attending it elsewhere, and the most prosperous States in the world are every day furnishing evidence to prove that wealth is not abundance, that prosperity is not happiness, and that discipline and subordination, however rigid, can not always secure order and tranquillity. Why should he make the exchange? Is it because others can not understand the relation he bears to his slave, and he has none but his own heart to witness the benevolence and equity that preside over it. Must he hang his head and hide his face with shame, when he hears others declaim against "the wrong and outrage with which earth is filled?" He has none such to answer for. Does his heart reproach him, when he hears the indignant descendant of England's purest moral bard;

"I would not have a slave to till my ground,
To carry me, to fan me while I sleep,
And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
That sinews thought and sold have ever earned."

And who would? Would I? Would you? Would you? Would any man in this presence? There may be some who would; and if there be, no where are they so detested as in the slave-holding country; and if among us here there be one whose heart, more than any other, cherishes and echoes the sentiment of the poet, that man is a slave holder. Is it not enough for us that we are conscious of living in obedience to the law of Love, which, in whatever form it be cast, is the law of perfect Liberty? Should we not indeed rejoice and exult that it has been given to us to solve the difficulty of reconciling subordination with freedom, by restoring that beautiful harmony, in which Power is gentle, and Obedience liberal, and the will of the superior prevails, because it is the delight of the inferior to know and do it? "Is it such a mystery," says one* "than whom none lives more devoted to the cause of Liberty and Humanity;" is it such a mystery to reconcile Despotism with Freedom? It is to make your Despotism just. Rigorous as Destiny, but just too as Destiny; and its law, the laws of God. All men obey these; and have no freedom but in obeying them."

But we may loiter and fall behind in the race of improvement and refinement! And what of that? Does improvement heal the sick, or clothe the naked, or feed the hungry; or does it increase the multitude of sufferers and their miseries? What is it but a medicine for the whole, who need no physic, which leaves untended the wounds and bruises and putrifying sores of afflicted millions? And Refinement? What is that but the new sauce, which the pampered Roman Emperor so much coveted to stimulate his jaded appetite? What does it accomplish for the poor and needy, the proper objects of that benevolence which interferes on behalf of our slaves? What is it indeed but an alembic, in which the blood and sweat of thousands are distilled into one drop of concentrated enjoyment, for the use of those whose cup is full to overflowing, and whose capacity for enjoyment is already gorged to loathing?

"O! Fortunati nimium, sua si bona noriat!"

My countrymen let no man deceive you. You have been chosen as the instrument, in the hand of God, for accomplishing the great purpose of his benevolence, according to a plan devised by his wisdom, and proclaimed in his word. You are in possession of every thing needful to your physical, intellectual and moral nature. There is enough of luxury for the health of either body or mind; there is comfort of a high order for the great body of society, and there is abundance for all. Besides this, and more than this, you have domestic peace, and security, and harmony, and love. You live under the discipline of a social system, by which the mind is informed, and the heart made better, and you have all the leisure necessary for intellectual and moral culture. You have all the elements of Happiness, and all the ingredients to Virtue.

You have, moreover, a constitution of society, which makes the tasks of Government easy, leaving no pretext to ambition, and no motive to misrule. Preserve that, and you will find no difficulty in preserving the institutions bequeathed by your ancestors, and perpetuating a form of Government under which all are free, and none so free as those the world calls slaves. Study the capabilities and the imperfections of the system. Cultivate the one and reform the other. Make the slave secure, and make him feel himself secure from the envious insolence of degraded freemen, and the petty vexations of a superfluous police. Make the hand of the master strong to protect him from all injustice; and leave the rest to his own sense of interest, and to the kindly working of the best affections of the human heart.

Gentlemen; I have spoken as in the presence of the searcher of hearts. I have testified to nothing which I do not know to be true. I have uttered no sentiment which I do not feel to be just. I have offered no argument which I do not believe to be sound. I plead before you the cause, not only of the master, but of the slave. I beseech you; I beseech the whole civilized world to leave us to execute as we may the task to which we have been appointed, and to work out unmolested an experiment, on which the temporal and eternal welfare of so many millions of human beings depend.

THE DEMON'S GAME OF CHESS.*

A CHRONICLE OF FLANDERS, OF THE YEAR 1131.

"Seigneurs et dames qui avez entendu réciter de belles histoires, si'il vous plait écouter et bien retenir, j'en raconterai une plus amé."

Ainsi, qu'il vous plaise prendre ce petit livre en gré, en corrigant les fautes, si aucunes y sont trouvées, lequel livre a été nouvellement translaté de vieilles rimes en prose.

[Histoire de Richard—Sans Peur.—PROLOGUE.]

The Lord of Clairmarais had departed for the chase at the matin hour. The lady, his wife, occupied the leisure of a long autumnal evening in embroidering in her oratory a veil of cloth of gold, a precious tissue dedicated as an ornament to the miraculous chase of the blessed Saint Bertin. Her tirewomen worked around her in silence, for their mistress was too stately to converse with them, or even to permit their voices to be heard, save when she so commanded.

For more than an hour, the breeze had ceased to bear to the castle the last tones of the curfew, sounded from the belfry of Saint Omer, a village about half a league distant, when suddenly the blast of a horn was heard at the postern of the castle. There was something indescribably wild and singular in the sound, which caused the lady and her attendants to shudder as its tones reached their ears. A page who hastened to ascertain the cause, returned and informed his mistress that a knight of lofty bearing, calling himself the Lord Brudemmer, craved her hospitality.

If some poor peasant in mortal peril had been mourning in the edge of the fosse, the lady of Clairmarais would not have permitted the drawbridge to be lowered, that he might find an asylum in the castle; but not so with a noble Lord. She ordered him to be admitted into the chateau, and conducted into her presence.

In the meantime, as custom demanded, she proceeded with her own hands to prepare the Hippocras, which was always offered to a guest in token of welcome, and she had scarcely poured the beverage into a goblet of silver, when the Lord Brudemmer was introduced by the page. He approached the lady with that noble and becoming courtesy, which distinguishes a knight of lofty lineage, and began by politely thanking her for the hospitality which she had bestowed on him.

"I lost my way in this domain," said he: "A short time since I bewailed the alarm of my steed, which separating me from my train, bewildered me amidst marshes and ravines hard by this forest, but since I have the happiness of being admitted to the presence of such marvellous beauty, I regard fatigue, danger and anxiety no longer."

* Translated for the Southern Literary Messenger, from "Chroniques et Traditions surnaturelles de la Flandre—par Mr. S. Henry Berthoud."

At first there was something rough and disagreeable in the voice of the stranger, but the impression was speedily removed by the grace which mingled in his manner.

The tirewomen, who, in conformity with the custom of the times, had withdrawn to the end of the hall, so that they could perceive all that passed, without being able to hear any portion of the conversation, remarked in whispers to each other on the rich apparel of Brudemmer, his elegant tournure, the regularity of his features, and the wild expression of his fiery glances.

It was not surprising, therefore, that the lady of the castle should find an inexpressible charm in the society of her guest, when it is considered that she had no other companions than vassals of lowly birth—whose discourse was confined to tedious recitals of the battles and tourneys, in which the old Lord, her husband, had mingled, and who shone far more as a warrior in the field, than a galliard in the hall.

Skilfully availing himself of these advantages, Brudemmer soon mingled in his conversation more of flattery and tenderness, than even the chivalric manners of the time permitted, while the lady, usually so proud and disdainful, subdued by a power she could not resist, listened at first without indignation, and afterwards with an emotion, which constantly increased.

Placing himself as if accidentally in a position which concealed the movement from the tirewomen, he took possession of a fair hand which was not withdrawn, and raised it tenderly to his lips. It would be difficult to describe the sensations of the lady—a fierce and terrible fire painfully circulated in her veins, it pressed upon her brow, it struggled in her heaving chest. She experienced none of that delicious languor, that indescribable intoxication, the sweet yet cruel symptoms of love, it was rather like the agony, the cold and shuddering chills of a dying sinner, or the horrible stupefaction with which a pilgrim beholds fastened upon him the mortal gaze of a basilisk.

In her confusion the lady of Clairmarais permitted the veil which she was embroidering to fall. "Oh! if such a scarf were granted to me," said Brudemmer, "if she whose fair hands have fashioned it, would accept me for her champion, how many lances would I shiver in her honor on the battle field and in the tournament."

She snatched it up with a convulsive movement and said, "'tis yours." Brudemmer carried it to his lips to conceal a horrid smile which he could not suppress, but he suddenly cast it from him with a shudder of terror, as if it had been living fire. Now, the Chaplain had examined it that very evening after vespers—and while his hands were still moist with holy water.

Quickly recovering from his emotion, Brudemmer approached still nearer to the lady and said, lowering his voice, "I was guided to your castle by an old man who in great haste demanded to see the Lord of Clairmarais. He waits at the postern to communicate to him an important secret, and one which concerns you nearly."

The lady grew pale at these words.

"I am informed," continued Brudemmer, "of the motives which impel him so earnestly to see your Lord. It is as he assures me to reveal a mystery to him; a mystery which will produce great changes in the manor of Clairmarais."

"The lady," said he, "caused me to be driven ignominiously forth from the castle. She threatened me with a dungeon if I returned. The ingrate! I will deprive her of the titles and the riches of which she is so proud."

"As I would not give credit to his threats, he related to me that his wife was the nurse of Count D'Erin's daughter, that the infant had died, he alone having knowledge of the fact, that he had substituted you, his own child, in the cradle of the young Countess, who was dead, and that you had been brought up and married as the daughter of the Count D'Erin. He has furnished me with numerous and creditable proofs of his fraud."

"This secret once known, the Lord of Clairmarais will hasten to repudiate a vassal, the daughter of an ignoble hind who has deceived him."

The lady wrung her hands in despair.

"Listen," continued Brudemmer, lowering his voice yet more, but speaking so distinctly that his listener lost not one syllable of his discourse, "listen—the old man wrapped in his mantle sleeps at the postern—this dagger—come."

"My father!"

"—No, you are right," replied Brudemmer, with quiet irony, "who knows? They may perhaps admit you among the tirewomen of the new bride of the Lord of Clairmarais. At the worst, you may but be condemned to a convent."

The lady suddenly started up, signed to her women in prohibition of their following her, and giving her hand to Brudemmer, they took their way to the postern together.

After having pursued the amusement of the chase all day, the Lord of Clairmarais turned his footsteps towards the warm hearth, and the side of his beautiful dame, whither his wishes now earnestly hastened him.

So eager was he to arrive, that he had left his attendants somewhat behind him, when suddenly his horse refused to advance, reared and exhibited signs of great alarm. The old Lord was forced to dismount, when, what was his grief and surprise! The foster father of his wife lay there extended motionless with a ghastly wound in his breast.

The attendants gathered around him, and remedies were instantly applied which proved not ineffectual. He opened his eyes, raised himself with great effort, and applying his mouth to the ear of the Lord of Clairmarais, he murmured with a faltering voice some words which caused the Castellan to shudder with horror. He then fell back and expired.

The old Lord, without uttering a word, proceeded immediately to the oratory, where he found his wife. Her brow covered with a deadly pallor, she was seated before a small table, and the better to conceal her dreadful agitation, she affected to be playing a game of chess with Brudemmer.

The latter, upon beholding the Lord of Clairmarais, uttered a shout of horrible laughter. The lady partook of this execrable hilarity—such a laugh could only be extorted by the most terrible suffering.

The Lord of Clairmarais no longer doubted his calamity, for up to this moment he would not give credit to the crimes of which the dying old man had accused the lady. "Satan," cried he, overwhelmed with indignation and despair, "Satan, I abandon to thee the parricide, the faithless wife, and the castle which she has profaned with her presence."

"I accept the offering," said Brudemmer—and at the same moment a crown of fire flickered around his head, and upon the snowy shoulders of the lady he laid too terrible hands armed with hellish talons.

More than two hundred years had passed since the Lord of Clairmarais had died in the odor of sanctity in the Abbey of Saint Bertin, when a friar of the order of Saint Benoist, inquired of a resident of St. Omer the name of the castle whose towers he perceived rising in the midst of a forest, surrounded by immense marshes.

"Our lady and the saints protect you," replied the townsman, devoutly crossing himself. "It is the castle of Clairmarais, an accursed spot, haunted by Satan. Every night it is illuminated with a sudden blaze, every night the Devil and I know not what other apparitions betake themselves thither in their fiery chariots."

"If we are to believe the old people, the Demon who inhabits the castle is named Brudemmer, and he forces those foolish persons who venture thither to play at chess, staking their souls against the domain and all the treasures it contains. You can readily imagine that no one yet has been able to overcome the Devil, and that consequently no one has ever returned from Clairmarais."

The monk listened in silence—and after a few moment's reflection, he proceeded with a firm step towards the diabolical castle. He encountered no obstacle, and forthwith established himself in an oratory richly furnished, where he perceived a small table, on which were placed a chess-board, and the various pieces of the game.

While the monk examined these objects, which the increasing darkness began to render somewhat indistinct, a vivid light suddenly illuminated the oratory, and at the same instant he was surrounded by a crowd of servants, of pages, and of tirewomen clothed in an antique fashion. All performed their various duties in silence, their very footsteps being inaudible, and yet more marvellous, their forms cast no shadow when they passed before the light.

Soon afterwards there slowly approached a Lord richly apparelled, who bore emblazoned upon his doublet in armorial guise a shield with two forks sable, with this device, "Brudemér." On his arm leaned a female—still young, whose lovely countenance was covered with a mortal paleness, while eight pages followed, bending beneath the weight of four heavy coffers filled with gold.

Brudemér placed himself at the chess-table and signed to the monk to be seated opposite. The latter obeyed, and the two commenced playing, without exchanging a word.

By a skillful combination, the monk believed that he had given mate to his adversary, when the pale lady who had remained behind Brudemér leaning upon the back of his huge arm chair, bent towards him and pointed with the finger to a pawn. The face of the game was at once changed, and the monk now found himself in danger of being vanquished.

At this turn of affairs, Brudemér and the lady burst into peals of laughter, while the rest of the ghastly occupants of the oratory who had grouped themselves around the combatants, joined in that fearful revelry which no human language can describe.

The monk began to repent of his temerity—a cold sweat bathed his forehead, and he would have given the whole world to have been at that moment safe in his convent. Nevertheless, he did not despair of the divine goodness, and mentally invoked his blessed patron, Saint Benoist, for a miracle alone could extricate him from his dangerous position. Suddenly, and by a celestial inspiration, he perceived that a new combination could still secure to him the game, and he pushed forward the pawn which accomplished it, when the shouts of laughter which echoed around him even changed into terrific yells, and then he heard and saw nothing more.

The monk having passed the entire night in prayer, at length hailed the approach of day with a joy that can easily be imagined. He found in the place occupied the evening before by the pale lady, a skeleton covered with the fragments of a rich female garb.

Remaining the undisputed possessor of the castle and of the wealth it contained, he caused a monastery to be erected on the unhallowed spot, and was appointed the superior. At present but a few faint vestiges can be discovered of the cloister, which was destroyed at the epoch of the revolution.

Such is the legend of the Demon's Game of Chess. How much do I regret my inability to recount it in the simple patois, and with the apparently sincere credulity of the good old dame who related it to me one autumnal night, in a poor hovel illumined by the rays of a solitary lamp and the ruddy glow of the fire, while the rain fell in torrents, and the wind rushed groaning through the immense forest of Clairmarais.

GROUPED THOUGHTS AND SCATTERED FANCIES.

A COLLECTION OF SONNETS.

By the Author of "Atalantis," "Southern Passages and Pictures," &c.

XII.

Sudden, the mighty nation goes not down ;—
There is no mortal fleetness in its fate :—
Time,—many omens, still anticipate
The peril that removes its iron crown,
And shakes its homes in ruins. Centuries
Fleet by in the long struggle ; and great men
Rush, mounted, to the breach where victory lies,
And personal virtue brings us life again !
Were it not thus, my Country !—were this hope
Not ours,—the present were a fearful time ;
Vainly we summon mighty hearts to cope
With thy oppressors' vanity and crime ;
These ride thee, as upon some noble beast,
The scoundrel jackal, hurrying to his feast.

XIII.

Would we recal our virtues and our peace !
The ancient teraphim we must restore ;
Bring back the household gods we loved of yore,
And bid our yearning for strange idols cease.
Our worship still is in the public way,—
Our altars are the market-place ;—our prayer
Strives for meet welcome in our neighbor's ear,
And heaven affects us little while we pray.
We do not call on God but man to hear ;—
Nor even on his affections ;—we have lost
The sweet humility of our home desires
And flaunt in foreign fashions at rare cost ;
Nor God our souls, nor man our hearts, inspires,
Nor aught that should to God or man be dear.

XIV.

Comes winter with an aspect dark to me,
Hurried with storms so long ! Are his brows stern,
Speaks he a language of asperity

Unfit for him to speak or me to learn!
 And do I shrink from the impending stroke
 That follows his keen chiding! Would I fly
 The terror of his presence, and that yoke,
 Borne with so long and so reluctantly!
 No! from its prison-house of care and pain,
 My spirit dares defy him. Well inured
 To trial,—I have borne it—not in vain,
 Since conquer'd is the destiny endured—
 Endured with no base spirit! I have grown,
 Familiar with the future in the known.

XV.

Yet bitter were the lessons of that past
 When life was one long winter! Childhood knew
 Nor blossom, nor delight. No sunshine cast
 The glory of green leaves around mine eye;
 No zephyr laden with sweet perfumes blew
 For me, its Eastern tribute from a sky,
 Looking down love upon me; and my mood
 Yearn'd for its kindred—for the humblest tie
 To human hopes, and aspirations true!
 Sickness, and suffering, and solitude
 Couch'd o'er my cradle: cheerless was the glance
 That watch'd my slumbers in those feeble hours,
 When pity, with her tears, her only powers,
 Might have brought hope if not deliverance.

XVI.

That season which all other men regret,
 And strive with boyish longing to recal,
 Which love permits not memory to forget,
 And fancy still restores in dreams of all
 That boyhood worship'd, or believed, or knew,— Brings no sweet images to me—was true,
 Only in cold and cloud, in lonely days
 And gloomy fancies—in defrauded claims,
 Defeated hopes, denied, denying aims;—
 Cheer'd by no promise—lighted by no rays, Warm'd by no smile—no mother's smile,—that smile,
 Of all, best suited sorrow to beguile,
 And strengthen hope, and by unmark'd degrees,
 Encourage to their birth, high purposes.

XVII.

Why should I fear the winter now, when free
 To meet and mingle in the strifes of man;
 The danger to defy which now I see,
 The oppressor to o'erthrow whom now I can!
 Childhood! the season of my weaknesses,
 Is gone!—the muscle in my arm is strong;
 No longer is there trembling in my knees,
 And my soul kindles at the look of wrong.
 And burns in free defiance!—never more

Let me recal the hour when I was weak,
 To shrink, to seek for refuge, to implore;
 When I was scorn'd or trampled, but to speak,
 When anger, rising high, though crouching low,
 Should, like the tiger, spring upon his foe.

XVIII.

Yet, in recalling these vex'd memories,
 Mine is no thought of vengeance! If I speak
 Of childhood, as a time that found me weak,
 I utter no complaint of injuries;
 These tried, but did not crush me; and they made
 My spirit rise to a superior mood,—
 Taught me endurance, and meet hardihood,
 And all life's better energies array'd
 For that long conflict which must end in death.
 Or victory!—and victory shall yet be mine!
 They cannot keep me from my right—the spoil!
 Which is the guerdon of superior toil—
 Devotion that defying hostile breath,
 Ceased not to "watch and pray," though stars refused to shine!

XIX.

Manhood at last!—and, with its consciousness,
 Are strength and freedom; freedom to pursue
 The purposes of hope—the godlike bliss,
 Born in the struggle for the great and true!
 And every energy that should be mine,
 This day, I dedicate to its object,—Life!
 So help me Heaven, that never I resign
 The duty which devotes me to the strife;—
 The enduring conflict which demands my strength.
 Whether of soul or body, to the last;
 The tribute of my years, through all their length,—
 The future's compensation to the past!—
 Boy's pleasures are for boyhood—its best cares
 Befit us not in our performing years.

XX.

The open sea before me, bathed in light,
 As if it knew no tempest; the near shore
 Crown'd with its fortresses, all green and bright,
 As if 'twere safe from carnage ever more;
 And woman on the ramparts; while below
 Girlhood, and thoughtless children bound and play
 As if their hearts, in one long holiday,
 Had sweet assurance 'gainst to-morrow's wo:—
 Afar, the queenly city, with her spires,
 Articulate, in the moonlight,—that above,
 Seems to look downward with intenser fires,
 As wrapt in fancies near akin to love;
 One star attends her which she cannot chide,
 Meek as the virgin by the matron's side.

JEPHTHA LEATHERS;

OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF FAILURE.

The erudite and renowned Baron Von Ramzhauser, in his "Mémoire sur l'art de penser," divides the great family of human pains and pleasures into two grand groups or classes: the Anticipative and the Actual,—placing the former in the front rank, because it is the largest class, and the first to be encountered in the great battle of life.

However correct this classification may be in general, there are particular cases where both are united, and where we enjoy or suffer in reality, what we have already enjoyed or suffered in anticipation. But these are the exceptions and not the rule. Every body will doubtless concur with the Baron, that a large, and perhaps the largest portion of our joys and sorrows exist alone in our imagination. So are the major portion of our plans and policies of life generated, matured, and exhausted in our own anticipations,—we modestly declining to startle the world by their wonderful advent and development.

But by pursuing the inquiry still further, we find that we are not only prone to failure in our anticipations, but there seems to be a usage, that has perhaps become a law in human affairs, which leads us to realize those very things which our anticipations have not only overlooked, but held in entire contempt and abhorrence. From an ignorance of this law of human progress, arise more chagrin and moral misfortune, than from all other sources united; and the study of this law in detail constitutes what is technically termed "experience," which the old people tell us, we will continue to learn, if we live as long as they have lived. Who is there, that has not already planed out his entire career, marked and illustrated by suitable and copious achievements of usefulness and renown all along the way? And yet, who, that has travelled any considerable portion of his way, has not strayed so far from the blazed trail, that it is lost sight of in a forest of scenes and deeds, of which his original survey had no marks except those of caution and reprobation? This is the fruit of short sightedness: we measure our corn by the basket of another, and when tried by our own bushel, the cobs will not hold out. We see or read of the gallant exploits of a great warrior hero; we contemplate his noble courage and daring spirit, and we are apt to feel a glow of martial valor within us. Without examining the tissue and calibre of our own particular easement, to ascertain the probabilities of its remaining there for use when needed, we fall straightway to forming plans, and getting up occasions for its démonstration. But when our manoeuvres have been successful in raising a crisis, we call on our courage and find, to the frustration of all our designs; that the egg of our valor has burst in the roasting, leaving nothing but the brittle shell, and we are as tame and submissive as a brick bat, whilst our spirit is rapidly coursing towards a different pole from that of its original direction.

Our neighbor is blest with a revelation, that labor is a nuisance, and turning his tools into "funds," he makes a short hand fortune. Whereupon our means are presto turned into lots in the city of Bubbleton, and the fallacy is dormant until the "depreciation of property" shows that Bubbleton is a humbug, and our enterprize a day after the feast. We read of Patrick Henry's wonderful "rise and progress," and we see and appreciate the thrilling display of patriotic and popular oratory made by our friend, Jake Jenkins, since he has abjured the sledge-hammer, and we forthwith forsake the plough handles, and mount the stump in support of the people's rights. We find that our organ of language is awkwardly developed, and our inventive and reasoning faculties very much out of gear, while our words, instead of rolling out in torrents, as per calculation, are given to sticking about the throat, and finally have to be swallowed down.

Thus it is, that we move on in helpless and provoking departure from the right line of conformity to our anticipated destiny: and hence the great number of men and women who are every where so benevolently engaged in regulating each other's affairs,—the number of regulators being proportioned to the amount of irregularity.

Amongst the vast multitude of irregulars who are living and breathing without the sphere of anticipation, very prominently stands Mr. Jeptha Leathers. Where Jeptha came from particularly, or what was his early history, are points not material to the subject, but according to his own account he was "well raised," and "it was said" that he sprang from one of those numerous "first families," which have so plentifully peopled the south-west in these latter years. He was certainly a man of much bearing. He was, at the time alluded to, bold, gallant, and daring, knowing no such thing as fear or misgiving under the most trying circumstances. Valor and vigor constituted the outer coat of his composition, and his inner man was all firm resolve. He was a bachelor of thirty, and as all bachelors have, so had he, a system of courtship, and also a set of rules and duties which were certain to happily and prosper the conjugal state. He harped lengthily upon, and discussed ably the whole question of "marrital rights," and understood perfectly the proper position of all parties to the compact. When it was currently and credibly reported, that a poor fellow of the neighborhood was thrust out of doors by his larger and "better half," the moral sense of Leathers was terribly shocked. And when he was further told that the neighbor aforesaid had the comforts of a shuck-pen, in which to console himself for the night, his very whiskers rose up with vengeance.

"Its all owin," said he, "to foolishness, to not understanding one another's rights; ef I was married I could get along with any woman in the world, because I'd jest tell 'em what was right at the start, and not spile 'em like most fellows do. But before I'd be druv up an tucked under in that way, I'd be a dog at once, and stay under the house; jest let me get married an ketch me at that pass, an then cut my ears off with a hand-saw."

Jeptha was quite a beau, and made all his anticipative inroads upon fortune's domains under matrimonial colors; in other words, he lived in the full enjoyment of imaginative matrimony, with a fortune included; for with him, it was out of the question to marry without "boot." His considerate parents had brought him up under the maxim, that "when want comes in at the door, love jumps out at the window." Our hero had exercised his governmental powers, in imagination, until his faith in their reality was as strong as it was in the moon's power over turnips, or the influence of the dog-days on snake-bites, when there occurred to him an opening for their exercise in practice.

Mrs. Jemima Jowers was a gay and handsome widow of forty-five. Sprightly and withal had the universal reputation of being a "business woman," which particular trait greatly delighted the anticipations of Jeptha Leathers. She had been a widow about ten years, during which time she had paid off a heavy debt, and very considerably improved and enlarged the estate. Universal sympathy is always drawn towards the widow; to condole with her over her great bereavement and heavy responsibility, while the most head-shaking fears are poured forth, that she will ultimately fall through, bringing her family to want, and failing to educate her children, bring them up destitute of both mental and monetary stores on which to start in the world. And yet the sage "lords of creation" have their kind-hearted sagacity almost universally rebuked by the managing talents, and thrifty concerns of the widow. During all the "pressure" and "hard times" which of late years have fattened the lawyers and sheriffs of the country, the widow has steadily held her own, and very rarely is she to be found, who has not come out better than she set in. If perchance a few be found who have fallen into the embarrassed crowd, they are generally suffering the fruits of entailed folly, and the whole number will not weigh a feather in the scale against the great army of the used up amongst the sterner sex.

The widow Jowers was "well to do in the world," and in the opinion of our gallant hero, in want of nothing but the guardianship of some "business man" to manage her out door affairs, and assume the paternal control of her six boys, who were now getting unmanageably large in her hands. Although marrying a widow was rather opposed to his favorite maxim, "bend a tree while it is young and it will grow so," yet he was well satisfied that Mrs. Jowers needed no bending, for whether it was by accident or former training he cared not, as the fact was indisputable, that her mental and moral temperament was exactly suited to the place which he designed her to occupy. He was much given to expatiate to himself upon the eligibility of the affair. "I always thought," he would say, "that I'd hit the nail upon the head after awhile; them may hurry as will, but I never would of married in the world, ef I couldn't of got jest exactly suited. Some marry for the sake of property, and some jest to get what they call a good, or purty wife, but I'll be hanged ef I didn't always know that I'd get all when I got married,—ketch this child asleep."

There are strange coincidences forever occurring, which are enough to make the most learned skeptic believe in a special Providence.

Mrs. Jowers had for sometime seriously felt the necessity of stronger hands to control such of her affairs as were too weighty for a "poor lone woman." And when Leathers had so far screwed up his courage as to present arms, the engagement became so warm, that a victory was inevitable, though the surrender was not specifically at discretion.

The affair was consummated after the fashion of the day and country: Jeptha Leathers was now in his prime, and like the adventurous Balboa when in the Pacific, he was up to his arm-pits in possession. It was really refreshing to the hearts of his neighbors to surround him and listen to his instructions on his present and future affairs. He had all the appurtenances and fixtures necessary to carry out all his vast schemes of greatness, and was rapidly rising to the acme of his ambition.—the big man of his neighborhood,—when he began to feel an invisible sort of influence, gently but steadily drawing the lines, curbing the bit, and consequently, rather baulking his speed.

The wise and benevolent Mother Goose has given us many valuable moral lessons, but some how or other, we are apt to forget them before the time comes round at which they are of most use to us. Could our couple but have remembered, and acted on the sound lesson taught in the case of Mr. Spratt and his wife, and one have eaten the "fat" of their cares, and the other been content with the "lean," there can be no doubt that their domestic peace would have been as "clean" as was the platter of Mr. Spratt and his good lady. But the good lady of Mr. Leathers took a different view of the matter, and in consideration of his deficiency of years and experience, she was rather disposed to assign him the position of "little Jack Horner."

without, however, furnishing him with the precise kind of wherewithal with which the said John Jr. is said to have regaled himself. This course was suitable neither to the principles nor practice of Jeptha, but came in direct conflict with all his preconceived notions. In fact, it upset his whole system, as maturely made out, and often revealed to his friends who had had the misfortune to go before him in the difficulties of connubial discrepancy. Mr. Leathers felt the need of no prompter, further than the suggestions of his own mature wisdom, while Jemima manifested much kindness in volunteering her advice and directions in regard to his business operations. She was prone to dwell upon her own qualifications, and to back her arguments by reference to her own history, in which she had much advantage over her dear man, as his history lay altogether, so far as business habits were concerned, in the mazes of imagination, and what are the most ingenious and learned theories, when brought in conflict with actual facts! Thus Mr. and Mrs. Leathers continued to attend to their respective duties according to their own notions of their limits, and were consequently often detected by each other in trespassing upon one another's rights. Every breeze grew a little stronger than the last, and finally it seemed that a tempest must come; indeed, it sometimes occurred to the mind of Jeptha, that a regular blast was the only means of getting things "in a proper fix to be righted up."

"Didn't I tell you sir to plough to-day," said Mr. Leathers to his man Jack, on returning from hunting one day.

"Yes sir, but missus told me to hoe de garden sir."

"Who told you to hoe the garden?"

"I did sir," emphatically said Mrs. Leathers, who by this time had made her appearance with her apron thrown airy over her head, and her left arm a-kimbo, "I did, and I wonder who had a better right."

"Nobody haint got no right to discommand my orders about my own business," replied Jeptha.

"Well I reckon I've got a right to do as I please with my own negroes," was the decisive response.

Jeptha at once saw the perils of his predicament, and felt deeply the humility of his degree as defined by his "better half."

"I won't stand it," said he, giving his horse a kick; "its a getting too often, its an everlasting hing dong, and never no satisfaction at nothin, I'd like to know how I'm to carry on business when every body's got a finger in the pie, I'll have a verry crap of it, an it gits worse an worse." By his kind of eloquent cogitation he worked himself up into a perfect paroxysm of wrath and recklessness.

"I won't stand it," he again exclaimed, and into the house he rushed. The first member of the household whom he encountered, was a little negro with a bucket of water, all of which he capsized, with a single application of his foot, and no sooner did the negro squall, than did the mistress bawl.

"Aint this a purty pass to come to, that a body can't get along in peace in their own house, I won't suffer it,—that I won't." This last sentence being uttered in a sort of nervous scream, wrought a wonderful effect upon Mr. Leathers, and it required much concentration of his courage to reply, which he did by saying in a tone which spoke more sorrow than anger.

"I'll have my way or die."

"You may have your way and die, too, for what I care, but I'll show you that I'll do as I please with my own business."

Whether it was his moral or physical philosophy that prevailed is uncertain, but a happy determination suddenly seized him, to try a fit of stiff-necked obstinacy, for he had not conceived the idea that Mrs. Leathers could possibly forego his smiles for any considerable length of time. So swearing ferociously that he would have "nothing more to do with her or her things," he skulked off.

Night came, but no supper was on hand, and poor Jeptha went to bed without it. By sunrise next morning his gun was heard amongst the squirrels, and about breakfast time, he set up one of his old time, jovial whistles,—not doubting that by this time Jemima's ire had abated, and that she would be more than glad to meet him on the neutral ground of the breakfast table. Just as he entered the yard, he saw her leave the pantry, but he saw or heard nothing of the breakfast. There was no cook to be found, and no living soul to whom he could look for relief but the unapproachable antagonist of his high resolves. He went to the pantry, the dairy, and even to the smoke-house, but all were locked, and Mrs. Leathers had the keys on her apron string. Here was a difficulty for which neither experience nor calculation had prepared him.

What are all the promises and prospects of poor human life! Why should a man say to himself, I will do this or that, that good may follow! Why should vain man work schemes and manœuvres to provide a competency whereon to feast and fatten in the days of his ease, when every change of the wind may blow him bare, and every swell of the tides throw him high and dry upon the beach of starvation! "Verily what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" Such were the thoughts which might have occupied the head of Jeptha Leathers at the particular time of which we speak, had something more substantial occupied his stomach; but for the present, metaphysical disquisitions, and all that sort of thing, had to give way to his physical cravings. He went to all the doors and pulled at them, as though he expected they were unlocked, and he whistled and fumbled about the shelves, in hopes that the relenting woman would ask what he was hunting, and thus bring about a parley, and consequently a compromise. But she was too much of a "business woman" to be caught by such a snare, so she looked straight at the fire and knit as though she was hired by the job. At length the spirit of the poor fellow gave way, and the gasping appetite spoke out for itself. "Aint there no cold vittles?" Said he pensively, as he scratched his head with one hand, and ran the other into his pocket. Mrs. Leathers saw the strength of her position and resolved to make the final charge. "May be there's some in the kitchen," said she, "and if there aint, you can have some cooled, if you'll wait 'til dinner." Jephth felt that he had met his Waterloo, and yielded like a soldier, surrendering at discretion.

From this time onward he was an altered man; his haughty spirit was melted into the most plastic humility, and all his acquaintances spoke of him as a very "good meaning sort of a man," and the ladies particularly cited him as a pattern of husbands. Whenever it was necessary to speak of his possessions, it was our negroes, our horses, our house. And it was said, that he carried the division even down to our hat, our boots, and our —.

But we were going to remark, that habit is second nature; at least, it was so with Mrs. Leathers; for she had been so long in the habit of managing her own business, that it was impossible to give it up without a struggle, and with her, a struggle was tantamount to a triumph. So that what she designed in the outset for an equitable monarchy, she finally reduced to an absolute despotism. Defeats seem to be governed by some regular law which makes each one accelerate the next, and our hero was very soon routed "horse, foot, and dragoon;" and like Santa Anna in the hands of the Texians, "he concluded to remain a prisoner."

As it was rather unpleasant to remain immediately under the guns of the enemy, and as he was completely disarmed, he was suffered to roam about within prison bounds. Day by day he took up his position in some shady place, on the fence, where he would sit and whittle sticks, and chew tobacco, until the horn blew him home to dinner, or the darkness of night drove him in. As he sauntered about from one resting place to another, his whole gait and outer integuments betokened the deepest humility and contrition of spirit. His hat gracefully flapped down before, as a sort of barrier betwixt his retiring countenance and the outer world. His whiskers, which in former times had stood up manfully to his countenance, now dropped down. His coat seemed to hang back as though it was afraid to go with him, and was ready to desert upon the slightest intimation of danger. His pantaloon was always kindly open at the pockets to accommodate his retiring hands, and were gently curved forward at the knee, ready moulded to suit his position on the fence, the door-steps, or such other elevated place as he might choose or chance to assume. His shoes had thrown off the useless restraints of artificial society, wholly eschewed every thing like blacking or strings, and modestly bowed down in the rear, to save their master the useless trouble of lifting his foot, or stooping to pull up the heels.

It has been frequently said that "all things are for the best," and we know that many of the brightest ornaments of the human family took their ground start in captivity, or extreme adversity. Indeed to aspiring spirits, there is nothing so wholesome and invigorating as an occasional brushing over by the lashes of necessity and privation. It gives time for reflection, and the superiority of second thoughts is proverbial. It not only adds to the maturity of plans for future progress, but it exercises a sort of whetting process upon the thinking powers, rendering them brighter and more acute for future use. So it was with Jephth Leathers; he was not brought up to reading, and was greatly in want of some wholesome mental employment with which to drive off the dreadful irksomeness of his solitary hours. Dr. Franklin said, that the most unhappy condition in which a man could be placed, was to have nothing to read of a rainy day. Every day was equal to a rainy day with Mr. Leathers.

It happened luckily one day, while he was sitting in one of his dreariest moods, that Major Briggins, who was a candidate for the Legislature, and out upon a sort of electioneering scout, came upon him with all his pockets full of newspapers, and other "documents," which he proceeded to read to him, with copious comments of his own by the way. He soon discovered that he had awakened an interest in Jephth, that would do to operate on further; so on taking leave, he insisted on leaving his papers with him to peruse at his leisure. By the time Major Briggins came round on his second tour, Mr. Leathers was a full convert to his cause, and the Major had the pleasure of remitting his name and money as a subscriber to his favorite party papers. Our hero now began to wear a more contented aspect, and retired to his shady retreats after dinner with quite a jovial whistle. So delighted did he soon become with his papers, that even the dinner horn would often pass by unheeded. For long hours would he sit or lie in some "sequestered shade," and pore over the ranting reasonings of some Congress statesman, or the lucid logs, and random rumors of a "special correspondent," until the friendly buzz of some quart or so of mosquitoes would set him violently to boxing his own ears, and thus bring to his recollection that night was fast falling upon him. So retired in his habits did he become, that it was generally understood amongst his neighbors, that those who might have business with him, must hunt him as they would hunt a stray horse—any where, but where he ought to be. Knowing and kind-hearted people sighed over him, as a poor fallen spirit,—a dependent in the house of his wife, and a drone in his neighborhood. Meantime Mr. Leathers was undergoing a purgatorial process, from which he was to emerge, cleared of his dross, as from a refiner's furnace.

It was soon discernible to Mrs. Leathers, that her husband was growing vehemently political, and whether from a conscious superiority in her understanding of the subject, or from a natural disposition to rectify error wherever found, she promptly met him on the wordy battle-field, never failing to come off at least with a drawn battle, and the last fire. But this was only another whet-stone to the edge of Jeptha's growing keenness. Time rolled on, and Leathers had gathered information, and talked of it to himself, until his intelligence and patriotism were overflowing. In the depth of his research, and the wide expanse of his philosophy, he had discovered that our once gallant ship of State was fast leaking, and rapidly falling to pieces; and that it required all possible exertion to save even a floating plank from the disastrous wreck. This discovery was truly startling to him, and the more painful, that most of his poor fellow-citizens seemed yet to be thoughtlessly clinging to the shattered ropes of hope and confidence, while the ship was sinking under them. The woods and fence corners could no longer contain him, but every captain's muster or magistrate's court, and, indeed, every other place where his talents could be employed, found him tendering his eloquent tidings of fraud and ruin, and patriotically rallying to the rescue. He was soon pleased to discover, that the omens of danger had aroused many besides himself, and the tide of politics was greatly swollen. The tide of politics, when it runs high, is like all other high tides, apt to have much foam and trash floating on the top; those substances which contain most wind and least solidity will ever be uppermost in a swell. Whether it was by the operation of this law of the tides, or from some other cause, Jeptha Leathers could not resist the solicitations of his friends to become a candidate for the Legislature, so soon as the election of his friend, the Major, was over. By consent, the name of Jeptha Leathers, Esq. was regularly brought out as a candidate the next year. Notwithstanding his retired habits, which were named by some as an objection to him, he soon convinced his fellow-citizens that he was well schooled in declamation, and inured to the clashings of debate. So that he was the man for the times—an "available candidate." A full report of his speeches would be valuable, as preserving many important truths in the history of the times, but as none was made out, we can quote only from recollection a striking passage, the eloquence of which fixed it indelibly upon our memory, and which will serve to exhibit in full their oratorical and literary character.

"Look," said he, in the midst of one of his ablest efforts—"Look at the supercilious office-holders and office-seekers, look at their arrogant presumption, and transcendental delinquency, see how they perdominate and refulgerate over the spiles of our rights and institutions. Look at their pusillanimous repudiation of the people's hard yearnings, and say if you're willing to coalesce with such misrulers. Ef a poor honest farmer, like me and you, was to happen to steal a little pig, he must be hilt up to public commiseration, and go to the penitentiary to work out by the sweat of his brow, the atonements of his duplicity, while these hired banditters are dressed in fine purple linnen, and a farin about upon all the sumptuous of the land, and interlopin upon the reserved rights of the States, and of our wives and childern. Reform, fellow-citizens we must have superlative, and magnescient reform, or else our country must sink into the dark debyss of—of ruin, and—an—and"—

"Huzzah," cried his right hand man and prompter. "Huzzah! Huzzah!" went round the crowd, while Jeptha's particular friends swore he was "a horse," and hoisting him upon their shoulders, bore him off to "grease his wheels," as they termed it, and to congratulate him upon his successful vindication of the people's rights. The Leather's party were boisterously patriotic, and abundantly triumphant—in anticipation. Leather was immediately at a premium. Every member of the party mounted leather cockades, and it was decidedly orthodox to wear leather buttons throughout.

Jeptha Leathers was totally amazed at himself; from the very sack-cloth and ashes of despair, he found himself suddenly blazing up in the full flame of his most hopeful ambition. On every occasion, it was necessary for him to make a speech, until he was almost continually speaking. It is true, he usually observed the most respectful silence during his short stays at home, but these brief intervals were but steam-gathering periods, and served wonderfully to heighten his polemic appetite for the first occasion he met with.

Thus went our hero swimmingly on upon his favorite current of applause, which would doubtless have borne him safely into the besieged harbor of office, had he not been one of those luckless heroes, whom fortune keeps for her most whimsical and fantastic sports. In the same year in which the political balloon of Mr. Jeptha Leathers was so rapidly ascending, the Indians took it into their heads to "rise," which presented a new field for his talents and patriotism, and with all his "Doric temerity" he entered it.

The appointed day for a draft came on; the sovereign citizens had assembled, Sergeants were making marks on the ground, and bawling for the gallant soldiery to "fall into ranks." Captains were posted at the heads of their respective lines, Majors were galloping and capering about in martial confusion, Colonels were strutting with valiant pomp, while the "citizen soldiers" were drawn up in crooked array to "bask in the sunshine." Orders were given for all those who would volunteer their services to fight the savage foe, to march out and array themselves under a red handkerchief, which was hoisted for that purpose; but just as they were to have marched, a halt was ordered. The voice of Mr. Leathers was heard,—he came forward with his hat in his hand, and at one stride, ascended the floor of an open cake-cart, to address the multitude—

"Feller soldiers," said he, "we are ordered out to stand a draft, to see who shall go to fight the savage Ingens, that are killing our wives and murdering our olphin children,—who of you will go? The Governor orders every sixth man to go, but I know that much more than every sixth man will go, yes every sixteenth will go, if there is room for e'm. Feller citizens, when I consider upon the ignominious degradations and bloody barbarosities, which these savage herds are committing, my heart would bleed within me—if it could." Such a strain did he continue, for full half an hour, by way of blowing up the smouldering embers of ire in the bosoms of the gaping throng. Meantime, the fife was squeaking melodiously, and the drum sounding in most thrilling jars, but the more they spoke, squeaked, and hammered, the more the patriotic hosts wouldn't march out. Finally orders were given for the formation of a court to proceed with the draft.

The business of the court was progressing finely when Mr. Leathers re-appeared,—for he had been slightly missing for awhile—but he was so altered in his aspect, as to attract the general attention. His right knee was slightly flexed, so as to bring the toes to the ground, and give his body a considerable slant to one side. He might have injured himself perhaps in mounting the cart. As he came hopping in, "my dear sir," said his friend, Colonel Spangle, "what has happened to you? did you get a fall?"

"Happened to me!" said Jephtha with an air of surprise, "nothing aint happened to me." "But my dear fellow you are lame." "Well what of that," said Jephtha, with much coolness; "weren't I always lame ever since I had the white swellin when I was a boy? I thought every body knowd that." "I didn't know it," said his Captain, "and so I've put your name in the box for a draft." "Well you may jest take it out," replied

Jephtha, "for I've got a receipt that I'm lame." The feint was not only too palpable, but an unnecessary blunder, as his name had already been drawn out to a blank, and escaped the draft, but our hero had again overreached his mark, and realized one of those inevitable hoists which grow out of a discrepancy betwixt ends and means. From this time onward, his star was sadly in the descendant. He kept his name up until the election, but so dispirited was the leather's party, that not a single leather button was seen at the election, and very few Leather's tickets were deposited in the box. Our hero was deprived of the solace of most of the great men who are defeated: he could not retire to the "peaceful shades of private life;" both habit and circumstances forbade it, and he gradually descended to a very low round in the social ladder. He became at once, a common convenience and nuisance. The last time we saw our once ambitious hero was on a Christmas morning; he was reeling and rocking along a village street, minus coat-skirt, and a hat, while a dozen hopeful lads were swarming round him, pinning papers to his remaining skirt, and occasionally giving him a high-fall, to their own uproarious delight.

Long before this stage of the case, the gallant Legislature had passed "an act to divorce Jemima Leathers from her husband, Jephtha Leathers, and to confer upon the said Jemima the powers and privileges of a Fem. sole." Thus dwindled down, and wound up, the career of Jephtha Leathers, the martyr to blind ambition.

THE FORSAKEN IRISH GIRL.

An "o'er true" scene from real life.

I.

We deem the fiction-tale o'er-wrought—
The passion's dye too deep,
But the true annals of a heart
Shall a weak pencil keep!

II.

The bud, the bloom, the blight of hope,—
The strife of changing hours,—
The crushing of love's precious pearl,—
The wreck of reasoning powers!

III.

Ah, who have felt—they best can tell
How dark the lines should be,
That trace the course through days and years
Of such a destiny.

IV.

The sun pour'd down its mellow light,
As wan'd the summer day,
And silent seem'd the earth, and calm,
As Heav'n's own blessed ray.

V.

The South-West stir'd the blossom'd vines,
That climb'd the trellis, high,
And fill'd with sweets the open door—
What! ho! who rushes by!

VI.

A slender form, with pallid cheek
And air more wild than rude;
She starts, and feels her haste too great,
And seeks a tone subdued.

VII.

"Excuse me, Mam, I seek employ,
Indeed I'm honest too,
Though he—I saw him enter here—
Has slander'd me to you.

VIII.

"Where'er I turn, where'er I stray,
He presses on before,
And cautions those who would be kind
To shut me from the door.

IX.

"He's cruel—oh, I feel it here;"
In falt'ring tones she spoke,
And press'd her clasp'd hands to her side:—
"Oh here—my heart is broke."

X.

"Be calm," I said, "I'll hear your tale,
To slander none may dare"—
She gather'd up her dark eyes' fire,
And there was frenzy there.

XI.

With clenched hands and upturn'd brow,
She talk'd—to me unseen—
Of love, and hate, and grief, and wrong,
With many a curse between;

XII.

Of parents wrong'd and sisters sham'd,
Of Beauty, spoil'd and spurn'd,
Of raven locks made gray by grief,
And Love to madness turn'd;

XIII.

Till, fury-spent, she calmly sigh'd—
"He heard, Mam, what I spoke,
He's hid, but well I know he's here—
Cruel!—my heart is broke.

XIV.

"I left my Island home for him,
And cross'd the dreadful sea.
My heart to him as Heav'n was true—
God! what is his to me!

XV.

"Then I was fair—as black as jet
These tresses on my brow"—
She sadly smooth'd her ringlets down—
"You see they're changing now.

XVI.

"'Tis woman's lot to lose her charms,
While men are young and gay;
We have more trouble, Mam, you know,
Grief makes the tresses gray."

XVII.

I ask'd about her parents' home,
And friends she'd left behind.
"Oh, they were of the better sort—
Careful, and proud, and kind.

XVIII.

"There is a difference, you know,
Some parents train with care,
And mine—oh, oft my father said,
'My daughter dear, beware.'

XIX.

"My sisters did with honor wed
To farmers, rich and free,
And in their true heart's love were bless'd,
Blessed—oh, all but me!"

XX.

Then rush'd the anguish to her heart—
The madness to her brain,
And him unseen she oft adjured
By fearful curse again,

XXI.

To give one word—one sweet hope word
In her crush'd heart to wear.
How pass'd the frenzy-fit away,
And follow'd it—despair.

XXII.

"Dost thou not pray to Him who binds
The broken heart?" I said—
"Curses are mine,—I cannot pray,—
I've heap'd them on his head,

XXIII.

"Till my own frenzied brain has reel'd,
And my lost heart is sear'd,—
Love's fountain floweth out in prayer—
Only Love's prayer is heard.

XXIV.

"But present ills and outward wants
The heart's deep sorrows hide;—
Where shall I be another night?"
Sadly, the wanderer sigh'd.

XXV.

Her parting words, remembered well—
When earth shall yield, at last,
The annals of her children up
With all the hidden past,

XXVI.

I'd not meet her as "he" shall meet,
Before the Face Divine,
Were earth one perfect crysolite,
And I might call it mine.

RECOLLECTIONS OF SIX DAYS' JOURNEY IN THE MOON.

BY AN AERIO-NAUTICAL MAN.

In our last, we left the Aeronaut in the Isle of Engines, in the Moon. Next, as we have already intimated, he visits and describes a certain Republic, in that bright world.

[Ed. Mess.

Having enjoyed the hospitalities of the Island as far as my time would permit—that is to say, having paid dearer for my accommodations than I ever did any where else, notwithstanding the wonder working machinery,—I took passage in the magnetic vessel, for the purpose of visiting a famous Republic of which I heard such terrible accounts in the Island, that I felt a great curiosity to see it with my own eyes; for I could scarcely believe, that a people so ignorant and vicious could exist in a state of society and civilization. I had observed too, that the people of the Island were especially vain of their superiority over all others in the Moon, which they took care to maintain by an ingenious process of elevating themselves at the expense of other people. This Republic, or Confederation as it is called, lies at the western extremity of the Ocean, at a distance of about three thousand miles, yet we reached it in about twenty-four hours. I inquired of the Captain if they knew any thing about steamboats, and he told me they were used about a hundred years ago, but had now become, as he expressed it in the common phrase of the inhabitants of the Moon, “obsolete ideas.”

Arriving at a great city, called the emporium, I was agreeably surprised to find what a great man I was. As soon as the better sort of people learned I was a traveller, and had come from the Isle of Engines, they took the horses from the hackney coach in which I was proceeding to my lodgings, and dragged me along with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of admiration and applause. At the hotel I was met by a committee, the chairman of which made a long speech, in which he complimented me in such high terms on my literary eminence, that if I had not been a remarkably modest man I should have been quite out of countenance, and concluded his address by respectfully inquiring when it would suit my convenience to partake of a public dinner. In less than six hours, I had invitations enough to last me six weeks, and received so many other proofs of profound devotion, especially from the ladies, who, by the way, were remarkably handsome, that I could not help thinking there must be a severe scarcity of great men in the Republic, and finally came to the conclusion, that the people who made such a fuss with me, must labor under a deep sense of their inferiority.

This I however soon found was by no means the case, for they turned out to be almost as great boasters as the inhabitants of the Isle of Engines, and called themselves the most enlightened nation under the sun, as indeed they are in many respects. It seems they were formerly subject to the sovereign of the Isle of Engines, but became independent some fifty or sixty years ago, after a struggle in which they displayed great gallantry and perseverance. They are justly proud of this achievement, and boast much of their independence, which is however merely political, for I found them little better than abject slaves to the fashions and opinions of the Isle of Engines, frequently adopting them long after they have become obsolete ideas, (to use the Captain's expression,) like menials who strut about in the cast-off clothes of their masters.

It is proper to premise, that the Moon is separated into two great divisions, called the Old and New World; of the latter of which, the Great Republic considers itself, and justly too, the representative—being the most powerful and enlightened state in that quarter. The inhabitants of these two great divisions either really have, or pretend to have, a great contempt for each other, the people of the Old World looking upon those of the New as mere upstarts of yesterday, without any ancestors, ancestral monuments, or ancestral achievements. Those of the New World, on the other hand, have various flings at the aforesaid old gentleman. They call him a superannuated dotard, strutting about in the threadbare garments of his ancestors, and living upon their reputation, instead of establishing one of his own. They say he is always looking backwards, if not going backwards too, while they are perpetually going ahead, and looking straight forwards. That one nibbles at the dry crust of memory, while the other luxuriates on the luscious banquet of hope; and that, in short, one lives in the past, the other in the future.

Almost all their jealousies and antipathies may be traced to those sources, though it must be confessed, they are combined with others, arising from the opposition of great national interests, and above all, of political principles, the states of the New World being for the most part Republics—those of the Old, Monarchies. They are perpetually disputing about the superiority of these modes of government; the Monarchists stigmatizing the Republicans as semi-barbarians, anarchists and agrarians; the latter returning the compliment by dubbing the others ignorant, spiritless slaves, without courage to assert their freedom, or sense enough to enjoy it if attained.

But notwithstanding this, I soon observed, that the people of the New World, with all their pride of liberty, had not achieved its last and greatest triumph, that of independence of mind. They still cherish a sort of sneaking deference, a paltry spirit of imitation in respect to the inhabitants of the Old World, which is perpetually leaking out in spite of all their boastings of superiority. I scarcely met a man or woman, especially among those of the more enlightened classes, who ventured to adopt an opinion in opposition to the authority of the Old World, or a dress not sanctioned by its example. Both their tastes and opinions seem entirely subservient to foreign example, and the influence of the Isle of Engines is at this moment far more despotic over the minds, manners, and morals of the people of these her ancient colonies, than was her political authority at any period of their dependence.

The government of this Great Republic of the Moon is strictly democratic, while almost all the early education, as well as subsequent reading, of its inhabitants inculcates the usages of monarchy. Their political principles are those of perfect equality, while their domestic habits and associations are almost all founded on a broad and palpable distinction of rank. In theory they are all the same, in practice they are all different. At an election poll, the servant is equal to his master; in the drawing room he waits on him at table, and does his bidding. One might be tempted to conclude, that it was impossible any system of society or government could subsist for any length of time in the midst of such incongruities, and this has uniformly been asserted by the philosophers of the Old World of the Moon. But it is singular how easy it is for all these apparent contradictions to become reconciled by custom and practice, the two great agents in smoothing down the asperities of conflicting principles. Strange to say, these Republicans seem to get along very well, though it would be easy to prove such a result absolutely impossible. Setting aside their penitent propensity to adopt the opinions, and follow the fashions of those they affect to despise; their ignorant, vulgar admiration of foreigners, especially literary tourists, and inferior writers of the Isle of Engines; and their profound devotion to those titles of nobility which are incompatible with their government and institutions, they may be called an enlightened people, among whom intelligence is far more widely diffused than elsewhere; whose morals, though tinted, have not reached the incurable corruption of the Old World of the Moon; whose portion of happiness is most assuredly at least equal; and whose progress in numbers, wealth and prosperity, is unparalleled in the history of mankind. I could give such examples of the growth of states and cities, as would without doubt place me on a level with the celebrated Baron Monchausen, notwithstanding the sage and highly original remark of my Lord Byron, so often quoted by his admirers, that "Truth is strange—stranger than fiction." I will therefore only venture to give one example. Travelling along the banks of a great river, to the examination of which I had devoted a full half hour, I was overcome by heat and fatigue and fell asleep, in the midst of a sublime forest of primeval trees, whose heads seemed almost to reach the skies. On waking and looking about, I found myself, to my utter astonishment, in the midst of a thriving town, with a canal and a rail road running side by side, and the stumps standing in the streets. The impression on my mind at first was, that I had taken one of Peter Claus's naps, but I trust the reader will believe me when I declare, on the veracity of a traveller, that on looking at my watch, I found I had slept only two hours.

Intending this as a mere sketch of my personal travels and adventures, it will not be expected that I should here aspire to a complete development of the state of trade, science, literature, the fine arts, and the general statistics of the various countries of the Moon it was my fortune to visit. These I shall reserve for a separate work, to be published in one hundred and seventy-five numbers, embellished with original designs borrowed from every accessible source, and so cheap that purchasers will wonder at the sum they have paid when they come to the end of the series. The reader must therefore be content with a few general observations, commencing with the subject of money, that being the first principle of all things among the inhabitants of the Moon.

The ordinary currency is paper money, though there is one remarkable exception which came to my knowledge in a way I shall hereafter explain. In some places, I found it greatly depreciated, but the people having no other standard of value to compare with it, were quite ignorant of the fact, and so delighted with the high prices they received for every thing, that they actually forgot what they paid. They consequently all fancied themselves growing rich apace, and were so happy, that they turned every man out of office, as a common disturber of the public peace of mind, who had the audacious wisdom to predict that such a state of things could not last forever. In some places the privilege of making paper money was confined to a few; in others I believe every man manufactured it for himself, it was so plenty. In all these places, particularly the latter, there was nothing seen but paper money, and such was the scarcity of silver and gold, that the only specimen I saw, was a shilling carefully preserved in a cabinet of curious medals collected by a learned antiquary, who had written a dissertation to prove that the Aborigines of the country were acquainted with the art of coining money. In most of the countries I visited, there were two great parties, one called the hard money men, the other the shin-plaster dynasty, with which opprobrious epithet the believers in paper money were scandalized by their opponents. Sometimes one, sometimes the other gained the ascendancy; but I was told by a person of veracity, that paper money maintained its stand through all these vicissitudes, which puzzled me not a little. The shin-plaster boys insinuated that the others were called hard money men, because it was so hard to get at their money; while the latter retorted by asserting that the others never paid their debts at all except by act of Congress. This is all I mean to say on the subject at present, with the single exception of an anecdote I shall relate, too curious to be omitted, without great injustice to the reader.

I had heard of a strange people, that lived among the recesses of a range of high mountains at a great distance and were considered a hundred years at least behind the spirit of the age. They were held to be little better than barbarians and infidels, for they knew nothing about running in debt without paying, and did not believe in paper money. It was my intention to pay these people a flying visit, but finding this great Republic of the west extended in every direction so far that it seemed impossible ever to get out of it, I reluctantly relinquished my design. It happened, however, that I luckily fell in with one of these originals, of whom I bought a superb beaver skin as a present to my wife on my return home. On offering payment in paper money he declined to my great surprise, and continued turning up his nose contemptuously, at a new bank note, just from the mint, which I pressed on his acceptance. I assured him it was as good as the bank, and far preferable to silver or gold, which were considered obsolete ideas. He shook his head however, and at length asked me with great gravity—

"Can you convert it into silver spoons?"

"No—I believe not," replied I.

"Or watches?"

"I can't say I have ever known such a thing done."

"Or any thing useful or ornamental?"

"They make very excellent shin-plasters."

"Are they intrinsically of any earthly value?"

"Not that I know of, with this single exception. Yet you may exchange them for every thing valuable."

"That is to say if any body will take them. Pray give me my beaver skin. I can at all events make it into a cap, a waistcoat, or something useful." Saying this, he almost snatched it from my hand, and left me wondering at his blindness as well as pitying his deplorable ignorance of first principles of circulation and currency.

The inhabitants of the Moon have made great progress in science, arts and literature. In one nation especially, they paint exquisite pictures, though there is not a man among them that can make a tolerable box to pack them in. They carve the most exquisite statues; yet are totally ignorant of the most common machinery for raising blocks of marble from the quarries. They can unroll the most ancient manuscript without injuring it, but a common tack, or a scientific horse shoe, is beyond their comprehension, or beneath their attention. In short, they are as deficient in the useful mechanical, as we of the United States are rather flippantly said to be in the fine arts. I should here observe, that these remarks are confined to one nation of the Moon in particular, which is celebrated throughout the whole planet for its taste and skill in the fine arts, most especially music. The rest take pride in various other matters in which they fancy they excel all their neighbors, consoling themselves with the idea that the progress of the fine arts is coeval with that of luxury and effeminacy, and that where greater honors are paid to fiddlers and prima donnas, than to the benefactors of mankind, or the giver of freedom to nations, the former will become plenty, the latter very scarce. However this may be, it is certain that the nation of fiddlers and prima donnas both pities and envies its neighbors, while they, in return, despise and imitate it to the extent of their ability.

Of the vast progress made by the inhabitants of the Moon in science and knowledge, it will be sufficient to state, in order to convey some faint idea of the truth, that they are so far in advance of those of our Earth, that they have discarded nearly one half the knowledge we hold to be essential to the reputation of a wise man, and consider a great portion of the other half, of extremely questionable utility. It is beginning to be a prevailing opinion among the philosophers, that the world has been on the wrong tack for the last six thousand years: that society is altogether constituted on erroneous principles, and that it will soon be absolutely necessary, either to re-organize the old, or make an entire new world, founded on the solid basis of human experience. As respects the sciences, I was surprised to find them so far in advance of us, that they had nearly completed the circle, and were fast returning to those venerable exploded systems, which in the benighted ages of ignorance and superstition, were considered as no better than arrant witchcraft and necromancy, the diabolical progeny of an incestuous communion with the powers of darkness. There are men of such stupendous, scientific attainments among them, that they can tell what others are thinking of without dealing with the devil, and the gift of second-sight, or clairvoyance, as it is there called, has become so common, that it is much more usual to meet with people who cannot see what is to be seen, than such as can see what was once invisible to all but those who, in the days of ignorance and superstition, were supposed to partake of supernatural powers. Every day some new science is discovered, which renders easy what was considered impossible before, and I have little doubt that if they continue on for half a century more in the same rapid pace, they will be able to dispense altogether with a Supreme Being, and construct not only worlds, but people to live in them, on purely scientific principles.

With regard to the Literature of the Moon, I have only space to say, that it has ceased to be a separate avocation. Every man is there his own author, and as for booksellers, if any one should be silly enough to publish a book for the purpose of even giving it away, it would be considered a gross insult, as conveying a direct insinuation that men could not do this for themselves. In truth, the entire system is reversed. Authors give a premium to their readers for their trouble; and critics always prepare their strictures before the work is written, having in the course of the development of the human mind, discovered that it is much better to teach an author what is right, before he has done wrong, than to arraign and punish him afterwards. It is moreover a curious fact, for which I can vouch the very best authority, that there are at least ten critics to one author, all gaining not only fame but bread, by correcting his faults or proclaiming his beauties, without the least expense of taste or judgment.

At the period I visited the Great Republic, (which by the way is too young to have been christened, and is yet without a specific name,) the better sort of people, to wit, those who had most money, or credit, were laboring under a singular sort of monomania, that is to say, they were what is called music mad. A few days after my arrival at the Great Emporium, walking one bright moonlight evening* through a fashionable street, I encountered a vast crowd of people, pushing and thronging after a person, who was stalking along with much dignity, and huzzaing with great vociferation, while they scattered flowers in his path, and the ladies showered bouquets on his head from the open windows. Feeling somewhat curious to know who this could be, I ventured to inquire of a respectable looking man, who had ensconced himself by my side, behind the stone steps of a hotel, to get out of the way of the crowd.

"I suppose, that is some great hero, just returned from a victory over the enemies of his country," said I.

"Not at all," replied the old gentleman with a look of surprise.

"Some illustrious patriot, who has passed his life in the service of the State!"

"Not at all, sir."

"Some great public benefactor, who has ensured the happiness of his countrymen by freeing them from despotism and securing their rights and property by a wise system of laws and government?"

"Not at all, sir."

"Surely then he must have done some glorious act, or achieved some great triumph of virtue or intellect."

"Not at all, sir," again replied the old gentleman with a significant smile. "He is only the greatest fiddler in the world, and has just got through a piece of music, so difficult that every body pronounced it impossible."

"Indeed! You must be a very musical people."

"That depends on the people of the Old World, from whom we derive all our tastes and opinions. On the arrival of the next magnetic packet, we shall all become deaf for aught I know."

Here we were interrupted by a shout that rent the skies, and looking in that direction, I saw the great fiddler elevated on the shoulders of six ladies dressed in the most fashionable mode, and fiddling in great style. Whereupon all the people fell down and worshipped his fiddle.

"Really," said I to my companion, "You are indeed a very musical people. What will be the consequence of such enthusiasm?"

"That we shall have plenty of fiddlers, and a special scarcity of heroes, poets, statesmen and public benefactors. The ambition of our great men will be confined to playing the fiddle. Sir," continued he, "do you see that decrepid old man, stealing along unnoticed through the crowd, as if ashamed of himself or his countrymen? That man bore a great share in giving freedom to his country, which owes him a debt of gratitude it can never pay. Yet you see he passes unnoticed. Good night, sir, I am going home to learn to play the fiddle."

It was originally my intention to spend six weeks, or two months in making a thorough investigation of this new, or at least hitherto unvisited region. But it unluckily, or rather luckily happened, that at the close of my six days' researches, on opening my pocket for some purpose or other, I was suddenly appalled at the sight of a polite invitation from a bank to call and pay a note which would become due the sixteenth of the month. It wanted only three days of the time, and not a moment was to be lost. Accordingly, I set forth with the least possible delay, and having the advantage of my previous experience, arrived just in time to borrow the money of a friend, thus preserving my credit triumphantly, and fairly becoming entitled to a new discount. I found little trouble in my descent, and confidently assure my readers, that if they can only once arrive at the Moon they will find no difficulty in getting back again.

* I should here observe, that the Moon receives its light at night from the earth, which thus like a good neighbor repays the obligation.

THE DESOLATED.

"One step to the white death-bed,
And one to the bier,
And one to the charnel—and one, oh, where?"
Shelley's "Ginevra."

Rest, weary heart, and sleepless spirit, rest :
Not long, not long, thy steps shall linger here ;
The darkened room, "the death-bed, and the bier"
Follow most closely ; and thy lofty crest,
O ! Mortal body, by the passer pressed
Shall fret not at his scorning ; nor, O ! soul,
Shalt thou glance backward from the glorious goal
To which thou sprangest, as toward his nest
Flies the freed dove, for words that stain alone
Thy earthly fetters—no ; for bright ahead,
Beyond the vale of shadows, lie dispread
The spirit-lands to angels only known ;
And there, the immortal halo round thy brow,
Thou shalt not heed the carks that sting thee now.

THE POET'S GRAVE.

Build me no vault with sculptured marble crowned,
For death seems darkest with the coffin'd dead ;
But place a broken column at my head,
And lay me gently in the grassy ground :
And o'er me let a tall Ailanthus grow,
That shadows from the "Tree of Heaven" may glide
Like spirits round me ; and, if aught of pride
Lurk in thy tender breast for priest so low
In Nature's temple, on the pillared stone
Inscribe,—"Here sleeps a Poet," with my name ;
Then, if Time gives its simple sound to Fame,
To those who loved me living shall be known
My sepulchre, and those who knew me not Shall pause with solemn hearts and ponder at the spot.

THE HARP I TOUCHED.

The harp I touched in former years,
The wires and burnished frame—
The wreath, that twined the chords above,
And all the harp's the same ;

But yet, its notes are wild and sad
Like one who deeply moans :
I touch the chords, they give not back
Their once loved, joyous tones.

The spirit of the song is dead,
The music, oh ! how changed !
It speaks of hearts, that fondly loved,
Now cold and far estranged—

Of blighted hopes—affections crushed,
The faithless, broken vow—
Of garlands, once that twined young Love,
Now faded from his brow.

The minstrel's heart has felt the blight,—
'Tis there the secret lies ;
His heart is sad and mournful too,—
His faithful harp replies.

I cannot bear those mournful strains,
They break my swelling heart—
Farewell, awhile, a fond adieu,
My faithful harp we part ;

I'll hang thee on the silent wall,
Inglorious and unstrung,
'Till happier days and scenes restore
The light and life of song.

GLEANINGS FROM DIFFERENT HISTORIES ;

OR AN HISTORICAL

SKETCH OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY W. W. ANDREWS,

UNITED STATES CONSUL AT MALTA.

(Period embraced, from 1698 to 1730.)

After various ballotings, Raymond Perellos de Roccaful, a native of Arragon, and Grand Bailiff of Negropont, received a plurality of votes, and came to the throne, much to the displeasure of many French and Portuguese knights who had strenuously opposed his election. This prince, who was of a noble carriage and polished manners, distinguished also by his naval deeds, and strictly moral in his conduct, no sooner commenced his reign than he became generally popular with all the languages of his Order, and all classes of his native population. Even those monks who had at first exerted themselves to prevent his promotion, became his firmest friends ; and afterwards filled the highest situations in his councils.

With peace and harmony at home, and threatened with no invasion from abroad, Perellos employed himself in correcting those abuses in the convent which had so much tended to corrupt the morals of its members. Gambling, either with cards or dice, was strictly forbidden, and the more effectually to prevent the Knights from engaging in any games of chance, or sporting bets, they were bound in heavy penalties not to carry money about them when absent from their dwellings, nor to meet in any numbers, unless when attending to the duties of their language, or summoned for a general Chapter. Though Perellos was thus continually employed with the internal affairs of his convent, still he never lost sight of his squadron. Owing his renown, as he often acknowledged, to his naval conquests, he did not forget his sea-faring friends, nor the profession in which they were serving. Guided by this honorable feeling, the Grand-Master always kept his ships of war in thorough repair, and continually absent on different expeditions, that his admirals might win that fame from their exploits which he had won in the same gallees before them.

Early in May, 1797, when the Maltese commander, De Cremville, was cruising off Cape Passaro in a well manned ship, he discovered two sail near the shore wearing the Ottoman flag and steering in a southerly direction. Led to believe from their appearance that they were two roving Corsairs, he thought not of their strength, but gallantly altered his course, to bring them to action. While De Cremville was thus edging down with a light easterly wind, to commence an engagement, for which he anxiously wished, he was told by one of his seamen that the vessels were of a friendly power, as the Turkish flag had disappeared and that of the Pope been run up in its place. A sad disappointment, as one writer has stated, for the monks were bent on a fight and sanguine of success. As the galleys approached each other, the friars of St. John were informed by the Roman commander that he was on his way to Malta,—whither he had been sent by his Holiness, to carry a Russian envoy by the name of Sheremeto,* who had been ordered by Peter the Great to make the Grand-Master's acquaintance. Sacchitti, the Maltese ambassador at Rome, having written to the convent that Sheremeto was of royal descent, being nearly related to the Czar† of Muscovy, and also that when taking leave of the Roman pontiff, he had declared, "that after having seen the most celebrated town in the universe, the holy city of God, the sacred relics of the principals of the holy apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, having likewise received the blessing of his Holiness, the vicar of Jesus Christ on earth, he was resolved to visit the most famous heroes of the church militant, the 'sacred Order of Malta,'"—it was unanimously voted in full council to instruct their Admiral to offer him a passage, should they meet at sea, and to receive him on his landing with princely honors, and at the public expense. In pursuance of these instructions, De Cremville invited the envoy, with his two brothers and suite on board of his ship, which invitation, we are told, was most cordially accepted. The Maltese, however, did not take leave of the Roman commander, until he had arranged with him to cruise in the channel of Sicily where the Barbary Corsairs were wont to make their appearance, in search of Christian commerce.

On Sheremeto's entering the city of Valetta, and passing through the Italian gate, he was met by a guard of honor, saluted with fifteen guns and taken in a carriage to the palace, at the entrance of which the Grand-Master, with many of the grand crosses of the different languages, was standing to receive him.

A general meeting of the Knights having been called, on the 16th of May, 1698,* the Russian ambassador addressed Perellos in the latin language, saying that he had been sent by the Emperor from the "Hyperborean pole" to pay homage to his distinguished Order;—a truly eminent body, and deserving of every praise, for not only having protected its own coast for so long a period from the descents of infidels, but also for carrying the war into their enemies' country, thereby ever rendering a powerful service to all the European powers, whose possessions bordered on this inland sea. Having finished his harangue, which in truth was little else than a continued strain of compliment, he was taken by the Grand-Master into a private apartment of the palace, "and requested to accept a cross, the same as their own." To make the gift "of still more merit," says one historian, "it had been touched with a piece of the real cross, and by the hand of St John the Baptist, the patron of the Order: two relics carefully preserved in the treasury. Perellos added, that this mark of distinction had been unanimously decreed, still less on account of his illustrious birth, than for his military exploits, his attachment to the convent, and the sacrifice he had made in travelling from such a distant country purposely to visit its chief place of residence. And furthermore, it was ordained for the future, that the Knights of the present time, and those who should succeed them, would ever remember him in their prayers, and make him a partaker in all their good works.† Kzeremetz im-

* Although Boisgelin has given us a very able and agreeable history of Malta and its famed Knights, still we must say, that in his dates we find him very inaccurate. His statement, that Sheremeto left Naples for Malta, on the 12th of May, 1698, and that on the following day his passage was finished, is an instance in point. To show that this was impossible, we would merely mention that the fastest steamer of the present time, and when steaming under the most favorable circumstances, can not pass over this distance in less than thirty-six hours.

† Certainly a most flattering compliment this, from a bigoted Catholic prince, to an equally bigoted Protestant noble.

* Eight different writers have spelt this person's name in as many different ways. Not knowing who is correct, we have concluded to follow Voltaire.

† Czar is a title in the Slavonian language, equivalent to that of King in our own.

mediately knelt before Perellos, who placed round his neck a golden chain from which was suspended the cross of Malta. This he received with every testimony of the profoundest respect, having been furnished, at the same time, with the decree of council, assigning the reasons of his being honored with this distinction."

Sheremeto, after passing a week in Valetta, and amusing himself in visiting the fortifications, catacombs, grottoes and other objects of interest in the Island, took his leave of the Grand-Master, and said to the many monks who surrounded him, that for the future he should consider himself one of their number, and ever bear in mind their kind attentions towards him. Then, immediately embarking on the Admiral's ship, he set sail for the southern coast of Sicily, hoping to fall in with the Roman captain, whom, as we have observed, he left, intending to cruise on that station until his return. Being successful in his search, he took leave of De Crenville under a royal salute, and went on his way to Naples, whither he had also been sent on a political mission, and of which, as it concerns not our subject, we shall have nothing to say.

Many historians were anxious to discover the reasons which had operated so powerfully on the mind of the Emperor, as to compel him not only to send an ambassador to Innocent XII. and the Knights of Malta, but also to name a person to go on this mission, on whose services as a relation of his own he could place the utmost reliance. If, as some authors have supposed, the politic monarch wished to annex the Island to his dominions, he signally failed in effecting his object. But we can find no proof that Peter ever harbored any such intention. Sheremeto certainly did not mention it when at Malta, or we should have seen it recorded. To suppose that the Emperor would gladly have secured a fortress in the Mediterranean, as England and France have done at a much later period, is natural enough, but that to obtain it, he would have been willing* to risk a war with the cowed monks and their Papal Chief is very improbable. Only a few months after the Russian envoy had taken his departure from Malta, Peter made a truce with the Sultan, which was to be binding between them for the long term of five-and-twenty years. It could, therefore, have been with no intention of forming a league against Mustapha the Second, for any immediate action, that he had been sent on this Catholic mission.

Although Sheremeto was the first Muscovite minister who had ever visited the convent, in a public capacity, still there had been others before him at Rome. Alexis, the father of Peter the Great, had sent a special ambassador, a quarter of a century before, to Clement X., asking his assistance against the Turks, with whom he was engaged in a most desperate war: a truly independent person, as we should judge, "for though a Catholic, he refused to kiss His Holiness' toe, saying that so mean an act was beneath the dignity of the Prince he had the honor to represent." Clement, notwithstanding this refusal, received the Russian representative with every mark of respect, and promised, with the consent of his Cardinals, to grant the aid which the Czar had desired. The Roman Pontiff keeping his word, sent his own gallees, and those of the Order, to cruise off the Turkish coast, thereby creating a diversion in favor of the Autocrat, which to him, being hardly pressed at the North, was a service of the utmost importance. It was doubtless owing, in a measure, to this happy diversion, that Alexis was indebted for the glorious victory over the Moslems at Cochim, where, as a popular historian of the last century has written, his enemies "were intrenched up to their teeth," and made a most gallant resistance. This victory was the more deserving of remembrance as it placed Sobieski on the throne of Poland, and made him a firm ally of the Muscovite Emperor, by whose assistance alone he had secured his kingdom and obtained his crown.

The policy of Russia with reference to Turkey has always been the same. Ever has it been her constant wish, her only aim, to weaken the Ottoman Empire; and gladly would she league with any power, whether Protestant or Catholic, that would aid her in securing this, which for England's interests, is too much her favorite object. So steadily has Russia pursued this unwavering course, that the Moslems of this day greatly fear a tradition, which says that they will not long exist as a nation, and that their conquerors are to be a Northern and a barbarous people.* But it is not so much that the Russians are inimical to the Turks on account of their religion and their infidel rites, as that they wish to seize on their country, and make it a Muscovite province. Oleg a thousand years ago took Kiev, and said on his entering it, "this shall be the mother of all my cities." And such, says Count Segur, it became in fact for nearly

* That Peter would have gone as far as any other monarch of his time to make a conquest, or to gratify a wish, we will cite but a single instance to prove. Saying to a favorite minister on one occasion, that he was ignorant of the real state of Russia, inasmuch as she had land enough, and only wanted water, he pounced on a barren, marshy spot, and laid the foundation of that famed city which is now one of the most flourishing in Europe, and still bearing his name, though it be engraven on the remains of one hundred thousand of his subjects, who perished in its erection. "On this unnoted spot," says Malte-Brun, "in less than one hundred years after his death, the fate of Europe was to be decided, and the whole moral and political aspect of the northern regions was to undergo a change."

* The Persians also, we are told by the Rev. Mr. Perkins, "have a tradition and apprehension among themselves, that the whole fabric of Mohammedism is destined ere long to fall."

three centuries. "Not so much that the conqueror might enjoy repose in it, but because it was near at hand to the Greek empire, a prey which was greedily coveted by the barbarians whom he commanded."

Singular it is, that after the lapse of so many ages we should find the Emperor treading in Oleg's footsteps, and trying by his yearly encroachments on the borders of Turkey, to get possession of that country which, ten centuries ago, his barbarous countrymen, at the head of his savage hordes, had so much coveted. Were it not for the jealousy of England, France and Austria, the Mussulman Empire would now be divided and a Russian Viceroy sent to sit on that sanguinary throne, which the bearded sons of the prophet so long have filled. When this long threatening change is to take place, time alone must determine. That it will occur, there is not a doubt, and that it must be before the lapse of many years, all the political movements in the Levant, of a recent date, but too strongly seem to foretell.

But not having taken our pen to speculate on future events, however important they may be to the young Sultan and his Moslem subjects, we shall return to Sheremeto's mission to Malta, which made such a talk in its day, and caused so many surmises. That it was no uncommon occurrence for the representative of a crowned head to appear at the convent, when his sovereign wished to make a treaty with the Knights, or to form a league against the followers of the Prophet Mahomet, will have been seen from our previous chapters. On such an occasion, it was only necessary for an ambassador to remind the Order, that the Sultan was the common enemy of their Christian faith, to secure the coöperation of the monks in any cause, however daring, or unjust. The unchristian oath, which these war-like friars were obliged to take before gaining admission into the convent, that they would never be at peace with the Turks, was a most convenient one throughout their whole history, serving as it did to cover all their crimes. Pleading this ever constant obligation, they went forth in their galleys to murder and plunder, to raze, ravage, and destroy, entirely forgetting that they were a religious body, and as such were to be governed by the laws, the usages and customs of Christian men. For many a score of years, every act of these fighting priests but too pointedly seems to say, that they knew no God but that of evil, and no power save that of doing harm to the miserable mussulmen who might, by the fortune of war, be thrown into their power: a fate often times worse than death, though it might have come to them in the most horrible shape.

Peter the Great doubtless being well acquainted with this hostile policy and with the barbarous atrocities, which were ever attendant upon it, determined to profit by an alliance with these cowed monks, as his royal cousins* of Italy, France, Spain and Portugal, had been constantly doing before him. Nor was he wrong. For during his time, a treaty was not understood to be of so sacred a nature as diplomatists have more recently made it, and in fact was no longer thought to be binding than the high contracting parties might find it for their advantage to acknowledge the obligations under which their public faith had been pledged. Indeed, to show how little reliance was to be placed in the political integrity of those who ruled over the Ottoman Empire, we need only remark, that although Mustapha kept at peace with the Emperor so long as he lived, still his successor acted otherwise, by breaking the truce five different times, in very nearly the same number of years. Peter wrote to the Sultan, complaining of these frequent violations of the treaty, and said that if it was not more strictly observed for the future, he should try to make him obey it with the point of his sword. Count Tolstoy being commanded to deliver in person the letter containing this threat, bearded the lion in his den, by asking an audience to enable him to fulfil his instructions. Achmet received the Russian minister in his council chamber; where he was seated on a sofa, from which he did not rise, and surrounded by his ministers, most of whom were kneeling, with their hands crossed before them, and their eyes on the pavement, in token of their abject submission. Tolstoy stood before these crouching slaves, and their absolute ruler, to make known the contents of a letter which in a moment might cost him his life. Dangerous as was his position, still he did not evince the slightest fear; and when the Sultan told him that although for his temerity he deserved to die, yet in his mercy he should only confine him in a prison on the banks of the Bosphorus, Tolstoy was more than satisfied, as it was an amelioration of his fate which he had never expected. Achmet, burning with rage, remarked to the Grand Vizer who stood trembling before him, that perhaps the Russian Emperor might have his wishes gratified so far as a new treaty was concerned, but how it was to be drawn up, or where it should be signed, were matters yet to be settled. Then rising on his feet, and drawing his scimitar which had served him faithfully in many a fight, he advanced towards the Russian Ambassador, and thus continued: With Charles XII. in my company, and at the head of two hundred and fifty thousand of my brave soldiers, whom I have already collected at Adrianople and who are only awaiting my orders to march, I hope to go through the heart of Russia, and to the very gates of your master's capital. After razing his villages, burning his towns, and scattering his forces, it will be no difficult task to name my terms for our next truce, in the city of Moscow, and within the walls of his palace. "If Mohammed but wills it, so it shall be," said the incensed monarch, as he tore up the letter which Peter had sent him, and returned again to his sofa. While the Sultan was thus giving vent to his feelings, the Muscovite envoy never uttered a word, a prudent act, for had he spoken, it is but too probable, that he would have been made to feel the force of that Damascus blade, which Achmet, during his paroxysm of rage, had so carelessly brandished about him.

* Long has it been customary for crowned heads to term each other cousins, though not at all related by the ties of consanguinity. Peter the Great on one occasion was disposed to be even more affectionate; for, after having thoroughly routed the King of Sweden at Pultowa, he said to some officers whom he held as prisoners after the battle, "that he wanted his brother Charles to keep them company, and had sent Walkouiski to fetch him." Very nearly was this wish gratified, as the Russian General came in sight of the King, but the river Bog was between them, a barrier which, without boats, Walkouiski was unable to pass.

"His Czarish Majesty, hearing of Tolstoy's imprisonment, published a long manifesto, setting forth the reasons of his entering into a war with that perfidious breaker of the peace, as he called him, Achmet, Sultan of the Turks. But before this declaration had been made known, the Tartars had commenced their hostilities." The Cham's son, and the King of Sweden having previously stated that they had united in a common cause against the Russian Emperor, who, as they said, had been too long permitted with impunity to encroach on their dominions, and cast his insults upon them.

Peter the Great, on the first opening of the campaign, finding that some of his Generals had crossed over the "Neister," and were marching in his enemies' country without the least interruption, was rashly led to believe, that "Heaven had destined the honor to him, of overthrowing the formidable Empire of the Ottomans, and of exalting the Cross, in those places where the Crescent so long had triumphed. But herein his Czarish Majesty was too sanguine, and took a fatal step, that had like to have been the ruin of himself and his country. Relying upon the supplies which were promised him by Brancovan Hospodar of Wallachia, who deceived him, he suffered himself to be shut up by the Turkish Army on the side of the river Pruth, in a port so disadvantageous, that he must have been inevitably lost, but for the management and affection of the Czarina Catharine, who at this critical juncture did her utmost to save him."* The Emperor thus enclosed by the Sultan's forces, and greatly in want of provisions, was compelled to sue for a treaty, though well knowing that it must come to him in the most disadvantageous terms, as he was wholly at the mercy of the infidel monarch, who boasted of being his bitterest enemy, and of anxiously wishing his downfall.

* Taken from Mottley's History of Russia, which was published in London in 1744, and as a book of reference is highly valuable.

Achmet, taking advantage of Peter's desperate situation, obliged him to comply with his exactions, against which, while doing it, the Czar could only protest. Peter did not make his escape out of Turkey until he had expended millions in "money and jewels," and ceded to the Grand Seignor all the conquests which his father and himself had made in many previous years: terms the more galling from having been suggested by Charles XII., who, after the battle of Pultowa, had fled to Stamboul for protection,—and excited the Sultan to engage in this war, though, as we have seen, breaking a treaty to do it. It was doubtless to guard against this faithless policy of the Ottoman Emperors that Sheremeto was sent on his mission to Malta. That the Autocrat would have cared but little for the Papal bulls which might have been issued against him, or for the resistance of the Knights, however desperate, had the Island been near his own shores, and he anxious to bring it under his rule, no one who is acquainted with his character will for a moment deny.

But Malta, from its position, was out of his reach, and he was by far too politic a monarch not to court the friendship of the Order which resided upon it, and which, by the force of his arms, he could never hope to reduce.*

* Peter the Great has been termed by historians the most remarkable man of the age in which he lived,—no slight honor, when he had such a competitor as Charles XII. of Sweden, with whom, during his life, he was always at war.

Proud and unbending, as the Autocrat was when negotiating with foreign powers, yet while legislating for the benefit of his own ignorant subjects, no man in his Empire could make himself more humble. Hence it is, that at one time we find him breaking off all intercourse with the Queen of England, because his ambassador had been insulted at London, and firmly refusing to renew the alliance, until Her Majesty should send him an apology for the conduct of one of her judges,—and at another, throwing off his jacket, and with the sleeves of his shirt rolled up, working on the hull of a vessel, in an English dock-yard, and claiming his daily pay from the master builder, to which, as he said, by the sweat of his brow he was justly entitled. Peter well knew the character of his people, and governed more by the example he set them than by the laws which he enacted. A few anecdotes which we have found recorded, will serve to exemplify his policy which made him so renowned as a warrior, and as a ruler so truly distinguished.

Entering his own army as a drummer boy, he regularly rose from one step to another, until he had obtained a Marshal's baton, and was thereby enabled to rule over the minds of his soldiers as well as their movements and bodies. Peter on one occasion, after fighting a desperate battle with the Swedes, and gaining a splendid victory, asked a Russian General for the command of a regiment, made vacant by the death of its Colonel. Although in the fight the Czar had greatly distinguished himself, by having two horses shot under him, and by being struck with a ball which, as it grazed his forehead, cut off a lock of his hair, still his request was refused. An older officer having a prior claim, got his promotion, while the Emperor remained as he was, the Senior Major of another corps. Peter acknowledged the justice of this decision, and ever afterwards

Not continuing our digression, which has been made the longer from the little of interest which we can find to record of the Knights, we return to the reign of Perellos, which was terminated by his decease, at an advanced age, in 1720. Mark made the General his constant adviser, his firm and intimate friend.

While the Czar was serving in his Navy, he acted in precisely a similar way. How different is this conduct from that pursued by the Princes of the present day, who on entering a service expect to be at its head, without even being acquainted with the clangor of arms, and hardly the sound of a musket. In civil life also, if any could be termed such in Russia at the time of which we are writing, the Emperor was, if possible, in his bearing to his subjects even more humble. Passing one morning at early dawn through a narrow street of his capital, he entered a shoe-maker's shop, and seating himself among the workmen, without saying a word, commenced making a pair of shoes for himself. Not leaving his work until it was finished, he went from his bench to the palace. Surrounded at midnight by his nobles, he showed them the fruits of his labor, and said that if they were expecting any honors from him, they must change their manner of living, and hereafter employ their idle hours in some profession or trade, the choice of which he would leave to themselves. While many of those who were present willingly complied with his wishes, still there were others who as firmly refused. At the head of this last class was his only son, Alexis; an ignorant and vicious Prince, who dearly paid for his stubbornness, by the loss of his life.

Nothing could have exceeded the affection which was shown by Peter the Great to this unpromising child, in his infancy, and nothing surpass his hatred towards him, when he came to the years of maturity. His sad fate was sealed in the following manner. The Emperor having discovered that Alexis was seriously implicated in a conspiracy, which was forming against him, first had him imprisoned for a few days, and then calling at his cell, offered to his trembling victim a silver goblet containing a poisonous liquid, which he told him to drink. The unfortunate Prince was obliged to obey, and was a corpse in less than an hour. Two incidents connected with this horrible tragedy, are deserving of remembrance. First—That this murder was no secret act, as the Czar while committing it, was accompanied by two of his ministers—and Secondly—That the contents of the cup were mixed by an English druggist, who dared not disobey, and was struck dumb for a longer period than Alexis was suffering from the convulsions caused by his poisonous dose. Peter weeping over his son's body, said that he had made himself childless, (mean- ing by his first wife,) that his Empire might he saved. With one other record of Peter's policy for the good of his people, barbarous as some of it was, we shall have done with the subject. Anxious that his nobles might improve themselves by foreign travel, he sent his ambassadors abroad with many young men in their suites, and kept them at the different courts until their mission was closed. But it would appear that this praiseworthy measure was often thwarted by the stupid conduct of those whom he employed in this service. For Le Vergue tells us that there were some gentlemen attached to Sheremeto's suite, who, on their arrival in any capital, would take to their apartments and never leave them so long as they remained in the city. It being their wish to say on returning to Russia, that they had come back as wise as they went. Manstein has given us even a worse character of these travelling Muscovites, for he reproaches the Emperor for sending them out of his Empire, saying that they "acquired nothing but vices."

Anthony Zondodari, who succeeded him, was a native of Sienna, and at the time of his election one of the oldest and most distinguished monks in the convent. In his short rule, which was but of little more than two years duration, no events of any particular moment occurred. "Two large Corsairs (says Sutherland) were brought into Malta as prizes in the midst of the rejoicings that followed his election; and the happy omen was afterwards strengthened by the capture of an Algerine ship-of-war," after a gallant action, in which the Algerine captain was killed. In this single sentence, the whole glory of his reign is told. On the death of Zondodari in 1722, Anthony Manoel de Villena, "a Portuguese Knight of the language of Castile," came to the vacant throne. This prince wishing to guard the city of Valetta on its only assailable point, was induced to build that splendid fortress in the harbor of Marsamuscetto, which to this day is known by his name.* "For, like most of his predecessors (says one writer) Villena could not resist the desire of securing an immortality, by means of stone and mortar." But of the intentions of this prince, his works, and reign, we shall write more fully in our next historical letter.

* No fortress on the Island is better known to foreigners, than this of Fort Manoel. Most travellers, on coming from the Levant, are obliged to pass their quarantine within its walls, for ten, fifteen, or twenty days, as the board of health in their wisdom, or folly, may give them. Among the many Americans who, within the last five years, have been doomed to this confinement, we may name Henry B. McLellan, Esq., a favorite poet of the North, William B. Hodgson, whose writings on the Berber language, and a recent publication on the Foulahs of Africa have made him so well known in Europe, and lastly, William Boulware, Esq., our present popular, able, and highly respected envoy at Naples. We take much pleasure in thus publicly naming Mr. Boulware, as his unceasing exertions to procure us a treaty with the Neapolitan Government, which we are told he is now in a fair way of attaining, certainly deserve the thanks of his countrymen. We hope yet to see our flag waving in the bay of Naples, and our produce on its quays.

IMITATIONS FROM ANACREON.

DRINKING—H γη μελαινα πινει. κ. τ. λ.

The dark earth drinks the welcome rain,
The forest drinks the earth again,
The ocean drinks the river wide,
The sun, too, drinks the ocean's tide,
The moon the sun :—Am I to blame
Companions, if I do the same?

ANACREON.—Θαλω λεγειν. κ. τ. λ.

I strive to tell in numbers bold
The deeds Atreides wrought of old,
Or sing the bright, enduring fame
Attached to Cadmus' sacred name;

But futile all my efforts seem,
Love is my lyre's only theme.
The sounding chords I cast aside;
Fresh strings, another lyre I tried,
Alcides' toils I sung,—in vain:
My lyre resounded love again.
Farewell, ye heroes! I no more
Shall sing your wondrous legends o'er,
No more to lofty themes aspire—
Love, only love shall wake my lyre.

SONNETS FROM PETRARCH.

BY MARY G. WELLS.

II.

S' amor non é, che dunque é quel ch' i' sento?

If 'tis not Love, what is it that I prove!
And if 'tis Love—ye Gods, what is this thing!
If it be good, whence is its mortal sting?
If evil, why are all its pangs so sweet?
Why do I grieve if at my will I love?
If 'gainst my will, to weep it is not meet.
O! living death! O! fascinating ill!
Whence comes thy power if not at my consent,
And, if I yield, ah! why do I repent?
A helmless bark, sport of each adverse wind
Is the frail thing in which I wander still,
And folly is my heaviest freight, I find,
Myself not knowing where my wishes turn:
I freeze in Summer and in Winter burn!

III.

Zefiro torna e 'l bel tempo rimena.

Zephyr returns and balmy hours doth bring,
And flowers and plants, his ever lovely train;
The varied sweets of gay and lovely spring,
And Progne's* song and Philomela's plain.
The meadows smile; the heaven serene above
Rejoices thus to see its children blest,
And all the elements are breathing love—
Each living thing is filled with love's unrest.
To me, alas, Spring brings the deepest sighs
Drawn from my weary, woe-worn heart by one
Who that heart's keys hath taken to the skies:
The singing birds, the banks with flowers o'er-grown,
The sweet, attractive looks of ladies fair,
Bring nothing to my soul but deep despair!

EXTRACTS FROM NOTES

OF A VOYAGE IN THE EAST, IN 1843.

BY W. B.*

Wm. B. Ware.

June 27.—Yesterday, after my interview with the Pasha, I gave the remainder of my time to the souvenirs of the past. Mr. Todd kindly sent me his horse and a Janizary to accompany me. I hastened to visit Pompey's pillar as the most remarkable of the antiquities remaining. I found it beyond the walls of the city, standing in solitary grandeur on the edge of the desert. It is a polished column of beautiful granite, and lifts its capital far into the sky. Its shaft consists of a single piece of sixty-four feet in length, and was superior to all others of the monolithic kind, in magnitude, until that recently elevated at St. Petersburg. It stands upon a pedestal twelve feet in height, and is surmounted by a Corinthian capital, which gives ten feet more to the elevation. An inscription is on its pedestal, but I was unable to decypher it. Others have been more fortunate, but they have not been able by this means to settle the controversies as to the origin of this monument. Some believe that after the building of the city by Alexander the Great, he caused this monument to be reared to commemorate the event. Others suppose it to have been erected by Cæsar, to the memory of his great rival—that he not only shed tears upon the fall of Pompey, but left this loitering memorial of respect for his memory. On the other hand there are those who contend, that its object was to perpetuate the memory of his own victory.

"Non nostrum inter vos tantas componere lites."

But there are some facts which have been recently published by the Duke of Ragusa, which seem to indicate that the first opinion is the correct one. An antiquary of the fifteenth century, by the name of Cyriaque, who travelled in the East by order of Pope Nicolas V., relates that he visited this column and found on its base an inscription to the effect that it was erected by the architect Dinocrates, in honor of Alexander. In a collection of ancient inscriptions published by Pierre Appian and Bartholomew Amantius, and dedicated to a counsellor of the Emperor Charles V., and of Ferdinand, King of the Romans—we also find the following—"they say there exists at Alexandria, in Egypt, upon a column of wonderful grandeur, an inscription in Greek, of which the translation is 'Democrates, (or Dinocrates,) celebrated architect, erected me by order of Alexander, King of Macedonia.'" The same inscription is reported by Muratori, (p. 499,) as existing at the base of this column.

* See the handsome compliment paid this gentleman, by Mr. Andrews, in his "History of the Knights of Malta," issued in this number—in note towards the end.—[Ed. Mos.]

These statements being supposed true, it remains to account for the fact, that this inscription is no longer seen, and that one is now found which is relied on to support a different opinion. It is also necessary to explain why it has been so long known as "Pompey's pillar."

In the first place, the pedestal is now exceedingly defaced by the rough usage it has received from visiters. Many have been ambitious to leave their names. Black paint, red ochre and pitch have all been used to the destruction of its beauty and the obliteration of whatever previously existed. As to the difficulty supposed to be presented by the inscription now existing, this is easy of explanation. Pococke gives the inscription as follows—"Po...us, (Poathumus or Pompeius) Prefect of Egypt, and the city have erected the most holy Emperor, the tutelary god of Alexandria, Dioclesian the invincible." This inscription speaks probably of a statue which formerly surmounted the column. Those who have ascended to the summit report that the capital has been hollowed out for the reception of a statue. It would seem that a statue of Dioclesian had been made to stand on the column of Alexander. This mode of appropriating monuments by succeeding rulers was not at all extraordinary in antiquity. The Forum of Rome contains at present an example of this sort. As to the name, by which it has descended to posterity, it would seem that it has taken that of the Prefect instead of the Emperor, in whose honor this desecration was perpetrated.

Every one must remark here the difference between the shaft, and pedestal and capital of this monument. The two latter are far inferior. It is probable the architect of Alexander made use of the materials furnished by previous structures, and robbed the monuments of the predecessors of that conqueror—the memorials of previous heroes were destroyed to construct a souvenir of his glory, and in turn his own monument has been wrested from its object and made to bear a statue to record the glories of Dioclesian. This again has passed away, and thus amid revolving ages, retributive justice has followed in pursuit, and now the monument bears the name of none, whose fame it was intended to commemorate. Upon examining the foundations of the column, we found two fragments of an obelisk, and a block covered with hieroglyphics, which were inverted. These furnish still further evidence of the manner in which other structures were made to yield their treasures for the construction of this.

From this place we went in search of the needles of Cleopatra. My Janizary had never heard of them. But this did not surprise me, as in Rome I once asked the way to the Forum, of a Roman citizen who lived in twenty steps of that "field of freedom, faction, fame and blood," and he told me there was no such place. My Janizary knew nothing of the lovely queen, nor her needles, but he thought he could find them. We rode probably for a mile over the desert, but within sight of the walls of the city, until we reached one of the gates of the town, which he said would probably lead to them. We entered and found the interior of the city in this direction as desert as the exterior. The whole earth was torn up by excavations, in search of antiquities, and lay in great mounds and caverns. Not a human being was to be seen, nor a house. I asked for the needles. He supposed they were somewhere in this quarter. We wound our way amid these mounds for a long time, and at length discovered by chance near the sea shore the objects of our search.

They are obelisks resembling in their general appearance those which are now seen at Paris and Rome, and which were carried from this country. They are covered with hieroglyphics, and each is hewn out of a single piece of granite. They are reported to be sixty four feet in length. One has fallen down and is now lying half covered with sand. They are believed to have adorned the entrance to the palace of the Ptolemies. Here was the court quarter of the ancient city—here the celebrated library, and here the gymnasium. Here Cleopatra entertained Caesar and Antony, and made the Roman conquerors slaves. Here swept the royal pageants amid palaces and temples, and Rome's conqueror and Rome's triumvir were led in triumph. Bound in the silken cords of love, ambition lost for a time her votaries, and provinces and empires won by Roman legions were scattered at the feet of beauty. Venus triumphed over Mars, and gathered the spoils of war. And there was the tower which witnessed the last triumph of the proud queen, who failing now to conquer, disdained to grace Augustus' triumphal train, and queened it to the last. Now, here are the sands of the desert, and two solitary obelisks remain to tell us of departed glories. The slaves who tread this soil, so full of histories, know not the name of Egypt's Queen.

I found the time was now near for my embarkation, and I was reluctantly compelled to forsake my interesting ramble. I passed through the Arab quarter, traversed the Bazars and returned to the hotel. The two former contained nothing that would interest a traveller who had seen Cairo, Damascus and Constantinople. The hotel is on one side of a "place" which is surrounded by lofty and handsome buildings in the European style, and which would do honor to any city. Were it not for costumes and camels, one might easily forget that he was in the land of the East.

I was anxious to visit the arsenal and fleet, but time failed and I was forced to rely upon others for information on the subject of these wonderful creations of Mehemet Ali. They afford another example of his great energy and the boundless resources of his genius. In 1828 they had no existence,—the peninsula of Alexandria was a barren waste. In 1834 it was covered with an arsenal on the largest scale, with magazines for provisions, a rope-yard a thousand and forty feet in length, and all the buildings and appurtenances necessary for the construction, rigging and armament of ships; except, if I mistake not, the cannon which I believe were obtained from abroad. Ten vessels of the line had been built, of which seven were of a hundred guns, and frigates, corvettes and brigs, making a fleet of thirty sail. And all this had been accomplished in a space of time, one would suppose almost incredible, in a country without wood, without iron, without copper, without workmen or sailors. Every element was wanting to the creation of a fleet, and yet this remarkable man surmounted every obstacle and called it, as if by magic, into existence. Difficulties only stimulate his genius. There is something in this singular country, its gigantic and immortal monuments of antiquity, the pyramids, the wonders of Thebes, the temples of Naxos and Carnac, well calculated to inspire the desire of great achievements. And well has he drunk;—drunk to the full of this inspiration.

With a tact which in great men often seems to border on inspiration, he selected the agents, the best adapted to his purpose; and soon the Fellahs became ship-carpenters and sailors and mechanics. With extraordinary quickness, they learned to execute those works even which require great delicacy and art—all the instruments of navigation, compasses, quadrants, sextants, spy-glasses, &c., &c. Marshal Marmont states that in his visit to this country, he examined their workshops, and their work was admirably executed though the mechanics whom he saw, had not been two years engaged in this species of labor. They seem to have participated in the genius of their master. Certainly such results are not obtained in so short a space of time in other countries.

Now, these great works are of but little use. The fleet was made to assist in the struggle with Sultan Mahmoud. That conflict is ended, nor is it likely to be resumed with his successors, since the European Powers have interposed and taken the affairs of the East into their hands. In case of an European war it might probably be brought into requisition.

There is no doubt the Pasha will avail himself of any favorable opportunity to get rid of the treaty forced upon him at the late peace. After he had vanquished his great enemy, and occupied a position in which he was able to dictate what terms he pleased, the European Powers, with the exception of France, stepped in and deprived him of his conquests. They agreed on that extraordinary and absurd proposition, that the integrity of the Ottoman empire must be preserved—a proposition abhorrent to all the interests of humanity, and all the feelings of the civilized world. Mehemet Ali was made to abandon Syria, one of the cherished objects of his ambition and of the policy of his life. With heroic spirit he fought against the combined Powers. But like Napoleon he failed at St. Jean d' Acre and found himself for the first time vanquished and compelled to accept the terms they imposed. He is reported to have said to one of his generals, "I will never submit to the conditions of the peace—these conditions are too degrading. I have accepted them from force, but I will do all I can to escape from them." Nor has he ever fulfilled them. In open violation he keeps up a large standing army, far exceeding the number of troops agreed on by the treaty; and his monopolies still exist in spite of the Sultan and his allies. Nor has he abandoned his designs on Syria, but diplomacy is substituted for the sword. Magnificent presents are transmitted to Constantinople, in the place of former defiance. The Sultan mother, the relic of the great Mahmoud, has become his friend and supporter, and report says that her abilities are extraordinary and her influence powerful. His policy now is to persuade the young Sultan to throw himself on him for support, rather than on his christian allies—that he is the natural supporter of the representative of the Prophet. His final object is the government of Syria for himself and his heirs. Should he succeed in gaining the confidence of the Divan, he may, if there should be no interference from the European Powers, again obtain possession of that country. In the meantime, he preserves his army and navy, and is ready to profit by whatever may turn up in the chapter of accidents. With his talent for intrigue, his knowledge of men, the great resources which he commands and his indomitable perseverance, it would not be a surprise if he should again pass over into the "promised land." It has been said by one who knows him well, intimate with his whole career and fully competent to pronounce judgment, that all the little sovereigns of Italy combined, in the middle ages, have not exhibited more of "esprit," address and stratagem, than the Pasha in his career.

SONNET,

ON READING THE ODYSSEY.

The wise Ulysses, honored once of Kings,
When he, a beggar, sat at his own gate,
Had still three friends, who loved him as when great—
And each to man like his own shadow clings.
No change in them from change of fortune springs.
Wealth, poverty, lofty or low estate,
Fame, infamy, by his own faults or fate,
These all they look on as indifferent things.
His treatment sours not them—harsh words are breath,
Or still they love, even if they moan and mope,
And will be parted from him but by death;
Cheerfully he may with misfortune cope,
And find some flowers even in life's dreariest path.
Who still has left his Wife—his Dog—and Hope?

LETTERS OF PLINY THE YOUNGER.

GHOST STORY, &c.

(Translated for the Sou. Lit. Mess.)

TO SUSA.

As we both have leisure now, you to instruct and I to learn, I wish to propose a question for your consideration. Are spectres real beings, having their proper forms and spheres of action? or merely idle phantoms, the birth of a terrified imagination? I incline to believe them real, partly induced by what I am told happened to Curtius Rufus. While yet poor and unknown, he went into Africa as a dependant of the governor of that province. At the close of a certain day, while walking in a portico, he was startled and alarmed by the sudden apparition of a female form, which stood before him, taller than the daughters of men and radiant in celestial beauty. "I am Africa," she said to the wondering man, "come to foretell your future destiny"—and accordingly predicted that he should go back to Rome and there attain civil honors, after which he should return with supreme power into Africa and die there. All this came to pass. When he reached Carthage, on his return to Africa, the same image is said to have met him on the shore as he left the ship. He was taken ill, and despaired of recovery before his friends apprehended danger, foreboding his death from the verified prediction of his past prosperity.* Now hear another story, more terrific and not less wonderful, which I shall relate as I heard it. There was at Athens a large and stately house, but of evil fame, because reputed to be haunted. In the silence of midnight was heard the sound of irons; and if you listened attentively, you could distinguish the clanking of fetters, at first faint and distant, then louder and nearer. Presently an image appeared,—an old man, squalid and emaciated, with a long beard and rough neglected hair, having fetters on his legs and manacles on his hands, which he shook and rattled incessantly. The wretched household watched whole nights in trembling anxiety, till health and finally life itself sunk under incessant terror:—for the day brought no respite, the dreadful spectre still floating before them, and haunting the imagination though removed from actual view. At length the house was deserted, and abandoned to solitude and its unearthly occupant; but advertised notwithstanding, if any perchance, not knowing its bad character, might wish to hire or purchase. Meantime the Philosopher Athenodorus coming to Athens, read the placard; and surprised at the low price, demanded the cause and was told the whole story. Nevertheless, indeed, for that very reason, he hired the house. When night approached, he ordered a couch to be prepared in the front room, and called for a candle and writing desk. Then dismissing his family into distant apartments, he employed his mind, eyes and hand in writing, lest his wandering fancy, disturbed by vain fears, should conjure up strange sounds and phantasms. At first the silence of night reigned here as elsewhere; then the noise of clanking irons was heard. The Philosopher neither raised his eyes nor remitted his pen, but bracing his mind to the work, deformed his attention from the disturbing sounds. The clashing irons sounded louder and nearer, and were heard, first at the door, and then within the room. He looked up at last, and recognized the image as described to him. It stood and beckoned him to approach. He on his part signed to it with his hand to wait a little, and recommenced writing. The spectre then clashed its chains above the head of the Philosopher as he sat, on which he looked up and saw it making the same sign as before. He delayed no longer, but took the candle and followed. The spectre proceeding slowly as if weighed down by its chains, descended into the courtyard and suddenly sunk into the earth. The Philosopher thus deserted, gathered leaves and grass to mark the spot of its disappearance. Next day he informed the police, who, by his suggestion, ordered the earth to be opened at the place, and found a skeleton encircled with chains; the flesh in the lapse of years having mouldered into dust, leaving the naked bones. These were collected and buried publicly; and the troubled ghost being thus propitiated, ceased to haunt the house. What I have told I believe on the word of others; what I am about to tell is vouched on my own.

I have a domestic named Marcus, a man of some pretensions to learning, with whom a younger brother used to sleep in the same bed. One night this young man seemed to see some one sitting by him on the bed, and cutting the hair from the crown of his head with a pair of scissors. When day arrived, he was found to be shorn about the crown, and the hair lying on his pillow. Another boy slept with many others in the pages' apartment: two figures in white tunics (so he says)

* This story of Curtius Rufus is thus told by Tacitus, Ann. XI, ch. 21. "Of the birth of Curtius Rufus, who is said to have been a gladiator's son, I must not speak falsely, and the truth were scandalous to tell. After he was grown, he went to Africa in the suite of the questor to whose lot that province had fallen; and when in the town of Adrumetum, while walking alone in an open portico about mid-day, a female form above human size appeared and thus addressed him: 'Thou, Rufus, art he who shall return to this province as Consul.' Animated by such a prediction he went to Rome, where the largesse of friends and his own sharp intellect raised him to the questorship; and shortly after, contending against noble candidates, he obtained the pretor's office through the favor of the Emperor Tiberius, who veiled his ignoble birth with these words: 'Curtius Rufus appears to be self-originated.' He lived long after this, a base sycophant to those above him, inso- lent to his inferiors, and morose and discourteous to his equals,—attaining successively the consular dignity, triumphal honors, and finally the province of Africa, where he died, and thus fulfilled the fatal presage."

came through the window, and cut off his hair as he lay; and the next day found him shorn like the other, with the hairs strewed upon his pillow. Nothing remarkable followed, which such portents might have been thought to indicate, unless it be the fact that I was not condemned, as I certainly should have been if Domitian, in whose reign these things happened, had lived longer: for in his writing desk was found an accusation which Carus had brought against me. And as it is customary with condemned men to let their hair grow long, it might be inferred that this preternatural loss of my domestics' hair was a sign of that danger escaped. And now, apply your learning to this question; for the subject is worthy of patient inquiry and reflection, and I not unworthy to call them into exercise. Argue on both sides if you like, according to custom; but not with equal force on both, lest you perpetuate the doubts to resolve which I have applied to you. Farewell.

TO SABINIANUS.

Your freedman,* who, as you informed me, had incurred your displeasure, came to me, and falling before me, clasped my knees as if they had been yours. He wept much and much besought my intercession, and much too forbore to say. In fine, I was induced to think him sincerely penitent. His reformation I believe to be real, because he is conscious of his delinquency. That you were angry, and with good reason, I am well aware; but the justice of your resentment will heighten the praise of your clemency. You have been a friend to him heretofore, and I hope you will be again; but for the present, I am content to ask merely that you will not be inexorable. You can be offended again, if he should deserve it; and your present forbearance will give moral weight to your future indignation. But pardon something to his youth, something to his tears, and indulge your own forgiving disposition. Cease to torment both yourself and him; for I know that angry passions are most tormenting to a heart benign as yours. If my entreaties are added to his, I fear I shall seem to constrain rather than persuade you to overlook his fault; but I add them nevertheless, and with more warmth and earnestness, because I have reprehended him severely myself, threatening pointedly that I would never intercede for him again. This was said to him, however, because he needed intimidation, but to you I speak differently; for, perhaps, I shall again interpose and prevail in his behalf, provided the case be such as will make it proper for me to ask and you to accord forgiveness. Farewell.

TO THE SAME.

I offer my acknowledgments for the deference you have shewn my wishes in re-admitting your freedman to the place he formerly held in your favor and confidence. It is gratifying to you, I trust; and it certainly is to me for two reasons; first, because it shows you not implacable in anger, and next, because, in overlooking his offence, you concede so much to my authority or wishes. I thank you, therefore, and commend your forbearance; and in conclusion, would suggest the hope that you will be lenient to his future errors, though no friend is near to intercede for him. Farewell.

* The libertus, or freedman, had only a qualified freedom under the Roman laws, and was never wholly emancipated from his patron.

TO SUETONIUS.

You are frightened by a dream, you tell me, and apprehend the loss of your lawsuit; and therefore wish me to ask a continuance for a few days, or at all events for a single day. It will be difficult to obtain, but I shall try;—

“For dreams are admonitions sent from heaven.”

It is important, however, whether your dream is a direct presage of the future or is to be interpreted by contraries. When I recollect a certain dream of my own, I am disposed to regard what excites your alarm as really an excellent omen. I had undertaken the cause of Julius Pastor; and after retiring to rest, my mother-in-law appeared in a dream, and kneeling before me, besought me to relinquish the case. I was then a very young man, about to argue in the Quadruple session, and opposed by the first men of the city and even by the emperor's friends—all which might well have shaken my purpose when combined with a dream of such evil aspect. I argued the cause, however, revolving the line, for my plighted faith was my country to me, or whatever else might be dearer. It terminated successfully, and thus gained me the favor of men and opened the gate of fame. Consider therefore whether your dream may not in like manner be an omen of good: or if you prefer to adopt the maxim so much in vogue with cautious men, forbear what is doubtful, then write me word. I will invent some device, and so manage the business that the case may be brought to trial whenever you like. The circumstances differ from those which controlled the case I have referred to; for in the centumviral court* the course of business can not be delayed under any pretext: in the present case the task may be difficult but not impossible. Farewell.

* The quadrupes judicium or judicium centumvirale was composed in Pliny's time of about 180 judges called centumvirs, who were divided into four classes, each constituting a separate court, but occasionally united into one for the trial of the most important causes. The centumvirs were selected from the different districts, and sometimes summoned specially to try particular causes,—in that respect bearing a considerable resemblance to our juries.

THE YOUNG BARD OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

BY AMERICUS SOUTH.

We are happy to announce to the friends of the Messenger, that we have succeeded in securing the contributions and Editorial assistance of Mr. South. His modesty prohibits us from blazoning his pretensions, after the manner of some of our cotemporaries; and we will leave him to unfold himself in the Messenger. However, we may occasionally set forth some of his peculiarities and traits, which might not be found out from himself. As an Editor he has had some experience and will conduct the Messenger whenever we may be compelled to be absent.

[Ed. Mess.]

Soon after I first took possession of an Editorial chair, I sought my sanctum one morning at the usual hour, and found waiting to see me a young man, of about twenty-one or two years of age. His suffused cheek and stammering speech convinced me of his embarrassment, which I endeavored as much as possible to remove. At last, he made out to tell his wishes, and proceeded to unroll a large bundle of MSS. The young worshipper of the Muses now stood revealed, and having succeeded in getting thus far, he began to feel "more at home." He handed me some short poems, which I glanced over hastily, making some casual remarks about them, and expressing my criticisms in the Socratic method. The modest diffidence of the youthful bard, his rather dejected air and thoughtful expression had already prepossessed me in his favor; and I thought, too, that whilst there was a want of cultivated taste in his verses, yet they were not devoid of merit. A conversation ensued, during which I learned the following particulars.

He was born in New Hampshire, where his parents resided in the vicinity of the most splendid and sublime scenery. He had been early inspired with a love of Nature, and often wandered amongst his native hills and along the mountain streams. I could not learn that any particular incident had marked his youth, though I have since wished I knew more of his history. Having completed his education, which was quite liberal, he, as many from his native New England are constantly doing, sought his fortunes in the South, and had been teaching school, a year or two, in the interior of Virginia.

He seemed to be of a sad, meditative cast of thought, and a vein of serious reflection ran throughout all his poetry. Indeed, his trains of thought seemed to resemble those of Lord Byron, and on my making the inquiry, he confessed that he was a little sceptical, though he had been educated under religious influences.

At length, he said he had a longer poem, which he wished to submit to my judgment, and presented me with a budget containing several cantos of lines, somewhat after the style of Walter Scott. He said he would read me some portions of them and commenced. I listened attentively, my good opinion probably raised by the deference thus shewn to my taste and judgment. It was a tale of life and love—not without beauties, not without interest and force. But it was spun out with the prolixity of a youthful poet, having no well digested conception before his mind.

When he arose to go, he seemed to be more confused than ever, and rightly supposing that my judgment was adverse, was about to carry the poem away. But I desired to look farther into it and asked him to leave it with me. When he returned, I had read a large part of it, and advised him to keep it by him; not to destroy it, as he seemed inclined to do, but to labor upon it; not to hurry it before the world and to remould and condense it; and encouraged the hope that he might yet have the credit of presenting something worthy to his country. He then took his departure, leaving some of the shorter pieces for publication. Having never before published them, I now bespeak for them the kind perusal of the readers of the Messenger. Had they seen the Poet, their sympathies would have been enlisted, and they, like myself, would wish him much success and Literary Honor.

A FRAGMENT.

Nature was out in all her summer greenery,*

And fragrant zephyrs o'er the landscape played,
As through New Hampshire's rugged scenery
I rambled: trees were towering undecayed,
That cast on other centuries their shade;
Tall mountains stood around with solemn mien,
The guardians of many a flowery glade
That slept in beauty and in calm between,
Like maiden innocence, too bashful to be seen.

There is an inspiration in those old grey rocks,
Towering in mountain majesty on high;
For ages they have battled with the shocks
Of racking whirlwinds, that have wandered by.
Changes that have deranged mortality
Are nought to them: a brotherhood sublime,
They hold a quiet converse with the sky
And stand as when our world was in its prime,
Unharm'd and undismay'd, by all the ravages of time.

And thou, "Parnassus" of my native clime!
What tho' we scarcely yet have seen thy name
Among the annals of Hesperian rhyme?
What if no oracle enhance thy fame,
No fuming deity, or prescient dame,
Erect a domicil and tripod near?
Thou grand Monadnoc! Grandeur is the same,
Whether it shade the Delphian hemisphere,
Or tower without a Sibyl, or a poet, here.

Thy shape has tenanted my earliest dream;
In infancy I gazed upon thy brow;
And tho' to other men a lowly theme,
I loved thee then—and I will praise thee now.
Companion of my childhood, where art thou?

* "What did you say to this, Americus?" "I objected; but the young man liked it and though I thought it rather greenery in him, I let it pass."—[Ed. Mess.]

Too long in stranger climes, 'tis mine to roam ;
But thou art with thy kindred hills, I trow,
And still dost pinnacle that upper dome,
Where earth-born rambles hope, at least, to find a home.

What if we hope in vain ? It matters not.
When storms assail our troubled being here,
We will be credulous of some bright spot
Where hearts are never weary—skies are clear :
The sunbeams of another world shall cheer
Our vision, till we leave the clouds of this ;
And we will launch away without a tear,—
We either find our haven, or we miss
Ourselves,—strangers to future grief, as well as bliss.

I stood upon thy solitary height,
When erst romantic boyhood climbed the steep,
And there outgilted all the stars of night,
Till Helios illumed the watery deep,
And woke a drowsy continent from sleep.
I saw remotest Orient unfold
Her portals, and a world of splendor leap
From the abyss, where far Atlantis rolled,
Mingling his silvery billows with a firmament of gold.

Farewell, thou rude, but venerable form !
I go my way ; perchance return no more.
I leave thee here to battle with the storm,
And the inconstant winds that round thee roar.
I would not like thy cloudy summit soar ;
Too many blasts would howl around my head.
Farewell, contentment is my only store ;
Along the humbler valley let me tread,
Unenvied live, and sleep with the forgotten dead.

Time rolls along with an oblivious tide,
And soon will drown the voice of praise or blame.
The highest monuments of human pride
Crumble away like ant-hills—both the same !
How brief the echo of a sounding name,
The envy and the glory of mankind !
And who shall heed the afterclap of fame,
That fluctuates a season on the wind,
Stirring the empty dust that he has left behind ?

Speed, speed along, thou cloudy orb of day ;
And haste, ye stars, with all your flickering light ;
So fast ye hurry this short life away ;
So fast ye bring that last, that starless night.
The soul aspiring to some daring height,
Stumbles into a wilderness of gloom ;
Genius is clouded in his noonday flight ;
Ambition, love, and beauty in her bloom,
Go down, all down, unto the melancholy tomb.

What is this fitful being but a dream,
Where visions ever changing come and go ?
Or like the music of a falling stream,
Soon lost amid the ocean's roar below ?
Blow on, ye puffing winds, forever blow ;
Wanton ye billows with the heaving main,
Arise, and sink ye stars ; ye streamlets flow !
One little hour of ecstasy or pain,
And ye shall glide and shine, for human hearts in vain.

Leave me with solitude ; I would commune
With shapes more thoughtful than the face of man.
The world is strange—my heart is out of tune ;
—Hunt a retreating echo, ye who can ;
Grasp your own shadow ever in the van ;
Labor for gold, and sweat for empty treasure.
—Leave me alone ; where cooling breezes fan

My mountain path, I will set down and measure
The sum of human hope—the altitude of pleasure.

I do not murmur ; but I wonder much
At this strange destiny, where man is thrust
Into the gaping world, with scarce a crutch,
To stand between him and the hungry dust.
I do not murmur ;—Heaven is surely just,
And will not mar, where it were best to mend.
And it becomes unlettered man to trust
In the decrees he cannot comprehend ;
And deem, tho' strangely made, his Maker is his friend.

The swain incurious, who floods along
Through this eventful scene, without a thought ;
And listens day by day, to nature's song,
Nor wonders where her melodies were caught ;
Who cons the liturgy his mother taught,
—Whether a Christian, Pagan, Islamite
And seeks the heaven that his father sought,
Is sure an humble, and a happy wight,
And will not err, while honest faith can guide him right.

But who, that sees the lamp of life go out,
Flickering and wasting to the latest spark,
Can stifle the misgiving of a doubt ?
Where shall the spirit wander in the dark ?
Shall it arise in morning, like the lark,
Or sink away into forgetful night ?
Or ramble like the dove from Noah's ark,
O'er weary floods a solitary sprite,
Without a single island, where it may alight ?

We each are left to fabricate our creed ;
And this is mine—that Heaven ; (if Heaven there be.)
Will, sometime, guerdon every worthy deed.
Till then, let Providence and man agree ;
Our being is but dubious, while we,
With a sagacity that is not wise,
Discredit all we cannot plainly see.
As planets rise to set, and set to rise,
We live to die, and die to live in yonder skies.

There is sublimity in human love ;
And they are more than sceptics, who forego
This certain good, and think to find above
The paradise which they neglect below.
What kindred smile can they hereafter know,
Who have no charities to dole out here,
Who bar the treasure Heaven would bestow ?
Benevolence is all our earthly gear,
Our solace, and our passport to a better sphere.

That overweening selfishness is blind,
That will not make another's joy its own,
Or interchange a favor with mankind.
There are a few whom Providence has thrown Into some uncongenial nook alone,
Who have no heritage except a tear ;
They hear no music in the kindly tone
Of kindred voices ; all that might be dear
Is barred, or lost, and earth is desolate and drear.

But let them stand in their own hardihood ;
There is a joy in overmatching grief ;
There is a medicine in fortitude,
Till time—the panacea—bring relief,
Sorrow is not forever,—life is brief ;
And some unpromised guerdon yet may fall
From the all pitying skies, that find their chief Employ in watching round this lowly ball
And scattering donations, equally on all.

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

REPLY TO "A SUBALTERN."

We regret exceedingly, that any even seeming personalities should have crept into a discussion, which depends for its efficiency upon its courtesy and truth. We would unhesitatingly have stricken out those that have been complained of, had they not, from our inability to foresee their application to individuals, escaped our attention. We wish to preserve both Courtesy and Peace; and all personalities shall be much rather settled by a "scratch" of the pen, than of the sword.—[Ed. Mess.

MR. EDITOR:—When "A Subaltern," in the February number of the Messenger, commenced a series of "Notes on our Army," he proclaimed it as his avowed object to present to the public facts only, and bound himself "nothing to extenuate nor ought set down in malice." Howsoever honestly he may have adhered to this course in intention, it is nevertheless true, and is much to be regretted, that he has departed widely from it, in several instances, in the performance of his undertaking. Permit me, then, to invite the attention of your readers to his communication as contained in the June number of the Messenger.

"A Subaltern" therein, in commenting upon the recent military movements at Augusta Arsenal, Ga., makes the following assertion:

"Another and odious distinction is made between the comforts and conveniences allowed to the enlisted men of the Ordnance with its hired mechanics and laborers, and to the regularly enlisted soldier of the Army. An example is now fresh in my memory of an outrage of this kind committed on a company of Artillery, commanded by one of the senior Captains of our service, which was forced to vacate its quarters upon the plea that they were necessary for hired men of the Ordnance Department, and to rent an old farm house some three miles from the military post. The effect of this move was to give the command of the arsenal to a subaltern of the Ordnance Department who was probably not born when the Captain of this company was first commissioned in our Army, and this in the face of an order from the War Department, issued but a few months before, directing this same subaltern of Ordnance to be placed under some discreet and severe commanding officer for past aggravated, military offences."

Examine, for a moment, what is the fair inference from this statement; compare that deduction with the whole truth, and let us see how far the above quotation comports with the avowed intention of your correspondent, to deal only in facts. To one unacquainted with the subject, and reading the quoted paragraph, with its context, it would appear that a company of Artillery, comfortably quartered at the arsenal in question, was removed most improperly in order to make room for hired Ordnance men. But how stands the case? In the month of March, 1843, two companies of Artillery, stationed at Saint Augustine, East Florida, were relieved from duty at that post—one being ordered to Fort Moultrie—the other to garrison the arsenal at Augusta, Ga. The destination of these companies was directed by the commander-in-chief, and so soon as the head of the Ordnance Bureau was informed of the contemplated movements, he earnestly urged upon the Secretary of War, the impropriety and inexpediency of the occupation of the arsenal by the company intended as its garrison. He stated the utter insufficiency of quarters to accommodate, both those employed in the public service, for Ordnance purposes, then at the arsenal, and the additional force not yet arrived. The result of his representations was the immediate issuing of an order by the Secretary of War, countermanding the previous one, and directing the company to be retained at Saint Augustine, until suitable arrangements could be made for its reception at its new station.

Most unfortunately, the Secretary's order reached Saint Augustine too late, the company had left the sea-girt city; and behold, it arrives at Augusta, Ga., to the surprise of the officer commanding in that vicinity, and before time had been allowed to make "suitable arrangements for its reception." What follows its arrival? The captain of the company, very properly assumed command of the arsenal and directed the evacuation of the quarters by the Ordnance men, to make room for his company, which, thus established, remained so quartered until the reception, at the post, of an order issued by the Secretary of War, directing the company to withdraw and to occupy temporary hired quarters in the vicinity.

It was then contemplated to break up the arsenal, as such; to remove the ordnance officer and men, and to re-station the company within. Though this course was not subsequently adopted by the Secretary of War, it was changed, I should judge, for reasons honorable and sufficient, as they have since coincided, it is believed, with the views of his immediate and a subsequent successor.

Such, Mr. Editor, is a brief history of the removal of a company of Artillery to make room for hired Ordnance men, and I very much mistake, if it convey to the unprejudiced mind any idea of an "outrage," as suggested by "A Subaltern."

With reference to the "indignation of an outraged community," I am enabled to say, upon the authority of one of its citizens, of high and honorable standing, that no such feeling existed amongst its members,—that a petition was signed to have a company stationed in their vicinity, not from any feelings of indignation—but because the request seemed to them reasonable, and one to which they could see no objection. Several persons signed this petition, without fully understanding its entire effect, and so soon as its operation and object were made known and explained to them, they withdrew their signatures by letter, after the memorial had reached Washington.

It is stated by your contributor, that "the company was forced to hire an old farm-house, some three miles from the military post."

The distance referred to is scarce half a mile, and though it does not much matter, whether it be three miles or thirty, yet, if intended to state it at all, why should it not be correctly given? Why not obtain authentic and certain information, before "A Subaltern" permits himself to present facts to the public? It is known, too, that the "old farm-house" afforded to the ejected company more extended quarters, more comforts and more conveniences than the arsenal had furnished, and that the "veteran captain," when banished from the Ordnance paradise, was forthwith established and domesticated, at the public expense, in one of those charming residences, for which the "Sand Hill" is so justly celebrated;—with quarters sufficient for a Major-General, and pleasure grounds that Adam might have envied in his palmiest days.

It has been to me, Mr. Editor, and I doubt not to many of your readers, a subject of most sincere regret, that "A Subaltern" should have deemed it necessary to the best interests of the service, or as coming within the scope of an exposé of material facts, to conclude the quoted paragraph with a personal allusion, so unjust and uncalled for.

"A Subaltern" can not point out to the public, whom he has misled, any order directing the Lieutenant of Ordnance to be placed under "some discreet and severe commanding officer," much less such order dated but "a few months before." The only one to which he can allude was issued by Mr. Secretary Bell, more than two years prior to the events referred to in the connection, and is materially different in its language and tenor from the representations of "A Subaltern."

Granting that your correspondent were right, and that "past aggravated military offences" were to be found in the conduct of the officer of Ordnance; are such offences never to be atoned for? May not time and becoming conduct cause them to be forgiven and forgot? I ask "A Subaltern" to suppose with me, that a Lieutenant of either arm of service is arraigned before a court-martial for behaving with contempt and disrespect to his commanding officer, is tried and convicted of the offence, and is sentenced to two months' suspension from rank, and a forfeiture of his pay and commutation money for the same period of time: when the term of his sentence shall have expired, and the Lieutenant, upon his return to duty, shall, perchance, be the senior officer present with his company,—will he be pronounced by "A Subaltern" as undeserving the command to which he would succeed, because of his "past aggravated, military offence?" Assuredly not. Why then is it deemed necessary to drag from the records of the past, offences which the hand of time had softened, for which subsequent irreproachable conduct might atone; and in regard to which, too, facts are to be coined, before they reach that grade of enormity to entitle them to the notice of "A Subaltern!" Your correspondent, sir, might have recollected that the Lieutenant of Ordnance, whom he so unjustly stigmatizes as undeserving, shared, in no inconsiderable degree, during his service in Florida, those privations and hardships to which he himself has so feelingly alluded—that he was brevetted by Congress for gallantry, on several occasions, during the most arduous and dangerous campaigns of the Seminole War—and, what is, perhaps, still more to his credit, that after a hard fought battle, he was complimented before the assembled soldiery, in a handsome speech, by a late distinguished Brigadier General of our Army, who expressed it as his opinion, that this same Lieutenant of Ordnance, then of Artillery, deserved to be made a captain for his active, energetic and efficient services. But above all, Mr. Editor, "A Subaltern" might generously have remembered occurrences of very recent date at the arsenal aforesaid, in which the conduct of the Lieutenant of Ordnance toward an insubordinate junior, evinced a courtesy and magnanimity above all praise.

In accounting for the removal and continued absence of the troops from the public quarters at the arsenal, "A Subaltern" is pleased to consider that the acting chief of the Ordnance Department has been enabled to mould and shape to his will, the opinions of three successive Secretaries of War; and in commenting upon the division of a "Veteran Captain's" company, he has "capped the climax," by supposing the chief of Ordnance to have controlled, by personal influence, the action of the executive of the country. Such assertions bear upon their face the impress of their own absurdity,—they require no comment to show their improbability, no discernment to know their impropriety, and but little kindness to grieve for their illiberality. Their author should not thus have assailed the reputation of an officer, whose standing, during thirty years service, has been above reproach.

FAIR PLAY.

OUR ARMY AGAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Sou. Lit. Mess.

Sir:—The appearance, in the June number of the Messenger, of a few comments by you upon a communication, from what you seem to consider an official source, demands a short notice;—though the efforts of "A Subaltern" to call the attention of Congress and the country at large, to the abuses existing in our Army have been suspended, as he privately notified to you, until the near approach of the next session of Congress.

The subject is undoubtedly one of general imterest to the country, and the writer feels pride and gratification at having been able to attract the attention which his efforts have secured. He attributes it, however, more to the importance of the subject, than to any merit of his own; and he regrets that some one more competent had not assumed the responsibility of discharging a duty to the Army and the country, by making exposures which it was expected would meet with "disapprobation" in some quarters; though it was not conceived that an attempt would be made to suppress them,* and that, too, in the shape of an official "remonstrance" directed to the editor of a distinguished public journal. The subject has attracted so much attention, and the discussion of it been approved by so many, that it ought to be, and shall be pursued; yet the object of the writer has not been, and will not be, a gratification of any personal feeling, but the correction of abuses by which the military establishment of our country can be preserved, and without which it must fall. With this object in view, he had determined on suspending his efforts until such time as they could be laid before those who alone possess the power to apply the remedy, and who will be held responsible by the people that a corrective is applied where such enormous abuses are proved to exist. This determination has not been changed, nor will it be changed, by any efforts of "those in power" to drive from his purpose one who so reluctantly threw himself into the breach, but who, being there, intends remaining until his ammunition is expended, knowing that he is unassailable and invulnerable except from official sources, and that even they can not "gag him," though he has heard they would attempt it, could he be discovered.

"A Subaltern" expects "that opposition will be arrayed against him," and knew at the time of forming his resolution to pursue this subject, that he was throwing down the glove to those by far his superiors in natural abilities and mental acquirements—that he was entering a contest where he would be overmatched, except in facts and truth, upon which he relies for a victory—and which he intends to present, notwithstanding "the decided disapprobation" of the "council of administration" at Fort ——. The non-appearance of "Subaltern," then, in the next number of the Messenger is not to be attributed to the "decided disapprobation" of said council, but to a previous determination based on the above reasons.

A fair opportunity is afforded for "A Subaltern," from his knowledge of facts and circumstances, to administer a rebuke to the remonstrants; but he forbears, as he is determined not to give cause for offence to any one, nor will he condescend to enter into any personal discussions, and thereby neglect the main object of his asking a space in the columns of the Messenger, through which to be heard, and which was so readily granted by the Editor, with the full understanding that persons were to be excluded. Nor would he even make a request for the admission of such matter into the columns of the Messenger—matter so totally at variance with the object of the writer and the interest of the work, the latter of which he hopes to subserve in attaining the former. It will not be unnoticed, however, by every military reader, that two of the three members of that august council who have passed sentence on "A Subaltern," are officers of the Staff of our Army, and therefore can not be expected to agree with him in opinion.

From the terms in which they express themselves, and the dates mentioned, it is apparent that reference must have been had to the second and third numbers of the "Notes on our Army." The council having been induced by the editorial remarks preceding the first number, to subscribe to the Messenger, and the fourth number, (May,) not having appeared when the extraordinary action of this council took place. Upon a re-examination of the articles in the March and April numbers of the Messenger, it is discovered that no personal allusions have been made except to the Quarter-Master General of the Army, and they are certainly as complimentary as they are just. Reference is made to the official report of the Commanding General, and a few comments appended, with an intimation that more may be expected; but no where is it discovered that "harsh epithets" are used towards any officer, or "number of officers." The official acts of two of our senior officers are commented upon, but these acts are public, and in no instance has a personal allusion been made with any intention of harshness or injustice towards them as individuals.

The object and aim of "A Subaltern" is the office and not the incumbent; he believes and says that many places occupied by men of talent and education in our service, are considered in foreign services beneath men of such standing; but no where, and at no time, has he detracted from the standing and character of the officers occupying such positions. On the contrary, he has admitted, and now repeats, that our Army is injured by selecting from among its officers those considered the most competent, and requiring of them the performance of duties which could be as well, if not better, done by a class of men far inferior, and at a much lower rate of compensation. In this there is nothing disparaging to the officers.

But a labored defence of the course pursued by "A Subaltern" will not be attempted; he is willing to go before the Army and the country with a consciousness of having acted from no personal motive, and, with his grateful acknowledgments to the Editor for the too flattering and complimentary notice given him in the last Messenger, he asks the verdict of both on the course he has pursued, repeating from the first number of "Notes on our Army, that "I wish it understood, that I am free from all political and party prejudices,—uninfluenced by any private animosity, or personal dislikes, and unknown, personally, to most of those whose acts I shall examine." The Council of Administration of Fort — have gone beyond the prescribed limits of their duties, as laid down in the regulations for the government of the Army, and the Editor of the Messenger was mistaken in supposing they spoke "somewhat ex cathedra." They can not thus clothe the act of individuals with an official robe; the attempt will be justly appreciated by all who understand the regulations of our service.

* We do not regard the letter of the Council, &c., as an attempt to suppress the "Notes on our Army." Such an attempt to control the Messenger, from any source, would be 'idle as the wind.' The Messenger depends, of course, upon public patronage, and a wise prudence should guide it; but whilst it lives, it shall be Independent.—[Ed. Mess.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW—No. CXXIV, July, 1844.

The present number of this able periodical contains the usual amount of interesting matter, but we heartily commend the leading article as particularly racy and amusing. It purports to be a review of "the Poets and Poetry of America," an article which our readers will remember appeared in the Foreign Quarterly Review for January, 1844, and was attributed to Mr. Charles Dickens, but which that gentleman has, we believe, expressly disclaimed.

We have rarely seen so happy an imitation of the slang of those writers about our country, who, shutting their eyes to every good quality of our people and every favorable feature in our institutions, present only our faults, in the most glaring manner, unredeemed by a single virtue, and then exclaim that "all is barrenness." Under the head of "the Morals, Manners and Poetry of England," the writer has brought together all the grounds upon which England rests her claims to be considered the most refined, moral, philanthropical, honest and enlightened nation on the globe, and a very pretty exhibition it presents truly! With what justice she assumes this high position our readers can form their own opinion after perusing the article to which we have called their attention.

BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE—No. CCCXLIV. June, 1844. New-York: Leonard Scott, & Co.

We always hail this popular Magazine with pleasure, and the present number does not fall short of the high reputation of its predecessors. The article "Who Wrote Gil Blas?" will be read with deep interest by all who are fond of literary disquisitions, and we may add, of the pursuit of truth. We have long believed that the laurels claimed for and worn by Le Sage, were, to say the least of it, extremely questionable appropriateness, and the article before us has gone very far to confirm our doubts. Indeed, after candidly examining the evidences and arguments adduced against the claims of Le Sage, a belief in his authorship is next to impossible. J. Gill, Agent.

Messrs. Drinker & Morris, have obligingly handed us the following works:

ROSE D'ALBERT—The history of France at the period when Henry IV. was struggling against "The League" is, in itself, a Romance, and we very much doubt whether imagination can increase, by its wildest and most fanciful suggestions, the powerful interest which the stern and naked facts of the time themselves command—and if it can, we do not think this Romance of Mr. James is calculated to do so. It contains, as do all his works, purity of sentiment, high toned morality, but its details of vice are minute beyond the limit of good taste, and unnecessary for the effect which is aimed at. The rewards and punishments too, are not, to our thinking, equitably distributed; and one of the punishments through the agency of a mistake about a poisoned bowl, is trite, and by no means probable.

The part that Henry IV. is made to play is trivial, weak and of second rate stage trickery, and there is haste and confusion in the denouement, of which, by the by, the author himself seems to be conscious. Nevertheless, the book may be read with pleasure and instruction, and in these times of party excitement, we recommend it as a relief and refreshment, to the heated and overtaken public mind.

GERTRUDE; AN ORIGINAL NOVEL.

— Judge N. B. Tucker.

CHAPTER I.

"Well! my daughter!" said Mrs. Austin, with an approving smile, and in a tone of inquiry.

The young lady was entering the room with an air of recovered composure, though a slight tinge upon her cheek, and an excited flash of the eye, and an almost imperceptible quivering of the lip showed that she was not entirely free from emotion. In her step, and the carriage of her head there was an expression of self-confidence and offended pride; and, on the whole, it was plain, that whatever might be the feeling of the moment, self-reproach had no part in it.

"Well! my daughter: is all settled?"

"I hope so, Ma'am," was the quiet reply.

"Mr. Crabshaw then is the happy man at last?"

"I trust, Mother, I wish Mr. Crabshaw at least as much happiness as he deserves, but I do not expect that I shall ever contribute to it."

"How!" exclaimed Mrs. Austin, in a tone of unfeigned amazement: "is it possible that you have rejected an offer that has made you the envy of all the girls in the village?"

"I do not know, Mother, who may envy me, but I have certainly given Mr. Crabshaw an answer which should forever free me from his unwelcome addresses."

"Upon my word, Miss! you carry a high head. The unwelcome addresses of a man of ten thousand DOLLARS a year!!! It would be quite edifying to be admitted to your confidence, and to learn how high a poor country girl can lift her eyes, when told that she is fine."

"Mother, you do me injustice. I do not lift my eyes to any thing. It is not of ambition, but the want of it, that you are wont to accuse me."

"Well! be it so. I shall not dispute about the name, you may choose to give your perverseness. I know you will find a high sounding one. I remember how it was with Mr. Clutterbuck, and how you tried to persuade me that I wounded your delicacy, and disgusted you, by teasing you about him. Now this time I have said nothing, and left you to yourself. But though I was silent you could not help knowing my wishes; and that, I suppose, was enough to determine you to disappoint them. Obstinate, disobedient, ungrateful girl!"

Poor Gertrude burst into tears, and sinking on the sofa, covered her face with her hands. She felt that she did not deserve this reproach—but she did not expostulate. It was needless. The Mother, sensible of her injustice, instantly softened.

"My dear Gertrude," she said, "you must forgive my harshness. You have always been good and dutiful, in every thing but this; and hence perhaps it is, that I am the more impatient at finding you so unreasonable and intractable. But what am I to think of your behavior? I have had no reason to suspect that you had gone, like a silly girl, and fallen in love with somebody who was not thinking of you, and I do not know how to understand your obstinate rejection of the best offers."

"Is it not enough, Mother, that I have as yet seen no man whom I can love?"

"Love!! repeated Mrs. Austin, with that scornful emphasis, with which the word is sometimes uttered by ladies whose day of love is past; "Love! and what should you know about love?"

"Nothing, Mother, but what I am told, and of that I understand and believe no more than what is self-evident—that whenever I do love any body well enough to be willing to leave all my friends, and spend my days with him, I shall not be unconscious of it."

"There you are mistaken, my dear. People are very often in love before they suspect it, and remain in ignorance of their true feelings, until something happens to interpret them."

"I do not know how that can be, Mother. I love you, and my kind good father, and my little sister, and all my friends; and I could as soon be hungry, or thirsty without knowing it, as insensible to my affection for these."

"O yes! But the love we are talking of is quite a different affair."

"Different! So I have been told before. I wish people would not call different things by the same name. But if I love Mr. Crabshaw, it must be because the love you speak of is more like disgust, contempt and aversion than any thing else. I certainly have no pleasure in his company: I see no sense in any thing he says; his sentiments, to me, seem low and mean: I find nothing in his conduct to approve; and I am always glad when he goes away."

"Pshaw! That is only because he is your lover, and girls are always so, at first. It is disagreeable to be always teased and harassed with attentions, which are often ill-timed; but let engagement once establish confidence and security, and so put an end to that sort of troublesome importunity, and who knows how soon you might love him!"

"And suppose I should not, Mother; what then would become of the engagement?"

"But that is not to be supposed."

"Is love then sure to follow?"

"I do not exactly say that."

"Then again, my dear Mother, let me ask what is to become of the engagement if it does not?"

"That will depend on circumstances. If a more advantageous offer, or one more acceptable and equally advantageous should be made, it might be broken off; but, if not, then let the marriage take place, and let love come afterwards."

The only answer to this was a look of perplexed amazement. Gertrude could hardly believe that she had heard aright. Yet her ears could not have deceived her; and she dared not trust herself to utter to a mother she loved and respected, the only reply to such a proposition that rose to her lips.

Mrs. Austin felt that she had struck a hard blow. But she had of late learned to blame herself for her neglect of this important point in the training of a daughter; and, far from wishing to recall it, she was glad it had been given, and determined to follow it up. "My dear child," she continued, "a pure-minded and simple girl like you cannot understand these things. None but a married woman can understand the feelings of a woman toward the father of her children."

Gertrude was indeed a pure-minded girl; but there was a significant emphasis in these words, and they were accompanied by a meaning look, from which her earnest gaze was instantly withdrawn. Ideas which the delicate instincts of woman had taught her to chase from her mind had been summoned by the words of her own mother; and, with downcast eyes, a burning blush, and a starting tear, she sat the image of wounded delicacy and violated modesty.

At this moment Dr. Austin entered the room, and wearily threw himself on a sofa opposite to that on which Gertrude sat. Though but her step-father, he regarded and loved her as his own child, and unaccustomed to any reserves in his family, thought nothing of breaking in upon a conversation between his wife and her daughter. His presence caused no interruption, though it might have moderated the coarseness of the last remark. But the arrow had sped. The words had been uttered, and were fixed in Gertrude's mind as a text and interpreter to what might follow. The lady went on. "My dear daughter, you must bear in mind your situation and circumstances. You know you have no fortune. The small property left by your father was dissipated in my widowhood, by the necessary expenses of a helpless family; and a young woman so situated, must make up her mind to lay aside all romantic notions, and never think of marrying any man who is not rich enough to establish her in life. You have my example to serve you as a warning, though you can never know the trouble and anxiety I experienced, when left by your poor father in such narrow circumstances. But I formed what I thought the best plan for you. Instead of trying to save a scanty pittance which must soon be gone, I thought it best to give you an education that might qualify you for the highest places in society; and now, if you throw yourself away upon a poor man, you defeat my plan, disappoint my hopes, and prepare for yourself the same distresses which I experienced."

"But Mother, I have no thought, as yet, of marrying any body, and would rather live single all my life, than marry a man whom I cannot love. I am thankful for your attention to my education, and wish I could have profited by it more. But, my dear Mother, you did not endeavor to improve my mind in order to qualify me to be the wife of one whose principles I disapprove, and whose understanding I cannot respect."

"Live single all your life!" exclaimed the Mother, giving the go-by to the latter part of this speech. "And how are you to live? Who is to maintain you, when you have power to do something for yourself, and will not? Here is poor Dr. Austin with his large family of children to provide for, and nothing but his profession and this little farm to depend on: and because he is so good as to give you home, and maintain you without charge till this time, you have no right to expect him to do so always."

The Doctor rose from his seat, walked directly across the room to Gertrude, laid his hand gently on her head, and bending over her, kissed her forehead. "Bless you, my dear noble girl," said he. "I honor your pure and virtuous heart, and love you better than ever for what you have done. I have just seen Mr. Crabshaw, and was pleased, and not at all surprised to learn the result of his addresses. Set your heart at rest, my child. Are you not my own child? And have you not another and a better father, who, while you cherish your just and noble sentiments will never forsake you, or leave you without a friend and protector when I am gone? You say right. You are not fit to be the wife of a weak or vicious man. But there are men of sense and virtue among the rich, as well as the poor, and it is not unreasonable to hope that some one of these will be found desirous to grace his establishment, with one worthy to share his wealth and honors, and capable of appreciating his worth. Now dry your tears, dear," he added, gently raising her, "and go to your chamber, for I wish to have some private talk with your mother."

Gertrude moved towards the door, but paused and looked back at her mother. Her heart sank as she beheld the fixed and stony look of baffled policy, which all the husband's tenderness had failed to soften. But the warm-hearted girl was not to be repelled by it, and, running to her, she threw herself upon her neck and wept. Then smiling through her tears, she rushed into the extended arms of her kind protector, and, after kissing him with grateful fondness, left the room.

Without waiting to hear what her husband might wish to communicate, Mrs. Austin immediately began to expostulate at his interference with a mother in the management of her daughter. For this he excused himself by reminding her, that he had been appealed to in a way which made it necessary that he should not be silent, unless he meant to leave Gertrude under the mortifying belief that she was an unwelcome burden to her only protector. The words of Mrs. Austin, as spoken by her, were sufficiently distressing, but, adopted by his silence, they must have rendered the young lady's situation absolutely intolerable. So much her mother was forced to admit, but she still insisted that he had no call to say more than was necessary to save himself from misconstruction, and she boldly threw down the gauntlet in favor of "prudential matches."

"You ought to consider," said the lady, "the education that Gertrude has received. There is not a girl in the land that has had a finer opportunity, and all her teachers give her credit for talents. And then for her looks, she may not be a regular beauty, but you may go far before you find a prettier face or figure."

"All that is very true, my dear, and if I were to speak of Gertrude's pretensions, I should use much stronger language than yours. I know no young woman so beautiful, so intelligent, so accomplished, so amiable, so good, so altogether lovely as she is, and this is the very reason why I have no mind to see her knocked off, like damaged goods, to the first bidder."

"Ah! That's always the way with you. To hear you talk, one would think that the reasons I give for my opinions were always the best reasons against them."

"By no means, my dear. I know few women of better sense. But 'ladies are ladies,' and I have known the sex too long to be surprised at hearing a woman, and especially a fine woman, reason backward."

"Yes, but I don't reason backward. I know what I am saying, and I did not say that Gertrude was so very superlative as you make her out to be."

"May be so; but I own I am at a loss to fix on that precise amount of merit in a lady, which must condemn her to be sold like cattle in a market, while either more or less would leave her free to follow the dictates of her best feelings, and consult her happiness. If poor Gertrude has been improved exactly up to that point, I can only regret that her education was so much attended to."

"There it is again! You know I only mean to say that Gertrude has merit enough to give her a right to expect to make a good match."

"And I mean to say precisely the same thing. The only point of difference between us seems to be, what constitutes a good match. Now I maintain that the only good match is a happy match, and that the chance for happiness is very bad between two people, who are closely connected for life, and who dislike each other."

"But people cannot live on love, and they who love each other must be unhappy when they see each other suffering for the want of comforts and even necessities."

"Very true. But I see no reason why they should want necessities, because they love each other."

"You know I am not so absurd as to mean to say that."

"Well then! the matter stands thus. There can be no happiness in marriage without love, or without necessities. The conclusion should be that Gertrude should neither marry a man she does not love, nor one who cannot support her. The question between us is about the first of these propositions, and as I affirm both, you cannot convince me that either is wrong, by proving, what I already believe, that the other is right."

"You are quite too logical for me. But you know what I mean, and you know that when I speak of necessities, I do not mean victuals and clothes alone. A fine young woman accustomed to admiration cannot be expected to sit down contented in the chimney corner and card wool to spin her a petticoat. When ambition has been cultivated it must have some indulgence, and be allowed to display itself after marriage in jewels and equipages and entertainments and all that."

"The whole of this marriage is 'gowd and a carriage,'" said the husband playfully: and then added, in a graver tone, "My dear Catharine, the very language you use shows that you are struggling against the best feelings of your heart, and the convictions of your own excellent understanding. Why else do you use the word Ambition, when you are speaking of Avarice and Ostentation? Ambition itself is a bad passion, though sometimes ennobled by its objects. But, bad as it is, it is so much less hideous and loathsome than the others, that they are glad to wear it as a mask. As long as you can cheat yourself with a word, you may make a merit of providing an ambitious marriage for your daughter. But call it by its right name. Call it a mercenary marriage, and you yourself will shudder at the sound."

"Lord! Mr. Austin how strangely you talk. Let a girl marry prudently, I say, and she will soon learn to love her husband."

"My dear, we are man and wife, and to you I can talk plainly, and present ideas which should never enter a maiden's mind but in the privacy of her chamber. Reflect a moment on all that is implied in what you have just said. It may be true of a coarse, vulgar-minded, sensual, brutish woman. But is it true of the pure, the refined, the delicate female, true to the instincts of her sex, which prompt to yield the person to him who has the heart, and to no other? Can such a woman look upon the man who has been forced on her by the tyranny of friends or the tyranny of circumstances, but as one who has profaned her person, rifled her charms, and degraded and dishonored her in her own eyes? I do not think of your sex more highly than they deserve. I will not offend you with the appearance of a doubt, by asking if you married me, depending on marriage to bring love. But you have been twice married; and when you gave your virgin charms to Mr. Courtney, was it before your heart was his?"

The tears sprung to the yet beautiful eyes of Mrs. Austin, and her husband kissed them away.

"Those tears," said he, "are an answer to my question. A woman, happy in a second marriage, does not weep to remember a first husband who was not master of her heart as well as her person. None, better than yourself, can understand the workings of a virtuous female heart. Let things be called by their right names, and none will feel more sensibly, that, apart from the arbitrary conventions of society, Prudence not Virtue makes the chief distinction between the despised street-walker, and the woman who sells herself in marriage."

The argumentum ad hominem is a troublesome thing to either sex. To a lady it is unanswerable, especially when accompanied by a compliment. Mrs. Austin if not convinced, was silent. Poor Gertrude heard no more of prudent marriages, and secure in the wild freedom of her guileless heart, her gratitude to her kind and generous protector was unbounded.

CHAPTER II.

Mrs. Austin has said that her daughter was a pretty girl, and her husband said that she was beautiful. All this was true: and more. She was beautiful and she was fascinating. I am not fond of descriptions, but if I knew wherein consisted the peculiar charm, the power of which I have so often felt, I would try to describe it. Perhaps it was in her manner, in which, with all her cultivation, and her high and deep thoughts, there was a childlike simplicity that at once awakened the fond feelings so natural in all good hearts, toward amiable and cheerful children. Perhaps it was in her voice, soft, low, distinct when scarcely audible, winning its way to the ear through other sounds, so that no word of hers was ever lost. In its saddest tones it was never complaining, and in its more cheerful moods there was a playful melody reminding the hearer of the careless and rapid distinctness of the wild notes of the mocking-bird. Perhaps it was in her eye. I never saw but one other such, and the light of that, (it was the light of life to me) is quenched for ever. It was blue and calm and deep as a well. It was not always bright, but the thoughts that rose in her mind glanced through it, as the light that glances from a window, casts back the pale moon-beams, and substitutes a ray from within for the cold reflection from without. In short she was lovely, and she was beloved.

Henry Austin was several years older than her. He was the eldest son of Dr. Austin, the first child of an early marriage; and, at the time of his father's union with the mother of Gertrude, he was entering on manhood and its duties. Bred to the bar, he had united his labors to those of his father, for the support of the numerous family whose comfort mainly depended on them. He was a handsome youth, of high principles, fine talents, great steadiness, and strength of character, and honorable ambition. His education qualified him for the dangerous task of assisting in that of his new sister (for so he called her) and it was from his lips that she learned those last and finishing lessons on which the final character of the mind so much depends. It is an old story—as old as Abelard and Eloisa—that a girl of ingenuous and curious mind, under the instruction of a bold and original thinker, is apt to learn—and to teach—one lesson not dreamed of in the philosophy of those who bring them together. There is nothing very seductive in the rudiments of learning, and a young lady is not apt to fall in love with her teacher of grammar, geography, mathematics or natural philosophy. But when we come to the Philosophy of History, and the metaphysics of the affections, to Taste and Belles Lettres and the beauties of poetry, then, if the teacher be a man of genius and spirit, and the pupil apt and enthusiastic, circumstances can hardly exist, which shall prevent them from loving. What can be more natural? To the inquisitive mind there is no pleasure like that arising from the perception of new truths. To the benevolent, few things are so sweet as to impart truth to the candid and ingenuous seeker. Thus each becomes to the other a source of enjoyment, welling up from the depths of the heart, like a perennial spring, pure, fresh and inexhaustible. The whole philosophy of love is that it disposes us to live with those who can make us happy, and to be happy with those with whom we live. Hence, if, after giving the characters of Henry and Gertrude, I were to say they did not love one another, I ought not to be believed.

I do not mean to say that they knew it. It was not until she began to be courted that he thought of her as a being to be married; and hence, until then, he never thought of marrying her. Then, indeed, he learned the secret of his heart; but he kept it to himself. She was slower in discovering hers. Teased by the addresses of those alone who were unacceptable to her, the idea of marrying any body was only made absurd to her mind by their importunities. Thinking of marriage only in connexion with disagreeable people, she could only think of it as a disagreeable thing; and it was not until she had been repeatedly told that she must marry somebody, that it occurred to her, that she would rather marry "Brother Henry," with whom she lived so happily, than any body else. But, at the time of which I write, she had not yet come to this conclusion, and said truly that she had no thought of marrying any one.

It is a common remark, that the politic often defeat their own designs. A strenuous effort to overcome an opposing principle or feeling must succeed, or it imparts its own energy to the reaction of the mind, which thus throws off the assailant farther from his object. Such was the effect of the decided demonstration made by Mrs. Austin in favor of Mr. Crabshaw. The mind of Gertrude soon freed itself from the gross ideas suggested by the gross hint of her mother, but the thought of such a man as the father of her children remained. What then? Were they to resemble him? To wear his stolid look, relieved only by his silly smile? To talk his prosing truisms or vapid niaiseries? To inherit his purse-proud arrogance and his petty meanness? If she was to have children, she would rather have them like any body else; and of all men, whom would she so soon have them resemble as him, whom she saw the beloved and admired of all, the pride of his father's heart, and the copy of his virtues? Such thoughts will come; and the result of it was, that, for the next twenty-four hours, the image of Henry Austin was more in the mind of Gertrude than it ever had been before.

To that pure and innocent and sunny mind such thoughts brought nothing painful. She did not think to analyse the character of her love for him she called her brother; and, whatever it might be, her own so exactly corresponded with it, that her heart felt nothing of that void to which those are doomed who pour out their affections on the insensible, and receive nothing in return. I am not sure that the delights of mutual love are ever so sweet, as in that short interval in which the true nature of our feelings is not fully understood. Then we live altogether in the present moment, without casting one glance toward that dark future, where, though nothing is seen distinctly, ugly shadows will sometimes flit through the gloom, and scare us into undefined apprehensions. The longer that interval is protracted, the more deeply does the passion sink into the soul. The mind sleeps securely in the sweet dream, and when it awakes, it finds every fibre of the heart tied down by the Liliputian fingers of the tiny imps, that do the bidding of the God of Love.

But others very often detect this state of feeling while the parties are wholly unconscious of it. The keen eye of Mrs. Austin was not blind to what was passing. Though so far influenced by the sentiments of her husband, as to have relinquished the idea of selling her daughter in loveless marriage, she was not at all shaken in the opinion that wealth, as well as love, is necessary to conjugal happiness. Her first husband had been a man of small property, but fine talents; and he had married her, when fairly entered on a career of professional success, which promised, not only affluence, but distinction. He had realized but little, though no man's prospects were more flattering, when suddenly death put an end to his career, and left her a widow in narrow circumstances. With the difficulties of her situation she struggled resolutely, practising economy in every thing, but the education of her daughter, in whom she hoped to live over again the life of ambition which had been thus cut short. I here use the word in its true sense. For herself, Mrs. Austin was indeed an ambitious woman. It was only when seeking to regulate the destiny of her daughter that she could succeed in cheating herself into that delusion, which dignifies avarice with the name of a passion less grovelling, though perhaps not less fatal. She was ambitious; and, had her husband lived, and had his life fulfilled the promise of his youth, her heart would have asked no more than to share his honors, in circumstances far short of affluence. But, when he was taken from her, she naturally felt less the disappointment of ambitious aspirations than the loss of indulgences, to which, in reliance on his growing fortunes, he had permitted her to habituate herself; and her fall from that place in fashionable and wealthy society, which had seemed her proper position. Hence she had learned to doubt the truth of the maxim that a good mind, a good education and a lucrative profession are the best estate. For the man himself, she admitted this might be so. But for the desolate widow—the helpless children, she required something that should not perish with him.

Thus reasoned Mrs. Austin within herself; and when she remarked the growing attachment between Henry and her daughter, she rejoiced to think that her wailings over her disastered lot, during a long widowhood, had already made Gertrude familiar with these ideas. "Let my fate be a warning to you, my dear Gertrude," she would often say: and now she daily harped on the same theme, without seeming to do so with any particular design. She had been so far successful, that, to Gertrude, there seemed to be but little difference between marrying a poor man with a profession or without one. But so long as she had no thought of marrying any body in particular, the idea was but an abstraction, and, like all abstract ideas, was ready to give way to any impulse of passion. Thus, in spite of all the good lady's training, the unconscious attachment to Henry was daily gaining strength. It was therefore time that something should be done.

Gentlemen are much less sagacious observers in these matters than ladies. They are more easily cheated by names and forms. Doctor Austin had taught his son to call Gertrude "sister," and, as long as he continued to do so, it never would have occurred to the father, that he looked on her as any thing but a sister. He did not wish that he should. Not deficient in worldly wisdom, he had other views for his son. He knew that a handsome young man, of respectable family, good talents, good principles, good habits and good manners, though without property, is an excellent match in this country, for any but a poor girl. His talents should indeed be unquestionable, and he must have had time to place them beyond dispute by his success in life. The doctor therefore had long cherished the hope, that, could he succeed in establishing Henry in business and reputation before his marrying propensities should be fully developed, he might so far better his condition by marriage, as to enable him, without difficulty, to fulfil the duties of a father toward the younger members of the family. He was therefore not a little startled, when his wife, having called his attention to the doings of the young people, gave him her interpretation of the symptoms. He claimed no right to thwart Henry's inclinations. Had he the world to choose from, she who had so long shown herself a daughter to him was the one he would select for his son's wife, did circumstances permit it. But his health was not good, and, in the event of his death, the prospect for his family, on the supposition of such a marriage, was anything but cheering. He possessed too much of the young man's confidence to believe that matters could have gone to any great length between the parties, and he justly thought there could be no harm in affording to both opportunities of making a more prudential choice. The remedy was a winter in Washington for Gertrude.

The session of Congress was just at hand. A sister of Mrs. Austin resided in the metropolis. She was yet in the meridian of life, the childless blooming widow of a wealthy man, who had left her mistress of a splendid establishment. There she reigned, the arbiter of fashion, in an extensive circle, embracing many men of talent, distinction and fortune. She had made it manifest that she had no matrimonial views for herself, and delighted to be surrounded by the young and beautiful, on whose charms she looked without jealousy or envy. Hence she had often pressed for a visit from Gertrude, and now the invitation, so often declined, was accepted.

When a capital measure is resolved on, success must not be sacrificed to minor considerations. It was meant that Gertrude should figure in society with a splendor that might attract attention, and the effect intended to be produced on her own feelings made it indispensable to secure her against any thing like mortification. The small remains of her patrimony were accordingly laid out in rich dresses and richer jewels; the degree of her success, in this, as in all gambling, depending on the magnitude of the stake. She was thus to be sent out as a sort of "drapery miss," her whole chance of happiness and respectability in life depending on the success of a scheme in which she was but a passive and unconscious instrument. In this there was deep policy. Mrs. Austin had not forgotten the story of Cinderilla, and how she hated to quit the ball-room, lay aside the glass slipper and the robe of golden tissue, and resume her rags and her lowly place in the chimney corner. Much the same effect did she anticipate, from a set of costly and splendid jewelry, which, as the wife of a poor man, Gertrude could never wear with propriety.

A day was fixed for her journey when Henry was to be absent at a distant court. The tenderness of parting was dreaded, and it was thought safer to distribute the excitement and the pathos of the separation from her friends so that, taken in broken doses, the effect might be less dangerous. In all this he was necessarily passive, and saw the day of his departure approach, as a condemned criminal awaits the hour of his doom. But he felt that circumstances called for a decided step on his part. Feeling that he deserved, and knowing that he possessed the esteem of his step-mother, the form of laying his pretensions before her seemed quite superfluous. Of her views for her daughter he had no suspicion, and his success in his profession warranted the belief, that, in offering his hand to Gertrude, he would not be guilty of the folly and crime of tempting her to poverty and distress. In short, he was in condition to promise her the continuance of all the comforts and enjoyments of life to which she had been accustomed, and he rightly thought that to be the exact measure of the good things of this world which is best for the happiness of all who are above want. Thus thinking, he resolved not to leave Gertrude in ignorance of his sentiments towards her. But aware that, whatever her feelings might be, to her they seemed only the feelings of a sister, he feared to press his suit, without first giving some hint, which might set her to examining her own heart.

For an opportunity to do this he watched carefully, and found, to his surprise, that there were difficulties in the way, such as he had never before encountered. To be alone with her at some time of every day was so much a matter of course, that he purposely deferred his communication to the last day of his stay at home. He was to set out in the evening, and the evening came and found him baffled in every attempt to obtain a private interview. He then determined to borrow of the last hours of the night as much time as would carry him to his destination next day. But still he could never find Gertrude for a single moment alone. The presence of her mother or his father seemed an indispensable condition of her very existence. But whatever restraint this placed on him, it imposed none on her. Knowing that he was about to leave her, she addressed her attention almost exclusively to him, though surprised and somewhat hurt at the moody silence with which he met her playful sallies, and his apparent insensibility to her tenderness. He was mute because one thought, which he could not utter, occupied his whole mind : and he seemed sullen, for he was vexed at a difficulty so unexpected. But however a man may be embarrassed by such difficulties, a woman can not be so baffled. Gertrude felt, she knew not why, that she wished none to hear her parting words to her beloved brother. Indeed she was annoyed, as well as he, by the uninterrupted presence of third persons ; and, had he given her a chance to find him alone, she would have soon afforded him the opportunity he sought. But by continually seeking her presence he defeated her wish.

The hour of retirement approached. The mother was gathering up her work, and the young lady was putting away hers, when he flung out of the room in despair. Instantly she ran after him, reproachfully, yet kindly, asking if he meant to leave her without bidding farewell.

"By no means," said he in a deep low tone. How could I think of doing so when this farewell is to be the last."

"Good Heaven ! What do you mean ? Where do you think of going ?"

"No where. But we part as brother and sister. We meet so no more."

"O my brother !" exclaimed the warm-hearted girl, throwing her arms about his neck, "how can you say that. You do not mean to cast me from your heart, and how can you think I can forget my dear kind brother to whom I owe so much ?"*

Her cheek rested on his shoulder ; her face was upturned to his ; his left arm, on which she leaned, encircled her waist. He gazed tenderly on her mild speaking face, and, gently removing the long ringlet that hung upon her cheek, he said with deep and earnest emphasis ; "Gertrude, dear Gertrude ! You must not deceive yourself. You know I am not your brother. The time is now at hand, when you must forget me, or love me more, MUCH MORE, than ever brother was loved. God bless you," he added, straining her to his breast, and pressing on her lips the first fervid kiss of undisguised passion.

"Ask me not what the maiden feels." None but a lady can answer the question, and none capable of doing so, would so far betray her sex, and lay open the workings of the female heart. She stood a moment, and then, for the first time, eager to let it be seen that her interview with Henry had only been long enough for a brief farewell, she hurried back into her mother's presence, past hastily through the room, ran to her chamber, and throwing herself on the bed, buried her face in her hands. Whether she slept that night, and, if so, what were her dreams, can never be known. But all the next day there was an unsettled look about her ; and her eye seemed to swim in an atmosphere of light ; and her lips still burned ; and a disproportioned brightness glowed on the cheek that had rested on her lover's shoulder. By degrees these traces passed away ; her countenance became calm ; the flush of her cheek diffused itself in the general hue of rosy health ; her step was that of one who treads on air ; and her eye, serene and tranquil, looked out on all around as if dwelling on the soft beauties of a summer's eve. Then, as the day of her departure approached, there came another change. She was paler, and somewhat sad ; and occasionally a sigh struggled to the air ; and a glittering drop hung on her eye-lid, and fell, leaving no trace. Such tears cool the eye that sheds them. It is only the scalding flood of fierce and sinful passion, that leaves the marks of its progress, which, like a stream of lava, parches and burns and leaves all desolate.

* This happened before the bride of Abydos was written. Lord Byron copied Nature, as Nature has always shown herself since Step-Mothers had existence.

GROUPED THOUGHTS AND SCATTERED FANCIES.

A COLLECTION OF SONNETS.

By the Author of "Atalantis," "Southern Passages and Pictures;" &c.

XXI.

These are God's blessed ministers, methinks,
 These winds that whisper to the heart subdued,
 So winningly, that still the sad ear drinks
 Their messages of mercy, and the mood
 Grows chaste and unresentful—while the blight
 Passes from off the spirit that, but late,
 Gloom'd with the gloomy progress of the night,
 And spoke defiance to the will of fate.—
 Comforts they bring with the submissive thought
 That teaches, sorrow still is the best friend,
 And moves to bless the chastener, that has brought
 The heart to tremble and the knees to bend,—
 Counselling that better hope, that born of fears,
 Is nursed in trembling and baptised in tears.

XXII.

Not blind to mine own weakness, which lacks power
 To save, though things, the dearest to mine eye,
 Sink, needing help, and vainly to me cry,—
 I cry to thee, O! God! in this dark hour!
 Spare me in mercy!—let thy chastening blows
 Fall lightly!—Thou hast taken from my heart
 The friends of youth;—these eyes have seen depart
 All my hope's dear ones, and the herd of woes
 Have wolved on my affections, till I stand
 Almost alone i' the forest! To my years
 Be merciful,—and to my feeble prayers,
 Accord the little breath of one whose sand
 Of life is just begun! Spare me this child,
 For the dear mother spare,—Eternal sire! be mild.

XXIII.

I reverence these old masters—men who sung
 Or painted, not for love of praise or fame;
 Who heeded not the popular eye or tongue,
 And craved no present honors for their name:
 Who toil'd because they sorrow'd! In their hearts
 The secret of their inspiration lay;—
 When these were by the oppressor's minions wrung,
 The terrible pang to utterance forced its way.
 And hence it is, their passionate song imparts,
 To him who listens, a like sensible wo,
 That moves him much to turn aside and pray
 As if his personal grief had present claim;—
 Thus Danté found his muse,—the pride and shame
 Of Florence;—Milton thus, and Michael Angelo!

XXIV.

Here, on this bank of bruised violets,
 That the crush'd odor comes from, lay thee
 down,
 And listen to the silence, and leaves blown,
 Until thy overtask'd, sad heart forgets
 The sleepless struggle of yon busy town!
 There, every passion sickens ere 'tis spent,
 Here, others follow ere the first are done,
 Each, like its fellow, meetly innocent,
 Soul sweetening, and most easy to be won!
 And woman!—thou shalt see her as at first,
 When, on a bank like this, in Eden sleeping,
 On sight of its lone habitant she burst,
 Suddenly bright, as heavenly rainbow leaping,
 From the retiring cloud where it was nurst.

XXV.

Moonlight is down among the shadowy hills,
 And bright o'er placid waters: let us go:—
 I would not seek my couch while such a show
 Of beauty all the blue empyrean fills.
 Give open brow to joy—throw wide the vest
 To the fair angel that would make us blest;
 Welcome the vision, fresh and beautiful,
 And shame to snatch it with a spirit dull!
 Look, where the shadows of the houses cast,
 Grow sick with the gay loveliness of night;
 And as her living beams flock, hurrying past,
 How shrink they, as if shuddering at the bright—
 Let us away, dear heart, 'tis beauty's hour,
 And we must share her smiles, and smiling seize her flower.

XXVI.

This fancy vision gladdens us no more,
 As in our days of boyhood;—it is gone,
 The glory which in fancy's eye it wore,
 The crown of spiritual semblance it put on,—
 The lustre and the holy tenderness,—
 Appealing, as it were, to glimmering ties,
 Of some past being, that we love not less,
 Because beyond our memory's reach it lies.
 And yet, even now, these mellow smiles of light,—
 That sad and sinking star—these silent woods, Sprinkled with gleams, that, as we gaze, take flight—
 Wake strange, sad thoughts, and still superior moods,
 And in the eyes that once they filled with joy,
 Tears gather,—and the man is twice the boy!

XXVII.

This tempest sweeps the Atlantic!—Hevasiak
 Is howling to the Capes! Grim Hatteras cries,
 Like thousand-damned ghosts, that on the brink
 Lift their dark hands and threat the threatening skies;
 Surging through foam and tempest, old Romia.

Hangs o'er the gulf, and with his cavernous throat,
Pours out the torrent of his wolfish note,
And bids the billows bear it where they can !
Deep calleth unto deep, and from the cloud,
Launches the bolt, that bursting o'er the sea,
Rends for a moment the thick pitchy shroud,
And shows the ship the shore beneath her lea :—
Start not, dear wife, no dangers here betide,—
And see, the boy, still sleeping at your side !

XXVIII.

Sweetness and gamesome images surround
Thy rest, young pilgrim ! Pleasant breezes come,
And bear the odors of the blossoming ground,
And wave their wings above thy forehead's bloom :
And O ! that life may glide away with thee
In infantile enjoyment !—while I pray
Above thy baby couch, that thou may'st be Guarded by angels, innocent as they,
I would deny them the vain hopes that crowd
The child-heart's being ! Thou should'st never dream
Those great, gay visions that make boyhood proud ;
Nor should deceitful fancy lend one gleam,
To lead thee blindly through those perilous years,
Which the extravagant hope still throngs with cares !

XXIX.

There is a pale and solitary star,
That, with a sudden but a sweet surprise,
Nightly, with little heed of bolt or bar,
Peeps in upon my couch and opens mine eyes.
The office of so pure a visitor,
Must be for healing. Lovely was the thought,
That, in the dreams of old astrologer,
Such influence, with the fate of mortal, wrought !
Nor, though this presence robs me of my rest,
And makes me sad with lifeless memories,
Shall it be curtain'd from my weary eyes :
As my twin-angel, blessing still and bless'd,
I welcome it, and still lament the night,
When storm or cloud obscures it from my sight.

XXX.

These times deserve no song—they but deride
The poet's holy craft,—nor his alone ;
Methinks as little courtesy is shown
To what was chivalry in days of pride :
Honor but meets with mock : the worldling shakes
His money-bags, and cries—"my strength is here ;
O'erthrows my enemy, his empire takes
And makes the ally serve, the alien fear !"
Is love the object ? Cash is conqueror,—
Wins hearts as soon as empires—puts his foot
Upon the best affections, and will spur
His way to eloquence, when Faith stands mute ;
And for Religion,—can we hope for her,
When love and valor serve the same poor brute !

XXXI.

Another yet, and still another height,
And still the last most wearisome ; but hark !
Comes not, like bless'd starlight through the dark,
Smiling with soft but most effectual light,
The confident look of hope, that cheers us still—
Mocks at the toilsome waste of wood and hill,
And with most sweet assurance of a joy,
That waits and beckons at the cottage door.
Takes off the oppressive toil, the day's annoy,
And teaches that the task will soon be o'er,— Forgot in arms we love ;—then, if we tell
Of the day's journey, wearisome and sad,
Twill be, in thanks and blessings, that so well
It ended,—in a night so bright and glad.

ALPINE SCENES.

PASS OF THE COL DE BALME, CHAMOUNI, MONT BLANC.

BY J. TYLER HEADLEY.

At Martigny we took mules for Chamouni. The same road leads for a while towards St. Bernard and Chamouni, when a mule path strikes off to the right up the Forclar, towards the latter place. As we slowly wound up the steep ascent, I often turned back to look on the valley of the Rhone, that stretched on, far as the eye could reach, presenting one of the most picturesque views in all Switzerland. Here, I first had occasion to test the world-renowned qualities of the mule on the difficult Alpine passes ; and instead of the one I rode being so very trust-worthy, he came very near recommending his sure-footedness to all future travellers, by breaking my neck as I was passing along the brink of a precipice. I thought he went unnecessarily near the edge, but concluding he knew his own business best, I let him take his own course—suddenly his hinder foot slipped over—he fell back—struggled to recover his balance, while a cry of alarm burst from my companions behind—rallied again—secured his footing, and passed as demurely and quietly on as if nothing in the world had happened to disturb his equanimity. For a few moments, it was a question of considerable doubt whether I was to have a roll with my mule some hundred feet into the torrent below, with the fair prospect of a broken neck and a mangled carcass—or to cross the Forclar. I learned one lesson by it however, never to surrender my own judgment again, not even to a mule.

We at length descended to Trient, a very small hamlet—composed simply of a few sheds—where we refreshed ourselves in truly primitive fashion.

Calling our guide, I told him I must cross the Col de Balme. He replied it was impossible; "no one," said he, "has crossed it this year, except the hunter and mountaineer. The path by which those who make the passage always go, is now utterly impassable. The recent snow and rains have so affected it, that not even a Chamois hunter could follow it, and I can not attempt it." This was a damper, for I had thought more of making this pass than any other in the Alps. All the guides and hangers-on at Martigny had told me the same thing, but I considered it mere talk. But the earnestness of the fellow, backed as it was by the inhabitants of the valley, who said no one, not even the mountaineers had crossed it for a long time, somewhat staggered me. I did not wish to be reckless and foolhardy, but I had fully made up my mind to cross the Col de Balme, and so, coolly replied, "well, if you can't accompany me, I shall go alone." The fellow stared at me, as if I were out of my senses. To have an ignorant traveller say he would go alone, where an experienced guide dare not go himself, was a piece of impertinence he had never before witnessed. Just then, turning to my guide book, I saw that a young German had perished on the same hill by disobeying his guide. This was any thing but encouraging—but the same book stated that from the top was one of the finest views "in the whole world." This restored the balance again. I then went to one of the inhabitants of the hamlet and inquired if there was no one among the peasantry, who would undertake to pilot me over the Col de Balme. He said he would see. Money will fetch any amount of daring from a Swiss, and one soon offered himself. He said that the ordinary pass could not be made by any one, but the summit might be reached by a gorge, now half filled, from top to bottom, with the wrecks of avalanches. Said he "it will be a difficult task, but we can try, and if we fail, we can return." Oh how I like that word try. I returned to my friends, who had from the first been averse to the undertaking, and told them I was going to attempt the pass—that I was convinced it would be one of exhausting effort, and perhaps of peril—that I would not advise them to accompany me, for if any accident should happen I did not wish to take the responsibility. The guide, I added, said it could not be made; while the peasant I had engaged, spoke of it as a matter of doubt. I then went to our guide, and ordered him to take the mules around by the Tête Noire, and wait for me at Argentières. He looked at me a moment, and replied with an ominous shake of the head "Je Vous conseille de ne pas aller. Je vous conseille de ne pas aller." "I advise you not to go. I advise you not to go." I replied, I must, and turned away. My friends finally concluded to accompany me, and furnishing ourselves with long poles, we started off. A hot July sun was burning down in the valley, and following the example of our guide, I stripped off my coat, and unbuttoned my vest to ease myself for the tramp. With a flask of brandy in one pocket and a bottle of wine in the other, our square built, swarthy guide tramped on. Immediately on leaving the valley we entered upon a bed of snow, formed by avalanches, that had accumulated there during the long winter months. This field of snow, stretched on, and up, like the roof of a house, as far as the eye could reach. Walking, I saw was out of the question, and it had got to be climbing, hour after hour. We had hardly commenced, before my two six-feet-high companions gave out, and were compelled to cling each to an arm of the guide. I, on the contrary, though possessing but half their muscular strength, became exhilarated, the higher I mounted. The rare, cold atmosphere acted like a stimulant on my diseased nerves. As long as I was in sight, the guide was continually hallooing to me, to keep more in the centre of the ravine, so that I could run either one side or the other, should an avalanche descend. Pressing on, I at length lost sight of him altogether, and could only now and then catch the sound of his faint halloo far, far below me. I was alone in the Alps. The beetling cliffs and lofty snow-peaks rose in awful solitude over me, while not a sound broke the stillness, save now and then the rattling of falling stones and earth, on the sides of the mountain, threatening the descent of a heavier mass. I was a mere speck upon the broad field of snow, and my overtaken powers began at length to fail. But thinking I was near the top, I rallied and pressed on; when lo, instead of having attained the summit, I found that what I had hitherto surmounted was mere child's play to the task before me. I had hitherto been treading on the hard debris of avalanches; but now arose, right before me, a pure, white snow peak—above the region of falling avalanches, nay, itself the father of them. Not a track was visible on the white surface, and the fearful drifts reposed in ominous silence along its cold bosom. At the base of this almost perpendicular ascent, I paused in doubt. I was at a loss on which side to attack it; indeed, I did not feel like attacking it at all, and confess that my spirits for the first time drooped. I sat down in the snow, now glittering in the light of the declining sun, and awaited the approach of my guide. At length I caught his dark figure against the white background below; and shouting out, motioned to know whether I should go to the right or left. He telegraphed to the right, and I pushed on. Backward and forwards I walked on the sides of my feet—leaning against the breast of the hill and sinking every step mid-leg deep in the soft fresh snow. This was too much; I toiled on, till I could feel my heart thump like a hammer against my breast, and panting and exhausted, I laid my hot cheek on the cold snow in perfect despair. The chill that followed, drove me up, and on, till finally my eye caught, on the distant snow-plain, a black speck, which gradually grew into a house of refuge, now desolate and filled with drifts. The summit was reached, and the unobstructed breeze, that blowed along the heavens, from the sea of Alpine peaks, fell upon me. Mont Blanc towered on my vision, and the "Vale of Chamouni" lay smiling at its feet. The Aiguilles of La Tour, L' Argentiere Verte de Deu Charmor, and many others, stood like guardsmen, on each side of Mont Blanc, divided from it and each other, by vast glaciers that went streaming into the valley, clothing the steep mountains with ice, in their passage. Mont Blanc had been the dream of my boyhood, and now I gazed upon it "rising from its sea of pines" over the sweet vale of Chamouni. Those sharp Aiguilles (needles) were spearing the sky in every direction, while the enormous glaciers were rolled into confusion at their feet. It was an indescribable sight;—those splintered pinnacles—those mighty glaciers—the awful form of Mont Blanc rearing haughtily over all—and the sweet valley that slept in the sunshine below, all combined to overwhelm the soul with awe and wonder and delight. I gazed and gazed, till at length a rain-cloud, drifting on its high path, caught against the top of Mont Blanc and enveloped it in mist.

Plucking some flowers that had pushed themselves up through the snow, we began our descent. But as I went leaping down the hill, I suddenly found myself hanging by the arms on the snow crust, while my feet were swept by a torrent, of whose existence I was first made conscious by this unexpected plunge. The bed of snow above it had effectually smothered its voice and concealed its passage, until I thus unceremoniously introduced it to the upper world. The meek, crest-fallen manner with which I withdrew my nether limbs and slowly dragged myself away from that unpleasant neighborhood along the thin upper crust, caused a shout of laughter from my friends, till old Col de Balme rung again. Giving them a few peltings with snow-balls, to repay their impertinence, I rallied my spirits, and again commencing my rapid descent, soon left them far behind. Pausing on a cliff to look on the scene that changed at every step, my ear caught a rumbling, crackling sound, that proceeded from a distant glacier. My eye roamed over the immense ice-field, till it caught a column of mist, slowly rising into the air. The next moment, a precipice of ice rolled over, and breaking into a thousand fragments as it fell, poured itself into the valley. Its voice of thunder rose and swelled on the air, then died away in sullen echoes among the hills. The mass from which it broke showed clear and blue on the face of the mountain. It was the first avalanche I had seen, or heard; and its sullen thunder, amid those vast solitudes, was indescribably awful and solemn.

Reaching the valley, we passed on to Argentiere, where our mules were waiting for us, and mounting them trotted off for Chamouni. I had abandoned the hope of seeing a clear sunset on Mont Blanc, from the moment I saw the rain cloud wrap it from the top of Col de Balme. But I could not keep my eye from its majestic form, and while I was looking on the veil that covered its head, the mist began slowly to part, and dissolve away, till the entire mountain stood clear and distinct like a model in the sky. Its smooth round top looked more like a spiritual, than a material creation, in the rare atmosphere of that far up region. I clapped my hands in delight, but a far more glorious scene awaited me. The sun had long since left the valley and mountains around, but Mont Blanc still looked down on him, as he sank over the western world, and while I was looking, a light rose color began to spread over this king of hills, till the snow assumed a transparency like the cheek of beauty. All his guardsmen put on the same bright coloring, that deepened every moment, till the vast mountain stood, a pyramid of pink, against a cloudless heaven. Soft, and mild, and spiritually beautiful, it seemed ready to dissolve in the warm embrace of the sunlight. Unlike any thing I had ever seen or dreamed of, it held me as by a wizard spell. Slowly the bright coloring faded away, shifting as it disappeared, leaving the snow valleys between the vast swells of the mountain, first in shadow, then retiring towards the summit, on which the sun lingered a moment as if for a last interview, when all was again white and cold as before. Weary and exhausted, we at length reached Chamouni. Selecting a room in the inn that looked full on Mont Blanc, so that I could sleep in his presence, I sought the warm fire and began to think, as I watched the steaming tea-kettle, of something more substantial than pink colors and poetic visions. While tea was preparing, I looked over the register of names, and the odd and grave comments scattered through the pages. Here was a bitter pasquinade against Chamouni and its everlasting rains—here a touching allusion to the death of travellers, who had fallen over a snow-covered precipice, and their dead bodies brought back to the inn, they had left in the morning full of hope. There was also poetry in abundance, among which the following description of the ascent of Mont Blanc amused me much.

"They talk of Helvellyn, Ben Lomond:—all stuff!
Mont Blanc is the daisy for me sure enough,
For next to the Reck, in the county Mayo,
It bates all the mountains or hills that I know.
Who'd see Mont Blanc fairly, must make the ascent,
Although owld — to look up was content.
I can tell owld T—— that as I mounted higher,
For one aigle he saw, I found three Lammergeyer.
I was up on the top, where, (I tell you no lie,)

I could count every rafter that holds up the sky.
 I wish to tell truth, and no more, tho' no less,
 And its terrible height, to correctly express :
 I should say, if I had but a common balloon,
 I could get in one hour, with all aise to the moon.
 If ever you wish on that trip to set out,
 You should start from the top of Mont Blanc without doubt :
 You'd find the way sure, and the chapest to boot,
 Since you'd make such a dale of the journey on foot ;
 Yet with one good or two middling spy glasses
 You could see from Mont Blanc every action that passes.
 I persaved the last quarter quite plain through a fog
 Growing out of the first, like a great moving bog :
 In a country so subject to change I'll be bail
 Some hints could be got of a fair sliding scale ;
 That Peel then should go to inquire I advise,
 For I heartily wish him a flight to the skies.
 But again to my subject, I say, and repeate it,
 Mont Blanc bates all things that were ever created :
 As I was determined new wonders to seek,
 I wint by a route that was somewhat unique,
 By the great sea of ice, where I saw the big hole,
 Where captain Ross wintered, not far from the pole :
 The Tropic of Cancer, first lay on one side,
 Like a terrible crevice, some forty feet wide :
 Farther on, I saw Greenland, as green as ould Dan,
 But 'Jardin' the guides called it, all to a man.
 I didn't dispute, so we kept under weigh,
 Till we came to the ind of the great icy say.
 We saw the great mules 'that congealed in a pop,'
 When Saussure and Balmat would ride to the top ;
 Now nothing remains but the petrified bones,
 Which mostly resemble a pair of big stones.
 I brought my barometer made by one Kayting,
 For fear the weather would want regulat'g,
 But the weight of the air at the top so increased
 That the Mercury sunk fourteen inches at laste.
Thin the could was so hot—tho' we didn't perspire—
 That we made water boil without any fire.
 We fired off a gun, but the sound was so small,
 That we doubted if truly it sounded at all,
 Which smallness was caused, (as I tould my friend Harrison.)

Alone by the size of Mont Blanc, in comparison :
 But to describe all the sights would require
 Not powers like mine, but genius far higher.
 Not Byron in verse, nor Scott in his prose,
 Could give the laste notion of Blanc and his snows ;
 Indeed none should try it but one of the 'Lakers,'
 Who, if not great wits, are yet great undertakers ;
 And then, of all these, none could do it so well,
 As the wonderful author of great Peter Bell ;
 For he, to the summit could easily float
 Without walking a step—'in his good little boat.'
 Next to him, the great Spouthey, whose magical power
 Paints the fight of the cat in the awful mice tower,
 Whose description in words of sublimity set,
 Says 'the summer and autumn had been so wet.'

"Tis spirits like these who are fit to attempt
 The labor, from which such as I are exempt."

Pat. McSweeney.

After tea, I leaned out of the window, and listened to the turbid Arneron, just borne from the glacier above, brawling through the valley, and gazed on Mont Blanc, still uncovered, and wearing on his head a coronet of stars. The heavens seemed to rest on it. I was completely walled in by peaks piercing the heavens in every direction, yet Mont Blanc stood unrivalled in their midst.

"Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains,
 They crowned him long ago,
 On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,
 With a diadem of snow."

I retired to my bed, but the toils of the day had been too much for me. The excitement of the magnificent scenery amid which I had stood and moved during the day, made me unconscious of effort, but now it having subsided away, the very life of life seemed taken from me. Feverish and hot, with my brain throbbing like an overwrought pulse, I courted in vain quiet repose. Precipices of ice rose in my dreams, along whose slippery sides I was passing—inaccessible peaks mocked my efforts to scale them, or gloomy gulfs opened in my path. Wakened by a fancied fall, I rose, and threw open the window. There stood Mont Blanc, white as a spirit's robe, with the moon hanging her crescent over his silver top, and not a cloud in sight. While I stood and listened, a dull, heavy sound, like the booming of distant cannon, rose on the night air. An avalanche had fallen far up amid its awful solitudes. Nothing can fill the soul with such strange mysterious feelings as the sound of avalanches, falling at midnight, and alone amid the Alps. They seem half conscious beings, meeting their destiny when the world is asleep, and fulfilling a mission, known only to themselves and their Creator. I turned to my pillow again, and was awakened at early twilight by a strain I had often dreamed of, but never heard. At first, I could hardly believe I was awake, but the strain rang on, till it flashed on me I was in the Alps, and that was the Alpine horn waking the echoes of early morn with its melody. How it rang in the clear morning air through that deep valley. I rose and looked out of my window, and close beneath me, a shepherd was driving his goats to their mountain pastures, and all was quiet as a Sabbath morning. Mont Blanc had robbed his forehead in mist, and days, perhaps weeks, would pass, before he would stand uncovered again. Breakfast was soon despatched, and all was bustle and preparation for the ascent of Montaubert to the "Mer de Glace."

THE FUNERAL OF TIME.

BY HENRY B. HIRST.

Author of "Endymion," "The Burial of Eros," "Isabelle," &c.

Lo! through a shadowy valley,
 March, with measured step and tread,
 A long array of Phantoms wan
 And pallid as the dead—
 The white and waxen dead!—
 With a crown on every head
 And a torch in every hand,
 To fright the sheeted ghosts away,
 That guard its portals night and day,
 They seek the Shadow-Land.

On as the pale procession stalks,
 The clouds around divide,
 Raising themselves in giant shapes
 And gazing down in pride,
 On the spectres as they glide
 Through the valley long and wide—
 On the spectres all so pale,
 In vestments whiter than the snow,
 As through the dim defile they go,
 With melancholy wail.

On tramps the funeral file; and now
 The weeping ones have passed,
 A throng succeeding, loftier
 And statelier than the last—
 The Monarchs of the Past!
 And upon the solemn blast
 Wave their plumes and pennons high,
 And loud their mournful marches sweep
 Up from the valley dark and deep
 To the over-arching sky.

And now the Cycle-buried years
 Stride on in stern array;
 Before each band the Centuries
 With beards of silver grey—
 The Marshals of the Day!
 In silence pass away;
 And behind them come the Hours
 And Minutes, who, as on they go,
 Are swinging steadily to and fro
 The incense round in showers.

Behold the bier—the ebony bier!
 On sinewy shoulders borne
 Of many a dim, forgotten Year
 From Primal Times forlorn.
 All weary and all worn,
 With their ancient garments torn
 And their beards as white as Lear's,
 Lo! how they tremble as they tread,
 Mourning above the marble dead,
 In agonies of tears.

How very wan the old man looks!
 As wasted and as pale
 As some dim ghost of shadowy days
 In legendary tale.

God give the sleeper, hail!
 And the world hath much to wail
 That his ears no more may hear;
 For, with his palms across his breast,
 He lieth in eternal rest
 Along his stately bier.

How thin his hair! How white his beard!
 How ashen-like his hands,
 Which never more may turn the glass
 That on his bosom stands—
 The glass whose solemn sands
 Were won from Stygian strands;—
 For his weary work is done,
 And he has reaped his latest field
 And none that scythe of his can wield
 'Neath the dim, descending sun.

At last they reach the Shadow-Land,
 And, with an eildritch cry,
 The guardian ghosts sweep wailing by Athwart the troubled sky,
 Like meteors flashing by,
 As asunder crashing fly,
 With a wild and clangorous din,
 The gates before the funeral train,
 Filing along the dreary plain
 And marching slowly in.

* * * *

Lo! 'tis a temple! and around
 Tall ebony columns rise
 Up from the withering earth, and hear
 Aloft the shrivelling skies,
 Where the tempest trembling sighs,
 And the ghostly moonlight dies
 'Neath a lurid comet's glare,
 That over the Mourners' plumed heads
 And on the Dead a lustre sheds
 From its crimson floating hair!

The rites are read—the requiem sung;
 And, as the echoes die,
 The Shadow CHAOS rises
 With a wild—a weird-like cry,
 A giant to the sky!
 His arms out-stretched on high
 Over TIME that dead doth lie;
 And with a voice that shakes the spheres,
 He shouts to the mourners mad with fears,
 "Depart! Lo! here am I!"

Down, showering fire, the comet sweeps;
 Shivering the pillars fall;
 And, lightning-like, the red flames rush,
 A whirlwind! over all!
 And Silence spreads her pall—
 Like pinions over the hall—
 Over the temple over-thrown—
 Over the dying and the unburied dead—
 And, with a heavily-drooping head,
 Sits statue-like—alone!

The works which head this page; are by no means remarkable in themselves, either for excellence of composition, or intrinsic value; but owe their importance, solely and exclusively, to the fact, of their forming the basis and foundation of the Mormon Faith—constituting the starting point of the Mormon people; of whom much has been spoken and written, and but little known, and even that little, so discolored and distorted by prejudice and falsehood, as to be almost valueless for purposes of real information.

The object of the present article is briefly to trace the leading and fundamental articles of their creed; with a glance at their present condition and prospects. This we are the better enabled to do from having personally visited, during the summer of 1843, the City of Nauvoo, the headquarters of the faithful; in which are congregated 17,000 Mormons. While there, we had frequent conferences with the Elders of the Faith, conversed with the redoubtable "Prophet" himself; and procured all the information, relative to the faith and people, accessible to a stranger.

Having possessed these facilities, we would fain impart the information thus acquired, relative to this new and strange faith, which bids fair, at no very distant day, to constitute an important element in the population of the Mississippi Valley; and which, from its rise, increase, and steady growth, may well claim the attention of all thinking men; since religious fanaticism, in all times and all ages, has ever been found a most powerful lever to uproot and destroy existing Institutions; and no sect can be deemed contemptible, or powerless for mischief, the members of which are thoroughly in earnest, and cursed with a proselyting spirit, which "will compass sea and land to make one proselyte;" who, when convinced, surrenders himself heart and soul to the guidance of a scheming, unprincipled, and ambitious leader, whose whole life hitherto, has been an acted lie, and whose malignity is only equalled by his power.

For the Mormon people are not, as is generally supposed, a small and scattered band of ignorant and squalid fanatics, destitute of all worldly wisdom, or common sense,—victims of an artful delusion, blindly staggering on to ruin in the steps of the arch hypocrite, who, by his pretended Revelations from Heaven, has duped and plundered them. On the contrary, they are an eminently practical and industrious people; sober, orderly, and discreet, as far as temporal matters are concerned; but in Religion, bigotted and fanatical to the last degree; yet, so far from rejecting or despising the test of argument, willing and ready, at all times, to enter into Theological controversies with strangers, in which their wonderful familiarity with the Bible, (the Prophecies especially,) is very apt to give them a decided advantage; be their adversary either Laic, or Polemic.

We were informed by the Captains of the Steamboats on the upper Mississippi, that their boats were actually haunted by these itinerant Mormons, roving "like roaring lions" seeking whom they might entrap into a religious controversy; and often is the incautious traveller amazed to find, in the shrewd and sensible individual with whom he has been agreeably conversing, a member of the church of "Latter-day-Saints," (as they somewhat vaingloriously term themselves,) ready to maintain, even to the death, the "Revelations" of the "Prophet," Joseph Smith, and firmly persuaded that he and his church are alone of the "Elect."

Nor is this an entirely new and distinct Religion, which has sprung up in the wilds of the Far-West, to supersede the doctrines of Christianity; for it is based upon the Prophecies in the Old and New Testaments, and its professors claim to be the only genuine Christians. The "Book of Mormon," whence they derive the name by which they are commonly known, and which is generally supposed to be their Bible, is in fact intended merely as a supplement to the Bible, which they make their rule of faith, and chiefly contains a pretended history of the Aborigines of this country, to which we shall presently refer in its proper place. For the present, as it is both curious and instructive at all times, to trace out the growth of a delusion in the human mind from its first imperfect glimmering to its final blaze, we would briefly sketch the origin and growth of this idea in the mind of its founder, finally developing itself in the form of a new Religion; tracing his steps, from his first hesitating hints of possessing some secret sources of information, not shared by others, to his daring and arrogant assumption of inspiration and prophetic powers; by which some clue may be afforded to the strange self-abandonment, and wild credulity, which can induce his followers, many of whom are men far his superiors in intellect and knowledge, to prostrate themselves in lowly reverence at the feet of this ignorant and blasphemous impostor.

* This article was written some months previous to the late disturbances which resulted in the death of the Prophet.

If we needed another confirmation of the Poet's words,

"How strangely subject is the human mind, Godlike, and gifted as it is,—to err!"

we might find it here; for though on the page of history we may read of the strange absurdities and barbarous crimes men could commit in Religion's name; although the blood-stained catalogue of the enormities perpetrated under the mask of faith, is enrolled on the chronicle of the past; and although, turning even to our own early history, the sad spectacle is presented us of the Puritan Fathers flying from persecution, and braving danger and death for freedom of conscience; yet, in their turn, becoming bitter persecutors, and driving forth with stripes and scorn, the harmless Quakers and Anabaptists; yet still, we fondly hoped, that fanaticism had been expelled from our land by the light of enlarged intelligence and general education; that the people had grown too wise, to be made the slaves of their own religious fears, and that religious freedom might flourish here. Sadly have these high hopes been disappointed; for few countries have been more rent and divided by Religious factions; whose war has hitherto been carried on by words. But a new element is now arising in our Western valley; a new creed, whose fanatic followers are ready, had they the power, to proselytise like the Mohammedans, at the point of the sword, and number already, by their own account, 200,000 in the United States, and with untiring zeal extending the numbers of the faithful.

The prevalence of religious delusions in the U. States, is a subject of curious inquiry; not that they prevail to a greater extent among us than among the people of other nations, but because, from our peculiar institutions, and the general diffusion of intelligence, it would be supposed more difficult to find dupes to delude; yet, in a country professing of all others to be the most free, no sooner have the fetters been stricken from the limbs of the people, than artful and designing fanatics attempt to forge them for their minds; and Faith, that pure Spirit, whose seat should be "fast by the throne of God," breathing to erring man of mercy and peace, is by their hellish arts converted into a grim Demon of terror and pain; enslaving the souls of those whose bodies are vainly free; for the true seat of freedom is in the soul, and he whose will is subject to the commands of another through superstitious fear, is the most abject of slaves.

Strange that Religion, the very essence of which is love, should be so often based on fear, lowest and meanest of the springs of action; base in itself, and baser in its promptings—that the hope of immortality, elevating man to a place in the scale of being, but "little lower than the Angels," should be made "the hangman's whip to scourge us!" Yet with the Apostles of all the new creeds, in which, unhappily our country is so prolific, fear is the motive principle; freedom of thought, is reprobated as "want of faith;" and the unhappy convert, whose heated imagination has caught at the absurdities, so zealously preached to him, and is ready, in his blind zeal, to follow the new light whithersoever it may lead, is stripped of all free will, and hurried on so far by the contagious enthusiasm of his fellow victims, that his pride forbids him to recede after his eyes are opened to his folly, and the earnest fanatic is converted into a cold and callous hypocrite, anxious to cover his own shame, by deluding others into sharing it with him.

The rapidity with which impostors gain converts in this country is indeed remarkable; witness Matthias, Swedenborg, Miller, Joe Smith, and innumerable others; with but one exception, coarse, illiterate and vulgar impostors, whose ignorance is only equalled by their villainy. And yet, the American people have the reputation of being a very sensible people; hard, shrewd, unimaginative; little prone to enthusiasm, and perpetually inquiring into the "reason" of every thing. Such is their admitted character. These contradictions are difficult to reconcile; so much hard common sense, and so much wild credulity. A partial explanation may be found in the reaction that ever takes place in the human mind, from not thinking at all, to thinking too much; the excitement and feverish activity of intellect, induced by free institutions and the diffusion of knowledge, before the stormy elements, so violently agitated, have had sufficient time to settle down and form their proper combinations. Such was the case in France, when the ecclesiastical and civil fetters, which had galled the people so long, were suddenly stricken off, and they grew drunk with freedom, rushing headlong into the wildest infidelity and most lawless license. Then, as ever, the violence of the rebound was proportioned to the weight of the pressure, which so long had bowed down and crushed the people.

Our revolution, though it was different in kind, was yet similar in character; it was built up on the "wreck of old opinions;" it was an impatient shaking off of exploded formulas, the substance of which had long worn out; but whose forms still remained; and the same chainless and terrible energies of awakened mind, which wrapt France in the flames of a revolution, a Saturnalia of crime ushering in the dawn of a brighter day, are here employed in working out the grand moral problems of man's mission and destiny on earth, and his existence in a future state,—once, the vexed questions of a few speculative and daring minds, but now entering into the popular mind, and absorbing the attention of the masses of the people.

Such are the strong and earnest struggles after a satisfying doctrine, now convulsing the minds of our countrymen, and driving many of them into "false doctrine, heresy, and schism" against common reason and common sense; such is the storm, at present black with its angry and rolling clouds, through which the sun of truth will finally shine forth in triumphant splendor, to flash on the inquiring minds, now darkened with error, the conviction of these ever-abiding truths, that the ways of God's providence are, and ever will be, inscrutable to the finite creatures formed by his hand, and the servants of his will; and that "the upright heart and pure" is more earnestly to be sought after and valued, than any new and Titanic efforts to scale the heavens by ranting violence, or stormy piety.

Viewed in connection with this national tendency, the Mormon movement is one well worthy of notice; being an attempt to establish a new Theocracy, to substitute "Revelations" through inspired individuals, for fixed and settled rules of conduct; a daring effort to create an "imperium in imperio;" and to crush all individual will and freedom of thought, under a stupendous church machinery; a despotism extending not alone to the mind and body, but seeking to fetter even the soul; and all this the work of a poor, ignorant, obscure, and heartless hypocrite; devoid of social position, mental culture, or even that great world-lever, wealth—but possessed of a stubborn, dogged energy, an unflinching effrontery, and a profound knowledge of human nature in its weakest points. By these means, and these alone, he has reared up a church in the wilderness, who firmly believe in him, as an inspired "Prophet;" and as the fire spreads over the wintry prairie, so has their infectious zeal multiplied converts to their new doctrine, until the "Latter-day-Saints" number their tens of thousands, whose active emissaries never rest.

In the western and northern cities, their churches may be found; and scarce a nook or corner of our Union that has not been visited by their itinerant preachers. They have penetrated into Western Virginia; in the States further South they rarely venture; but from the "East," as they quaintly term the Northern States, are drawn many of their converts: "the old Puritan heaven" is often kneaded up into this new "bread of life;" and the mighty Valley of the Mississippi begins to feel their power and to fear their ultimate designs.

In Missouri especially, the jealousy and hatred of the people burst forth in actual and open violence. They thrust them forth, not without a shedding of blood, from their borders, and forbade them, by an order of extermination, from again setting foot on their soil; and this persecution has done more to strengthen the Mormon cause, than any good works of their own could have done; since, from time immemorial, the sympathies of the people have always been with those who suffer, and against those who persecute, verifying the words that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church."

The Mormons have themselves published an account of these persecutions, the title of which heads this article; from whence our information on this subject is chiefly derived, which, although probably exaggerated, is in its main facts, unhappily, not entirely devoid of truth, as we learned from the admissions made to us while in St. Louis by disinterested persons, who united in deploring the extremities to which the citizens of Missouri were carried by hatred of this people; stating, at the same time, that ample cause was given them for their conduct, by the actions of the Mormons; which the latter, however, sturdily deny.

The Missouri version of the matter is simply this, that the "Latter-day-Saints" have two creeds. One Exoteric, or public, which they profess to the world at large; the other, Esoteric, or private, known only to the initiated when they become members of the church, and that the latter is in fact the real religion and rule of conduct which they impose on themselves and are governed by in their intercourse with the rest of the world; and that this creed simply amounts to this, viz:

"That the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof—that the Saints are the rightful inheritors of the earth—that they are the Saints, therefore the earth with all it contains belongs to them, and is theirs of right."

And that acting upon these principles, the Mormons unscrupulously appropriated the goods and property of the neighboring Missourians, and perpetrated divers wrongs and enormities against them: which finally induced them, since mild measures had failed, to drive them out of the country, as a nuisance which had to be abated; all of which, the Mormons most solemnly deny; attributing the conduct of their enemies to a desire of appropriating their property and goods, which they certainly did do, without making (as far as we could learn) any reparation therefor.

For the present, however, we will pass by this controversy, and attempt briefly to sketch the early history of the "Prophet," Joseph Smith, as detailed in one of the works before us, written by a member of his church, which, as Goethe said of his own autobiography, is composed both of truth and fiction, the latter preponderating to a very considerable extent. The book, however, is well written, and in addition to the imaginative life of Joseph, contains a sketch of the Mormon creed, to which we shall presently call the attention of the reader. It is a very curious production altogether, considering it as written by an educated and well informed man in the 19th century, apparently in sober seriousness, being much better fitted for the meridian of the 13th or 14th century, when marvels and miracles were not uncommon, but matters of every day occurrence. The narrative is quite matter of fact in its tone and style, and would compare well with De Foe's "Robinson Crusoe," were it not for the exceedingly unromantic name of its hero; a name, which no skill could render euphonious, or remarkable.

The style and title of this veracious and peculiar little book, are as follows :

"An Interesting Account of Several Remarkable Visions, and the Late Discovery of Ancient American Records, which unfold the History of this Continent, from the earliest ages after the flood, to the beginning of the 5th century of the Christian era. With a Sketch of the Rise, Faith, and Doctrine of the Church of Jesus Christ of ' Latter-day-Saints.' By O. Pratt, Minister of the Gospel."

From this work (obtained in Nauvoo) is to be derived all the information, attainable to the uninformed, touching the history of "the Prophet" and his doctrine.

From it we learn, that

"Mr. Joseph Smith, Jr. who made the following important discovery, was born in the town of Sharon, Vermont, on the 23rd December, A. D., 1805. When ten years old, his parents with their family removed to Palmyra, New York, in the vicinity of which he resided for about eleven years. Cultivating the earth for a livelihood employed most of his time. His advantages for acquiring literary knowledge, were exceedingly small hence his education was limited to a slight acquaintance with two or three of the common branches of learning. He could read without much difficulty, and write a very imperfect hand; and had a very limited understanding of the ground rules of Arithmetic. These were his highest and only attainments."

It may be supposed, that he had subsequently applied himself, to remedy the defects of his early training, by diligent study and self-improvement, but such is not the case; any one conversing with him can easily perceive, that he is an illiterate, ignorant and vulgar man, rough in his exterior, and boorish and unpolished in manners and address; so that we can confirm the statement of the veracious Pratt.

The author then proceeds to say, that "When somewhere about 14 or 15 years of age, he began seriously to reflect on the necessity of being prepared for a future state of existence; but how, or in what way to prepare himself, was a question as yet undetermined in his own mind. He saw that if he understood not the way, it would be impossible to walk in it, except by chance, and the thought of resting his hopes of eternal life upon chance, or uncertainties, was more than he could endure."

These thoughts were exceedingly natural and probable, as occurring to the mind of an ignorant, uneducated plough-boy, 15 years old; but the prefatory remarks are merely intended as a foretaste of the wonders which immediately after he pours out with a prodigal hand. So he continues with the meditations of young Joseph, carried on probably while he was running a crooked furrow, or attending a "cider frolic," in which the Green Mountain boys especially delight.

"The great question to be decided in his mind," quoth Pratt, "was—if any of these denominations be the Church of Christ, which one is it? Until he could become satisfied in relation to this question, he could not rest contented. The only alternative that seemed to be left him was to read the Scriptures and endeavor to follow their directions."

Finding reading rather fatiguing, probably from want of sufficient exercise in that way, although he "could read without much difficulty," our young "Gallio" hit upon a shorter plan of solving his doubts, and here the respectable Pratt, who has hitherto been rather prosy, and snuffing through the nose, begins to display the imaginative vein, which entitles him to be considered a species of prose Milton, dealing in "Angels holding converse with mortals," etc., though the snuffle through the nose, is still at times perceptible; for Joseph

"Now saw that if he inquired of God, there was not only a possibility, but a probability; yea more, a certainty that he should obtain a knowledge which of all the doctrines was the doctrine of Christ, and which of all the Churches was the Church of Christ." "He therefore retired to a secret place in a grove, but a short distance from his father's house, and knelt down and began to call upon the Lord. At first he was severely tempted by the Powers of Darkness, which endeavored to overcome him; but he continued to seek for deliverance until darkness gave way from his mind, and he was enabled to pray in fervency of spirit and in faith. And while thus pouring out his soul, he at length saw a very bright and glorious light in the heavens above, which gradually drew near." "It continued descending slowly until it rested on the earth, and he was enveloped in the midst of it."

The effects of this light were somewhat peculiar upon Joseph's system, being somewhat similar to those produced by the inhalation of the Nitrous Oxide Gas, for Pratt, who seems intuitively to have known the feelings of Smith on that occasion, proceeds to say,

"When it first came upon him, it produced a peculiar sensation throughout his whole system; and immediately his mind was caught away from the natural objects with which he was surrounded, and he was enwrapped in a glorious vision, and saw two heavenly personages, who exactly resembled each other in their features or likeness. He was informed that his sins were forgiven. He was also informed that none of the existing churches was the true church; and that the fulness of the Gospel should at some future time be made known to him. After which the vision withdrew, leaving his mind in a state of calmness and peace indescribable."

We have quoted this bare-faced lying and miserable twaddle, merely as a specimen of the general tone and temper of the book, which abound in similar scenes. The impression would be purely one of unmitigated disgust, did not the reader reflect, that this wild raving was accepted as truth by numbers of intelligent and apparently rational beings; and we have ourselves heard Joseph's divine mission, and communications with celestial visitants, sustained with rare powers of argument and reasoning, in a squalid garret at Nauvoo, by analogies drawn from the New Testament, and the meek and lowly character of the Founder of the Christian faith.

The vision has not even the merit of originality, since it was evidently suggested, and in fact almost copied, from a scene in the life of poor Cowper, whose diseased imagination once suggested to him a similar phenomenon, with the exception of the heavenly shapes; but in his case, it was evidently the phantom of an excited and diseased imagination acting upon a nervous and shattered frame, the precursor of that madness, which afterwards prostrated his powerful intellect; but which this coarse impostor seeks to appropriate for his own purposes of deception.

But this was only the first act: the interest is much heightened in the second, where the scene opens with Joseph in bed, (another lame imitation of Samuel's vision,) thus detailed by the veracious and imaginative "Minister of the Gospel." And

"It pleased God on the evening of the 21st of September, 1823, again to hear his prayers. For he had retired to rest as usual, only that his mind was drawn out in fervent prayer, and his soul was filled with the most earnest desire 'to commune with some kind messenger who could communicate to him the desired information of his acceptance with God;' and also unfold the true doctrines of Christ, according to the promises which he had received in the former vision. On a sudden, a light like that of day, only of a purer and far more glorious appearance and brightness, burst into the room. Indeed the first sight was as though the house were filled with a consuming fire. This sudden appearance of a light so bright, as must naturally be expected, occasioned a shock or sensation visible to the extremities of the body. It was, however, followed by a calmness and serenity of mind and an overwhelming rapture of joy that surpassed understanding, and in a moment a personage stood before him." "The stature of this personage was a little above the common size of men in this age; his garment was perfectly white, and had the appearance of being without seam." "This glorious being declared himself to be an angel of God sent forth by commandment to communicate to him that his sins were forgiven, and that his prayers were heard; and also to bring the joyful tidings that the covenant which God made with ancient Israel concerning their posterity was at hand to be fulfilled; that the great preparatory work for the second coming of the Messiah was speedily to commence; that the time was at hand for the Gospel in its fulness to be preached to all nations, that a people might be prepared with faith and righteousness for the millennial reign of universal peace and joy.

"He was informed that he was called and chosen to be an instrument in the hands of God, to bring about some of his marvellous purposes in this glorious dispensation: It was also made manifest to him that the 'American Indians' were a remnant of Israel; that when they first emigrated to America they were an enlightened people, possessing a knowledge of the true God, enjoying his favor and peculiar blessings from his hands. That the Prophets and inspired writers among them were required to keep a sacred history of the most important events transpiring among them; till at length they fell into great wickedness; the most part of them were destroyed and the Records, by commandment of God to one of the last Prophets among them,) were safely deposited to preserve them from the hands of the wicked who sought to destroy them. He was informed that these Records contained many sacred Revelations pertaining to the gospel of the Kingdom, as well as Prophecies relating to the great events of the last days; and that they were to come forth to the knowledge of the people. If faithful he was to be the instrument who should be thus highly favored in bringing these holy things to light. After giving him many instructions concerning things past and to come, he disappeared, and the light and glory of God withdrew, &c. But before morning the vision was twice renewed with further instructions. In the morning he went out to his labor as usual, but soon the vision was renewed, the Angel again appeared; and having been informed by the previous visions of the night concerning the place where those Records were deposited, he was instructed to go immediately and view them."

He accordingly repaired to the place, which is minutely described by one Oliver Cowdery, a neighbor and proselyte of Smith's, in Western New-York, from whose narrative we extract the following particulars.

"As you go on the Rail-road from Palmyra to Canandaigua, in the State of New-York, before arriving at the little village of Manchester, you pass a large hill on the east side of the road, as large perhaps as any in that country."

The southern side of this hill was the place where the discovery of the pretended Records was made. Mr. Cowdery goes on to say—

"How far below the surface these Records were anciently placed I am unable to say, but from the fact that they had been for some fourteen hundred years buried, and that too on the side of a hill so steep, one is ready to conclude that they were some feet below, as the earth would naturally wear away more or less in that space of time." "A hole of sufficient depth was dug; at the bottom of this was laid a stone of suitable size, the upper surface being smooth. On this stone rested four others bedded in cement, forming a box impervious to rain or moisture. This box was sufficiently large to admit a breast-plate, such as was used by the ancients to defend the chest, &c., from the arrows or weapons of their enemies. From the bottom of the box, resting on this breast-plate, arose three small pillars of cement, and upon these three pillars were placed the Records. This box containing the Records was covered with another stone; the bottom surface of which was flat, the upper crowning." "When it was first visited by Mr. Smith, on the morning of the 22d September, 1823, a part of the crowning stone was visible above the surface, while the edges were concealed by the soil and grass. After arriving at the repository, a little exertion in removing the soil from the edges of the box, and a light pry brought to his natural vision its contents."

Then follows another blasphemous description of the reappearance of the "Angel of the Lord" and his instructions and admonitions to Joseph Smith: he also exhibited to him "The Prince of Darkness, surrounded by his innumerable associates," whose old title of the "Father of Lies" has been fairly wrested from him by this new "Prophet." He was informed that he was not yet quite purified enough in heart to obtain the "Records," but should at some future time; followed by a long string of prophecies touching the future glory of his people, which the pious narrator summarily disposes of in the following words—

"Although many more instructions were given by the mouth of the Angel to Mr. Smith, which we do not write in this book, yet the most important items are contained in the foregoing relation. During the four following years he frequently received instruction from the mouth of the heavenly messenger: and on the morning of the 22nd September, 1827, the Angel of the Lord delivered the Records into his hands."

"These Records were engraved on plates which had the appearance of gold. Each plate was not far from seven to eight inches in length and width, being not quite as thick as common tin. They were filled on both sides with engravings in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume, as the leaves of a book, and fastened at one edge with three rings running through the whole. This volume was near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed. The characters or letters on the unsealed part were small and beautifully engraved. The whole book exhibited many marks of antiquity in its construction, as well as much skill in the art of engraving. With the Records was found a curious instrument, called by the Ancients 'Urim and Thummim,' which consisted of two transparent stones clear as crystal set in two rims of a bow. This was in use in ancient times by persons called Seers. It was an instrument, by the use of which, they received revelations of things distant, or of things past or future."

"Soon the news of his discoveries spread abroad throughout all those parts. False reports, slanders, etc., flew as if upon the wings of the wind in every direction. The house was frequently beset by mobs; several times he was shot at, and very narrowly escaped; every device was used to get the plates away from him."

Finally, being wearied out by these annoyances, he determined to leave that part of the country, and "putting the plates in a barrel of beans," says his biographer, "emigrated to the northern part of Pennsylvania," after having been twice stopped and searched vainly for the plates of gold; which, by a special miracle, we suppose, were hidden from the eyes of the searchers.

"Having provided himself with a home, he commenced translating the Record by the gift and power of God, through the means of the Urim and Thummim; and being a poor writer, (inspiration not being a school-master,) he was under the necessity of employing a scribe, to write the translation as it came from his mouth;"

Though the name and residence of this scribe, so important a witness of the truth of this statement, is no where given. He then continues to state that—

"Mr. Smith continued the work of translation as his pecuniary circumstances would permit, until he finished the unsealed part of the Records. The part translated is entitled the 'Book of Mormon,' and contains nearly as much reading as the Old Testament."

He then proceeds to give an analysis of the contents, to which we will presently recur.

Such is the pretended origin of the Mormon Faith. The name of "Latter-day-Saints" was adopted by them from a passage in the prophecies of Daniel, which they have applied to themselves, which is as follows—

"And the Kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdom, under the whole Heaven, shall be given to the people of the Saints of the Most High; whose Kingdom is an everlasting Kingdom; and all dominions shall serve and obey him."—Daniel vii, 27.

A very interesting question here arises, whether Smith actually discovered any plates at all, divesting his narrative of its supernatural machinery, and making allowances for a poetic amplification of his materials! On this point conflicting opinions prevail, among those best qualified to decide. It is true that he parades the "Testimony of Three Witnesses," and also the "Testimony of Eight Witnesses" in the sequel of the "Book of Mormon," to prove the existence of the plates; but their testimony goes for nothing, for they prove too much, more than they possibly could have known; and are all of them, friends, kinsmen, converts, and probably assistants in imposture with the Prophet. The "Testimony of the Three Witnesses," laying claim to their knowledge "through the actual presence and direct communication of an angel," we will not insult the understandings of our readers by quoting. It is signed by Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris.

The "Testimony of the Eight Witnesses" is more plausible and reasonable, and is in the following words—

"Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues and people unto whom this work shall come, that Joseph Smith, Jr., the translator of this work, hath shown unto us the plates of which hath been spoken, which have the appearance of gold; and as many of the leaves as the said Smith has translated, we did handle with our hands. And we also saw the engravings thereon, all of which has the appearance of ancient work and of curious workmanship. And we give our names unto the world to witness unto the world that which we have seen. And we lie not, God bearing witness of it."

Signed.

None others have ever seen these plates, and the weight of evidence would be therefore strongly against the probability of any such discovery, were it not for one or two corroborating circumstances; the first of these is, that at or about the period of Smith's discovery of the plates, a few of the original characters transcribed by him were sent by a person named Martin Harris to Professor Anthon of New York, who examined them, but professed himself unable to decipher them, expressing however the opinion, that were the original records brought he might be able to decipher them. It can not for a moment be supposed that an ignorant country boy as Smith then was, destitute of all culture or knowledge, could have imposed his own clumsy fabrications upon so learned and acute a scholar as Dr. Anthon is universally acknowledged to be; but must have copied them from some originals in his own possession, in some way discovered or procured; and this view of the matter is somewhat confirmed by the second corroborating circumstance before alluded to, which is the discovery of "six brass plates," similar in shape and character to those described in the narrative of Smith, which were discovered near Kinderhook, in the State of New York,* in April 1843, buried in the centre of a large mound, surrounded by human bones, which apparently had been burned. The communication to the newspaper relating the particulars of the discovery, was made by a Dr. Harris of that place, to which was appended the following certificate.

"We, citizens of Kinderhook, whose names are annexed, do certify and declare that on the 23d of April, 1843, while excavating a large mound in this vicinity, Mr. M. Wiley took from said mound "six brass plates" of a bell shape, covered with ancient characters. Said plates were very much oxydated. The bands and rings on said plates mouldered into dust on a slight pressure. The above described plates we have handed to Mr. Sharp for the purpose of having them taken to Nauvoo." Signed by nine citizens of Kinderhook.

It will be recollected that when Smith left the State of New York for Pennsylvania he was twice stopped upon the road, and subjected to a strict search; yet the plates could not be found; is it not then, under the circumstances, a reasonable inference, that he concealed the plates in this mound, at Kinderhook,* for his future uses, and that either by artful management or accident they were discovered and sent to him as above mentioned, forming an additional link in the chain of his proofs.

We have now before us a fac-simile of these brazen plates, and the hieroglyphics they contain are certainly very curious, bearing but a slight resemblance to either the Mexican or Egyptian hieroglyphics, with which we have compared them. The mound from which they were taken was in the shape of a sugar loaf; the usual shape of the mounds which abound in the valley of the West. So much for the plates; now for the pretended translation of the hieroglyphics inscribed upon them.

The ancient mounds and other antiquities which have been brought to light upon this Western continent, many of which bear marks of a much higher civilization than the Indian tribes ever could have attained to,—the bones of a race different from the Indian, which have been discovered in caves in Ohio, Kentucky and elsewhere, and the thousand traditions among the Indians relating to events, recorded only on the pages of the sacred volume, have all combined to induce the belief among the learned who have made this matter their peculiar study, that the Indians were not the aborigines of this country, but dispossessed and destroyed a far superior and more civilized race, the relics of whose skill in the arts still remain to testify the proficiency they had made in the comforts and refinements of life.

The recent and startling discoveries of Stephens in Yucatan and central America, who has stumbled upon the ruins of magnificent and splendid cities, unknown to history or tradition, which must in former times have been the seat of some powerful but vanished race, extending back into the earlier ages of the world; The strange and peculiar civilization of the Aztecs, as graphically described by Prescott in his delightful history, evidently a rude graft upon some purer and higher civilization—the origin of which their own traditions ascribed to a white stranger coming from the East; The many rites and ceremonies prevailing among the rude Indian tribes, resembling, or copied from those of the Eastern nations, though strikingly perverted from their original intent—and the relics of an older and higher civilization daily disinterred from the mounds of the Western valley—all combine to prove with irresistible force, that the Indian Savages were not the earliest and only inhabitants of this Western continent, and that the so-called New World, although its records have perished, leaving only a few crumbling ruins to attest the existence of a former people who dwelt within its borders, may yet have nourished in her bosom.

a civilization coeval with and as distinctive as that of Egypt.

Whence this civilization was derived, whether indigenous to the soil, or brought by its framers from a foreign land, we have no means of ascertaining now, though many of the customs and ceremonies still lingering among the Indian tribes, would go to confirm the latter. Some of these are peculiarly striking; such for example as the form observed in taking a solemn oath among the Western Indians, where the person affirming placed his hand under the left thigh of him to whom he was pledging his faith; a custom extensively prevailing among the Oriental Nations in ancient times, which existed among the Israelites, and is frequently referred to as a prevailing and common usage, in the Book of Genesis, and in other parts of the Sacred writings. It is from these and some other analogies, that the opinion has been strenuously urged and maintained, by learned inquirers, that the Indians were in fact the lost Tribes of Israel; and much skill and learning has been employed to set forth and defend this theory. The North-Western passage was supposed to have been the route by which they reached this continent; and the transition from the shepherd to the hunter state, was by no means difficult or unnatural: the change of color is, by these theorists, accounted for by the gradual change wrought in successive generations by exposure to the elements and the hardships of a hunting life.

It is this captivating, but wild theory, which has been artfully seized as the basis of the Mormon faith; which is wrought out with much artistic skill and imaginative power in the "Book of Mormon;" a book far beyond the powers of Smith to compose, and which as an imaginative fiction, will take a high rank in American literature, long after Mormonism, as a faith, shall have shared the fate of all other falsities, which ever bear within them the seeds of their own destruction.

Before giving a brief and rapid analysis of the contents, it may not be amiss to attempt an answer to the inquiry, whether Smith himself was capable of composing this book? To this question an emphatic negative must be returned. As before stated, the man himself is a vulgar and illiterate impostor, whose ordinary conversation is grossly incorrect and trivial; totally incapable of composing a connected sermon, far less a sustained and skilful narrative; yet by his deluded followers, this very argument is used, as a proof of his inspiration, (an analogy drawn, we suppose, from the case of Balaam's Ass.) Who then did write the Book of Mormon? The belief of the best informed on this subject is, that it was the production of a young Lawyer, or Divine, in Western New-York; a young man of high talent and much promise, who was early the victim of a rapid decline; and that this history of a new Religion was composed by him to while away the tedious hours of a sick man's chamber. Upon his death, the MS. is supposed to have fallen into the hands of a man, whose name (we think) was Sidney Rigdon; a keen, shrewd, unscrupulous man, of a restless and daring intellect, but lacking physical courage. Finding in Joseph Smith the qualities, which (as he supposed) would make him an useful and obedient tool, in case of success; or a convenient scapegoat in the event of failure; he tutored and drilled him in the part which he was to play; and the event showed, that unfortunately, his calculations as to the "dupability" of his fellow citizens, were too correct. The new doctrine took like wild-fire, Smith was elevated into the dignity of a Prophet; and an injudicious persecution endeared him to his followers, by the cement of a common suffering in a common cause; and Rigdon, too late perceived that he had mistaken his man; that beneath the rough exterior was hidden an iron will, before which he himself was forced to bend; and that like the Sorcerers of old, who invoked the Fiend, he had gained a master, where he sought a slave.

He had committed himself too far with Smith to expose him; and had shared too much in the imposture to recede; so he was forced to play a subordinate part, but still remains the secret guiding spirit of the Mormon policy; of which, he is the head, and Smith the hand to execute.

That the account given above of the composition of the "Book of Mormon" is the correct one, is verified (to our mind) by the internal evidence of the name, of which neither Smith nor his colleagues, understood the latent meaning; as we presume our readers know, that the word "Mormon," in Greek, signifies a "bugbear," or imposition; the name "Moroni" too, next in importance in this book, signifies in the same language "a foolish person." The division of the work into different books, as well as the style, is in studied imitation of the Scriptures, and as far as such imitation can be, successful. The names of the different books are as follows: the Book of Nephi; of Jacob; of Mosiah; of Alma; of Helaman; of Nephi, Jr.; of Ether; Mormon, and Moroni, prefaced by an extract from the latter, who was the son of Mormon, as follows:

"The book of Mormon; an account written by the hand of Mormon, upon Plates, taken from the Plates of Nephi."

"Wherefore it is an abridgment of the record of the people of Nephi and also of the Lamanites; written to the Lamanites, who are a remnant of the House of Israel; and also to Jew and Gentile—written by way of commandment and also by the Spirit of Prophecy and Revelation. Written and sealed up and hid up unto the Lord, that they might not be destroyed, to come forth by the gift and power of God into the interpretation thereof. Sealed up by the hand of Moroni and hid up unto the Lord; to come forth in due time by the way of Gentile; the interpretation thereof by the gift of God."

Our limits, and the space we have already occupied, will not permit us to give more than a very brief outline of the contents of these several books, contained in the book of Mormon. The following, which we quote from one of their elders, contains the chief events:

"In this important and interesting book, we can read the History of Ancient America from its early settlement by a colony, who came from the Tower of Babel, at the confusion of languages, to the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era. We learn that America, in ancient times, was inhabited by two distinct races of people: the first, or more ancient race, came directly from the great Tower, being called Jaredites; the second race, came directly from the city of Jerusalem, about six hundred years before Christ, being Israelites, the descendants of Joseph. The first nation, or Jaredites, were destroyed about the time that the Israelites came from Jerusalem, who succeeded them in the inheritance of the country. The principal nation of the second race fell in battle towards the close of the 4th century. The remaining remnant having dwindled into an uncivilized state, still continue to inhabit the land; although divided into a 'multitude of nations,' and are called, by Europeans, the 'American Indians.'

"The remnant of Joseph, after arriving in this country, separated into two distinct nations, the Nephites and the Lamanites; the former having a copy of the Scriptures, engraven on plates of brass, in the Egyptian language; the Nephites emigrated towards the Northern part of South America, leaving the Lamanites in possession of the Northern and middle parts of the continent. The Nephites thrived and flourished; but the Lamanites, because of the hardness of their hearts, brought down many judgments on their own heads; and the Lord cursed them in their complexions, and they became a dark, loathsome and filthy people; wild, savage and ferocious, waging desperate war against the Nephites, by whom they were repulsed with great slaughter; tens of thousands being frequently slain on both sides, who were piled together in great heaps upon the ground, with a shallow covering of earth; which accounts for the existence of those ancient mounds filled with human bones, so numerous at the present day both in North and South America.

"The Nephites were favored with the personal ministry of Jesus Christ, for after he arose from the dead, and finished his ministry at Jerusalem, and ascended into Heaven, he descended in the presence of the Nephites who were assembled round about their Temple, in the Northern part of South America."

Finally, a tremendous war took place between the Nephites and Lamanites, in the Western part of New-York; where, like the Kilkeny Cats, they actually demolished each other; the records of the Nephites having been concealed in the hill, "Cum-morah," which is in the State of New-York, about 200 miles West of the city of Albany; Moroni, the son of Mormon, escaped from the battle and continued the record down to the 420th year of the Christian era; when he

"Hid them up in the hill Cummorah, where they remained concealed until, by the ministry of an Angel, they were discovered by Mr. Smith, who, by the gift and power of God, translated them into the English language, by the means of the Urim and Thummim, as stated in the foregoing."

In the year 1829, Mr. Smith and Mr. Cowdery, having learned the correct mode of baptism, from the "Book of Mormon," but knowing that no one of any of the denominations had the authority to administer it, were somewhat puzzled, until the difficulty was solved by the appearance of an Angel, who laying his hands upon their heads, ordained them and ordered them to baptize one another, which they accordingly did.

In the year 1830, a large edition of the "Book of Mormon" first appeared in print; converts were made; and in the same year, on the 6th of April, "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day-Saints" was organized in the Town of Manchester, State of New-York; and this was the "cloud no bigger than a man's hand," which now hangs with ominous blackness upon our Western Horizon, presaging a terrible storm. Since that time their numbers have increased with an amazing rapidity, unparalleled by the spread of any other religion. Their first move was to a place in Missouri called "Far West:" here they settled in great numbers, until in that neighborhood alone they amounted to 12 or 13,000. The jealousy of the Missourians, excited by religious and political causes, aggravated by alleged outrages committed by them on the citizens of Missouri, at last burst out into open violence, and a war was waged between the two parties, in which many lives were lost on both sides; but the Mormons finally worsted and driven from the borders of the State. They have published their statements of the matter, which charges the Missourians with the perpetration of great cruelties, but whether truly or not we have no means of ascertaining. It is stated, however, that Governor Boggs of that State issued an exterminating order against them to the following effect.

"HEAD QUARTERS OF THE MILITIA.

Jefferson City, Oct. 27, 1828.

SIR:—Since the order of the morning to you, I have received information of the most appalling character, which changes entirely the face of things, and places the Mormons in the attitude of an avowed defiance of the laws, and of having made war upon the people of the State. The Mormons must be treated as enemies, and must be exterminated or driven from the State, if necessary for the public peace. Their outrages are beyond all description. If you can increase your force, you are authorized to do so to any extent you may think necessary. The whole force will be placed under your command.

Signed,

L. W. BOGGS.

Governor and Commander in Chief."

* This document is very much to the point; seen enough and merciless, but giving reasons for the terrible severity of his orders, in those brief words. "Their outrages are beyond description." What they are he does not state, probably because well understood by the officers to whom the order is addressed; there is some confirmation afforded, too, by the very vindication put forth by the Mormons; for in it appears an admission of a secret organization existing among themselves, known by the name of the "Danite Band," who "had certain signs and words by which they could know one another, either by day or night." They are bound to keep those words and signs secret. And the author of the "defence," speaks much of the "horror expressed by the mob at some secret clan known as the Danites," of whose real character and objects, he professes ignorance, "not being a member."

Driven from Missouri, the "Latter-day-Saints" took refuge in Illinois, where they were kindly received, and from the Legislature of which State, they have received some valuable privileges; one of which is the incorporation of their city, and the establishment there of a municipal court of their own, which, as we were informed by the Prophet himself, has jurisdiction of all civil and criminal causes arising within the corporate limits; thus insuring their civil independence of the State authorities; the other important privilege being the authorized establishment of the "Nauvoo Legion," a military force, which has been subjected to a thorough and perfect training under able officers, invited and paid for that special purpose, and which, animated by fanatic zeal, would be an effective and dangerous force, led by a reckless desperado, burning with hatred and unsatisfied revenge.

The city of Nauvoo, (a Hebrew word, signifying beautiful,) is the great city of the faith, the Mecca of Mormonism. It is beautifully situated on a range of hills, sloping gently down to the Mississippi's edge. As a military position it would be almost impregnable, three of its sides being washed by the waters of the Mississippi; and the fourth protected by a range of hills. It merits richly the name it has received, for as our noble boat, breasting the rapid current of the Mississippi, majestically glided up to the city, her deck was thronged by eager strangers, and exclamations of delight and astonishment burst from every lip. We knew that but three years before, a scattered and persecuted remnant had fled to this spot for refuge, and expected only to find a few wretched hovels with squalid and poverty-stricken inmates. And lo, in the bright sunlight of an August morning, we looked upon a thriving and populous city, from whence arose the hum of labor, and the stir of peaceful industry. The dwellings on the water's edge were humble indeed, for here it was the terrified and stricken Mormons had first paused to rest, after escaping from their enemies; but stretching back from the water's edge, for six miles, was one unbroken row of finished and partially finished buildings of substantial brick or stone, and on a hill, towering above the rest, keeping, as it were, watch and ward over the infant city—its graceful proportion clearly defined against the bright blue sky, arose the walls of that classic and stately "Temple," which, when completed, will proudly vie with any similar edifice in the United States, and which is to make Nauvoo the centre spot and rallying place of all the faithful.

It was indeed wonderful to think of. But four years before, the wild primeval forest, the silence alone broken by the dashing of the Mississippi against its banks—and now, a city numbering 17,000 souls, whose population was increasing each day by emigrants from Europe, and the States. The Prophet himself said to us, "My city has grown up like Jonah's gourd:" he may well beware lest the further analogy holds good. The city is situated on the upper Mississippi, about 400 miles above its junction with the Missouri, midway almost between Quincy and Galena. The surrounding country is still an unbroken forest, and he who has never seen the forests of the Far-West can form but an imperfect idea of nature's gigantic products in the wilderness.

We were strenuously dissuaded from stopping at the city, being warned that it was dangerous; but persevered in our original intent, and candor compels us to admit that we received every kindness and hospitality at the hands of the Prophet and his people. They are not a polished and courtly people; to forms they attach no value; but in that truer politeness, which consists in a sincere desire to aid in fulfilling all the wishes excited by the curiosity of a stranger, the rugged "Saints" of Nauvoo might give some useful lessons to the perfumed and contemptible dandies of the older cities. Justice, too, compels us to admit that during our residence in the city we saw or heard nothing which was calculated to offend the most scrupulous delicacy, or the nicest morality, and we pried about and questioned, with genuine American spirit, in all directions; and a careful and watchful examination and inquiry, forced upon our minds the conviction that whatever the sins of the Mormon people might be, they did not lie upon the surface of their society. Their city is the most quiet and orderly of its size we have ever visited; there are no loungers to be seen in their streets, all is hard work; there are no public houses or drinking houses allowed within the city, and they refrain entirely from the use of spirituous liquors; in fact, in its police and arrangements, it is a model city.

The only objectionable feature that struck us, was the bitter fanaticism of the people; not that they refuse to argue their doctrines, or speak intemperately, but any one who looks upon their stern and rigid features, flashing forth a fierce enthusiasm on any allusion to their creed, or listens to their conversation, garnished like that of the old Puritans, with Scriptural quotations, must be convinced that with them the passion of religious fanaticism, like Aaron's rod, has swallowed up all others; they may be dupes, but the mass of them certainly are not hypocrites. Every thing revolves around the church, of which Joe Smith is the acknowledged head. The church owns much property, which he holds as trustee, and the profits of which he manages. The old system of tithes has been revived among them, and he who has no property must contribute a tenth part of his labor to the erection of the "Temple;" the walls of which are already upwards of thirty feet in height; the building is of yellow stone, which can be procured in great abundance near the city, and the design of the temple is both novel and imposing. In the basement story is placed a baptismal font, in imitation of that in Solomon's Temple, supported by twelve oxen, carved out of hard wood, the size of life, and beautifully executed. The Prophet is said to have been the architect who planned the building; if this be true he has displayed as much skill in fabricating buildings as religions.

He deserves no credit for it, however, since his followers declare that he received the plan by special revelation; as well as the plan of a very extensive hotel, now in the course of erection, by which revelation, himself and children are to have and hold a suite of rooms in the said hotel, when finished, in perpetuity, rent free, which the infatuated people have willingly assented to, on condition that the "Prophet" keeps the tavern, which he has actually agreed to do.

The Temple being unfinished, in favorable weather their religious services are conducted in a grove, bordering on the Temple; and here we saw assembled upwards of 5,000 people, men and women, listening with eager attention to the words which fell from the lips of the Prophet, who preached to them on that day. They came in carriages, carts and wagons, and remained seated as they came. Others were ranged upon benches, set out upon the grass. The Prophet stood upon an elevated platform of boards, with 12 of his elders seated behind him; his appearance was by no means prepossessing; his voice harsh and untunable, his sermon a compound of ranting violence and scraps of Scripture badly applied, and ungrammatical to the last degree. Judging of him by this specimen of his powers, we should have regarded him as a stupid, ignorant ranter, devoid of intellect or sagacity; but a subsequent interview in private, dispelled these opinions, and convinced us, that if not an orator, he was eminently fitted for a man of action; a rude Cromwell on a smaller scale, of dauntless energy, and fertile in resources. In person, he is large and bulky, upwards of six feet in height, and broad in proportion, possessing great physical power; his head is small and phrenologically bad; the animal greatly preponderating over the intellectual; his hair of a light brown brushed back from his face; his complexion ruddy, the cast of his features heavy, common-place and sullen in expression; his eye small and of a dull gray color, heavy and lustreless when in repose, but when we mentioned the Missouri outrages, glaring with suppressed passion; the whole face indicated but little intellectual power, but much low-cunning and subtlety, with an hypocritical humility upon it, evidently not its natural expression.

His whole aspect and appearance was that of a rough, ignorant countryman; and no stranger meeting him by chance, would ever dream that that heavy, inert looking individual was the celebrated "Prophet" of the Mormons; the founder of a New Faith; verifying the scornful words of Oxenstiern to his son—

"Nescis, mi fili, quam parva sapientia regitur mundus."

The space we have already occupied, warns us to close this article on a subject, which we fear may not interest the generality of readers; the importance of which, however, we have by no means exaggerated.

It only now remains for us to give a brief outline of their doctrine or rule of faith, which we shall extract from an "Address" by one of their elders to the people of the United States, the caption of which heads this article.

CREED OF THE LATTER-DAY-SAINTS.

The Latter-day-Saints believe in God the Eternal Father, and in his Son, Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost who bears record of them, throughout all ages the same, and forever.

They believe that in Adam's fall all men sinned, but that Christ's atonement was all sufficient for the removal of "original sin" in man and that all men not transgressing some law in their own persons are guiltless in the sight of God. For which they quote Romans v., 28. John xii., 32.

All infants, by their creed being incapable of knowing good and evil and of obeying or disobeying a law, and there being no transgression where there is no law, if they should die in their infant state would enjoy eternal life, being neither transgressors themselves, nor accountable for Adam's sin.

They believe that all men will be judged by the light that is in them, and that those who do not know a law can not transgress it.

They believe in the Holy Scriptures of the Prophets and Apostles; and that all mysticism, or private interpretation ought to be done away with. The Scriptures should be taught, understood and practised in their most plain, simple, easy and literal sense, according to the legitimate meaning of the words and sentences, precisely the same, as if found in any other book. The prophetic and doctrinal writings contained in the Bible are mostly adapted to the capacities of the simple and unlearned—to the common sense of the people. They are designed to be understood and practised, without which none can profit by them.

The Latter-day-Saints believe that the "Gospel dispensation revealed and established one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Holy Spirit; in short, one system of religion, one church, or assembly of worshippers, united in their doctrine and built upon the truth; and all bearing the general name of Saints. God is not the author of jarring and discordant systems—His kingdom is not divided against itself; and for this reason we have no confidence in the sects, doctrines and teachings of modern times, so far as they are at variance with each other, and contrary to the Scriptures of truth. We have therefore withdrawn from all these systems of error and delusion, and have endeavored to restore the ancient doctrine and faith which was once delivered to the Saints, and to build a society thereon, hoping thereby to enjoy the peculiar gifts and blessings which were so abundantly bestowed upon the churches in ancient times."

"We hold it as the duty of all men to believe the Gospel, to repent of their sins; and to be immersed in water in the name of Jesus Christ 'for the remission of sins.' The Latter-day-Saints also after immersion lay on hands in the name of Jesus Christ for the gift of the Holy Ghost; they are then considered Saints, or full members of the church."

"The Latter-Day-Saints believe that the gathering of Israel and the second advent of the Messiah are near at hand; that it is time for the Saints to gather together and prepare for the same."

In accordance with this article of faith, the Prophet has summoned the faithful from all parts of the world to remove to Nauvoo by a special order, which is so curious and characteristic, that we can not refrain from quoting one addressed to the people in Philadelphia.

"Special Message to the Church in Philadelphia."

All the members of that branch of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day-Saints which is located in Philadelphia, Penn., who are desirous of doing the will of Heaven, and of working out their own salvation by keeping the laws of the Celestial Kingdom, are hereby instructed and counselled to remove from thence without delay, and locate themselves in the city of Nauvoo, where God has a work for them to accomplish. Done at Nauvoo, 29th day of May, 1843.

By order of the quorum of 12.

BRIGHAM YOUNG."

Similar circulars were sent elsewhere, and met with prompt obedience. In relation to the Book of Mormon and the Revelations of Smith they use the following language.

"We have implicit confidence in the Book of Mormon, not however as a new Bible to exclude the old, as some have falsely represented. We consider the Book of Mormon as a historical and religious record, written in ancient times by a branch of the House of Israel, who peopled America and from whom the Indians are descended. The Book of Mormon corroborates and confirms the truth of the Scriptures by showing that the same principles were revealed and enjoyed in a country far remote from the scenes where the Jewish Bible was written.

"Many Revelations and Prophecies have been given to this church since its rise, which have been printed and sent forth to the world. They also contain the Gospel in great plainness, and important instructions to the Saints. We believe that wherever the people enjoy the religion of the New Testament, there they enjoy visions, revelations, the ministry of Angels, &c.; and that wherever these blessings cease to be enjoyed, there they also cease to enjoy the religion of the New Testament."

Such is a faint and imperfect outline and sketch of this strange faith and people, drawn from their own lips, and from personal observation; a new and startling product of our free institutions; showing how far men may be misled by a confidence in their own judgments and contempt for established forms; rejecting a creed for its alleged inconsistencies, and embracing in its stead one which is a tissue of contradictions and absurdities!

As a sect already important and powerful, and every day gaining accessions of numbers and strength; fortified in an almost impregnable position, and consumed by a fanatic zeal, which sends its missionaries to Jerusalem and the "farthest Ind"—which has already drawn into the Holy City converts from Calcutta; and whispers its words of consolation to the Australian savage,—this new doctrine may be wondered at and dreaded, but may not be despised.

To us, its import is sad and humiliating; weakening our confidence in the strength of the human intellect; and clouding our brightest visions of the onward progress of the human mind in successive ages. That an imposture so palpable, gross and monstrous as this, should succeed, even for a day, in duping so many thousands of rational beings, as are even numbered in the city of Nauvoo, is indeed a mortifying reflection on human wisdom and human pride. It may serve as a warning and a lesson to the Sciolists of the present day, that in all respects the XIX century has not progressed so far in advance of the so called "dark ages" of the world, as their own inflated vanity would induce them to believe; and furnishes yet another proof, even in this practical age, that "Man can not live on bread alone," but yearns after some spiritual food, and as the mariner, tossed on the billows of an unknown and mighty ocean, in the dark mid watches of the night, looks to the bright Polar Star to guide him safely on his course into a safe harbor, so the soul of man, involved in a black chaos of uncertainty and doubt, tempted, tried, and suffering, yet turns in longing hope to the bright Morning Star of Faith, which is to usher it into a cloudless and glorious world, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

GOD BLESS THE MARINER.

BY MARY E. HEWITT.

God's blessing on the Mariner!

A venturous life leads he—
What reck the landmen of their toil,
Who dwell upon the sea!

He hath piped the loud "ay! ay sir!"
O'er the voices of the main,
'Till his deep tones have the hoarseness
Of the rising hurricane.

But pleasant as the sound of waves
Upon the sunlit strand,
Are its ever glad responses
To the greetings of the land.

God bless the hardy mariner!
A homely garb wears he,
And he goeth with a rolling gait,
Like a ship upon the sea.

His seamed and honest visage
The sun and wind have tanned,
As hard as iron gauntlet
Is his broad and sinewy hand.

But oh! a spirit looketh
From out his clear, blue eye,
With a truthful, childlike earnestness,
Like an angel from the sky.

A venturous life the sailor leads
Between the sky, and sea—
But when the hour of dread is past,
A merrier who, than he?

On the burning, broad equator
He hath wooed the cooling gale,
And amid the polar ice-fields
He hath spread the frozen sail.

And where the mad waves onward,
Like a leaguered army swept;
Undimmed through all, his compass lamp
Its flame hath brightly kept.

He knew that by the rudder bands
Stood one well skilled to save;
For a strong hand is the STEERSMAN'S
That hath brought him o'er the wave.

PRESENT CONDITION OF LETTERS.

LETTER II.

TO WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS, Esq.

My Dear Sir:—My former letter, "on the Present Condition of Letters," exhibited, in a very hurried and imperfect manner, the most obvious symptom of the times. I endeavored to call attention to the fact, that we are now rolling and rocking in the calm which intervenes between one revolution and another—having thought that by so doing I might best prepare the minds of those who might honor me with a reading, for any subsequent remarks on the great topic, which I am attempting to illustrate. The tendency of my observations on the previous occasion would point to the inference, that the literature of the day is rather trimming its sails to catch the first breath of the breeze that is springing up, than contenting itself with spreading its canvass to receive the expiring winds of the storm that has swept by. There is, necessarily, much of both dispositions in our present literary navigation, (if I may be permitted thus to continue the metaphor;) and our onward progress, so far as the vessel does make way, must assuredly be attributed to the impetus derived from the former revolution. It would be magnifying germs into full grown plants, and mistaking anticipations for realities, to suppose that, as yet, there is any inherent strength, or vital energy in the new spirit, which has revealed to us its speedy advent. It should also be remembered, that authors naturally occupy very different positions, both with respect to the past and the future, according to the hour of their nativity, and the features of their horoscope—which "in the vernacular means," (as Touchstone says,) according to the times in which their tastes may have been respectively formed and matured, and according to the determinate impress which may have been given to these by their individual psychological organizations. We are acquainted with gentlemen for whose profound learning, extensive reading, and refined critical acumen we have both the deepest veneration, who, to this day, will scarcely recognize Byron and Shelley as great poets—but the habitudes of their minds were fixed at a time when Pope and the school of Pope were sole lords of the ascendant. They live with a former age, they associate with the ancestors of our present literature, their canons of taste have been framed on standards, which are altogether incommensurable with those now required. Thus with our authors, the number of their lustres, and the atmosphere which they have habitually breathed, will impress upon them characteristics, not to be accounted for by any dissimilarity of genius, nor by any original peculiarities of mind alone. And when we apply to them the true maxim, Pectoribus mores tot sunt, quot in orbe figuræ.

we have the philosophical exposition at hand, to render the reasons apparent. Hence, in some of our writers the spirit of the past will manifest itself almost exclusively; in others it will so overlay the tender shoots of the new vegetation as almost to conceal them; while in none will the younger verdure as yet predominate. This is, indeed, only the expression under a different form, of the opinion already expressed, that our literature is, at the present moment, nearly stationary, although anticipating a new birth, of which it gives evidence, and for which it is preparing the way.

But, at the same time that I illustrated this peculiar position of Letters, I disclosed, as I might, the grand cause to which the phenomena around us might be reasonably attributed. I discovered, as I thought, the secret of its late rapid development in the widely extended influences of the French Revolution—and I found that the soil, then rudely but deeply ploughed up, had since, by constant crops, lost much of its original vigor, and capacity for supplying our requirements, especially as our circumstances have been materially altered. Our political, social and intellectual condition is in advance of our literature—we belong to a new age, our literature only echoes the voices of a former generation, although, if we listen curiously, the notes of the summer-birds which herald the new harvest may be distinguished among the multiplied melodies of our familiar choristers.

You must have perceived at once, that I only sketched, roughly but boldly, the broad outlines of a very vast investigation, and that much was wanting to complete the picture, in color, lineaments, expression, tone and finish, and still more to impress upon others its true character and just proportions. My unskilful limning was designed as a mere æciagraphy—it was as rude, but intended to be as significant as the stiff Egyptian figures in the magnificent work of Rossellini. I left the filling up and coloring purposely to others, being myself more anxious in these letters to give the hint than to develop the idea—to sow the seed than to reap the crop—to make my hasty epistles suggestive to other minds than to perfect, and throw into artistic forms the expression of my views. For this reason, though my former letter discussed topics to which whole chapters might have been profitably devoted, I shall not retrace my steps further than I have already done, but proceed onwards, and take up another branch of the same inquiry into the actual condition of our present literature.

The constellation of literary stars, which culminated in our heavens, after the storm and convulsions of the French Revolution, and in consequence of its fecundating energies, was one of unusual brilliancy. If Bentham was not Bacon, La Place and Herschel no equivalent of Newton, and Byron no equal of Shakespeare, yet their number atoned for such deficiency, and might recall the oft celebrated glories of the age of Pericles, and the too much lauded Siècle Louis Quatorze. But, though the stars, which formed this bright cluster, may have been only of the second and third magnitudes, they shone with such intense and concentrated splendor as might well deceive the ordinary gaze, and may still dazzle even the professed measurer of the literary heavens. Byron, Moore, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, Campbell, Rogers, Southey, Scott, (multis nominibus venerandus :) Fox, Sheridan, Pitt, Erskine, Lyndhurst, Romilly, Brougham, Porson, Parr, Maltby, Tate, Blomfield, Hermann, Wolf, Heyne, Niebuhr, Goëthé, the Schlegels—but this enumeration of eminent names is becoming tedious—such men as these were then scattered with no grudging hand over the earth. That such excess of light should intermit its radiance was but natural. The fountains, whence these cressets were fed, if not exhausted, refused to supply the same sustenance as at first, and we have been at length left in the twilight, to content ourselves with meteoric showers until the dawning of the expected day.

But the human intellect can not be entirely idle, either in the individual or in the masses:—least of all can it be so in civilized countries during an enlightened age. Accordingly, if names, such as those mentioned above are denied to us now, there is no lack of authors to usurp the thrones that have been vacated. Augustulus is brought in immediate succession to the seat of Augustus; and an Augustulan age of literature has been given to us as the legitimate tail-piece and appendage to the Augustan. We are fairly overrun with petty authorship. The plague of locusts with which Egypt was afflicted is nothing to be compared to the plague of authors with which we are visited. Scribimus indocfi doctique. When the sun is below the horizon and the moon in conjunction, the lesser stars come out and surprise us by their brilliancy—darkness adds a charm to them which at other times they would not have. There is no where such an abundance of weeds as in a neglected field. If the soil be rich their number and luxuriance will be multiplied. And similar will be the consequence if the legitimate crop should fail, in a regularly planted and cultivated field, either from inattention to it, or from any defect of the season. Hence we find infinite writers, of very questionable calibre, occupying the places abdicated by the great men of the last generation, and which we should be glad to see again in possession of those of equal powers. But, until such men shall arise, we must be content to leave the wide and fertile plains, once covered with rich and luxuriant grain, in the hands of those who claim by mere occupancy, and not by any actual conquest of the soil. All that we can do is to note the dissimilarities between themselves and those whom they have succeeded, since, in this way, we may either discover analogies to direct us to particular eras in the history of the past for instruction; or we may find indications of change that promise a more glorious harvest than that which of late we have been reaping.

The latter, we think, may be readily detected. We have already displayed the disintegration now taking place in all the forms of intellectual development, and from this we have inferred the necessity and the certainty of an early revolution in letters—and a prospective advance in their condition. This, however, was merely a passing inference: it did not follow, because a change was in progress, that the change must be necessarily for the better. In logic this would be a non sequitur; yet we have no reluctance in adopting the conclusion as a simple proposition, and proving its truth by other arguments. There is in the literary world itself a vague consciousness of present insufficiency, which in the absence of other signs might encourage the hope of future improvement. It would be indelicate to quote from private letters in confirmation of this position with regard to the United States, and I know that your own correspondence must have already assured you of the fact. As yet this consciousness is only an undeveloped sentiment, partaking very much of the character of an instinct, derived we know not how or whence, certainly not the genuine offspring of reflection, although it be such that reason would not disavow it. But that which is now indefinite and imperfectly recognized, will gradually work its way into clearer light and full recognition, through the superincumbent mass of bold habitudes, and stereotyped impressions, which now check its growth and preclude its easy development. Another confirmation of this faith in brighter days is furnished by the strong literary tendency, which indubitably exists at this moment in the most cultivated nations. There is an anxious yearning after intellectual enjoyments and the gratification of literary tastes. There is, moreover, a much keener sympathy with literature and literary men than has been ordinary in by-gone times. If the learned and the unlearned now write, smitten with an extraordinary and irresistible itch for scribbling, the multitude of readers has been increased in an equally remarkable and unreasonable proportion. The amount of reading got through with in these days is incalculable. Mrs. Chapone's maxim, that a good man should be read three times—the ter pure lecto libello of Horace—could never have been designed for our day, or at any rate for our meridian. Men do not now read, but they devour—they have a most hyper-Brobdingnagian throat for the engorgement of all literary novelties. They are in no wise choice in respect of their food: the merest crudities are as welcome as the rarest and most delicate viands; and, indeed, if the former be only highly seasoned with ginger, pepper, mustard and the like irritating and exciting condiments, they are infinitely proffered. It is quantity, not quality—spice, and not flavor which are now required by all classes, from the coal-heaver to the dandy, from the fish-wife to the fashionable belle. The unequalled rapidity with which the modern steam press throws out fresh works, and new impressions of old ones is truly amazing. Yet it can scarcely keep pace with this morbid voracity, produced by a diseased stomach, which, after a long fast, is at length brought to the acquaintance of beef. Moreover, the press in ministering to this consuming plague stimulates the appetite to renewed and greater rapacity. The gullet of that respectable gentleman, "the reading public" has dilated into "an antre vast," and illimitable as the throat of the Dragon of Wantley,

Which eat the church steeple
With all the good people, &c.

It receives every thing—sermons and novels, theology and scandal, tracts and trials, history and fashions—nothing comes amiss to it. It is omnivorous not simply with reference to species and genera, but to cubic feet and pounds avoirdupois. Gargantua, who unconsciously swallowed in a lettuce leaf, while eating salad, a monk "with pastoral staff and scalloped shoon," had no such gorge as our friend, the public. Every thing is introduced into the universal recipient—the various ingredients of the strange olla podrida are thrown in in the utmost hurly burly and confusion—and without the slightest mastication into the all-receiving stomach. The discordant materials lie there, scarcely fermenting, but neutralizing or volatilizing each other. We may hope, indeed, for repletion and consequent dyspepsia at some future time, and then the patient may probably be reclaimed to a more wholesome diet. But whatever this singular gluttony may prove in regard to the taste of our generation, it certainly affords sufficient evidence of the existence of a very strong literary appetite. That appetite is diseased—it is the symptom and the consequence of fever and delirium—but these disorders will pass away, and men will return to a healthy state, and again have a just relish for literature, and a discriminating appreciation of it. In the mean time, we are glad to recognize in the malady the auspices which predict so favorable a future.

It might be interesting to tarry for a while by the way side, and examine into the causes which have produced this notable eagerness after literary gratifications; to show how the great authors produced a multitude of readers, while the praise and profit, bestowed upon them by these readers, led to a rapid augmentation of the literary corps, and this, in its turn, tended to create greater variety, and required more speedy modes of publication than had hitherto been usual, while all conspired to render books cheap, and this again tended to the increase of readers,—thus reciprocally generating and regenerating each other in a manner, which those may elucidate, who can discover the exact relationship of Ægisthus to Agamemnon, or of the Miltonic Death to his father Lucifer.

In following—laxis habenis—this very tempting topic of modern literary taste, I had nearly forgotten the point from which my declination commenced, and have consequently reason to rejoice that I adopted the epistolary form for the communication of my views. An occasional digression—a momentary forgetfulness, even a partial contradiction, or subsequent correction of a former error might be overlooked or pardoned in a letter, when no such compassionate mercy could be expected for an essay. I shall, therefore, return without any compunction of conscience, to the point when I wandered, not exactly into a digression, but into too prolix expression.

I remarked that there were certain signs, visible above our horizon, which might create a reasonable hope of a brighter future. One of these is to be found in that increased literary fervor of the mass, which I have just alluded to. Another may possibly be perceived in their greediness for novelties, though it may be doubted whether this is not rather that morbid thirst for stimulating drinks, which is manifested fully as often in a mind distempered by constant excitement, as in a body corrupted by habitual intoxication. And, if we should determine such to be the significance of this phenomenon, we must interpret analogously the many paradoxical views and extravagant fancies of our recent literature, and its constant and uneasy straining after effect. But we may notice a dissatisfaction in the most eminent authors—each in his own department—with all that his predecessors have transmitted to him. Much of this, doubtless, will and may be attributed to that perverse love of contradiction which characterizes all the children of Adam, and that hope of establishing a claim to originality by attacking received notions, and obliterating old landmarks. But this explanation is not co-extensive with the phenomena to be accounted for—there is more still left behind to demand further interpretation. In this I see the early indications of an effort to project themselves beyond the beaten circle within which they have been tethered. Although seeing their models in their precursors, drawing their inspiration from them, and frequently adhering to a servile imitation of them, recent authors evince a strong disposition to give some proof, however slight, of that independence after which they sigh. Each convinced, rather by an unrecognized instinct than a conscious scrutiny, of the ruinous condition of those temples, in which he, in common with others, has been worshipping, talks of rebuilding; or at least repairing them, points out the corrections to be made in the ground plan, suggests additions to the structure, and determines what ornaments, and what proportions ought to be changed. But here he stops—he goes no further—he never accomplishes what he has designed—he seldom even collects his materials—he criticises, but he will not or can not stop the smallest gap, much less repair or replace the edifice. The true reason of this failure,—of this short-coming, (if I may venture upon the dangerous experiment of borrowing a word from our Methodist brethren,) indubitably is, that his own views have not yet attained definite shape—he is conscious of much to be developed, much to be added, much to be altered, but his consciousness does not migrate into action, nor produce in him that fixed knowledge and creative vigor which would enable him to achieve that of which now he only dreams. There is still wanting to him the vital and vivifying energy—the pectus divinus—which would impel him to its accomplishment, and which genius would soon experience—were it not that his hour has not yet come.

The utmost that has hitherto been attempted has been a barren and futile effort to anticipate the execution of that of which time is the principal cause, if not the sole parent. A great man may exert a wonderful influence upon his age—he may effect mighty and beneficial changes in old institutions, or may introduce new systems and subvert antiquated fallacies. But he requires two powerful auxiliaries for his ministers—times and circumstances. He can not produce any great result without his lot has fallen upon times suitable for the dissemination of his views, so that those whom he addresses may be a fit audience for their reception; and he must have favorable circumstances combining together to render their adoption practicable and expedient, before they can become firmly rooted, and bear any mature or perennial fruit. Whoever, ignorant of this universal law of the human career, endeavors to anticipate—(how serviceable would be the antique word prevent, for such anticipation acts as a retardation and restraint)—whoever, I say, anticipates the due season for renovating a falling system, or substituting a new one in place of the old, will surely fail, and neither attain the accomplishment of his desires, nor achieve any thing to merit that they should have been realized. Man and the world act and react upon each other in such a potent but mysterious way, that the great man is produced for the times, and exists only when the crisis requires it. Nec deus intersit, &c., may be a precept in dramatic composition, but it should be converted into an affirmation to asseverate one of the laws of humanity. It would seem as if the highest finish and perfection could not be given to a man even of boundless intellect, but by the very times which demand that he should display his powers under some definite and peculiar type for their benefit. It is shrewdly hinted by Carlyle that this is the era of Bobissimus Quidam, Esq.—we may hope that this day is passing away, but it has not yet gone. We could not, if what I have just said be true, have expected hitherto for any great success on the part of those who have indicated their dissatisfaction with existing systems. What would have been their fate if they had made any deliberate, though premature attempt, to do the work which the future has reserved for the past, may be learnt from the fortune of those who have in former days fallen victims to the same error. They were thrown rudely as a wreck upon the strand,—they tried to usurp the office of Time—to snatch the sceptre from his grasp—to supplant in the exercise of his most holy functions the universal arbiter of change, and the old God has passed them ruthlessly by, and relates little of their struggles, their aspirations, or their existence to a future age. Who knows any thing of Cesalpini, Tolesio, or Patrizzi? but who has not been familiar from boyhood with the venerated name of Bacon?

These random reflections may possibly explain many of the phenomena of our literature, and illustrate its present condition. They will explain, in some degree, its feverish restlessness—its spasmodic activity—its expansiveness, frequently grotesque—its conscious insufficiency—its unavailing effort at original development—and the scantiness of its matured fruits. They may serve, at any rate, to remove any discouragement, which might otherwise arise, from observing, that, in the attempts hitherto made to regenerate particular departments of literature and science, nothing satisfactory has been achieved. We may even assume this as an evidence that something will be accomplished before long. We are moving towards a definite goal; impelled along, blindly, it is true, at present, and coerced by unseen influences of which, for the most part, we are unconscious. It is useless as yet to run, when we do not know where we must run to: for the goal, though fixed, is still invisible—it is still below the horizon. We must float with the stream for awhile, for we have no magnet at hand, and we know not the points of the compass. But, as there is a current, it must flow into some ocean or inland sea—thither is our destination. When we discover our bearings, we may use helm, oar and sail—steam, too, if it beliketh us—but, until then, we can only note the country through which we pass, and the stray flowers that wave over our rivulet, or prepare ourselves for the reception of fuller knowledge, and for its due appreciation and employment after it has been imparted.

You may ask me, my dear sir, if we are to recognize this brightening prospect for literature, and can we do nothing to facilitate or hasten its approach. Is there no mode of preparing mankind for a reintegration of letters, and of modifying the characteristics of the times so as to expedite its arrival, or ensure its success? Certainly there must be. I should agree with you in your conclusion. I might think it requisite to restrain any general inference by sundry limitations, but I should most heartily assent to the faith you would thus advocate. But I must not now discuss this point, there are other topics to be previously examined: and, moreover, after having written you this long and rambling epistle, I have reason to fear that you may consider "my line upon line and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little," as having swollen to most dropsical proportions. I must, therefore, secure your attentive ear on some other occasion, by bringing my letter to an abrupt close, and assuring you that I remain, my dear sir,

With much esteem and regard,

Your obliged and obd't servant,

GEORGE FREDERICK HOLMES.

TO MARY.

BY J. STRONG RICE.

I'll ever be thy friend, Mary,
And ever love thy smile,
And never will offend, Mary,
Thy artlessness with guile.

I'll ever be sincere, Mary,
In what I say to thee,
And never cause a tear, Mary,
To leave thy deep blue e'e.

I sometimes think you might, Mary,
Have flown here from the sky,
So holy is the light, Mary,
Of thy cerulean eye.

And when my sleep is sweet, Mary,
I sometimes think I see
A host of spirits meet, Mary,
Of face and form like thee.

I see them in the light, Mary,
On fleecy clouds they ride,
Their zephyr seeds to sight, Mary,
Are viewless as they glide.

With coronal and wreath, Mary,
Of sweetest summer flowers
They strew thy path and breathe, Mary,
"Long life and rosy hours."

It gives me very joy, Mary,
To know thee Heaven's child,
I have been when a boy, Mary,
But never have beguiled.

BURNS.

There is a lesson of pleasing instruction in the varied forms and fortunes of human greatness. When the world is in commotion—when nations are the sport of foreign wars or intestine cabal, the conquering chieftain, or the cunning statesman may compel our startled admiration, while he is watching, perhaps, like a hungry bird of prey, to seize upon the torn and palpitating State. When some fearful moral evil must be cured, the Reformer comes forth as the special minister of Providence; and we look with silent awe, to see the workings of his stern and lofty mind, as he tramples on every obstacle, and strides on to the fulfilment of his destiny. But the Poet, whose bosom swells with all the manly virtues, and the gentle, generous affections—whose soul, like a richly tuned harp changes the common winds of life into sweetest music,—the Poet comes abroad to stir from their secret fountains the softer sympathies of man's nature: and as he struggles on through the sorrows and entanglements of life, and dies, perhaps, in utter desolateness and neglect, tears mingle with our reverence and love.

Such in the lofty sublimity and deep, tender beauty of his spirit—such in the sadness of his brief but glorious career was Robert Burns. Cheerless poverty was the companion of his youth; Toil and sorrow waited ever in his pathway; but Nature, by the richness of her benefactions, made ample amends for Fortune's smiles; and Genius, that owns no localities, was with the Rustic in his darksome drudgery, and from the midst of his deep obscurity broke forth, at length, upon the world in a serene, majestic brightness, which men gazed on with wonder and with tears.

Themes for the muse had not, indeed, been wanting in the land of Wallace and Bruce. Scotland was full of the grand and the lovely in nature, and of all the nobler and the softer virtues which lift up and beautify humanity. There were the fields of battle where the tide of invasion had been beaten back, and there rested the ashes of patriots who had nobly drawn the steel for their country and fallen in her defence. There towered in stern sublimity the rugged mountains and the wild hanging woods; there slept in quiet, peaceful beauty the calm lakes: and amidst them all there flourished, in perennial richness, those deep and pure affections of the heart which flow out in a thousand streams to brighten and adorn the field of life. And Poets, too, of power and beauty had been there: not Scottish scenery and Scottish life were never idly sung 'till the wild sounding lyre of the Plough Boy was heard on the banks of his own native Doon, where the songs of his loves, his hopes and his sorrows were singing themselves in strains of rich immortal melody through his soul.

We are not, of course, to compare the fitful, hurried outbursts of Burns' untaught genius with the elegant long-labored efforts of Pope, or the heavenward sketches of Milton's diviner spirit. No—the full fountains from which they drank so freely were sealed against him and such as him. But the expanse of heaven was over him; the broad world of nature and manhood was around him, and it was enough. Thrown, as he was, into the very bosom of nature, from her alone he sought his inspiration and his themes. Under her guidance, he touched his artless harp, and there came forth those notes of melting melody which were to find a quick response in human bosoms. His poetry is but the gushing forth of his own swelling emotions; and whether he describes those scenes of home devotion from which "Old Scotia's grandeur springs"—those sweet scenes of piety and love and peace, or kindles into phrenzy in the memory of the deeds of Bannockburn—whether he utters forth the felt language of joyous rapture, the sublime wailings of his woe, or the cherished enthusiasm of soft, sweet sadness—he finds a ready witness in the ever varying moods of man's heart.

What Burns might have been, in circumstances less adverse, we can not tell: but there is enough to excite our warmest admiration while we contemplate him the Poet or the man. At one time we see him toiling, by day, "behind his plough upon the mountain side," and at evening, sitting alone beneath the hawthorn shade, or wandering and musing upon the braes of his loved rivers; at another time standing upright, as if at home, amidst the loftiest, coolest spirits of Scotland's capital, astounding them all by the force and fire of his genius, convulsing them by the rough floods of his merriment, or wringing delicious tears from their eyes by the impassioned pathos of his feeling. Now he is borne away headlong by the tide of mad, blind passion, and again bowed down to the very earth in pungent sorrow and remorse. At one time his self-forgetting sympathies flow out over all his suffering fellows, or his pitying thoughts are fixed upon the poor wounded bare, or the "wee sleeket, cowering, timorous beastie" which his plough share has unhoused:—and again, though half starved, he spurns from him alike the narrow suggestions of selfish interest, and the wretched, patronizing "insolence of condescension." In his poetry, as in his life, are seen a warm, overflowing heart which in its embraces took in all the dwellers upon earth; a sterling honest worth which poverty could not debase; a proud Scotch spirit which oppression could never subdue.

He had his faults, and keen eyed envy saw them to his hurt. He had his virtues too; and the long-coming judgment of an after and calmer age has at length silenced forever the wild clamorings of shrill-mouthed malice.

Penury depressed and chilled his spirit, and the world refused to know his inward worth. Dark clouds of sorrow thickened round him while he lived—and the few brief gleams of light which broke in, sometimes, like blessed sunshine, on his soul, served but to make the gloom more gloomy as they disappeared. When earthly hope was gone, and to the many poisoned arrows rankling in his heart was added the crowning pang of cold neglect, death opened for him the only gate of deliverance; and the world saw too late that one of its gentlest, noblest spirits had passed away beyond the reach of its sympathies forever.

There needs no commendation of his writings; for a charm which cannot pass away is in them and they can not die—through the wild glens of his native land, and beside the rivers, consecrated by his muse; amidst the splendor and refinement of palaces, in the straw-roofed cottage of the peasant, and in the cloistered cell of the Philosopher alike, the Ploughman Poet will be known and loved as one of nature's gifted ones, while the language in which he wrote shall endure.

Nay—while the thistle blooms upon the mountains, or waves in the breeze upon the banner of his country—while the "sweet Afton," the "clear winding Devon" and the "Bonny Doon" send on their sparkling waters, while Scotia's bright blue Locks shall reflect to heaven her pure sky and her heathery hill-tops, thousands will thrill and melt at the poesy, and thousands more will shed their tears upon the grave of Robert Burns. ENGLISH ORTHOGRAPHY.

The defective system, (if that word may be justly applied to it,) of English Orthography has long been a reproach to this truly noble language. Changes in the mode of spelling have from time to time been made, but they have as often been from bad to worse as from bad to good; thus, since the period when the Bible was translated into English, the word plow has been altered to plough and cloke to cloak. In some words, the spelling has been amended, as in wagon, formerly spelt with two g's; but as baggage retains both, the alteration is likely to occasion an improper way of spelling both words. What can be more absurd than that the letters ough should represent seven distinct sounds, as is shown by the following lines written by the late Condy Raguet?

"Though the tough cough and hiccough plough me through, O'er life's dull lough my course I'll still pursue."

No reason can be given why the letter i should occur in the last syllable of such words as believe, conceive, &c., nor why it should precede the e in believe, relieve and grieve, whilst it follows it in conceive, deceive, perceive and receive.

A reform of our spelling would be attended with many advantages. It would abridge the labor of foreigners and children in acquiring the language; it would shorten the process of writing and printing, and save ink and paper now uselessly consumed.

An amendment of our orthography would require three things:

First. The removal of all letters not sounded.

Secondly. The substitution of letters that are sounded for those that are not; and Thirdly. The removal of letters not sounded, and the substitution of those that are for those that are not, when needed, in the same word.

In the present paper a number of words will be given to illustrate the first of the above proposed changes. It would be easy to enlarge the list, but it has been preferred to present only such words as are in most common use.

LOVE SKETCHES.

She was most gifted ; sad it is,
Such powers to profane—
Her spirit knelt to worldliness
The restless and the vain.
There was a studied witchery
About her beauty now,
And lovely was the snowy white
Of her fair and faultless brow.

Now every tone was musical
And every movement grace,
But oh ! it was a grief to me
To look upon her face.
So much of purer feeling lost,
No polish could replace,
So much of life's diviner light
Departed without trace !

There were gorgeous summer vines, curtaining the open window, from which the soft, sweet eyes of Bertha Vernon were looking thoughtfully forth, over a varied and "most living landscape." The gentle wind just stirred the bright ringlets of her long fair hair, and summoned to her cheek the delicate rose-hue which for months had been banished by the continual presence of suffering. She had been ill, very ill, and to expect her restoration, had for awhile seemed like hoping against hope, but youth is strong in endurance, and it was not willed that one so well beloved, should die so soon. Bertha had been always an affectionate and gentle child, and she had grown to girlhood with all her dearest ties unbroken. Not a voice spoke to her, that did not grow kinder as it greeted her, and none could look without spontaneous interest on one whose heart was so full of spontaneous tenderness for all things living. Very lovely had been her tranquil and happy existence, and like awakening from the fearful phantasies of some painful dream, seemed her arising from the sombre visions of sickness. She gazed around her, and every object shone with a new brightness, each tone of nature had acquired a strange and peculiar melody, and the glad, rejoicing earth never appeared half so beautiful as now, in its glorious crimson robe of evening sunshine. It is a solemn thing, to have been on the very brink of the grave, hovering, as it were, between two existences, and then unexpectedly restored to the world, and we pity the hearts for whom such events have no spiritual and enduring lesson, and who go back to flutter again in their idle frivolity without one higher thought of their own increased responsibilities, or a single improving reflection on the deep realities of life and futurity. For such, there is little hope ; heaven help them in their dark and shadowy days !—But Bertha's was not one, of these, and there were pure and prayerful thoughts in the bright young spirit that had soared so near to heaven. Ah ! there were long years yet in store for her, when her soul grew sad and languid beneath its depressing burdens, and she almost lamented the loving solicitude that had lengthened an experience so fraught with perplexities and regret ; for we know not what we do, nor what heavy griefs we pray for, in asking that life may be prolonged.

The last rays of the declining sun were lighting the view on which Bertha gazed, and nothing was there to mar its peaceful loveliness. A soft smile rose to her lip—the smile that comes when we look on those we love best—as she observed two persons slowly traversing the shaded avenue leading to her home. They were a lady and gentleman, and "both were young, and one was beautiful." An artist would have paused enraptured before the stately and queen-like witchery of Clara Vernon's face, and every movement—every attitude of her faultless form, was replete with the self-possessed and peerless grace of one who had made fascination an absorbing and successful study. There was nothing simply natural about her, but a nature in itself attractive, had been guided, not altered, and the final effect of such tutoring was so beautiful, that the most fastidious forgot to censure. There were lofty and glowing thoughts too, in the aspiring spirit of the proud beauty, and the eye whose flashing was so dazzling and lustrous, the lip whose gay smile was so winning, told eloquently of a mind whose dreamings were of no common character, and a heart whose impulses were the rebellious and impetuous ones, out of which are the issues of life. The looks her companion bent on her were full of ardent admiration, but it was the open and undisguised approval of brotherly tenderness, not the subdued and timid reverence of a lover's gaze. Their conversation had been quiet and cheerful, and those who had listened to their careless words would have little imagined that Clara Vernon had ever been more to her friend than a kind and sympathizing sister. Yet the period had been when Charles Herbert had no other vision, than the beautiful face beside him, when she had been to him the perfect embodiment of all life's fairest things, and he had loved her wildly and fervently as boyhood ever loves its first enchantress. He had told his tenderness too, and the denial that answered it had been cold and guarded, for Clara was exacting, enthusiastic and ambitious, and Herbert had little to proffer then, but a warm, true heart, and a future filled with many hopes. These were not enough to satisfy a nature craving the glittering and ostentatious realities of the world, and Clara's rejection, though graciously worded, had been calm and decisive.

Now three years had elapsed, and Herbert's position was in every respect altered. He had won an enviable reputation as a promising member of the bar, and had unexpectedly inherited wealth ; but the rapt devotion of old times had faded away with them, and the more tranquil affection of his deeper feelings and maturer judgment had been laid at a gentler shrine.

He had met Bertha in a distant city, where she had been residing for the completion of her education; they had there revived the intimate acquaintance of their childhood, and he was now her accepted and acknowledged lover. Of his former attachment to Clara, Bertha knew nothing, and no voice had spoken more cordial gratulation and approval of his choice, than that of his early love. To Bertha, with her sweet and confiding disposition, her pure, self-forgetting nature, this new tie was the bright realization of all her spirit hoped for, and there was not one sully trace of calculating worldliness in the deep tenderness that responded to Herbert's with a child's true and undoubting reliance. Her health, which for several months had been precarious, alone prevented their immediate marriage, and perhaps her fragility, and the consciousness of her having patiently suffered so much, lent a softness and anxious solicitude to Herbert's feelings which rendered them doubly precious.

There is nothing in moral existence more touchingly beautiful, than the uncomplaining endurance of suffering in youth. In maturer years, we learn from observation, if not from actual experience, to anticipate pain in some one of its unnumbered forms; we are then less prone to express our emotions, or to expect the sympathy of those around us, and we feel that silent calmness is the wisest and best philosophy. But it is difficult for the young to realize this, and it is a hard thing for the warm, wild impulse to be subdued and deadened in its earliest spring, for the elastic step to grow prematurely slow and languid, and yet for the heart to maintain its patient tranquillity, and the true soul to look hopefully upward and be strong.

Herbert had mingled much with society, and though young had looked often on the dimmer side of human nature. There was to him a peculiar interest in the innocent freshness of Bertha's being, and something sweet in the unshadowed hopes of one for whom the hereafter seemed filled with brightness and for whom life was now unfolding its loveliest leaves.

Youth! the true and holy and evanescent! heaven-sent is the magical witchery that makes thee beautiful, that paints the present with dream-like happiness, and tints the future with radiant and visionary promise. Soon thou leavest us with all thine enchantment; we miss thy presence and yet know not when was thy farewell. We only mournfully feel that thou hast departed from our lot, forever, and we go wearily onward, heart-sore pilgrims to a darker and sadder time, and the past whose reality was so brilliant, grows dim upon our pathway, till remembrance is all shadow. Then the responsibilities, the trials, the endurances of humanity press heavily upon us, truths arise, one after another, gloomily around us; cares gather, that forsake us not; the hopes that gladdened the hereafter depart from the earth, to brighten a farther futurity; the step that was lightest becomes languid, and life is a sorrow to the soul. Thrice blessed are the ones who never experience this inevitable change, but lie down to sleep with untainted spirits, and pass gently from their youth, to heaven. And blessed, too, are they who love the young, and deal kindly with their frivolities and failings; for cold words fall bitterly on the gay, impetuous heart, and the season comes to us all when such things are regrets, when it is a pleasure to recall the gladness we have conferred, and a pain to remember its reverse, and when a kind look and tender word are among the soul's recorded treasures.

There was something amounting almost to reverence in the deferential nature of Bertha's affection for her sister. In her eyes, Clara's appearance and character were equally faultless, and the imperious selfishness, the dictatorial manner too often apparent in Clara's daily conduct, seemed to her judgment only the involuntary result of a superiority not to be doubted, nor denied. Dispositions like Bertha's, simple, yet refined, timid to excess, but capable of a moral heroism stronger souls would shrink from, meet us rarely in the world; we turn to them as the desert wanderer pauses when the green place greets him in the wilderness, the pure fountains of their thoughts refresh and cheer us; they bear our memories to the time of our own early innocence, and awaken a deeper veneration, and truer appreciation for the diviner tendencies still lingering amid the mysteries of humanity.

A smile lent its sunny and exquisite light to Clara's face as she left the lovers alone that evening, but it soon disappeared, and sadness, vague, indefinable, and irrepressible lay heavily on her reflections as she sat languidly in her chamber, with her writing on the table before her. An expression of irony and bitterness glanced across her countenance, as she idly and carelessly turned over the closely covered leaves, where it has long been her habit to record the trivial events and emotions that marked her every day experience,—those trifles which make up woman's life, and decide her final destiny. She had been accustomed for several years, regularly to trace these pages, and there was a sad contrast between the childish confidence and impetuous hopefulness of the early records, and the prematurely heart-worn, depressed, disappointed tone, evinced in the later ones. And yet, the circumstances around her were prosperous and brilliant; she had never known a severe sorrow, there were many who praised her, and one or two who sincerely loved. She was beautiful, gifted, cultivated and intellectual; the world, whose applause she worshipped, had bowed down in admiration to her, and thus far, her footsteps had only pressed on flowers. Then, what needed she? Ah! questioner! if thou hast ever felt the total insufficiency of these things for happiness, if when actual blessings and pleasures were brightest, thy soul has still burningly thirsted for something enduring and beyond them all, if the time has been to thee when no aims were thine but those of the earth, then look into thine own heart, and read its mournful memories, and thou art answered! Turn we now to a few of these hasty pencillings of a proud and restless and craving intellect.

"The night, starry and tranquil and full of beautiful visions as a poet's slumber, is resting on the summer-robed earth. Not a cloud is on the heavens, not a shadow flits over the innumerable stars that are looking down so placidly on this troubled world. I have no sympathy with this perfect peacefulness; a cloud would seem to me a friend. It was an idle, but elevating faith, that mortal destiny was traced unalterably in yon bright leaves; and fraught with holy and bewildering mystery must have been the lives of those whose days were passed in dreaming, and who, in the solemn depths of night, strove to reveal the unreadable histories written for eternity on the sky. Vain was the creed, but yet not vainer than many an one whose beginning and ending is here; and oh! how full of inspiration, passing the power of language to depict, must have been the ever upward hopes and illusions of the astrologers of old. They had a perpetual aim in existence, an aim unrealized and unattainable, but deceiving pleasantly and completely to the last. And is not this, the foundation of human happiness? if, in truth, humanity and happiness have any thing in common. How many real blessings would I willingly and rejoicingly relinquish for a permanent motive in life, however delusive. But it is my misfortune to view all things vaguely; to be ever longing, aspiring, seeking—for I know not what. What a waste of energy is my daily existence, what a continual frittering away of time, opportunity and talent. And yet, how can I avoid it? There is little scope for woman's ambition, and the world proffers nothing that harmonizes with mine. I hear praises of the great and gifted, and the approval lavished upon them stirs my very soul with the deep, wild pining that such commendations might be my reward. Little prospect have I of fulfilling such eager yearning; for I am too impetuous, too impatient, to be assiduous. The labor requisite to attain distinction, would embitter every moment, and literary fame is at once the most toilsome, and the only enduring one now attainable by my sex. Well were it with me, could I but learn to toil and be patient, 'to labor and to wait!'

"My heart is troubled, for I have heard to day the warm avowal of a tenderness whose silent presence has long been around me. It is an important moment in a girl's life, when she hears a lover's declaration of affection, for her thoughts go forth to the future with new vividness, and she learns to realize her woman's lot. The clouds or sunbeams of many after years, lie hoarded in the decisions of such brief instants. True and impassioned were the earnest professions I have heard, yet they have been breathed, and listened to, in vain. And am I so wedded to my idle, ambitious dreams, that a love so beautiful as his should be rejected, even while valued too well? And yet such rejection is better for us both; for I am not fitted to enjoy the tranquil pleasures of Herbert's lot, and he, amid the duties of his profession, will speedily cease to lament the loss of his boyhood's love. I write coldly, calmly, but my spirit grows faint, and hope dies within me, as I remember, and then look onward. But my era of romance has departed, if indeed, it ever had existence; I can not live without the excitement of public admiration and envy. I stand on the ashes of love, and now the world, the active, restless, rewarding world, must be my atoning future!"

Alas! young dreamer! thou knowest not what thou askest, in seeking the rewards the world ever giveth to those who trust in it!

JANE TAYLOR WORTHINGTON.

LINES TO THE ABSENT.

"Love! how pass the weary hours,
Since I parted from thy side?"
Dearest! when thy own lov'd flowers
Sweetest breathe at even-tide,
There I wander, thoughtful now,
Weaving garlands for thy brow;
But the rosy wreath I twine
Droops, like every joy of mine!
"Happy?" Yes, a tear is stealing,
Which I would not have thee see!
Much, too much, the heart revealing—
Happy? yes, I think of thee!

"Love! how pass the weary hours,
Since I parted from thy side?"
Dearest! in our rural bowers;
Where the sportive wood-nymphs hide;
Underneath the ancient tree,
Where I oft reclin'd with thee,
Or, in musing mood, I rove,
Sadly through the dark pine grove,
Hush'd my soul, in deep devotion,
While the solemn blast comes o'er,
Sinking, swelling, like the ocean,
Heard along a distant shore.

"Love! where pass the weary hours
Since I parted from thy side?"
Where we cull'd the sweetest flowers,
Asking, wishing nought beside.
Bending o'er the cool, clear stream
Where we watch'd the ripples play;

Sounds, as sweet as fancy's dream
Follow where it glides away.
Sweeter far the quick, low beating
Of a heart no longer near!
Or the whisper'd hope of meeting
Telling each how each was dear.

"Loved one! who will shelter thee,
Since I'm parted from thy side?"
Dearest! One hath said to me,
"Come, in my pavilion hide!"
And, beneath his folded wing,
Safely now I sit and sing,
Waiting 'till a brighter day
Soothe my sorrows all away.
Hither, when thy heart is turning
From a world of toil unblest,
Hither come! my sun is yearning
For its long-forgotten rest!

MAY DAY.

A VILLAGE TALE FOUNDED ON FACT.

May Day is past; but it may be well now to revive it, and to dispel the oppressive glow of Summer, by renewing, as it were, the smiles and freshness of "Ethereal Mildness." Perhaps, too, we owe it to the young of the numerous families, into which the Messenger goes; and to those who, though called upon to "put away childish things," will not let even the Dog star's fervor dry up the May-flowers of youth in their hearts.

———"Neque semper arcum Tendit Apollo."

Should the "village tale" sadden any by the reflection that life passes, as the Spring, they may be reassured by the "Addresses," to be gay and happy, while they are innocent.—[Ed. Mess.

"Oh! I am so glad, I am so glad!" exclaimed Lucy Ashly, a lovely, blooming girl, with great animation; "I am so glad to-morrow is the first of May!"

"Indeed," said Harriet Love, the eldest of a little coterie of boarding misses, pettishly, I don't care about it—we shall have no coronation, and so I don't care. I wonder why Mr. Thornton didn't let us have one. You know how delightful it was last year. Mary Harris was Queen—how beautiful she looked, and I was one of the maids of honor."

"Who besides?" inquired Lucy Ashly.

"There was myself!"

"Oh!" said the little group laughing, "you have counted yourself."

"Well, I'll begin with Susan Jones."

"How many were there?" said Lucy Ashly.

"There were eight, let me see; Susan Jones was one," at the same time pressing her thumb, successively, on each finger, with a corresponding nod of the head, "Caroline March was two, Helen McAllister was three, Ann Price was four"—

"Ann Price, that died last winter!" said Lucy.

"Oh, yes—but don't interrupt me. Jane Smith was five, Catherine Hope was six, Eudocia Fry seven, and I made eight."

"Where did you have it?" inquired Lucy.

"Oh! in that delightful grove that overlooks the village, under those tall oaks that seem almost to reach the skies. We had a beautiful bower, covered with all kinds of flowers, for I believe Mrs. Home and Mrs. Wise sent every one in their garden—so did all the other ladies; and we went in procession with a band of music before us. Mamma said we looked so pretty as we wound around the hill—and we had such a long table, filled with every thing that was good. I thought I should never eat enough, and I carried home my bag full to little Bill and Sam."

"Well," said a little girl who had hitherto been silent, "I wish we could have a coronation. I do not care about eating, I am always too much pleased to think about it, and Mamma will never let me carry home any thing in my bag, but I love to see the company, and hear the fine music, and we always dress so pretty, you know."

"Well," said Lucy, "if we can't have a coronation, we must have some fun."

"I am sure," said one of the girls, "we have no holiday to-morrow, so I must get my lessons. Hush talking, do hush girls, and let us get our lessons."

With this, she put her hands on her ears, and waving to and fro, began loudly to con her morning's task.

"Oh!" said Lucy after a pause, as if she had been pondering on some great and weighty matter, and with the vivacity of one who has suddenly bit on some new pleasure, "let us try our fortunes."

"Oh, yes!"—said all, with rapturous delight, "do let us try our fortunes."

"But, Lucy, how can we try them?"

"By taking a looking glass and holding it over the well. Ma says she tried hers when a girl and saw Pa in the glass."

"La me! I never heard of such a thing," exclaimed they.

"Well I have, often enough," said Harriet Love, but here is Miss Julia—let us ask her to join us." At this time, a young lady entered the room. She was two or three years their senior, tall and graceful in her movements, and with a face of peculiar sweetness and expression. "Miss Julia, Miss Julia," cried they vociferously, each trying to be the first to speak, "Will you try your fortune to-morrow! Do, now—oh! please do, 'tis the first of May, and you can see who you are going to marry."

"You silly things," said she, with a good humored smile, "let me go—you had better be getting your lessons;" and she essayed to pass on; but they continued with still greater pertinacity.—

"Oh, do! Miss Julia, please."

Being unable to overcome their importunities, and anxious to gratify their childish whim, she tacitly consented by asking what was to be done. They were all in raptures at her good-natured compliance, and they kissed her repeatedly.

"Now girls," said she, "you must go to bed. Papa (their preceptor,) is quite unwell and says he must dispense with prayers. You must not make any noise as you pass his room—so good night," kissing each affectionately.

As she retired, they bade her remember to get up very soon, as their success depended on their early rising.

Those gay creatures were up with the dawn, with the same buoyant spirits, as on the preceding night. They dressed themselves quickly, in a tumult of delightful anticipation, then gently tapped at Julia's door—"Miss Julia," said they softly, but eagerly, "are you ready?"

"Yea," said she, at the same time unclosing the door.

They silently descended the steps for fear of waking those who slept. As they opened the large folding doors, the air was fresh and balmy, and touched the cheek with beauty's breath. The early spring flowers were shedding their sweetest odors; the birds were making compensation for the long and dreary winter, and ushering in with their most melodious lays, this sweet month. May, beautiful May—how typical of youth! Just merging into life, when first weaving those fantasies of hope, those buds and blossoms of the heart, into every sweet and varied shape, little dreaming of the canker, that preys upon the tender germ, and blights the opening blossom.

They pursued their way, blithe and gay as young fawns, laughing and jesting on their coming fortunes. At last, they reached the well, encompassed by a few tall trees. They continued talking—but somewhat less volubly, and drew closely around, their voices gradually subsiding to occasional whispers. Each sobered into seriousness—"Hush, girls, hush!" whispered Lucy Ashly, "speak not a word. Now form the circle, and I will act the Sybil." She left the spot a moment, but quickly returned, bearing in her hand a branch, which was to serve as a mimic wand. All was now profoundly still. Lucy waving her wand, walked slow and solemnly around the well several times. At length, in a low but impressive voice, she repeated the following lines, (still walking slowly around.)

Sacred, sacred, be the well,
And potent be the charm,
And may we see,
Whate'er it be—
Whether of good or harm.
Omnipotent spirit! appear, appear!
And show thy vauhted power,
And ope to us life's quaint page,
At this sweet morning hour.

This is the morning of our life—
How quiet and serene!
But ere the Noon, or Evening sun,
What clouds may intervene!
Sacred, sacred, be the well,
And potent be the charm,
And may we see,
Whate'er it be,
Whether of good or harm.

She ceased—a solemn stillness pervaded the spot. Each took the glass in succession; some returned it with a gleam of satisfaction, while others looked indifferent, or disappointed. At length it came to Julia's turn. She held the mirror with a firm grasp, and looked on its polished surface with great intensity. She continued gazing longer, much longer, than the rest, her color heightening to a beautiful glow. She suddenly became deadly pale. "Miss Julia, dear Miss Julia, what do you see?" exclaimed the astonished girls, in alarm and expectation—"do tell us what you see." She tremblingly handed the mirror to the one nearest her and silently and dejectedly walked away. Arrived at home, Fanny Thornton, her elder sister, made some inquiries of the girls respecting their morning's adventure; then turning to Julia said with a smile, "Well, Julia, I expect to hear something quite romantic from you—pray what did you see?"

"Nothing," said Julia languidly, "nothing Fanny."
"I know Miss Julia saw something," said Lucy Ashly, "she turned so pale."

Fanny looked at her sister attentively, and perceived she was wan and agitated. She therefore forbore further remarks; but when at night she was alone with Julia, in their little sleeping apartments, she importuned her to tell her what she had seen.

"I know, dear Fanny, you will think me very absurd, but nevertheless, I will tell you. I saw, dear sister, a grave—yes, an open grave:—and I know you will soon be alone, in this little room—we shall no more lie side by side. Yes, Fanny, you will soon be alone, in our dear little room; and I," she said with a shudder, "will be in my little narrow home, no covering but the damp, cold earth, no shelter but the canopy of heaven. Say, Fanny, when the moon shines sweetly, as it is now shining, on my lonely grave, say—will you not think of me?"

"Julia," said Fanny reproachfully, "don't talk so. I am surprised that you should suffer such trifles to weigh on your mind. It was, I am certain, nothing more than an illusion of your too sensitive imagination."

"It may be so," said she dejectedly, "I have not been well lately. Although I am gay—sometimes too gay—I often think of dying. I seize each innocent pleasure with avidity. I love to visit my young friends; and oh! how dearly I love you all! but a cloud, a mist dims the future, that future which you, dear sister, think strewed with flowers.—I form no such anticipations."

"Nonsense, Julia, nonsense ;—it is all nonsense," said Fanny with a gaiety she did not feel. "What would Sinclair say to this ! you know his visits are intended for you, and we shall soon have a wedding. Let me see," said she laughingly, "when will it be ?"

"Never ! never !" said Julia emphatically, "he may be yours, or Lizzy's, but never mine."

"Well, well," said Fanny with a yawn—"we'll say no more, I am very sleepy, so good night."

The sisters were soon quietly slumbering, with brows as calm as the glassy lake untouched by the summer's breath. Julia awoke the next morning, cheerful as usual, and with the charming elasticity of youth, busied herself with her customary occupations. Oh ! happy period ! when the tear is soon chased by a smile, when the fountains of sorrow are quickly dried by the zephyrs of Hope ; or when sunbeams soon break through the cloud, making all sunshine and gladness.

One day, a few weeks after this, Julia was singing those sweet lines of Mrs. Dana's—

"Shed not a tear o'er your friend's early bier,
When I am gone, when I am gone.
Smile, if the slow tolling bell you should hear,
When I am gone, when I am gone."

Fanny remarked a tear stealing down her fair and rounded cheek. Discovering that her sister had seen the emotion, Julia said smilingly, "you know, Fanny, I am going from home to-morrow, perhaps to stay a week or two. I can not help feeling a little sad when I think of leaving you, although I anticipate a great deal of pleasure."

"Yes," said Fanny, "I know you will enjoy your visit ; the country is so beautiful at this season ; and Betty Grafton will make your time so agreeable ! I wish I was going with you."

The next morning the carriage stood at the door. Julia kissed her family circle, bidding them a warm and affectionate adieu ; she stepped gaily in, bowing and smiling on the loved ones, until they were lost to sight. As she was farther and farther removed from the village, she threw off the shackles of morbid apathy—inhaling the morning breeze laden with the fragrance of many flowers, listening to the song of many birds, and marking the rich and varied landscape. She felt a renovated being—she indeed felt the wild delight of a bird let loose. Her taste was decidedly rural, and as she alighted from the carriage, at Mr. Grafton's door, she exclaimed, with artless animation, "Oh ! how I love, how I do love the country !" Time flew on angel's wings ;—she rode, she walked,—she laughed and sang with all her heart. How blithe, how merry was she !

She returned to her home, redolent with health and joy, the gayest of the family group. The impression she had received on the first of May had entirely vanished, and she was unconsciously weaving those gay dreams so natural in the spring time of life. "Julia," said a lady who called shortly after her return, "will you walk, it is a charming evening, it is also the Sabbath, and I love on such evenings, to visit the grave of my dear, my angel child."

"I too," said Julia, "love to walk there on the Sabbath, when the heart and affections seem subdued and refined by its holy calm, its consecrated stillness. All seems in unison : it is a melancholy pleasure to visit the mansions of the dead."

While talking over the graves of those whom they had known, and sadly commenting on their fate, Julia complained of a headache. They returned, but Julia's indisposition increased. The next morning found her seriously ill ; a physician was called in, but still she grew worse. A consultation of several eminent physicians was held, but still she was no better. A week passed and but little hope was entertained of her recovery ; delirium ensued, and often she talked wildly and incoherently, of the warning she had received on the first of May. She awoke from a pleasant sleep and seemed refreshed. "My dear child," said her mother, "I know you are better ; I know you are, tell me my child, my angel, tell me you are better."

"Yes, mother, I am better,—I have had such a sweet and pleasant dream—a dream of Heaven. Your Julia will be cold, cold, when yonder setting sun shall have risen again, and when it sets again, it will throw its farewell glance on my new made bed. Mother I shall sleep then—so sweetly,—I am tired now, dear mother, but then—I shall sleep so sweetly—sweetly." She closed her eyes and slept forever.

MAY DAY ADDRESSES.

INTRODUCTION,

By the 4th Maid of Honor.

When the wild-bird spreads its wing,
When the bee its music hummeth ;
When the bright and glorious Spring,
Crown'd with beauty gently cometh,
Who would not in gladness meet her,
Sweetly woo and fondly greet her ?

In the valley—on the mountain—
On the sea—and on the plain ;
By the ripple-running fountain,
Trills the same delightful strain ;
Earth with all her thousand voices,
Bids her welcome and rejoices !

Rob'd in beauty bright and beaming,
Deck'd with jewels rich and rare,
Pearls of living lustre gleaming,
Mid her curls of clustering hair,
On a sunbeam blithe and gay,
Comes the beauteous month of May !

Then, the Fairies woo the flowers ;
 Then, does joy the purest flow ;
 Then, the golden plumag'd hours
 Brightly wing their way below ;
 Then, the wild birds sweetest sing,
 Then, the soul is like the Spring !

Welcome ye this beauteous day,
 Joy with purest love attend it ;
 Here we'll crown a Queen of May,
 Here in sweet communion spend it ;
 To all, from each, a welcome meeting !
 To one, from all, a loyal greeting !

Third Maid of Honor.

On this grassy emerald green,
 'Neath this overhanging bow'r,
 Graceful forms of Fairy mien—
 Sported at the midnight hour :
 "Tis the merry month," they said,
 "Tis the merry month of May ;
 Now, we'll seek the violet's bed,
 Now, we'll sing the night away.

"Who shall be the gentle Queen ?
 Who the mossy throne shall press ?
 Who shall walk the verdant green,
 And pluck the flow'rs of loveliness ?
 Who, with brow serenely fair,
 Who, with courage true and bold,
 The coronet of flow'rs shall wear ?
 The potent sceptre hold ?"

Then Titania, sweetly spoken,
 Answer'd from her acorn throne ;
 "By this simple fairy-token,
 Shall the gentle Queen be known :

"Eyes of light, and auburn hair ;
 Clear complexion, forehead fair ;
 Cheeks, where dimples blushing play,
 Rosy as the ruby's ray ;
 Lips, whereon the wooing bee
 Well might hang in ecstasy ;
 By these tokens shall be known
 Who shall press the mossy throne."

Lady, we have sought and found thee,
 Thou our gentle Queen shalt be ;
 Loyal hands, are here to crown thee,
 Loyal hearts, to bend the knee.

Second Maid of Honor.

Take thy crown of beauteous dyes,
 Wreath'd and twin'd for thee alone ;
 Pure and spotless as the skies,
 Take and wear it for thine own.
 On thy fair and radiant brow,
 Here, I lay the garland down ;
 Who more worthy—who but thou,
 Queen of May ! should'st wear the crown ?

Fair it is, as Spring's bright dawning,
 Fragrant, as its balmyest flow'r ;
 Fading, as thy Youth's young morning ;
 Transient, as its happiest hour !

Queen of May ! the elves decreed thee ;
 Queen of May ! we make thee known ;
 Loyal ladies long to lead thee,
 Queen-like to thy mossy throne.

First Maid of Honor.

Seated in thy regal chair,
 With the warbling birds above thee ;
 Blest with courtiers ev'ry where,
 Tried and true, that can but love thee ;
 With the seal of royal-seeming,
 On thy brow of beauty beaming,
 Happy art thou ! Joy shall bless thee,
 Cares of State shall ne'er distress thee ;
 And in Story's magic mould,
 Thine shall be the age of gold !

Take thy sceptre, Queen of May ;
 'Tis a wand of potent pow'r ;
 Emblem of thy regal sway,
 Worthy of the golden hour.
 Take, and by thy blushing cheek,
 By the words thou fain would'st speak,
 By the love-light in thine eye,
 By thy garland's beauteous dye,
 One and all, thy subjects prove,
 By the magic pow'r of love.

Then, by all the hearts before thee,
 By the minstrel-music o'er thee,
 By the sweetly whispering breeze,
 By the fairy-dancing leaves,
 By the sunbeam's brightest treasure,
 By the purest thrills of pleasure,
 Speak thy bidding Queen of May !
 Breathe the word, and we obey.

Queen's Address.

Sisters, courtiers, subjects, how,
 How, shall I your love command ;
 Tho' the crown is on my brow,
 Tho' the sceptre in my hand ?
 Fain would I in welcome meeting,
 Give you all a Queen-like greeting ;
 But the honor, and the favor,
 And the compliments you pay—
 Make my struggling spirit waver,
 Take my thankful thoughts away.

Sisters, (thus I first address you,)
 All the joy and love I owe ;
 All that bids my spirit bless you,
 As a sister I bestow.
 Tho' thy kindly gift elates me,
 Tho' the regal pow'r awaits me ;
 Yet, when Time's fast moving finger
 Bids yon glorious sun go down,
 Tho' the dulcet hours would linger,
 I must give you back my crown.

'Till that hour of trust and duty,
 'Till that summons comes to me ;
 Tho' these forms of fairy beauty
 Well forbid a harsh decree ;
 Yet, by all the love I bear you,
 Duty bids me not to spare you.
 Let no anxious thought be here—
 Not a sigh—not a tear—

Not a breath of breathing care—
 Not a murmur in the air,—
 Nought of sadness—nought of sorrow—
 Time enough for them to-morrow ;
 But to-day, the bliss is ours ;
 Wreath'd in beauty, crown'd with flow'rs,
 Here it woos us—here it meets us—
 Here with gladsome welcome greets us.

Courteous subjects,—one, and all,
 Let us to the banquet-hall !
 There, may joy as here attend us,
 There, may pleasure blushing send us—
 Dulcet sport and gladsome play,
 Worthy of this festal day !

THE FIRST SCHOOLMASTER !

A LEGEND OF THE CENTAUR.

—“Cessere magistri Phyllirides Chiron.”—Virg., Georg. III., 550.

No man likes to have his father ill-spoken of. It comes near home. His own honor is touched by it. In like manner, to be thought a man of no ancestors, a mere filius nullius, hath somewhat of disgrace in it. A good taster knows very well that the clusters of this wine were sunned on the hill sides of Madeira, and of that on the slopes of the Carpathians : nay, a good taster most certainly knows that this cup hath its flavor from a northern exposure, and that from a southern ; as the learned and nice Montanus could discern whether an oyster had grown near Circeii, or in the Lucrine lake. The grape smacks of the soil in which it grew. So men buy a horse, not for his points only, but for his pedigree. The winner of the palm at Elis comes not of the same stock with the Satureian nag. As a man may well take shame to himself for the foul deed of his ancestors, so is he entitled to some share of the renown, and this too without reckoning the merit of the blood. Thus it is that men live before they are born, and have a patrimony in the past ; as well as after they are dead, entailing a sad or a glorious inheritance on those who spring from them. And so, in all time, has it been declared, that noble birth is sponsor to noble doing. Antiquity every where affirms that heroes and poets and the founders of commonwealths are the offspring of the gods. Orpheus sprang from the loins of Apollo. Was not the silver-footed daughter of the sea proud of her boy, Achilles ! What but the maternal love of Venus guarded Æneas through his years of wandering and perilous wars ! Even the little great have rendered homage to this doctrine of heavenly birth, and the son of Olympias dared to claim descent from Ammonian Jove.

Kindred to this relation of a parent to his children is that of the founder of an art, or a fraternity to all the craft and brotherhood. The freemason allows no one less than Solomon to be his master. The snipe-shooter claims to be of the family of Nimrod, and a merry company of thieves will do business under the patronage of “thrice great Hermes.” Why may not we too search out our genealogy, and boast ourselves in the merits of our great progenitor ! Or hath the schoolmaster alone no saint in the calendar, when St. Crispin even hath those that reverence him ! We are not so fallen. The cobbler shall not have his laugh of us. We make our reverence to Tubal-cain : yet, though he be a teacher withal, we are not of him. We lift our hat to the Centaur Chiron. He is our father. We admire his skill : we are lost in wonder at the amplitude of his knowledge. We revere him as the great Seeker and Finder.

Far away on the hills of Thessaly dwelt this wondrous being. Tempe refreshed him in her grassy meadows, the Peneus slaked his thirst, and Ossa and Olympus echoed to his cheerful horn in the chase, and his merry laugh over his wine cups with Pholus. Foremost in feats of strength, and peerless in grace and beauty, (out on thee who couldst find it in thy heart to say si modo natura formam concedimus illi.) and sought after by many a fair-haired Hylonome, his rocky cave was ever his unshared home, and wild wood sports his occupation and delight. Nor might the youths, more than the maidens of Thessaly, win him to their companionship. The assemblies of mortals were not honored with his presence, save only when he might find just fellowship with demigods and heroes of celestial birth. Nursed in wild and rocky solitudes, and trained by want and danger, he grew into nobleness and strength.

Gladly would we tell all the story of this our great ancestor and pattern. But scanty and imperfect are the records of that rugged and solitary life. In this was he a type of his most excellent followers, whose lives are passed in the quiet obscurity of doing good : and good deeds love the shade. Rarely did he leave his calm retreat and his favorite pursuits. Yet once and again we find him on gala days and feasts of solemn fitness, sharing the festivities of mingled gods and men.

Once, when were wedded heroic Peleus and gentle Thetis, who scorned not human nuptials, the chivalry of Thessaly were there, from Phthiotis, Tempe, and the walls of Larissa and far Scyros ; and the rude peasantry forsook the plough and the hook, to gaze on the splendors which that day came up to Pharsalia. There, in the mingled throng of gods and demigods, came Chiron,* as to no too lofty fellowship. Peneus, the river god, and forest-girdled Tempe brought each an offering of trees and woven flowers, and wise Prometheus, whose limbs yet bore the traces of his vast agony, and the dread Paræ with their prophetic song. The ox-eyed mother of the gods was there: and all of the immortals, save only Phœbus and the chaste huntress of the Carian mount. Yet in this august presence was our great master as an equal, and father Jove disdained not to drink with him health and fair issue to the blushing-bride.*

Still was his mountain cave his home, chosen for meditation and quiet thought. The proud, unwise, would disdainfully scoff at the cloud-begotten, the nubigena.† Yet was he a true "son of the mist," who loved nature as a mother, and was steadfast in his love, were she gentle, or in storm. And from this filial devotion came his wisdom. The "unwedgeable oak" and the everlasting hill were at his side, ever mute monitors of constancy and endurance: the moon, on whose broad disk he gazed in the midnight chase, or from his lonely couch on the side of Othrys, taught him her lesson of perpetual growth and decay: the obscure and neglected wild-flower revealed to him its cunning: the music of the stars inspired an inward harmony, and the fierce mountain winds trained him to perfect manhood. In this communion with nature he grew wise, and the beasts of the field learned to reverence and obey him; which great fact the artists of later ages have not inaptly symbolized by a twofold nature.‡

Wisdom hath no limit, and knowledge can not be confined. The fame of it comes forth from the desert where it would hide, and draws the young, the generous, the pure-minded to itself. So to this far off school came the sons of gods and heroes to gain strange lore and the perfectest masters of art. Came the famed son of Alcmena. Vain had been the lessons of strong Castor, of skilful Eurytus, of Autolycus, of the noble bard Eumolpus. Each had taught his separate art, but the completing accomplishment and grace could be given only by the hoary experience of Chiron. Well doth the glory of the pupil attest the virtues of his master; and long as the "twelve labors," twelve constellations shall endure, shall abide that master's fame.

Came the renowned son of Thetis, wrathful and fierce, whom the marrow of lions and fat of bears strengthened for the sad conflicts of Troas. No homely exercise taught his fingers to fight. Testis erit magnis virtutibus unda Scamandri. Came Esculapius, the gentle, the beneficent: the mild radiance of whose virtues attracts like the evening star. From the hand of the teacher he received a talisman which unlocked the secret powers of herbs, and the hidden agencies of minerals, and the healing virtue of flowing waters, and gave an antidote to the miseries of mortal life in the heart-easing nepenthe, and to its temptations in the deep-rooted moly. Could not he wrestle with death stronger than Hercules! Alas! that Jove should fear a divided Empire, and a thunder-bolt be the reward of so glorious benefits! Yet hath the bag of simples its efficacy, and we laugh at the impotent rage of the thunderer, which only gave immortality to its victim.

Time would fail us to report the worth of Jason, of Peleus, and of the many who became illustrious under the instructions of the first teacher. Yet we must drop a tear over the fate of the gentle Actæon. Brave was he in his life, mournful and untimely in his death. No unhallowed passion, no vain curiosity led him to the fatal fountain: but the nimble deer, and a hunter's weariness, and a cool shade: and an erring glance, and the wrath of the maiden Dian, made the solace of his life the bitterness of his death. But the attendant Nymphs hung many a chaplet in memory of the beautiful stranger; and his faithful hounds howled a sad eulogy.

None of the many who have striven to follow the example of our great progenitor can boast of such pupils. In these poor days, Busby might look somewhat proudly on his bench of Bishops: but how faint that praise!

But we must close our eulogium. Once again, at the marriage feast of Pirithous and the fair Laodamia, we find the presence and venerated gravity of Chiron, awing to peace, and calming the hot passions of riotous wassailers.

Alas! that the wise should die! that the good we do, often stings us like a serpent! That the hand which had learned its inevitable aim from the great son of Ixion, should loose the arrow of his death!

Yet weep not, ye who have admired, and imitated and mourned. Yonder! high in the heavens! the Archer! that bright constellation! That is our Master.

THE ABSENT SISTER'S LAMENT.

And art thou gone, my brother!
And is thy pilgrimage so quickly o'er—
And shall I hear thy pleasant voice no more—
Oh, was there then no other!
That Death must nip a flow'r as fair as thou,
And set his icy seal upon thy brow?

And when again I come
With hasty step—and heart o'ergushing full—
To clasp the lovely and the beautiful—
E'en in my own dear home!
And ask for thee—Oh, no! they shall not say,
That thou, my own lov'd, has pass'd away!

And when I turn my eyes
Upon the lovely group, and wait to hear
Thy silver tones, come bursting on my ear,
In welcoming surprise;
Oh! must the tear—and half-averted head—
Tell to my bursting heart, that thou art dead!

And when I call for thee,
And on thy fair young cheek would fain impress
A Sister's kiss, and feel thy sweet caress;
Oh, shall it come to me
With spirit-crushing pow'r, and thick, faint breath,
That thou art sleeping in the arms of death!

That thou did'st leave thy play;
Leave the glad circle of thy father's hall,
Thy young companions, mother, sister, all;
And take thy lonely way
Down to the Spoiler's home;—that thou hast gone,
In all the freshness of thy radiant morn!

That thy young life is o'er—
Thy fond heart still—thy pulses ceas'd to beat—
Thy cheek all pale as thine own winding-sheet—
That thou wilt come no more
With thy sweet smile, and soft angelic eye,
To glad my spirit as in days gone by!

No, no, I see thee now!
Thou art not dead; for oh, if it were true,
That thou hadst gone, without a last adieu—
Clean gone forever, thou!
And I had not been nigh thee, ah, I know,
My heart had ceas'd to beat, oh! long ago!

And yet methinks they said
That he had gone—that in its bright young bloom,
Death nipp'd the flow'r, to deck his bridal tomb—
That in his lowly bed,
They laid him gently down in quiet rest,
And 'pil'd the sod upon his sinless breast!

Methinks—methinks they said—
He ask'd for me—to fan his fever'd brow—
And kiss his burning cheek—to tell me how,
When he was cold and dead,
He hop'd I'd come, sometimes, unto his grave;
Where flow'rs, perhaps, would bloom and green grass wave.

Mother, I'm coming home!
My soul is heavy, and I fain would lie
Upon thy bosom! no, he could not die!
Tell him I'm coming Home:
Home, to the dear old place—the one lov'd spot,
That Time may all destroy—but Memory can not!

"OUR KATE."

CHAPTER I.

"I can not do that! ask me not! If my father is no longer able to support me in college, I must look about for some other resource; but I will not be dependent—least of all on my best friend!"

"I honor your spirit, my dear Frank!" replied Edward Stanton, "and yet I would change your resolution. I have abundant resources, thank Fortune! or Providence, I should say. Early left an orphan, as you know, I am my own master, I am alone in the world. Let me share the fortune which I scarcely prize with you, who deserve it so much better than I. Don't you know the adage, 'a friend indeed is a friend in need?' Vice versa. I have it! but no matter! Give me leave to be a real friend."

"You are so, Edward! Your sympathy —"

"Sympathy is very good, my dear fellow! but it won't fill your purse—nor is it all, you may justly claim of my friendship. I do not believe you love me! You don't believe me a true friend!"

A tear sprung to the manly cheek of young Lee, as grasping the hand of his chum, he replied, with strong emotion, "do I not? take this proof of it—that I will not lower myself in your esteem by accepting your proffered bounty. In your soul I know you do me justice. You approve the principle from which I act. Were our circumstances reversed, I know that my feelings would be yours."

"And would not mine be yours?" interrupted Stanton.

"Indeed they would! and yet I believe I should esteem you more for refusing to gratify them."

"And what do you propose to do?" asked Stanton after a pause, during which both had looked musingly in the fire, as if that could throw some light on a dark path.

"Leave college, I suppose, for a year or two, and go to digging for money."

"It is too bad! too bad that you must quit the field now when the goal is in view. One year more and we may graduate together! What a proud day it would be! But unless you are to share its honors with me, I protest I care not a fig for them all!" Lee was sensibly moved, but with a strong effort he controlled the rising in his breast, and answered, "it is I who have most to lose. To stand by your side would have been glory enough, for who can stand higher than Edward Stanton! But it is all over now, I fear. Instead of vain regrets, I must think of stern resolves." Another silence ensued, which Frank at length broke by saying, "there is the Academy in N — without a Principal. Could I get in there for a year or two, the work is done. Who knows but that is just the place!"

Frank Lee was never long in forming a resolution, nor slow in acting upon it when once formed. Without another word he rose, went to his desk, wrote, folded and sealed a letter; while his friend sat with his eyes still on the fire, his feet on the fender, and his head leaned on his hand, in a fit of melancholy musing, which lasted till Frank Lee had returned from the post-office.

CHAPTER II.

It was a bleak November night, just a fortnight after the above conversation took place. The hills of New England were all white with the earliest snow. Sadly the wind moaned, in the long row of naked elms, on "College Green"—but it was scarcely heeded by our two friends, as they drew up the study-table to a well-replenished fire, and sat down to their evening's labor. A stranger would have marked the contrast between them, and wondered, at first sight, how they came to be friends. Edward was tall, slender, almost feminine in person—his high, pale brow stamped with the seal of thought—his eye deep-set and melancholy—his manner indicating a sensitiveness too keen to leave its possessor at ease, except in the society of those whom he loved and trusted—and they were but few. To them he was irresistibly fascinating, not so much by the force of his genius and the brilliancy of his wit, as by a certain delicate playful seriousness, which seemed assumed, while it was altogether real. Frank Lee was not so tall as his friend, but more robust—his ample brow, clear and open as the day—his cheek glowing with health and manly beauty—his eye now blazing with eloquent passion, now melting with tender affection; always bright, and diffusing gladness over whatever it looked upon—his manners gay or serious, according to the impulse of the moment, but ever displaying the whole-souled cordiality and sincerity of his nature—his soul alike capable of the lofty and the tender in sentiment, frank, generous, high-toned and guileless as an infant's. Lee was a general favorite, and became so at first sight, while Stanton secured affection only where intimately known. Such were the two natures, which, like two opposite poles of the magnet, insensibly attracted each other and became as one, till the two friends were never seen apart.

They had not been long at their tasks this evening, when a hasty knock at the door, and the entrance of a fellow-student caused them both to start and look up. "I was at the post-office and thought I might as well save you a walk in the snow-storm," said the intruder casting down a handful of letters, and making his exit as unceremoniously as his entrance. Frank seized one that bore the post-mark "N ——" and hurriedly broke the seal.

"And what will you do now?" anxiously inquired Stanton, perceiving from his friend's fallen countenance, as he laid down the letter, that it brought only disappointment.

"Trust Providence, and try again," replied Lee, trying to look cheerful.

"If worse comes to worst you have still one friend!"

"I know it! I believe it!" cried Frank, warmly grasping the hand which Stanton extended, "and I may be driven to beg for the kindness I once rejected; but not till every other resource fails me. Ah! what's this! a letter from Kate!" he exclaimed, picking up one which had lain unnoticed. Eagerly tearing off the seal, he began to read, his countenance undergoing a variety of changes, mean while that quite non-plussed the sagacity of Edward, as did the frequent ejaculations which the reader threw in, par parentheses. "What does the girl mean?" "Here is some joke!" "no—Mother's P. S. will explain all." "Noble girl! God bless her!" A gush of tears accompanied the last exclamation. "Here, read this!" said Lee, putting into his friend's hand the letter which had produced such an unwonted display of feeling. "Read it, Edward! If ever there was a good sister—if ever there was a happy dog, I am one!"

"Which?" asked Stanton laughing. "Oh! the dog to be sure!" And with that, our excitable hero got up and described such a variety of antic circles around the table, that his more philosophic friend began to fear for the safety of his understanding which was no doubt endangered by his near approaches to the fire in some of the aforesaid performances.

Dear reader! if your curiosity is on the alert like mine, step hither, and take a peep over Stanton's shoulder, as he reads—but lightly! and remember never to do the like again!—

"My next letter, dear Frank! is likely to be penned in 'Dismal Swamp,' or some other interesting part of the sunny South. I wonder if I shall be so fortunate as to fall in with one of your 'noble-hearted Virginians!' and I wonder if I should treat a 'proposal,' should he make one, as you have done! How I should love such an opportunity to show my disinterestedness! and how he would admire it! and how heroic I should feel!—But pardon my nonsense, dearest Brother! Seriously, I admire your generous-hearted Southron, and would fall in love with him too, were it as easy to get out as to get in! and as for you, my noble brother, I love and I admire you a hundred times more than ever. And I'll do more than that. You shall go to college, and through college too, in spite of Fortune. My little head has devised a way, and my little heart is quite big enough to do all my head can devise. You are not going to turn Pedagogue—that's out of the question! nor are you to turn Paddy and go to digging praties—but I, with all my nonsense, can be serious, and I have taken it into my wise head to be a school-ma'am. Hinder me, who can! My trunks are at the door. Rose and Hetty are watching for the stage which is to convey me to Providence, whence I shall go on to Fredericksburg, Va., with Mrs. La Motte, an old friend of Mamma's, now married to a Southern planter. It was through her agency that I obtained the situation which I am going to occupy as teacher. Hark! the stage is coming. Dear Mamma tries to look cheerful, and I try to feel so—but—good bye!"

P. S. by Mrs. Lee. "'But it is hard work,' she would have added. Yet, for your sake, my beloved son, we can do it, and much more. Our Kate is really gone! I can not realize it. The whole thing has been so sudden, so unpremeditated, at least by me, that I am as one bewildered, hardly knowing what has happened. Kate has, I believe, had this project in view ever since Mrs. La Motte's visit to us last summer. The day before your last letter came, we received one from her, stating that she knew of a good situation for Kate, which could be immediately secured, if we desired it. 'Mother,' said Kate, 'think of that opportunity to aid our dear Frank! In our present embarrassments, such a salary as I shall receive is quite a fortune.' Your letter arrived. It decided my wavering resolution—and our noble Kate joyfully received my permission to do as she pleased. 'I please to have my brother stay where he is!' said she. 'He would do anything for us—I will sacrifice a little present happiness for him. It will only be for a year or two—and then when I return, and Frank graduates, and we are all together once more, how happy shall we be! how light will be the toils, the sorrows then past!' And she is gone! Your dear father sinks under the reverses that have overtaken us. But we hope for brighter days. When you return, wearing the laurels which a strong arm has enabled you to win, we shall be both proud and happy. Go on! my darling boy! write for yourself a name that we can read with honest pride. Fear not that our Kate will repent of her resolution. She is no longer the timid, sensitive child that she appeared in the days of our prosperity. She has become, all at once, energetic, unselfish, cheerfully devoting herself to the task of sustaining us in our misfortunes. She is learning to look on life as it is—'real, earnest'—not a vague longing for that which is not! That she will adapt herself to her new situation, and be happy in it, I doubt not. Our blessings, and the blessings of Heaven be upon her, and upon you my son!"

CHAPTER III.

We will now put on our "seven league boots" and transport ourselves to the front porch of an old-fashioned mansion in one of the interior counties of Virginia. We have left snow-storms and driving blasts far behind. It is a warm sunny afternoon, and we may sit in this little shaded porch, while the children and kittens gambol in the yard, without getting our noses frost-bitten. Indeed it is quite like summer; one genuine Indian summer; so soft, so warm, so dreamy, that even you little bird—you see him in the aspen yonder!—folds his wing, and sleeps, and dreams, perchance, of his loving mate, who hops lightly from twig to twig, as if in fear to disturb his slumbers. A light, soft veil of mist hangs over that still lake, just there among the persimmon trees—lake we will call it, though it seems more like an artificial convenience for making ice in the winter; serving also as a bath for sundry animals of the fowl, or foul kind, at other seasons. But listen. What is little Fred saying?

"I don't believe I shall like her! that I don't! She won't let me laugh or play a bit, I spose!"

"Why, bubber! you don't spects to play in stool, does you?" asked a blue-eyed girl, a year or two his junior, with an air that seemed to say, "Ah! I know all about it!"

"I wonder if she is pretty!" observed a youth of sixteen, who, with his back leaning against a tree, stood patting a savage looking beast whom he called Beauty.

"She may be pretty enough, for your Yankee girls are all so, if bright eyes and blooming cheeks constitute beauty; but I imagine they are all her fortune, or she would hardly be coming out here to exchange them for money," replied his brother, some two or three years older.

"For shame! for shame! Gerald!" cried out a thoughtful looking girl, who had hitherto sat reading on the door-steps, but now rose and moved to the side of an elderly gentleman in the porch, who put his arm round her and said, fondly:

"That's right! that's right! my child! Always take the part of the injured!"

"As you do, dear grand-papa! and I thank you for teaching me that lesson! And will you be my teacher still?" she asked after a pause, during which she had been twining a lock of silver hair in her fingers. He drew her closer to his side, and pushed back the curls that fell over her pale intellectual forehead, shading a pair of soft hazel eyes, that turned confidently on his own. "And why should you doubt it, my Lucy?"

"I do not, only I thought, perhaps, now Miss Lee is coming——"

"You shall have two teachers instead of one—so never fear, my child," said Mr. Ashton, kissing her. Lucy put her arm around his neck, and murmured in a voice low and soft as the music of a stream, and yet so plaintive that it seemed the moaning of a turtle-dove. "Nobody loves me like you, dear grand-papa! Mamma is—does not like me to caress her. Oh she is not like my own sweet mamma, whom I shall see no more! My own gentle mamma! And papa—he loves me—but he is seldom at home, nor does he ever talk to me like you. I sometimes think he loves even Beauty and Cato more than me, for he never seems so happy as when caressing them. But perhaps I do wrong to say it. You look displeased! are you angry with me? Pray do not be angry!"

"It is better," answered Mr. Ashton, his brow resuming its placid aspect, "it is better that you should not indulge in remarks of this kind. Never does it become a child to criticise a parent's tastes and pursuits, however she may feel in regard to them."

"Forgive me—I will not do so again. But—I know not how to express what I feel—I am so lonely here"—and Lucy laid her hand on her agitated bosom. "I am so lonely grand-papa! I have no friend but you, and ———."

"And you want another who is younger and handsomer! Is that it?"

"No, but ———"

The reply was prevented by a shout among the children, of "There they come! there they are!" and a moment after a carriage rolled up to the front gate. A black servant hastened to let down the steps. Out jumped a middle aged gentleman, with a jovial eye, and a face that indicated a fondness for good cheer. After depositing himself safely on terra-firma, he proceeded to hand out first a lady in velvet hat and feathers, secondly "our Kate," habited in a simple riding-dress, and straw bonnet. The children crowded round "mamma," drawing her as far as possible from the formidable "school ma'am," and engrossing her attention so completely, that the stranger was in a fair way to be forgotten, had not grand-papa perceived her following alone, and gallantly handed her up the steps. Mr. Morris had lingered behind to return sundry attentions bestowed on him by his quadrupedal friends.

"Jenny! show Miss Lee up stairs. Dick, take those trunks up to her room." The servants did as ordered, and both contrived to linger, under some pretence or other, long enough to get a peep at the new teacher's face.

"I want no assistance," said she, at length, wondering why they did not go. Whereupon Dick made his bow—but Jenny, being seized with a sudden fit of industry or neatness, or both, caught up a broom and fell to brushing the clean brick hearth.

"That will do," said Kate. Jenny examined the pitcher which she had herself filled, not ten minutes before, and finally made her exit. Kate sat down to collect her thoughts. The door opens. "Misus say does you want anything?"

"No—thank you," and Kate begins to examine the state of her trunks.

Door opens. "Come to see does you fire burn."

"It is doing very well!" is the half impatient reply. "What next?" thinks our tired heroine, wondering if all the servants in the house are coming to see her. Again the door opens—Kate looks round nervously, and sees a pair of saucer-like eyes, and two rows of very white teeth, looking forth from the surrounding darkness, like two new moons from a thunder-cloud. "Well, what now?" The saucy little "nigger" grins in her face and runs away. Our heroine hastens to turn the key, but it is not there. "Well," she wearily reflects; "well, this is not home, my own sweet home!" That word never seemed to her so full of meaning before. Home! its forsaken joys—its kind tones—its beaming eyes—its dear embraces—its bright hearth, and cosy winter evenings, all come back like the shadow of things long past; and she feels as if ages had intervened since she left them, though it is but a week. Home! the sound unlocks a fountain of sweet, bitter thoughts, and she throws herself on the bed and weeps. It is the first time since she left that home. Hitherto her mind has been occupied—but now, the strangeness of her situation bursts upon her all at once; a new feeling of depression, of abandonment, as if there were no being in the world but herself, comes over her, and she can but weep!—A light foot-step has glided into the room. Kate turns away her face, expecting no sympathy, and not choosing to betray emotions which she feels are too sacred for the eye of a stranger. Presently a soft arm steals around her neck, and a voice so like her own dear Hetty's, that it startled the blood from her heart to her cheek, murmurs timidly in her ear, "do not cry! are you very sad, dear Miss Lee? I am sad too sometimes, though I am not far from home, like you! I should love to have a sister, such as I know you would be! May I not be your friend, your own dear sister?" It was not in Kate's nature to resist kindness. She looked up in the sweet, serious face of Lucy Morris—for she it was—folded her arms about her, and answered as her grateful heart dictated.

Very slight things direct the currents of feeling. Kate found herself, without an effort, becoming cheerful. She thought of the motives which had made her a voluntary exile—her brother's image rose before her, and she felt strong. "It is for him!" she said to herself, "and it is but for one or two short years and then I shall return." Hope, bright-winged hope, presented before her the hour of reunion; she began to think how her mother would look—how much the little ones would have grown—whether her father would have any more grey hairs—whether she herself would be at all changed; and what the neighbors would say. The tea-bell summoned her, in the midst of these speculations, and, hastily arranging her disordered curls, she followed Lucy down to the supper-table. Mr. and Mrs. Morris are there, Mr. Ashton, Lucy's maternal grand-father, is in his place. Half a dozen chubby-cheeked children are scrambling into their seats. Gerald and Howard, two older sons of Mr. Morris, fill the remaining places. Kate glances timidly round the table, and encounters the eyes of Gerald fixed on her with a free and easy air of critical nonchalance that brings the warm blood to her cheek, and she is glad to turn, with some light remark, to the gentle girl at her side. Tea is served. Half a dozen colored waiters present this thing and that; till Kate, perplexed, knows not what to choose, and wonders why they can not let people alone. She is glad when supper is over and her quiet chamber again receives her. Weary and heart-sick, she tries not to despond. Her mother's parting gift, a small Bible, lies on the table. She opens it where a leaf is folded down, and reads, "The Lord loveth the stranger—love ye therefore the stranger!" A grateful tear steals over her cheek. She feels no longer friendless. With a trusting prayer to Him who cares for the lone heart, whether of "the widow, the orphan, or the stranger," and a resolution to bear her weary exile with patience, and fulfil her new duties with cheerfulness, she lays down to rest, while a thousand images of the past, present, and future, are fantastically blended in her dreams.

CHAPTER IV.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER.

Holly Wood, Nov. — — —.

"A year, a whole year has passed, dear Mamma! since I wrote you my first letter from this room, and here I am again, writing on the same table, by the same cheerful fire—Lucy, gentle, dear Lucy, is at my side, reading Milton. I wish you could see this sweet favorite of mine—she calls herself my pupil, but is more a friend to me than a learner of me. She is so good, so gentle, so docile, that I can not but love her; while there is a latent energy,—a half-revealed enthusiasm belonging to her character, that makes me admire as much as I love her. There is a something in her soul-like eyes that I can not fathom—the shadow of a hidden thought—a mystery—a sad, earnest meaning—a memory or a half-defined hope, that is more fear than hope—in short, a je ne sais quoi, as the French have it, which I can not make you understand—so I will not try. Her form is delicate, almost spiritual—her face pale, but ever-varying in its expression—her manners shy, yet graceful as a timid fawn's—her heart, I have already told you, kind as a sun-beam. Lucy's mother died when she was not six years old; yet her image and her very tones are enshrined in Lucy's soul. To the memory of her mother, and to the careful training of Mr. Ashton, she is more indebted for the excellence of both mind and heart, I believe, than to any other parental influence. There is a certain beautiful harmony in the qualities of both, that I have seldom seen in one so young—for Lucy is not sixteen—the result, I doubt not, of Mr. Ashton's judicious superintendence.

"But I forget that you care less about sweet Lucy than about somebody else, who is not half so amiable. Am I 'happy?' Yes—no—yes, I believe so. Mrs. Morris says I shut myself up too much—that young ladies should dress more, visit more, and be less bookish. Perhaps she is right; but certainly she does not understand my motives in declining the invitations I receive. You know, dearest Mother, and you appreciate my aims, motives, feelings; and it is enough. I want no better society than my books and dear Lucy. She is just the companion for me—never obtrusive, instinctively reading my feelings, and adapting herself to them; serious, playful, pensive, by turns, and always at the right time. When we walk, she is at my side, or gliding away, as I happen to be moody or social: when we sit in the woods, listening with subdued feeling to the 'voice of God among the trees,' she is absorbed in thought, so hushed, so retired within herself, that I am alone as I love to be in the solemn woods.

"Lucy has a fine taste in drawing, and sketches admirably from nature. On one occasion, I caught her in the act of pencilling my pretty phiz on the cover of a book. I said nothing till the picture was complete. It took her a long time, I thought, to put the finishing strokes. At length she laid down the pencil, and contemplated her work in silence. An expression of sudden pain darted across her face,—she glanced at me, and colored deeply, but instantly became pale again, as she met my eye, fixed on her with a look of inquiry. I begged to see the sketch. 'Very artistically drawn,' I cried, delighted with the accuracy of expression in every feature; 'but who is this?' I asked, pointing to another face, which seemed the very embodied soul of Frank's noble-hearted Southern. Lucy was musing and did not answer. 'What does this mean?' I again asked, 'it is very like my brother's Southern friend, Stanton!' 'Ah!' she exclaimed, but suddenly relapsed into her musing attitude, saying carelessly, 'Oh! I only wanted to see how you would look together!' I confess my curiosity was considerably excited; but as Lucy has never alluded to the little scene of that evening it has died of starvation.

"Now for the main subject of my letter, which, according to rule, must be put in a P. S.

"Will you suffer me to remain another year! They all wish it, especially Lucy, who entreats me with tears to stay, and for her sake I have promised to do so, if I have your permission."

FROM MRS. LEE TO KATE.

"It is thanksgiving eve. The parlor hearth is blazing merrily. A group of happy faces are gathered round it. There sits your dear father, who has 'renewed his youth,' since our beloved son returned to us. Here he is, at my elbow, looking a foot taller, at least, than he did a year ago. Our hopes have not been disappointed. The highest honors of the class were his, or might have been, had he not voluntarily relinquished them in favor of his friend Stanton. This steady, generous friend, is now one of our circle, and will be, we hope, for some weeks, previous to his departure for the South. We already love and admire him as much as Frank could wish. He is the life and charm of our social circle, that is, when he suffers himself to be drawn out of the reserve so common to those of his temperament.

"Our dear Rose has grown so that you would hardly know her; as for Hetty she seems to think herself large enough. We are all here—but where is our beloved Katy? Our hearts are yearning towards her—we feel a vacancy, which only her bright presence can fill. We say to ourselves and to each other, she is the best! the dearest! she has made us all happy, and will she not come to share our joy? Most reluctantly we grant you permission to remain, but for one year, remember! for we long to clasp you to our hearts, especially Frank, who talks of nothing but you and gentle Lucy! He is half in love with her, I do believe! By the way, I can throw a little light on that 'sketch' of hers. I read aloud your description of Lucy, all but the scene, as you call it. Stanton listened like one in a dream. "Lucy Morris! yes, it must be the same! I remember her well. My mother had some friends residing in the vicinity of Holly Wood, and used often to take me there. Little Lucy, just then bereaved of her mother, had found a home for a time in the family of Mrs. West, the lady whom we visited. I used to spend hours in contriving amusements for her; but she was unlike other children, thoughtful, mature, far beyond her years. Her greatest delight was to lean on my knee, and listen to stories of wonderful events gone by, and accounts of the wonderful men who acted in them; her questions and remarks evincing an acuteness of observation, and depth of thought quite unusual in one so young. I remember to have had the feeling that she was destined to an early grave. On one occasion I expressed it to her, (unwisely perhaps, but I was then a mere boy,) when she looked up in my face and asked 'would you weep for me, dear Eddy?'—so I had taught her to call me."

"And when did you see her last?" inquired Frank, looking so like a jealous lover, that we could not forbear a little good-natured raillery.

"Not since she was a mere child; two years old perhaps!" replied Stanton.

"Here the subject rested, for the young men both fell into a fit of abstraction that lasted till bed time.

"P. S. Your brother has been elected 'Principal' of the Academy in our village, with a salary of $800 per annum. So you see he is to be a pedagogue after all."

KATE TO HER MOTHER.

Holly Wood, May.

"Alone, lonely, with no being to sympathize in my joys or griefs, I now, for the first time, experience a depression of spirits that quite unfits me for the task of instruction. Task! it was hitherto a delightful one! but now my heart sinks, my courage flags; I pine for the breezes of my native hills; for the dear familiar voices; for the old elms; the rose-bushes; the stream where I used to play in childhood! Do the wild flowers spring along its borders as they used to! Dear Mother! forgive my childishness—I can not help the gushing tears! My heart is sad, very sad, and I have none to say it to but you. 'Where is Lucy?' do you ask. Gone. Her delicate health rendered some change of air necessary. Mr. Ashton, in alarm, determined to set out immediately, and to spend the summer in journeying with his darling child. His love for her is unbounded. Poor Lucy pleaded hard to remain with me. 'I shall be better soon,' she would say—'I am beginning to improve already. You do not understand my case, dear grand-papa—dear Miss Lee—let me stay! I shall soon be well!' Mr. Ashton shook his head however, and so the preparations for a journey were made.

"On the evening before their departure, Lucy and I sat together at my window, as we often did at the calm hour of twilight; I gazing on her pale face—she, as it seemed, communing with her own thoughts; for though her eye wandered from object to object, she evidently saw as though she saw them not. I put my arm within hers. She turned her soft, dreamy, mournful eyes on mine, gazed earnestly and long in my face, and then, talking to herself rather than me, she murmured, 'I see it all now! yes! my vision is clearer than it once was—she will be happy!—Well, she deserves to be so! she lives to make others so!' After a pause she continued, 'It was so bright! I could have wished it not a dream; but—I'm waking now, after so many years! I shall live to some purpose yet!' She paused again, and I whispered, 'You do, Lucy! you do now! you make me at least happy! Why talk so sadly! I love to see you cheerful, dear girl! and would do any thing to make you happy.' 'Any thing?' repeated Lucy, raising her head with sudden animation; but it soon drooped again on my shoulder, and she went on talking to herself. 'She would do it! yes, I know she would! but it is for me—not her! yet she will help me. I was so lonely once! she came, she loved me, she unfolded my own heart to me. She made me conscious of powers within of whose existence I had scarcely dreamed. I am weak—she knows not how weak—but I can be strong—I shall be. I already feel a new soul growing within me; my shadowy life is passed away! now begins the real, the earnest, the active!"

"Why! how strangely you are talking, dear Lucy!" said I, not knowing exactly what to think of this new development of character.

"Am I?" she asked vacantly. "Well, I am a strange girl!"

"You are a dear good one, at any rate," said I, folding her in my arms, "but why not confide in me? Why not tell me all you feel?" I thought of Edward Stanton at the moment, but as she had never made any allusion to him, I dared not do it.

"Not now, dear Miss Lee!" she replied, "not now! but when I return, when I am older in the new life that just dawns upon me, then—not now."

"Mr. Ashton's voice upon the stairs, calling for Lucy, put an end to our conversation.

"Dear Mamma! I think of her, till I forget myself. The impression is sometimes strong upon me that our destinies are interwoven—how I know not—whether for good or for evil I can not tell—but no storm shall fall on Lucy, if I have power to avert it."

June 23rd.

"How happy I am to-night, dear Mother! Guess why! Mr. Stanton is here, and I have spent the whole evening in talking about you, and Frank, and home, and all the dear ones there! and it is almost like seeing you. I fancy you will ask if I have seen the original of the 'sketch.' Yes—there was no mistaking the lineaments of that face; once seen, it is not soon forgotten at least, so it would seem from Lucy's experience. He has been asking after his 'interesting little friend,' and paid so fixed attention when I spake of her, that I really became quite flurried and could not go on."

July.

"MY DEAR FRANK:

"Your friend promises to become very neighborly. He has purchased an estate adjoining Mr. Morris', where he now resides, at least when he is not at Holly Wood, and that is six days in the week. He comes over almost every afternoon to inquire about Lucy, or to tell me something about his visit to you, that he had not thought of before. Somehow or other, he contrives to make me talk a great deal, but I don't think he knows half I say, for he sometimes asks the same question three times over. Poor fellow! I hope Lucy will return soon, or he will evaporate into an abstraction. He must be desperately in love —"

CHAPTER V.

And so he was, not with Lucy Morris, whom he remembered only as a very interesting girl; but with the unconscious Kate Lee herself. He had no intention of falling in love—indeed he thought nothing about it; but the frank, intelligent, sprightly face of Kate insensibly interested him; while her manners, cordial, artless, and unaffected, like her guileless heart, made him feel at home in her presence, as he had never done in that of any other lady. Forwardness would have disgusted—affected coyness repelled him—but the native simplicity and sincerity of Kate Lee, at once, interested and pleased. Her vivacity amused, her good sense instructed, and her cheerfulness made him happy. Day after day found him at her side, riding, walking, reading, singing, (both loved music,) and it was not long before Kate discovered that whether he read, or sung, or only talked, his voice was the finest she had ever heard. Something in its deep, flute-like tones, caused her heart to thrill with emotions it had never felt before. The commonest things, when uttered by that voice, seemed, all at once, to glow with life. Was it strange that the daily tasks grew lighter, now that evening brought its delightful rambles, its long conversations about home, and Frank, and Lucy! She believed in her heart, that Stanton had some tenderer thoughts of Lucy than he breathed in words, and once or twice Kate sighed when she thought of her near return, without well knowing why. Stanton, on the contrary, often spake of the pleasure he anticipated in renewing his acquaintance with her. Kate tried to feel as anxious for her arrival as she believed him to be—but she was surprised, and vexed with herself, to find how great was the effort required.

CHAPTER VI.

Month after month had rolled away. The "last rose of summer" lay faded and fallen,—Autumn, rich, sober, thoughtful Autumn had come, and with it Lucy and Mr. Ashton; the former evidently improved in health, and with more elasticity of spirits than was usual with her. Kate observed that she was now more constantly employed than formerly; and that she seldom indulged in dreamy, idle musings. Mr. Stanton continued his visits at Holly Wood. Towards Lucy his manner was gay and playful; with Kate it became serious, and he conversed in a tone of deeper feeling. The former was not long in marking the difference, and assigning its true cause. In his presence she said little, and withdrew whenever she could with propriety, to her books, or her needle, but seldom to those solitary walks which she had once loved. He did not urge her to stay, at which Kate wondered—but innocently thought it was because he loved to speak of her as he did frequently in her absence.

Weeks glided on. Lucy became more and more industrious—Kate more and more observing. She studied Lucy's face and manner—her own heart she closely questioned, and the result was a hasty resolution to go home.

"And may I not accompany you?" asked Lucy, when Miss Lee had communicated her intention; "I have always wished to see the land of the Pilgrims. May I not go with you?"

"Ah! you can not get away so easily! There are other voices to be heard, as well as mine. Wait, my pretty bird, till your wings grow: then come, and doubt not I will welcome you, even as I now fold you to my heart."

"But why must you go? Is it for my sake? It can not be for your own? There is no reason why you should fly from—from Mr. Stanton?" inquired Lucy, suddenly looking up in the face of her friend, as if a new idea had just struck her.

"Is he not then a dangerous companion?" asked Kate, looking full in Lucy's eyes.

"Not to those whom he loves!"

"Not to you then, dear Lucy!"

"You mistake, dear Kate! widely mistake the truth."

"It is you who are mistaken, Love! Does not Stanton evidently show his preference for you? With whom is he happy? For whom are his sportive sallies, his brilliant fancies, his smiles! all for you, Lucy!"

"And because he thinks me a child—a too serious one—and wishes to amuse me. He never trifles with the one he loves. Believe me, I am too sedate, too reserved, too like himself, it may be, to please him. He wants what I have not—an ever-bubbling fount of cheerfulness, to enliven the wastes of life, a vivacity just like your own, to beguile its weariness, and break up its monotony. Don't you believe in the harmony of contrasts? I do—and from my own daily experience, I feel a yearning for something out of, and unlike myself, to make up my completeness. A part of myself is wanting——"

"Your worser half," suggested Kate.

"No, no! my stronger half! My soul is weak. It seeks a strength that seems to belong to it, and yet is not in it. From childhood, my hopes, my yearnings, my dreams, vague and half understood even by myself, ever shaped themselves into the form of one who had forgotten me, but whose image, tones, looks, had become interwoven with my very being; so that I seemed to have no existence separate from his. I lived only for him; only in myself. You came—your voice awoke in me a better soul; I saw you sacrificing yourself for others—I became conscious of a latent power to act—to live—hitherto I had only dreamed. By slow degrees I awoke, I stretched out my arm, I tried to rise—then I felt my weakness, I looked around for help, I saw you, and I said 'I will rest on Kate! She will teach me to stand—she will infuse her strong soul into mine. There is an earnestness in her life, that shames me into courage.'

The shadow that haunted me so long recedes. A something real stands forth in the distance. It beckons me on, it seems like the other soul which, united with mine, shall make a whole. It is not the image which memory used to present to my dreams. It is more like hers who awoke me to a better life. And can I say to it 'leave me!' Let me sink back to darkness, to weary inaction! Stay, dear Miss Lee; be my better angel, at least for a few months longer, till I become more like yourself! But yonder comes one that will persuade you, if I can not."

"Don't go, dear Lucy!" But Lucy had glided away as Stanton came up, and feigned to be looking for something among the fallen leaves.

"Is it true that Miss Lee is about to leave us?" inquired Stanton, in a tone that quickened the pulse at Katy's heart.

"I have been away from home nearly two years," replied Kate, with a composure of manner that surprised herself; "there are many there who watch for my coming!"

"And well they may! well they may!"

The earnestness of this reply called up a warm glow to the cheek of Kate.

"But who cares for me," he continued, in a tone so melancholy that she involuntarily turned her full, glistening eye on his—"who is then to bid me 'welcome home' when I turn from a weary world? You have a home! a bright happy home! and warm hearts there to welcome you; I am an orphan—alone—homeless. Nay, should a passing memory of the stranger, whose path you have so often cheered, should such a thought come to you, in that distant home, say that you will not banish the intruder, and my heart shall bless you!"

"My brother's friend will surely not be forgotten," answered Kate, so warmly, that a moment after she repented of it.

"Will you then think of me? Will you pray that I, too, may be happy! that I may have a home?"

The eyes of Edward must have seen the tears starting into our Kate's just then, or else it was by chance that he possessed himself of the little hand that lay trembling on his arm, asking as he did so, "and will you, dear Miss Lee, will you return to be the light of that home?"

The reply was so low, that Stanton was obliged to bring his head very near Kate's in order to hear it.

CHAPTER VII.

Holly Wood, Nov. 30th.

"Well, dear ones! another year is gone! joyfully I am turning my feet to the ark where my loved ones dwell. Next week I shall set out for dear New England. And whom do you wish to see besides my ladyship? Not Mr. Stanton, though he pleads hard to be my guardian angel; but grand-papa and dear Lucy. Mr. Ashton will spend only a week or two with you; Lucy has promised to stay till she has learned to manufacture dough-nuts and johnny cakes—I guess that the pedagogue will give her lessons. Whether she will pay him, remains to be seen. Of course I have not hinted my guesses to her. You will find her an apt scholar, Mr. Frank! The gentle, pensive, dreamy girl is becoming almost as great a busy-body as myself. Her character is daily unfolding, changing, or settling itself, if I may use the term. She will make a charming woman. I used to fear for her. She was all ideality once—but the ideal now serves, in her, as a veil of enchantment about the real, not sufficient to disguise—just enough to soften and beautify.

"P. S. Mr. Stanton begs a remembrance, and signifies his intention to visit you next summer if Papa has no objection."

CHAPTER VIII.

"Next summer" has come; the Lee's are in a state of unwonted commotion. Preparations for some great event are going on; it is rumored in the village that a wedding is approaching. I may as well whisper in the reader's ear that "Papa made no objection," and so Mr. Stanton is coming to claim his promised bride. Frank has gone to meet him. The two friends have already embraced as brothers, and are hastening homewards.

And what of our Kate! She sits in her still chamber, looking out upon the streams, the walks, the flowers of her childhood, now passing away forever! Another home is hers! another path lies before her—but the star of love beams brightly upon it; and though her dear ones may not walk with her there, yet the dearest one is at her side, and it is enough!

And Lucy! what of her! she has found the other part of herself—at least, so it would seem, for there is a light in her eye, an elasticity in her step, a color in her cheek, that belonged not to them when we saw her last.

CHAPTER IX.

Let us look into the parlor! There are the father and mother, happy, but quiet and almost sad. There is Kate, looking tenderly from one to the other, the color coming and going on her cheek, so that Stanton, who sits in a recess, gazing upon her unobserved, thinks he never saw her so beautiful! Frank too is there, looking quite sentimental for a pedagogue!

Listen; they are all talking about Lucy. "I am so sorry she is going away!" says Rose; "I shall have nobody to dress my dolls!" "She is so kind to help me in my lessons," chimed in Hetty. "I am sure I shall never love any body else half so well!" Frank thought his sister more sensible than ever before. "And I," said Mrs. Lee, "have, surely, cause to love her! Never was a child more attentive to the wishes of a parent than she to mine!" "She is so gentle, so good, so child-like!" joined in Mr. Lee, "and so affectionate," said Kate; "and so artless!" said Edward.

Frank says nothing. "And don't you love Miss Lucy, too?" innocently asked little Hetty.

"We will excuse you from telling," observed Mr. Lee, pitying Frank's embarrassment, "provided you go and find her."

"And provided also, that you tell her!" whispered his friend, slyly, as Frank passed out.

Lucy had stolen away for a lonely ramble. It led to a grove, where she had often, with Kate and her brother, sat under the trees, at sunset, and watched the crimson clouds, and listened to the low sighing breeze. She was there now—leaning against an old moss-covered pine, whose branches waved gently in the evening wind, giving forth a low, plaintive murmur, that seemed the echo of her own thoughts. There she stood, and gazed up into the deep blue sky—spirit-voices whispered among the trees, and died away in soft cadences. Long she stood there, and gazed, and listened, till the past, the future, the present, were all forgotten—life, its cares, its joys, its sorrows no longer existed. Nothing lived in the universe but herself, and the great spirit of love breathing around her, its presence felt rather than seen. Absorbed in deep devotion, she scarcely heeded that one who had often worshipped with her there, had placed himself by her side. They spake not! they breathed not; but his hand was clasping hers, and both were happy! They had often wandered, hand in hand, among the groves, and over the hills; and Frank had felt that he could traverse the rudest waste with the gentle Lucy by his side; and she had never known weariness when his strong arm sustained her.

"How sweet it would be to stand here thus for a life time!" whispered Frank.

"Methinks I never understood the mystery of life till now!" said Lucy. "Nature unfolds herself to me in a thousand beautiful forms, since I had your eyes to see them! With you I live another life—my soul expands; I feel capable by your side of rising to the height of all that is glorious and beautiful!"

"And why should you ever leave me, dearest Lucy?" cried young Lee, folding the enthusiastic girl to his heart, and kissing away the tears that trembled in her eyes. "Will you be my own, my own sweet wife!" he asked, but most provokingly, got no answer, for Kate and Edward made their appearance just at this interesting crisis. Lucy threw herself on Kate's neck, while Stanton joined his friend, and sobbed, and laughed as Kate wickedly asked—

"Ah, have you found the missing part of yourself here in the woods?"

"I am perfectly happy now, my own sweet sister!"

"And so am I!" "And so am I!" exclaimed the two young men approaching and folding the united sisters in their arms.

And now, farewell, patient reader! Should it be your hap to enjoy the southern hospitality of Edward Stanton and his amiable wife, do not forget my compliments to "our Kate"—or should an equally benign Providence lead you into the polished circles of her native village, fail not to inquire for Professor Lee, and his gentle bride, as also for our old friend, grand-papa.

AN EVENING WALK.

From eastern climes how peaceful and sedate
In sober majesty pale night comes on,
And o'er gay nature's sweetly varied face,
Deep shading all, her silver mantle throws.
Congenial silence on her solemn steps
Obsequious waits,—and thoughtful. Not a breath
Disturbs the placid air. On the bough the leaf Unquivering hangs. The crystal lake seems
To enjoy the happy calm, nor wears a dimple
O'er all her silver surface. By her side
Sweet contemplation walks with pensive brow
Intently musing. Nature seems to feel
The soft impression and sinks down to rest.
How sweetly gay is yon cerulean field
Inlaid with the glittering gems of Heaven
Set by thy Almighty hand, Father of light,
And love and beauty. In the dawn of time
Thou formed'st at nature's universal frame,
Moulding its every part, with sovereign skill.
The golden sun, bright mass of vivid fire,
Thou fashionedst in the hollow of thy hand.
Around the centre thy omniific word
The starry orbs in beauteous order hung
And bade the planets know their various spheres;—
Imposed those laws by which the harmony
Of heaven is preserved. Then to thy will Obsequious, in majestic, solemn state
First moved the grand machine, and ever since Has moved, incessant travelling in the Glorious round. Where'er I cast my eye
The solemn scenes to solemn thoughts invite.
The rising mists gathering o'er the hills
Hide deep their verdant heads. O'er all the plain
The liveliest green sinks into deepest shade,
And mute are all the songsters of the day.
Sovereign director of unnumbered worlds
'Tis thine to bid cities and empires rise
And at thy pleasure fall;—to lay in dust
The proudest glories of the sons of men—
To make a desert on the fertile plain,
Or with thy beauty clothe the barren soil.
All is thy work, and all thou dost is good.
While at this solemn hour the prostrate world
Unconscious lies, and the mad sons of riot,
Pursue the midnight revel; oft let me
With all that blest tranquillity of mind
Which innocence and meditation give,

To such delightful solitudes repair,
And to its sweet enthusiastic joys
Give up my ravished soul.
Oft let fancy take her flight through regions
Unexplored, through ideal worlds delighted
Range, happy in her own gay created charms.
Blest solitude! a thousand joys are thine;
The boundless social wish, the wide embrace
Which grasps the works of God with universal praise.
Peaceful and calm, with thee fair virtue dwells,
And sacred wisdom makes her blest abode.
Thrice lovely pair! ornaments of Heaven,
Your happy paths let me forever tread;
Unwearied follow where you point the way,
And all your footsteps reverently adore.

THE RURAL AND DOMESTIC LIFE OF GERMANY,

With characteristic sketches of its cities and scenery, collected in a general tour, and during a residence in the country in the years 1840, '41 and '42. BY WILLIAM HOWITT. American edition—Philadelphia, 1843. One vol., octavo, pp. 197.

Year by year German literature is acquiring more and more importance. It is so extensive, so various, and so highly wrought, that it commands attention, and its characteristic patient and labored thinking necessarily gives it great perfection in those departments to which it is chiefly directed.

The reading world is much divided in opinion as to its value. By some it is spoken of as surpassing the literature of any other country, while with others it is a favorite mark for ridicule. And this is not surprising, for at a first glance, many German works present a strange medley. Lofty and elevated sentiments are mixed up with the most common and trivial matters, and to illustrate an argument or a theory, a comparison is taken up from the street, or the kitchen. In their philosophy, again, we find positions laid down as matters of course, which to us are not very easy of comprehension. These are regarded by some as monuments of the power of human reasoning. Others finding them wholly unintelligible, naturally reject them as unmeaning words. Yet we find Germans of strong mind and acute judgment subscribe to them unhesitatingly.

German literature and German life should be studied together, for without the one, the other could not be what it now is. To their literature, their manners are in no small measure indebted for their present form, and we see the traces and effects of their every-day life in every page of their writings. Perhaps there is no more perfect picture of a certain kind of German life than that contained in Goëthé's Wilhelm Meister. Acknowledged by his fellow countrymen to be such, the strong and marked impression which it leaves upon the mind is likely to outlast the comparatively faint ideas derived from a dozen books of travels through the country. The weakness of the hero, and worse still, his contemptible obsequiousness to the noblemen whom he meets towards the end of the book, constitute a strong picture of a certain class of German youth, and show the injurious effect of the veneration entertained by most Germans for those elevated above them by titles of nobility. The condition of morals depicted there is more forcibly brought before us, than it would be by a hundred statistical accounts of the state of their capitals, and the facility with which Meister twice transfers his affections from one to the other of the heroines of the third volume, needs but to be read to be appreciated.

Goëthé's opinion appears to have been, that the best education for a young man consists in roving about the country, connecting himself with strolling actresses, now acting himself, now instructing others to act, and finally purchasing a right to associate with noblemen by the sacrifice of his independence. To prove this more satisfactorily, a friend of the hero's is introduced, a young man of energy and strong mind, who has devoted himself chiefly to commerce. After a long separation they meet again towards the end of the book. Meister has acquired a déagé air, and has grown tall and handsome. Werner's exertions have given him a slight stoop, and have rendered his nose rather sharp and thin. The superiority, therefore, of the former's mode of life is obvious.

In the "Life of Quintus Fixlein," Richter has given us a very interesting little sketch of a country school-master who becomes a country parson, and who, though extremely simple and plain, attracts and pleases us by his true German goodness of heart. His classification of the errata of German authors is entirely in keeping with the close attention to trifles, which has too frequently been the aim of the learned of that country. Fixlein's mother is a simple old country woman, who loves her son and admires his acquirements without having any very well defined idea what they are; and his bride, Thiennette, is as dutiful, loving and retiring as any German could wish. The portraits are all eminently characteristic, and are not easily forgotten: we can not help receiving them as faithful. So it is with other writers. Germans are fond of describing their countrymen, and a want of close likeness and circumstantiality are among the last faults of which they can be accused.

On comparing the German character with that of other countries, we at once perceive various peculiarities, good and evil, which separate it distinctly from all the rest.

On the evil traits we shall not enlarge. The Germans themselves make no attempt to conceal them, and they lie open to the observation of every one. They may be said chiefly to consist in a less close observation of some of the laws of morality, a want of independence, and an absence of energy.

First and foremost among the good, we place the German goodness of heart, openness and straightforwardness. These are inestimable. Perhaps there is no place in the world where a stranger may sooner feel himself at home than in Germany. He meets with kindness every where. The very peasant smiles as he meets him, and wishes him good morning. English warmth of heart is concealed by reserve and coldness of manner; French warmth of manner and politeness are too often a cover for indifference, but in Germany we find the warmth of manner and of heart combined.

The untiring patience of the Germans has always been acknowledged, and though sometimes a matter of ridicule, certainly commands our respect. To it we are indebted for new and curious views in philosophy, for our best dictionaries of the classical languages, for the best commentaries on the writers of antiquity, and for the productions of all their musical composers who have been most celebrated for genius and originality. If occasionally carried to an extreme, it is a fault common to most other virtues.

German honesty stands unsurpassed in Europe. Though there is much poverty, there is little destitution: the very needy are assisted by the government; thus dishonesty is kept down, and the rest of the people are left uncontaminated. Of their rectitude we have the strongest evidence, that of strangers, whose ignorance of the language places them at the mercy of all whom they deal with; and when we find all their testimony concurring, the evidence is conclusive. Strangers find it impossible to recollect the comparative values of the different coins in consequence of the great variety circulated through the different German States, and yet they have rarely reason to complain of imposition. In illustration of this, we may quote an anecdote from a little book of travels in Germany, recently published.

An English clergyman just arrived in a German port, and entirely unacquainted with their money, was solicited for alms by a little boy. Finding that he had nothing but gold about him, he resolved to make a trial of German honesty, and gave a piece to the boy to have it changed. The latter soon returned with a handful of silver, out of which the Englishman told him to keep a small sum which he named. To pay his fare, he held out the handful to the coachman, who took what he considered just. The rest was placed in a pocket by itself, and was examined by a German friend who pronounced it to be exactly right. To those who are acquainted with European morals, this incident will have its significance.

German industry is unwearied and unending. It is not that strong and irrepressible energy which with us overcomes all obstacles and surmounts all difficulties; it partakes strongly of the character of the nation,—slow, patient and opposed to innovation. But man, woman and child, none are idle; the rich valley of the Rhine is made to bear to its uttermost;—soil is carried to almost inaccessible parts of the mountains, and when there is no hold to retain it, it is secured in baskets fastened to the rock. The breaking up of each spring carries with the water and ice a large portion of this soil, and the same labor is to be gone through year after year; yet the peasant never shrinks from it. The very leaves of the forest are collected to serve as litter for the horses.

These are perhaps some of the most salient points in the character of the great Teutonic Nation. We do not hesitate to say that there is much evil mixed with the good: immorality, insensibility, obstinacy and other faults are constantly to be met with; yet the time is past when these were considered, not as blots upon a fair surface, but as themselves constituting the national character.

Father Bonhours has already been severely handled for having doubted the possibility of a German's possessing "de l'esprit," and we will therefore spare him, merely asking if it be possible at this day for any one to read the pages of Goëthé, sparkling even through the mist of a translation, to become acquainted with the deep feeling of Richter, the ballads of Uhland and Herder, or Schiller's "Würde der Frauen," and question the existence of German genius?

The "Rural and Domestic Life of Germany" appears to be written in a good spirit. The author has evidently travelled for enjoyment, has always been willing to be pleased, and when mishaps and disappointments were inevitable, in place of betaking himself to the old English resource of grumbling, he has made light of them, and has been willing to forget them. His descriptions are often lively, and in some places he seems to have written from his heart; but on the other hand, he is frequently dull, and his book is long, unnecessarily long, spun out. Had this and the "Student Life of Germany" been compressed into one volume, the size of either, the whole would have been much more readable. Nor can we compliment him upon his additions to the English language, upon the new words which he has introduced, and which are remarkable neither for their aptitude nor their euphony. Yet with these unquestionably great faults, the book has many amusing passages, and shows evidences of observation. The author evidently kept his eyes and ears constantly open to what was passing.

He opens his subject with the just observation, that we should commit to paper our first impressions of a new country, and not wait until use has dulled our appreciation of their differences from what we have been accustomed to. Thereupon he proceeds to describe the air of the first German town that he entered, the ill-paved streets, upon which a man accustomed to smooth pavements is in constant danger of falling, the projecting iron shutter-bars, which are ready to receive him as he falls, and the many obstructions peculiar to a German village, the sidewalk filled up by a mass of firewood, or an old carriage set on the pavement to be out of the way.

The "overpowering smells" are another, and we should judge, a very disagreeable novelty which strikes the traveller on his arrival. It appears that Cologne with its thirty-six odors is but a type of German villages in general.

Mr. Howitt is struck by the care which the peasant shows in preserving and making use of every thing.

"The cuttings of his vines are dried and trussed for winter fodder. The very tops and refuse of his hemp are saved for the bedding of his cattle, nay, the rough stalks of his poppies, after the heads are gathered, serve the same purpose, and are all converted into manure. When these are not sufficient, the children gather moss in the woods; and in summer you constantly meet them coming down out of the hills with their great bundles of it. In autumn they gather the very fungi out of the woods to sell for poisoning flies, and the stalks of a tall species of grass to sell for cleaning out their long pipes. Nothing is lost; the leaves in the woods are raked up as they fall, and are brought home before winter to serve as bedding for cattle. The fir-cones, which with us lie all scattered in the forest, are as carefully collected to light their fires, or are carried in sacks and sold in the cities for that purpose. The economy and care of the German peasant afford a striking lesson of utility to all Europe."

But with all this industry and attention, they nevertheless take good care not to break the bow by over-straining it. Saints' days and holidays are periods of great merry-making; a large portion of every Sunday is devoted to amusement, and at intervals they have their "Kirchweigs," or wakes, when the whole town or village turns out and passes the day at some spot selected for the purpose in the neighboring country. While at Heidelberg, Mr. Howitt was present at one of these wakes, and the spot chosen is the Wolfsbrunnen, or Wolf's Spring, about a mile from the town.

"As we approached the Brunnen, we saw a dense crowd there. The sheds and tables were all occupied. There were groups of fierce-looking, whiskered and smoking students, other groups of families, with their choppin, or glass measure of wine, and bread and butter, or cheese, and sundry cakes, enjoying themselves in quiet as they looked on at the gayety around them. The upper outside galleries of the house were filled with gay spectators. Donkeys were standing ready saddled for such as chose to hire them for the young women returning to the town, and music announced that dancing was going on near. This we found was in a large shed close to the inn. Several of the trout reservoirs were planked over to prevent people walking into them, and a throng of gazers surrounded the dancing scene. There was a sort of orchestra at one end, at which twenty couples were waltzing. It would have looked strange in England to see shop-boys and girls, nay, shoemakers' and tailors' apprentices, joiners, smiths, boots, or any body, waltzing with their smart-dressed girls in the shed at a country wake. It would want but this to put waltzing out of fashion with all the other classes of our countrymen. But Germany is the country of waltzing, the waltz is the universal and almost only dance of the people, and they could just as well live without tobacco as it. From the highest saloon in Vienna or Berlin, to the lowest shed in the village, or to the village green, round spin the Germans, and are as happy as if they were in Paradise; nay, what would Paradise be to them without a long pipe, a tall glass of beer, a smart girl and a brisk waltz? The dancing, indeed here, would not have disgraced a splendid saloon. The dancers were for the most part people under the middle size, and had nothing remarkable in their appearance, but some of the girls were very pretty, and this exercise gave an attractive glow to their naturally fresh cheeks. Here and there was a student in the circle dancing with some pretty girl of Heidelberg, and we could not avoid being reminded of Goëthé, as he describes himself in his life, mixing in such scenes at Frankfort with the fair girl, destined afterwards to figure as Margaret in Faust. Indeed what writer in Germany has so completely transferred to his works the popular life of his country as Goëthé has? His descriptions both of the country and its people come before one continually with a delightful surprise."

A pleasant feature in the German character is the fondness for travelling. With many of them, it is true, travelling is a mere search after dissipation; the cities are visited as places of luxurious enjoyment; the baths for the sake of their gambling houses, and their crowds of revellers. But with by far the greater number of German tourists, the source of attraction is the beauty of nature. The mountains, the valleys and the rivers are visited, are seen with enthusiasm, and the traveller returns refreshed, both in body and mind, well prepared to encounter the trials of another year. In Mr. Howitt's words—

"There are no people on the face of the earth that all summer long enjoy themselves like the Germans in their gay capitals; but autumn approaches, and the great climacteric of the year is reached. The whole nation is astir. Not a man or woman can rest long. Every one must fly in quest of change, and pleasure and health. The whole population is like one huge hive of bees at the point of swarming, there is one vast motion, buzz and hum. Every soul must have his Herbstreise, his autumn tour. He must visit the watering places, and drink and bathe. He must traverse the Rhine, the Elbe or the Danube. He must climb the mountains of Switzerland, or the Tyrol. Steamers are every where loaded to sinking, inns are full to suffocation, and landlords stand shaking their heads, gabbling German, French, English, Italian, and Russian, and bowing away disconsolate travellers, and dusty carriages from their doors. Railway trains are enormous in length; and a smoking and a talking are going on in them that are astounding to the stranger. Baden, Baden-Baden, Wiesbaden, all the Badens; Schlangenbad, Carlsbad, Wildbad, Alexiabad, all the Bads; Ems, Ischl, Bad-gastein, every watering place is full. Meeting in the early morning, and drinking of the sulphurous or effervescing water in the Kursaal, or holding a five o'clock gossip in the warm general baths, men and women together; plunging into hot or cold baths in private, making drives to the neighboring castles and scenery, sitting for two hours at tables d'hôte; purchasing of nosegays and paying musicians; the parade, the splendid conversation-house, the ball, the reunion, the gambling in an evening,—and thus it goes at the watering places.

"But every spot of the country which is attractive; every mountain district, every gay town, every fine stream is alive with the ever-moving throng of pleasure-tourists. The heights and castles of the Rhine and Danube; the vales and defiles of the Saxon Switzerland; the romantic regions of the Salzburg, the Noric and the Swabian Alps, the Franconian and Thuringian forests, in short, every spot of gaiety or beauty receives the temporary hosts of these wanderers.

"And in truth I can say from experience, that a more delightful mode of spending an autumn is to be found in no country. When winter closes again upon your home, you shall find that this sunny dream does not fade, but that you have laid up a life-long store of rich remembrances; have widened the field of your vision, and spread around regions of beauty through all the space of your inward world, that neither winter can reach, nor night darken, nor time snatch again from your knowledge and enjoyment."

So fully are the advantages of travelling understood, and it may be, overestimated, that all the young Handwerksburschen, or apprentices, after finishing their Lehrjahre, or apprenticeship, are obliged to travel for from three to six years, over the country, supporting themselves by their handicraft, and improving themselves by observing the different methods practised in different cities. On their return they must make and exhibit a "Meisterstück," or masterpiece, which if satisfactory, entitles them to enter formally upon the practice of their craft. Each trade has its guild, or association in every town, and the wandering apprentice receives assistance, if in need of it, from the guild of the trade to which he belongs. If he falls sick, he is cared for until he recovers. This system is at once so curious and so universal, that we shall quote some of Mr. Howitt's remarks upon it.

"But there are advantages derived from this wandering system of the handicrafts, which may be said to be far more than a justification of it. If much time is lost to their artistical advancement, and if they seldom reach that degree of excellence, which an exclusive direction of their attention to the capitals of Europe would bring, on the other hand, they see more of their own country than the same class in any part of the world does. They wander at public cost through the various States of their common country. They see the varieties of men and manners, of cities and costumes. The beauties of nature are brought under the eye of all that have a feeling for them. They tread the spots celebrated in their history, and calculated to inspire a patriotic sentiment. They are made aware of the greatness and extent of the Fatherland. Galleries, works of art, noble specimens of architecture, celebrated ruins, and peculiar institutions are open to their observation, and many of them, as we shall see, do not neglect to avail themselves of these privileges, and lay up for their future lives, a store of the most delightful recollections and subjects of conversation. It is in fact in this point of view, rather than as a means of perfecting themselves in their individual arts, that the excellence of the system, in my opinion, lies: though at the same time, it is not to be denied, that it is attended with many dangers and abuses, as it must be while it lets loose such a swarm of raw and rude youths, as must of necessity exist in this class, who, without gathering much good for themselves, are very capable of corrupting those that they circulate amongst."

Here follows a description of the youth upon his travels, and the feelings he is likely to experience at the approaching prospect.

"It is thus that we see these youths strolling on in groups, or one by one, from town to town, in every part of Germany. A leathern knapsack on their backs, under the cover of which is generally rolled a cape, to throw over their shoulders in rain; a hat, often covered with oil-skin; in summer a linen blouse bound round the waist with a belt, in the hand a stout stick, and in the mouth, or peeping out of a pocket, a pipe. The dignity of carrying a stick and a pipe in public, or in company, is one to which the youth only arrives, on issuing out of his apprenticeship, and taking the rank of a 'gesell.'"

"Imagine a youth who has passed his apprentice years in some stupid little town, and under some severe master; amid circumstances and tempers which make a house worse than a prison, and of which the bitterness is only too sure to fall upon the innocent apprentice,—imagine with what delight he must look forward to the hour which shall set him free, and spread before him a new existence, and new realms and years of novelty, variety, more freedom, and as he fondly hopes, more good."

Much time must unquestionably be lost in this way, but, according to Mr. Howitt, its advantages may be seen in every mechanic that one meets with. He dwells upon the love of nature and fine scenery which is so universal among the lower classes, and very reasonably attributes it to the cultivation it receives during the most excitable and enthusiastic years of a man's life. To it, also, he ascribes a certain intelligence and extension of view which he finds even in the poorer part of the community.

"If any one think this too poetical to be true, we can only advise him to enter the dwellings of such men as shoemakers, saddlers, or other such handicraft tradesmen, and talk with them and their families, and he will soon convince himself to the contrary. He will find something at once so manly and so friendly, such a domestic feeling, and such a feeling of nature as will most agreeably surprise him. We have no doubt whatever, that this nature-loving and poetical feeling which so universally distinguishes the Germans, even to the commonest class, has been by means of these wanderings, wonderfully developed in the man, and thence introduced into and diffused through every member of their families. It is this which sends them forth on all Sundays and holidays in such crowds into the country, to solitary wirthshouses in the woods, into the villages and the hills, to smoke their pipes, and drink their coffee in orchards and garden arbors, all Germany over. It is this which makes them read Goëthé, Schiller, Hauff, and such other of their writers as abound in and cherish this spirit."

The Germans generally appear to be unusually well acquainted with their best writers. Our author observes that when he was in the neighborhood of Lichstenstein, the people seemed to think that they could scarcely do enough for the Englishman who had read and admired their favorite Hauff.

We have before alluded to Mr. Howitt's prolixity, and in passing, we may instance his childish description of Christmas amusements, consisting of translations of nursery-songs, a dissertation upon Peinzel, a sort of German St. Nicholas that reads lectures to naughty children, and an account of his having introduced all this into his own family, the whole occupying ten closely printed octavo pages of the American Edition,—one twentieth of the entire volume. The same may be said, in a less degree, of his chapter on sleighing, but he in a measure redeems it by concluding with an amusing story, which, but for its length, we would extract.

We have next a good chapter on the peculiarities of etiquette, always an interesting subject, as being strikingly indicative of national character, and often an amusing one, as contrasting singularly with our own manners and customs. Among the Germans, a lady may waltz all night with strangers, yet it would be an unheard of violation of propriety, for one of them to offer his arm next day while walking in company with the whole family: A lady and gentleman may ride off tête-à-tête in a sleigh for miles alone, and yet when they walk, they must take particular care that their dresses do not touch. If a gentleman on parting, or after a long absence, were to take a lady's hand, she would probably think him demented. But of all strange prejudices, perhaps the strangest, is against a lady's wearing spectacles. It seems that there was a lady in Mr. Howitt's party who was nearly blind without those useful contrivances. Her necessity for wearing them came near breaking up a large sleighing excursion which had been for some time planned by a number of friends. The gentleman in whose sleigh she was to ride, positively protested against it when he found that he and his sleigh were to offer a pair of spectacles to the admiring gaze of the street loungers. The students, he said, would insult her as they passed by, he should be obliged to challenge them, and sundry duels would ensue. The whole affair was at a stand, when some ingenious contriver suggested—a veil! and the difficulty was satisfactorily arranged. Throughout all Heidelberg the lady was known as Fraülein Brillé,—Miss Spectacles.

During his visit to the watering-places, he gives a rather lively description of scenes at the gaming-table. Play, it appears, is permitted by the government at these places only, and constitutes one of their greatest attractions. The subject, though one of interest, has been too often and too well described before, to possess any novelty.

Further on, we have an instance of the justice and good sense of a German Bürgermeister. On his visit to Lichstenstein, Mr. Howitt engaged a "vorspan," or additional pair of horses, to assist them up the mountain to the hotel at the summit. After remaining there some hours they wish to go on, and their road descends a different part of the mountain from that which they ascended. Meanwhile, the owner of the vorspan has persuaded the coachman that there is yet a bad hill which they can not pass unassisted, and notwithstanding the assurances of the people at the hotel, the coachman refuses to go on without him. On understanding the state of the case, Mr. Howitt agrees that the owner of the vorspan shall go on with them, and that if there prove to be another hill, he shall be paid, otherwise not. No hill having appeared, Mr. Howitt refuses the money, and the man becomes violent and menacing. He is told that if he insists he must come on to the Bürgermeister in the next village, to which, after considerable difficulty, he consents.

"At the village inn I inquired for the Bürgermeister, and the Wirth (inn-keeper) cried out to a servant: 'Hole den Schmied,' 'Fetch the Blacksmith.' I replied I did not want the blacksmith, but the Bürgermeister. 'It is the same man,' said he. Presently appeared the blacksmith in his shirt sleeves, and tolerably smutty, from the forge. When he had heard the case, and the man was running on very volubly in his Swabian dialect—'Stop!' said the worthy welder of iron, 'There needs only one word. Did you put your horses before the carriage, or behind it?' 'Before, to be sure,' replied the man very confidently. 'Then,' answered honest Vulcan, 'you can go about your business. Every body knows that it's all down hill from Lichtenstein hither, and who wants a vorspan to pull him down hill. Had you put on your horses behind to drag, I would have awarded you your money.' The good man refused to receive any thing for his trouble, even to partake of a bottle of wine, but wiping his mouth on his shirt-sleeve drank a glass of beer at his own cost, expressed his satisfaction in being able to prevent imposition on a stranger, and only begged, that if we saw a countryman of his in similar need, we should help him if we could."

München, or as we have strangely corrupted the word, Munich, the great metropolis of artists, occupies no inconsiderable portion of the rest of the book. It is an interesting specimen of what the patronage of a ruler, combined with a moderate expenditure of money, can do towards encouraging the arts. It appears too, that independently of this view of the case, the expense has been fully made up to the citizens, by the crowds of strangers drawn to view the many celebrated works of art which adorn their collections. The most interesting are undoubtedly the Ægina marbles, two groups discovered in 1811 by Baron Haller and purchased for 6,000 pounds sterling by the king of Bavaria. The subject of one of these is the battle of Hercules and Telamon with Laomedon; the other represents the fighting over the body of Patroclus. There are other antiques, and various works by Canova, Thorwaldsen and Schadow.

Workmen were engaged in building up the clay model of a figure of Bavaria, 55 feet high, intended to be cast in metal from the cannon taken from their enemies. These were lying round, ready for use. The statue is described as being a beautifully symmetrical female figure, whose size may be realized from the fact that the thumb-nail was as long as a man's hand. It was to be placed in the "Theresien Meadow."

Towards the end we find an account of an interesting visit made to the Brocken, the mountain whose singular spectres have always excited so much curiosity. Far loftier than any of the neighboring elevations, it is exposed to sudden and tremendous storms, during one of which Mr. Howitt reached its summit. These storms often rise so unexpectedly, that persons are in danger of being lost even when within sight of the Brocken-house. Several anecdotes are mentioned to show the danger, one of which will suffice.

In January 1837, the landlord descended the mountain, and Karoline Heyder, one of the servants, accompanied him. Returning they were met by another servant, Karoline Kuhlemann, and both servants sat down to rest, a few hundred yards from the house. Nehse, the landlord, went on. He had scarcely reached the house when he began to feel uneasy, and returned to seek them, but they were nowhere to be found. Meantime a severe storm had arisen;—a search was made all night, but proved fruitless. It was continued next day, but with no better success. Three or four days after, they were found covered up with ice and snow, and all attempts to recover them failed.

The day after Mr. Howitt's arrival the storm passed away, and the unusually pure and clear atmosphere gave him a splendid view of 500 miles in circuit.

"What the expanse of prospect here is, may be imagined, when we say that it includes as observed, a circle of nearly 500 English miles, inhabited by from five to six millions of souls. A part of Prussia, Hanover, Saxony, Hesse, Weimar, Brunswick, Gotha, and most of the little principedoms of Anhalt-Dessau, Köthen and Bernburg, Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen and Rudolstadt, Lippe-Deimold, Schaumburg, and Waldeck, etc. The cities of Halberstadt, Magdeburg, Brandenburg, Wittenberg, Halle, Leipzig, Göttingen, Hanover, Brunswick, Wolfenbüttel, and very many others, with the castle in Gotha, the cathedral in Erfurt and the whole chain of the Thuringian forest hills, and in fact, castles on the heights in almost every direction, and to the vastest distances, including 89 cities and towns, 668 villages, fortresses and hamlets, from a height above the level of the sea of 3,633 feet."

The whole concludes with a hasty glance at German Literature, a short article on Education, in which the author is very severe upon German superstitions, and a chapter upon Religion. These subjects are much too comprehensive to be discussed in supplementary chapters, and we therefore pass over them without comment. The article on Literature concludes with a catalogue of German authoresses, in which we notice the names of Caroline Pichler, Fanny Tarnow, Gräfin Hahn-Hahn, Bettina Brentano, and others less known out of their own country.

On closing the book, we feel called upon to notice several things that have struck us unpleasantly. There is a want both of manliness and of modesty running through the whole, which contrasts strongly with the volumes of Dwight and of Russell, and Mrs. Howitt's poetical merits are obtruded upon us much too often. We do not like to see him place his wife's name so very near the head of his list of thirty or forty of the most celebrated English authoresses. There is a would-be familiarity, too, with the reader, which shows itself constantly,—a great mistake for an author, who is never so much respected as when he respects himself. L^s.

SONNET—TO HELEN.

BY JOHN TOMLIN.

Thy beauty, like the scene,
Helen, is forever
Glorious, as the parted river,
With green isles all between.

As morn upon the mountain,
Thy spirit on me shines ;
As thirst craves the pure fountain,
My spirit for thee pines.

Alas ! alas ! no more
To thee the plaint I pour !—
To what etherial isles
Thy fondest visions go,
May Friendship's blessed smiles
O'er all those visions flow.

SUNRISE.

The morning comes—the twinkling stars
Melt in the glow of day,
And heaven lets fall her golden bars
Upon the rippling bay :
The flowery banks are robed with light ;
The violets wake from sleep ;
And nature paints her semblance bright
Upon the glassy deep.

The balmy nectar of the morn,
Flushed with the orient sun—
How swift, through every veinlet borne,
Its sparkling currents run !
Our hearts, with younger life, leap up,
Like flashing founts at play,
To quaff, from morning's rosy cup,
The dewy balm of day.

'Tis harvest-time—and many a note
Salutes the ear of morn,
Warbled from many a feathered throat,—
Oh, thus was Music born !
List, loved one ! as the cadence swells
E'en to the cope of heaven,
And mark the glad some tale it tells,
In sweetest numbers given.

It rises to the Lord of all,
Who rears the swelling grain ;
Who watches o'er the sparrow's fall
And hears the lark's refrain :
For them, men's fields prepare a feast—
God's commoners they be—
Oh ! listen ! while that feather'd priest
Says grace on yonder tree.

Vol. X—72

How blithely rings the holy air,
Echoed through heaven's fane,
Bending the solemn woods in prayer
And reverential grain ;
Even the tinkling leaves aspire
To swell the matin hymn ;
And what a wild, Æolian lyre,
Is that old, antler'd limb !

Like Memnon's statue, Nature sings,
Vocal with holy lays,
While, from unnumber'd choral strings,
Resounds her cheerful praise.
No gloomy shadows round her throng,
Bred by ascetic Art,
But sunshine fills her happy song—
The sunshine of the heart.

A CLASSIC RELIC RECOVERED.

The reader of the following will know as much of the subject, as we can pretend to. We will only add a brief account of the supposed author of the relic.—[Ed. Mess.

MIMNERMUS was [a poet of Colophon, in Ionia, who flourished about 590 B. C. With him is said to have commenced the second period of the pentameter, that is, the application of the alternate hexameter and pentameter verse to other than warlike themes. (Wieland, Attische Museum. vol. 1. p. 338.) The poetry of Mimnermus was so sweet and harmonious that the ancients gave him the appellation of Ligytaides λυγίτης, "melodious." He was a votary of love and pleasure, and is so distinguished by a line in Propertius, (1. 9. 11.)

"Plus in amore valet Mimnermi versus Homero."

Horace likewise (Ep. 1. 6. 65.) refers to him in a similar connection, though in much stronger terms,

*Si, Mimnermus uti censet, sine amore jocisque
Nil est jucundum, vivas in amore jocisque.*

The very few verses that remain to us of this poet breathe a pleasing melancholy. He deplores in them the shortness of human life, the rapidity with which youth passes away, and the array of evils which afflict humanity. The ancient writers speak with great admiration of his poem on Nanno, a young female flute-player, of whom he was deeply enamored, and who preferred him to young and handsome rivals. The fragments of Mimnermus are to be found in the collections of Stephens, Orsini, Winterton, Brunck, Gaisford and Boissonade. (Schöll. Hist. Lit. Gr. vol. 1. p. 191. seqq.)—See Anthon's Lexipriore.

O ye who patiently explore
The wreck of Herculean lore,
What rapture ! could ye seize
Some Theban fragment, or unroll
One precious, tender hearted scroll
Of pure Simonides.

Wordsworth.

The subjoined beautiful relic of antiquity has not, we believe, as yet appeared, either in translation or original, in this country. It is an epithalamium or nuptial hymn, which had been chanted, as was the custom, by a choir composed of the most beautiful young maidens, on occasion of a marriage solemnized at that Shrovetide of the Greeks—the famous Festivals of Delos. It has been discovered by an Italian antiquary, on a marble tablet, recently disinterred, not from “Herculaneum” but from the “Artemisium,” or the chapel attached to the temple of Apollo; it is published in an Italian magazine, the Il Aliratore.

The “happy pair,” in this instance, are sweetly named Theëtis and Ismène. The choir, or, as it wastechically termed, theoria, is Corynthian. The composition is, we perceive, variously ascribed to Simonides and Mymnermus, the two most tender of the Greek poets. That it is a “tender-hearted scroll,” the critics, then, are implicitly agreed. Their diversity of opinion, as to the authorship, appears to have arisen upon one or two passages, which the more fastidious conceive to be too warmly colored for the pencil of the “pure Simonides,” and to savor rather of the softer soul of Mymnermus.

We shall not pretend to decide this disagreement; critics are as authoritative as “doctors,” or rather are doctors in their own line. But as we have studiously preserved the expression of the passage impugned, it will not be impertinent to offer a few remarks, on this point of delicacy, in reference to these passages, and also to the ancient erotic poetry in general.

In the first place, the subject of the poems under consideration is perhaps inevitably suggestive of the obnoxious quality imputed—certainly so, to the depraved of imagination; but as to the phraseology, the most spurious “delicacy” must allow it, we think, to be not unbecoming even the innocent and virgin lips that utter it. This indeed is no more than should be presumed from the good taste, if not the good morals, of either of the great masters of poetical propriety, to whom the authorship is ascribed.

With regard to the general charge of “indelicacy” preferred against some of the Greek and Latin poets, it is first to be considered, are we, can we be competent judges. In questions of this nature—questions, in a great degree, of the taste, the sentiment, the particular purity of the reader, rather than of any general principle of morality, ought not allowance to be made for admitted differences in manners, in times, in temperaments? The Greek felt more exquisitely, conceived more vividly than we do; and naturally suffused his images and expressions with a corresponding intensity and glow of coloring. He had no northern climate to blunt the delicacy of his organization—no prosaic institutions to stunt the native energies of the soul; a frivolous civilization had not yet introduced the art of hypocrisy, nor impurity of heart suggested the idea, and necessitated the observance of a conventional refinement. It may safely be suspected that it was but the reflection of their own morbid licentiousness that the monastic fanatics of the tenth century saw in the exquisite Elegies of this same Mymnermus, which they so barbarously destroyed—a licentiousness that, like the jaundice, colors every object it contemplates, with its own distempered hue. The remark is applicable, with little qualification, to more modern, though no less monkish “delicacy” in this particular. It is, on such a principle, unsound in morals as unjust in criticism—or, we should rather say, it is from the absence of any fixed principle at all, that Anacreon too is pronounced a profligate, while he is admitted, (however inconsistently in our notion of the character,) to have been also a “sage.” It is this that has also calumniously stigmatized the name of the high-souled Sappho—the “Tenth Muse”—to an infamy perhaps as immortal as her genius and her love!

But this is not the place to pursue this prolific matter. Though we concur, but on different grounds, with the opinion that makes Mymnermus the author, it happily, is not requisite to the propriety of the present publication, that we should have vindicated the general decency of his writings—still less, that we should enter upon a formal apology for the other poet-sages of his country or his class, against the prudish and pedantic carping of modern coldness or modern cant.

A word, in conclusion, with regard to the translation of this “Delian fragment.” In an enthusiastic despair of seizing the volatile essence of its graceful spirit, the discoverer has declined to attempt a version, even with the aid of a language which, in melody and expression, is all but equal to the divine original. The classic reader will probably regret that we have not followed this exemplary veneration or discretion. But the poems are presented here, chiefly as an object of literary curiosity. If, however, we have entirely failed to convey any idea of that inexplicably touching union of impressive dignity with infantile simplicity, (which characterizes the style and identifies their antiquity,) of that “Jovian elegance” which the country and the dialect of the Muses alone, perhaps, could inspire and express, we beg it be remembered, in addition to the ordinary difficulties of adequate poetical translation, that we have had to contend against the “harsh, northern, whistling, grunting guttural.”

AN EPITHALAMIUM.

FROM THE GREEK OF MYMNERMUS.

CHOIR SINGS.

1.

Tho' in the opening spring of life—
Tho' choicest of Corynthian maids—(Corynth with that rare beauty rife
Before which every other fades,)

Yet, O Ismène, 'mong our band
 There blooms not one can vie with thee;
 The courser from Thessalian land
 Has form less fair and step less free :
 Thou, noblest flower our gardens bear !
 The lily Greece is proud to wear.

II.

The Loves hold revel in thine eyes ;
 The Arts take life beneath thy touch—
 O graceful girl ! O charming wife !
 We come with joy to greet thee such :
 To-morrow, from the dew-bright flowers,
 We'll weave a crown for yonder pine,
 And 'neath its boughs shed fragrant showers,
 And on the bark engrave this line :
 "Stranger, thine incense pour to me,
 For henceforth I'm Ismène's* tree."

III.

Hail happiest pair, we wish you joy !
 May she who rules the genial bed,
 Latona, grant a sire-like boy,
 And Venus still new ardors shed !
 Repose you there in rapture's arms,
 Respire but true-love's tenderest strain ;
 When morn unveils her earliest charms,
 We'll come and chant for you again.

MORNING HYMN.

I.

O Venus, thou fairest in heaven !
 O Love, thou delight of the earth !
 We praise you at morn, at even,
 With Hymen, the source of our birth.

II.

Awake thee, Theëtis, and turn
 To gaze on thy beauteous young bride—
 And now, that Love's fires cease to burn,
 Survey her, thy bliss and thy pride.

III.

See the graces around her keep warden,
 The freshness that glows o'er her air—
 Yes the rose is the queen of the garden,
 Ismène, the rose of the fair.

IV.

Awake then, Theëtis, nor one bright,
 Dear moment miss. Drooping above
 Mark her lid tremble soft to the sun-light,
 And give thee its first look of love.

It is proper to apprise the reader that both the hymns are of the same metre in the original. We have, however, allowed ourselves to imagine that a measure more cheerful—more cheering than that we have adopted in the former hymn, would better befit the spirits of a marriage-morning. But being a bachelor, we, of course, do not answer for the accuracy of this surmise, in a matter so mysterious to the uninitiated.

* A Greek usage.

LINES.

"What shadows we are, what shadows we pursue."

We chase, we chase unreal things,
 That flee us as we follow,
 We haste, we fly, but swiftest wings
 O'ertake to find them hollow !

We chase in youth the roseate cloud
 That flits before, above us ;
 We clutch to find it but a shroud,
 To wrap the friends that love us.

Our later years find us the same,
 Bright follies still pursuing ;
 They laugh and flee, but leave the shame
 To us of our undoing.

Yet still we fancy that the grave
 Can give us peaceful rest ;
 We yield to earth the gift she gave
 And drop into her breast.

PARTING FROM NIAGARA.

My spirit grieves to say farewell to thee,
 Oh beautiful and glorious !

Thou dost robe
 Thyself in mantle of the color'd mist,
 Most lightly ting'd, and exquisite as thought,
 Decking thy forehead with a crown of gems,
 Woven by God's right hand.

Hadst thou but wrapp'd
 Thy brow in clouds, and swept thy blinding mist
 In showers upon us, it had been less hard
 To part from thee.

But there thou art sublime
 In noon-day splendor,—gathering all thy rays
 Into their climax green and fleecy white,—
 And changeful tincture, for which words of man
 Have neither sound nor sign, until to breathe
 Farewell,—is agony.

For we have roam'd
 Beside thee at our will, and drawn thy voice
 Into our secret soul,—and felt how good
 Thus to be here,—until we half implor'd

While long in wildering ecstasy we gaz'd,
To build us tabernacles, and behold
Always, thy majesty.

Fain would we dwell
Here at thy feet, and be thy worshipper,—
And from the weariness and dust of earth
Steal evermore away.

Yea, were it not
That many a care doth bind us here below,—
And in each care a duty,—like a flower
Thorn-hedged, perchance, yet fed with dews of heaven,
And in each duty an enclosed joy
Which like a honey-searching bee doth sing,—
And were it not that ever in our path
Spring our own planted seeds of love and grief
Which we must watch and bring their perfect fruit
Into our Master's garner,—'twere most sweet
To linger here and be thy worshipper,
Until death's footstep broke this dream of life.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

We invite the particular attention of our readers to the following resolutions, and solicit their aid in the cause of the Institute. The best means of enhancing our National glory will be to connect it with the progress of Literature, Science and Art, for the advancement of which the Institute has been established. We have already proclaimed our leading principle to be "the promotion of a pure Native Literature and a devoted National Spirit." Hence, every thing so National and noble in its design and influences, will ever receive the warm support of the Messenger.—[Ed. Mess.]

The Committee of the National Institute, consisting of the Hon. JOHN C. SPENCER, (chairman,) Hon. J. R. INGERSOLL, Hon. W. C. PRESTON, Hon. ABBOTT LAWRENCE, Hon. R. J. WALKER, Hon. R. CHOATE, Hon. W. C. RIVES, and A. D. BACHE, Esq., superintendant of the United States Coast Survey, appointed to make arrangements for the April meeting of the friends and members of the Institute, having, in compliance with a request of the Society, submitted its report, the same was communicated to the meeting of the 8th instant by the Corresponding Secretary, who accompanied it by a report, and the correspondence and papers which relate to that meeting; whereupon, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the report of the committee, and that of the Corresponding Secretary, communicating said report, be adopted.

Resolved, That it is expedient to publish a volume of the proceedings of the meeting of April, 1844, and that for this object the Corresponding Secretary of the Institute be requested to obtain all the papers, addresses, and communications which constituted the exercises of said meeting.

Resolved, That, as soon as all the materials shall be ready for publication, the Vice-President appoint a committee of publication, of which he shall be the chairman, whose duty it shall be to examine the materials carefully, to reject all papers it thinks inexpedient to publish, to omit passages it may conceive to be objectionable, and to reduce such as appear to be too long; and also to make a contract for the publication of as many copies of the work as they shall think proper, which, when published, shall be distributed in the following manner:

1st. One copy to every subscriber who has paid, or who shall pay, the sum of five dollars.

2nd. One copy to every society and institution in the United States, and foreign countries, in correspondence with the National Institute; one copy to every college in the United States; and one copy to each member of the present Congress. The remainder to be sold on account of the Institute, and under its directions, with the exception of 500 copies to be reserved for future use.

Resolved, That it is expedient to publish a third bulletin of the proceedings of the National Institute, for which the Corresponding Secretary, under a former resolution of the Institute, has already prepared the principal portion of the materials, and that the third bulletin form a part of the aforementioned volume.

Resolved, That the third bulletin shall consist of the following materials:

1st. Abstract of the proceedings, embracing the correspondence, and a statement of the contributions, donations, and deposits, with the names of the contributors, donors, and depositors, from March, 1842, where the second bulletin terminates, to the present period.

2d. Copies of the two memorials lately presented to Congress on behalf of the Institute.

3d. Charter of Incorporation.

4th. Constitution and By-Laws.

5th. Lists of Officers, and of honorary, corresponding, paying corresponding, and resident members; and also of societies and institutions, foreign and home, in correspondence with the National Institute.

Resolved, That a prospectus be issued by the committee, announcing the publication of a volume to embrace the proceedings of the April meeting and a third bulletin.

Resolved, That, inasmuch as Congress has adjourned without making any provision for the Institute, it is expedient that new exertions should be made to raise money throughout the United States to sustain it, and to promote its objects. And that, with this view, the Vice-President and the constitutional officers be authorised to send an agent or agents to such places as they may select, for the purpose of collecting money to defray the expenses of the publications, and for the general purposes of the Institute, to be expended under the Board of Management.

PETER FORCE, Vice-President.

Corresponding Secretary.

LEAFLETS OF MEMORY: An Annual for MDCCCXLV. Edited by Reynell Coates, M. D., Philadelphia. Published by Butler & Williams.

FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING: A Christmas, New-Year and Birth-day present, for MDCCCXLV. Boston: Published by Lewis & Sampson, 1845.

Two of the most beautiful annuals we ever saw, and two, moreover, which reflect the highest credit on the taste, zeal and generosity of their several publishers. A word about this class of publications, which, for some time past, have fallen into disrepute. Meagre collections, as they were, of wishy-washy nothings, the products of minds which received so little pecuniary encouragement that they cared not what they perpetrated, based at best on an unsound literary taste, and frequently, the offspring of no taste at all—how could they do otherwise? Bound and embellished, however, in the most costly manner, they appealed to the eye though not to the mens divini of the mass, and being, like Peter Pindar's razors, only made for sale, of course carried out the purpose of their creation. The "almighty dollar" was the nil ultra of the publisher's hopes, and gaining that, the after complaints of his patrons were matters of the most minor consideration. The annuals, too, were never worth the dollar aforesaid, nor even the time demanded for their perusal. But they were never intended for such a sequence: nobody dreamed of reading them. They were received as gifts of course; of course admired, we can do nothing less with things that cost us nothing, and lying a reasonable length of time on the centre-table, were robbed of their embellishments, and expedited, as Mantalini has it, to "the how-wows." The plates were next consigned to the pages of scrap-books, but these went out of fashion, and with them expired the annuals. They were the dandies of literary productions, like all dandies, more remarkable for their exterior beauty than interior brains, and, fluttering their little hour in the parlors of ladies, were dismissed with the contempt they so richly merited.

"The Leaflets," however, as well as "Friendship's Offering," is a book of a different character, as indeed are all those, which have a master mind as an architect.

First, of the exterior.

The binding is rich, Arabesque and unexceptionable, an excellent accessory even to the most abstruse publications, (the Bible, itself, is more read since Harper has illustrated it,) while the engravings which are steel are the chef d'œuvres of the best British artists. Of these there are no less than ten. Among the most beautiful are those entitled, "The Grecian Maid," "The Rose of the Ruin," "Past and Present," "The Heart's Best Dream," and "The Christian Slave," all of which embody not only the finest art, but the loftiest ideality. In addition to these are a title page and presentation plate, both of which are illuminations, adding to a chaste and cultivated modern taste the grandeur and gorgeousness of Froissart. The letter-press of the volume is noble, large, open and commanding, and the paper hot-pressed, and of the very best quality.

But of the contents. As may be imagined from the title, they are not wholly original, nor indeed, are all the illustrations themselves. The skill, however, with which they are moulded to new articles, or rather, with which new articles are moulded to them, deserves, to say the least of it, the very highest praise. This is entirely the work of the talented editor, who to a lofty and spiritual genius, whether as a prose or poetical writer, adds the greatest critical ability and the supreme taste. Some of the original matter is grand, and one article, a remarkably vigorous description of "Lake Michigan," by Sidney P. Williams, M. D., "paints the lily." Among the other names which contribute to swell the riches of this volume, are those of Mrs. S. C. Hall, Mrs. Chas. Gore, T. K. Hervey, Louvret de Convray, (translated by Dr. Coates,) "The Author of Chantilly," Thomas Colley Grattan and many others of equal celebrity. Altogether, the "Leaflets," to boil down our criticism, is not only worth a position in every parlor in the country, but likewise, one in every judiciously selected library.

"FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING," on the other hand, though a less expensive, is scarcely a less beautiful production. Its illustrations are mezzo-tints—we like mezzo-tints; there is something so liquid, so soft, so spirituelle, in a word, so poetical about them, something which we feel, but find it difficult to express; something which the harsher lines of a steel, or copper-plate never can compass, but which the mezzo-tint breathes in every light and shadow of its surface. Among these, "Hope," the frontispiece, illustrated as it is by a sketch from Reynell Coates—a sketch that reminds us more of Jean Paul than any other living or dead writer, delicious and dreamy as the engraving itself, "Crossing the Ghoo," "The Parting" and the "Mimic Chase" stand preëminent. By the way, a word about the text which accompanies the "Mimic Chase." Like the "Julian Savary" of the "Leaflets," it embodies much of the living presence of the Author. If ever two characters portrayed one, that of "Mr. Johnson" in the former, as well as "Old Mr. Logan" in the latter, exaggerated, perhaps, by the artiste, portrays Dr. Coates. Not intentionally, so we know, but it is hard to separate one's self from one's creations. We form a standard of character and whatever we paint, whether a lady, a lover, or an old man, there is something of the author about it. Just such a noble, kind, benevolent, worthy, philosophical, far-seeing gentleman, is the editor of the first and we think the last of these volumes. The contents, like those of the Leaflets, are not altogether original, but they have been selected with the same care, the same taste, and the same judgment. They are from the pens of Leitch Ritchie, Mrs. Shelley, F. M. Reynolds, Miss Montague, R. Bernal, M. P., J. A. St. John, Lieut. G. F. White, R. A., Edward Fitzgerald, Mrs. S. C. Hall, Sir Egerton Brydges, and others, who appear, not in their every-day robes, but in their court-dresses, gemmed and decorated, it must be confessed, as Americans are not want to see them. Indeed, almost the entire collection is a novelty even to our reading. And the original articles—they are equal to the "best imported," and give the lie, the loud, the direct lie to those British reviewers who have dared to assert that America can never produce a distinct literature. We trust that the publishers will be amply recompensed.

URANOGRAPHY; or a Description of the Heavens, designed for Academies and Schools; accompanied by an Atlas of the Heavens. By E. Otis Kendall, Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy in the Central High School of Philadelphia, and member of the American Philosophical Society. Philadelphia, Butler and Williams. Richmond, J. W. Randolph & Co.

This treatise is evidently of a higher class than that of ordinary school-books. The name of the author assures us of this, and we are glad on that account to notice its appearance. There has already been too much reason to regret the manner in which most elementary works have been prepared. The humble nature of the employment has generally thrown the composition of these into the hands of mere compilers, wholly incompetent to conduct it with the care and knowledge, which the importance of education in this country demands. The consequences of this are seen clearly enough in the manuals of the physical sciences in use in our schools. A want of clearness, of ease and liveliness of expression and of accuracy in description—an adherence to antiquated opinions—a general ignorance of the spirit and progress of modern philosophy disfigure nearly all.

It requires, indeed, the hand and judgment of a master to execute well that most difficult of all tasks—the translating of scientific into common language—and those who are fitted to attempt it are naturally reluctant to undertake a labor which can not add to their reputation. Some exceptions, and those of the most brilliant kind, are familiar to all, and for our own part we are disposed to place in point of utility and of difficulty of execution the Astronomy of Herschel above his Treatise on Light, and the Algebra of Euler before his vast work on the Integral Calculus.

The Uranography of Professor Kendall is another exception to the general practice, and we were not surprised to find it distinguished by those qualities of style and composition, which flow from a thorough and practical acquaintance with the subject. The station which the author occupies in one of the highest institutions in our country, and the facilities, unprecedented with us, which he has had for investigation and discovery, are sufficient sureties for the accuracy of his work. The treatise is not of course wholly original; it is based upon a work of Littrow's, which we have never seen, but the arrangement and most of the details are due, we presume, to the judgment and research of the editor. Any one who wishes to test the knowledge of modern astronomy, exhibited in the work, may turn to the chapters on Nebulae and the Double Stars—subjects long familiar to astronomers, but only recently opened to the public through the showy sketches of Nichol. These chapters and several passages scattered through the book will be interesting even to those who have past their school-days, and they must seize at once upon the vivid imagination of youth.

As a school-book it seems to hold the proper medium between a scientific treatise and a bald summary of facts. The simplicity of the language, the careful selection of the most important points and the fullness of explanation upon those are recommendations which will soon introduce it into general favor; and here, in the clear atmosphere and under the brilliant skies of the South, the study seems almost necessary.

HARPER & BROTHERS. NEW-YORK, 1844.

MORSE'S SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY, illustrated with Cero-graphic maps.

In this work, so handsomely "gotten up," Mr. Morse has adopted an arrangement which we think will prove highly useful, greatly facilitating the studies of the pupil. The maps, beautifully executed, can be consulted without loss of time, and the illustrations must incite the interest and assist the memory of the student. The fineness of the print is the chief objection. It might have been larger, even at greater cost. The eyes of the young are not so efficiently cared for in the type of their school-books. Perkins, Harvey and Ball have also sent us,

THE H— FAMILY; TRALINNAN; AXEL AND ANNA; and other tales. By Frederika Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt.

We have received through Messrs. Drinker and Morris. THE GRANDFATHER; one of the popular novels of Miss Ellen Pickering.

ABRAHAM NEIL, OR TIMES OF OLD, a romance by G. P. R. James, Esq., who, from the frequency and sameness of his productions, appears to be a sort of ATTORNEY AT NOVELS; having some years ago prepared some very excellent forms, which he now fills up to suit new parties, with some slight variation of incident; and

TRANSACTIONS OF THE SOCIETY OF LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC CHIFFONNIERS. THE SPOON, with upwards of one hundred illustrations, &c. By H. O. Westman. No. 2. 25 cents—In 4 No.'s.

Mr. Editor, this Western man must have a "plenty of Spoons," for did you ever see such a variety of bowl, and shin and handle. They may shew the progress of art and civilization. Some not over refined people are in the habit of disparaging spoons, "dipping the summits of their digits into the repositories" of food, and proclaiming boldly that "fingers were made before spoons." It's well it was so; else the Chiffonniers would have been cut off from their very laudable pursuits. Nature requires only one pattern and "hits the exact thing" at once; but man must continually improve and invent. His "digits," not only supersede the use of all the spoons the most scientific Chiffonnier ever saw, but are necessary to form and then to handle every spoon and all "the spoons," in the world. The author remarks, "It had been well for the world had soldiers never handled any weapon but the spoon!" Quere. Would they then have been soldiers? Just imagine the army going through the drill with such weapons: "shoulder spoons," etc! or undergoing a review by the President of the Chiffonniers!

Such a weapon might not have produced war; but it might pestilence and famine, since the soldiers, grown so expert in the use of their arms, might demand rations beyond the public supply. In one sense then it would be a rational proceeding.

But this declaration of the author reminds me of two circumstances, which may serve to show that "spoons" are more formidable than he supposed. I recollect a thrilling account given from the pulpit many years since by a country parson, of a terrific battle, fought by some children, with pewter spoons, over a bowl of buttermilk. They made their "weapons" flash and clash, like the heroes of Ossian; and black eyes, bloody noses and swollen heads and faces attested the fury of the conflict.

Again, when Philip of Macedon consulted the Oracle, as to the issue of the war he was waging upon Greece, he was told to "fight with silver weapons and he would conquer the world." A certain student of Greek, calling upon one more advanced to translate for him the response of the Oracle, was told, "fight with silver spoons and you will conquer the world." At recitation he boldly translated it thus and received a "basting" for his supposed mockery. How unjust it was! for any modern fortune hunter would at once see the beauty and literal force of the translation. But the unsophisticated pedagogue had never heard of a girl's having "the spoons." Have I not then a right to conclude, that the substitution of "spoons" for muskets and swords would be disastrous to the peace, independence and integrity of the nations of the earth!—[Am. South. Q. B. Minor]

THE HISTORY OF THE CRUSADES. By Charles Mills, author of the History of Chivalry.

The crusades can never cease to be a source of wonder and delight, surpassing all romance and fiction. They exhibit, in a very striking manner, some most singular and curious aspects of human motive and character. Mr. Mills' is a standard work on the subject; and is but one of a series of such works, in progress of publication. Messrs. Lee & Blanchard, Carey & Hart, the Harpers, the Appletons, and other standard publishers deserve the highest commendation for their manly course in the late mania for cheap publications. The sweeping and often destructive current never bore them from their fast moorings. In so far as they yielded to it, it was only the result of necessity; and they have endeavored to make the spirit of the day subserve the useful purpose of diffusing valuable books more widely among the people. With this view, the "Library of Standard Literature" has been commenced by Messrs. L. & B., and we hope they will meet the patronage they so richly deserve.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. By Box—a new Edition, complete in one volume, with numerous illustrations.

THE CYCLOPÆDIA OF PRACTICAL MEDICINE is progressing. We repeat our former commendations. Drinker and Morris have it.

FAIRY LEGENDS AND TRADITIONS OF THE SOUTH OF IRELAND. BY T. CROFTON CROKER. 250 pp., 8 vo.

It is not ungrateful to turn from the agitation of "Repeal, Repeal," and from the excitement of State prosecutions, to the legends of this interesting, but unhappy country. Indeed it would be improving to the public taste, and morals too, if more were disposed to drive away the engrossing realities of tumultuous life, by excursions into "Dreamland." There are some, perhaps too many, who are disposed to leave fairy legends and traditions to children only. But these have often too much to do with the character and the Romance of a people, for them thus to be confined to the nursery. Some critics have gone so far as to assert, that no country can have a great Literature, especially Poetry, that has not its early fables and traditions. And when they are found to influence the national character, and the imagination and modes of thought, they become full worthy of the attention of the Historian and the philosopher. The work before us consists of a number of narratives, written in simple and natural style, illustrating in various forms the legends and superstitions of the South of Ireland. Sir Walter Scott, in his letter, thanking the author for a copy of the work, says, "you are to consider this as a high compliment from one, who holds him on the subject of elves, ghosts, visions, &c., nearly as strong as William Churne of Staffordshire—

"Who every year can mend your cheer
With tales both old and new."

Scotland has similar fictions and traditions, and it was Sir

Walter Scott's intimate acquaintance with these, which in part has made him, in Romance, her best Historian. For further information, our readers must refer to Drinker and Morris, who have the work:—and also,

TYLNEY HALL. A NOVEL. By THOMAS HOOD, Author of "Whims and Oddities," "Comic Annual," &c. With a portrait of the author.

Mr. Hood is well known as one of the leaders of the humorous school of English writers. The "New Spirit of the Age," a very interesting recent republication, says of Hood, "the predominating characteristics of his genius are humorous fancies grafted upon melancholy impressions. It is a curious circumstance that in his 'Whims and Oddities' of by gone years, the majority of them by far turned upon some painful physicality. A boy roaring under the rod—a luckless individual being thrown over a horse's head—an old man with his night cap on fire—a clergyman with his wig accidentally caught off his head by a pitchfork—a man pursued by a bull—skeletons, death, duels—cats with mice—dogs with kettles, &c., &c."

But the following, from the same work, is more to our present purpose. "Though the touches of sadness are generally brief, and at unexpected seasons, Mr. Hood has still shewn himself capable of writing a long narrative of serious interest and sustained purpose—carried on through the very thick of the cross-fire of puns, jokes and extravaganzas—and convinced us, that had he pleased, (or had he possessed less versatility,) he would have taken a permanent position among the highest class of English novelists—if his TYLNEY HALL does not already entitle him to this rank. It will be recognised as a work of genius, when hundreds of novels which have been popular since its publication, have lined trunks and the trunks been burnt for firewood."

Hood is much more good natured than Hook was, whose wit was generally malicious, and his humor satirical.

ROSS' LATIN GRAMMAR, a new and improved Edition. By Nathan C. Brooks, A. M. Philadelphia, 1844.

The classical attainments of Mr. Brooks are already well known, and the readers of the Messenger will recollect some of his polyglot diversions. He has been engaged in teaching for some years, and is now the principal of the Baltimore High School, which important position he has filled with honor and usefulness. In the preparation of this grammar, he has been guided by his own experience as to the wants of our schools and bestowed pains to make it supply all the deficiencies that he has been lead to observe and deplore.

In acquiring languages, the synthetic method must be greatly pursued—and the memory chiefly relied on. It is not expedient to fill elementary works with annotations, criticisms and the so called "philosophy of language." This work is the first of a contemplated series for the use of schools, into which Mr. Brooks desires to see his grammar introduced, and of whose favor it seems to be very worthy.

CAREY & HART. PHILADELPHIA, 1844.

THE WORKS OF THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH, in 3 volumes.

The Rev. Sydney wields one of the sharpest pens of the day and has of late been exceedingly severe upon American Repudiation, for which some of our citizens will be disposed to condemn his writings, unread. If so, they will lose a treat and much instruction. It may well be doubted whether his wit, power and earnestness are not preferable to the elegance and apt allusions of Macaulay. One of the founders of the Edinburgh Review, he has been a constant and prominent contributor, discussing with signal ability almost every class of subjects and removing all dryness from every thing he handles. The public owe their thanks to the publishers.—[Am. South.]

JOHN S. TAYLOR & Co. NEW-YORK, 1844.

HELEN FLEETWOOD. By Charlotte Elizabeth.

The great demand for this popular and instructive story has already called for a second edition, which the publishers have just issued in their usually neat style. It is one of the best of its Authoress' productions. Call on Perkins, Harvey & Ball; who also have

THE OBLIGATIONS OF THE WORLD TO THE BIBLE. By Gardiner Spring, D. D., of New York City.

The obligations of men to the Bible can not be too often or too deeply impressed upon our minds. Dr. Spring seems to have treated this vast subject in a very useful manner, adapting his lectures principally to young men, who, destined to give stamp to human affairs, should enter upon life with just sentiments to guide them in their career. The Chapter on "Slavery" may well be commended to the attention of many, who pretend to be so fully aware of the Spirit of the Bible, in reference to that Institution. Dr. Spring's views are perhaps as liberal as could be expected, under the circumstances of the case. Certainly Fanatics and Agitators receive no encouragement from him.

A LOGICAL VIEW OF THE TESTIMONIES TO CHRISTIANITY. By E. Starnes. Prepared at the request of the Franklin Literary Society of Augusta, Georgia.

Our thanks to the talented author for this very neat publication. We are glad to know that his legal studies do not preclude him from Literary pursuits and the effort to shield the minds around him from the poisonous influence of Infidelity.

REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.

The Southern Quarterly, for July, 1844; Silliman's Journal; Graham and the Ladies' Magazine are all before us. We can not review their contents and their well known merits render any thing else superfluous.

Mr. Gill, agent, has sent us the last Blackwood, Ladies' Quarterly, and Edinburgh Reviews. Leonard Scott & Co. are now the only publishers of Blackwood, and they certainly deserve extensive patronage for the superior style, the cheapness and expedition with which they bring out all their reprints.

ERROR CORRECTED.—We committed an error in the notice of Young Kate, in the reference made to Mr. Terrell and the Louisville Journal. Both Terrell and Taylor are named in the work; Terrell particularly. When we penned the notice, neither the book nor the journal was at hand, and having read both, we trusted to a treacherous memory.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

OCTOBER, 1844.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH PROPAGANDISM.

BY AMERICUS SOUTHER

B. B. Minor

Mr. Editor,—In the conversations that I have held with you as to the guiding principles upon which you intend to conduct the Southern Literary Messenger, I have been highly gratified to find them such as met my most hearty concurrence, being, as I sincerely believe, eminently useful and demanded by the present circumstances of our beloved country.

Indeed, sir, the tone and spirit of the Journal have already displayed those principles, and its nationality, its devotion to American feelings and interests are plainly perceptible in its pages. These United States are the glory of the age! and of all past ages! in physical advantages, in natural magnificence, in free institutions. The very pulsations of the unfettered heart of America shake the foundations of arbitrary power, and alarm the advocates of bolstered establishments.

Whilst those advocates are thus apprehensive for their fate, they are not idle; but pursue an ever vigilant system of counteraction and disparagement. From the tumultuous tossings of the Freedom which we enjoy; from the excesses often committed by their own lately disenthralled victims, who do not rightly appreciate the liberty that here refreshes their souls, down to the mode of smoking, spitting, talking and eating, are drawn facts and fancies, upon which this system is based and by which it is supported. Domestic institutions, inwoven with our social and political organization, as little understood by their revilers as light is by the blind, are assailed, misrepresented and even interfered with, in the most unprecedented and unjustifiable manner. This system, for it seems such to me, is pursued and propagated by drivellers, travellers, historians, literateurs, statesmen and ministers of state.

In view, then, of the greatness and glory of our free and happy country, the hearts of all her people should beat with fondest devotion to her. A national spirit dedicated to her, should be cherished, and she should be the land of our pride and our ardent love. And whilst she and her institutions, her people and their manners are assailed, belittled and insidiously undermined, it behooves every American to consider the tendency and the motive of these things, and planting himself firmly upon American sentiments and principles, to withstand their influence.

Our national mind has been like our territory, open to the reception of every thing from abroad. The importation of foreign ideas has been like the immigration to our shores, from almost every country on the globe. These ideas require to be digested, always; and often to be resisted, or expelled. This is plainly the province of one branch of the Literature of a country; but where is the national Literature here to embody and enforce it! where the organ of any such continuous operation upon the public sentiment!

If we look to England, we find a splendid monument of Literature, its summit almost lost in the clouds; reared with a skill, adorned with a taste, inscribed with sentiments, illuminated with names, and exulted over with a pride and a joy purely national. Every thing in England is, or must soon be exclusively English. Her present Literature, is thoroughly imbued with a national spirit. Her leading Magazines, however they may differ among themselves, and even descend to a virulence and indecency equal to that so much complained of and scandalised amongst us, are yet all devoted to their own land and made the vehicles of incessant propagandism of British notions, wishes and resolutions.

These United States have an Independence as decided, a character and interests as distinct, opinions and feelings as peculiar, and institutions all their own, and, in an eminent degree, dependant for their success upon public sentiment. Yet this has been for more than half a century, constantly—systematically operated upon by deleterious influences—nay almost entirely manufactured for us.

Is not all this to produce an effect here? Have the productions of genius and learning lost their power? Have the trees ceased to grow, as the twig was bent? These influences from the East, unsuited to our circumstances, pass not over us in vain:—they leave some trace behind them. But with the exception of some of our leading newspapers, whose home-made tone is conspicuous, where is there any special organ here, that subserves the part of the leading reviews of England; not in reference to the parties that divide the Empire; but as between her and foreign governments? We have journals of no less excellence—distinguished for their ability and independence; but they do not specially assume the office, I have endeavored to point out as due to the country. The North American Review and others deserve praise for their spirited vindications of our country, against her unscrupulous assailants. But these should sometimes be passed by in silence: what we need is something above this—a high toned periodical that shall steadily aim at inducing and infusing into the popular mind a more self-relying, self-thinking, self-judging, national spirit, adapted to our noble institutions and ever opposing by its current of generous patriotism, the tide that has been so long and injuriously setting upon us from across the Atlantic.

The constant in-pouring upon us of Foreign ideas, engendered by and only fitted for monarchical establishments, intended often directly to oppose and act upon that silent, onward power of truth and liberty, imbosomed here and hence diffusing itself through the civilized nations of both hemispheres, amounts in fact to a species of English propagandism, and is persisted in and carried out with a zeal and constancy worthy of a Loyola. One striking example to illustrate this, though the same is exhibited in a thousand other forms, may be found in Alison's History of Europe, during the French Revolution. The subject of this great work is one of the most splendid that ever engaged the pen of a historian. To use his own words, "in no former age, were events of such magnitude crowded together, or interests so momentous at issue between contending nations. From the flame which was kindled in Europe, the whole world has been involved in conflagration, and a new era dawned upon both hemispheres from the effects of its expansion." This flame was the French Revolution, and taking the excesses of that terrific explosion as a fair sample of popular liberty, he studiously disparages every system of government that aims to be more liberal than that of England, and bends the weight of no ordinary talent and learning to sustain, in its tory principles, the statu quo, ne plus ultra, sat bene institutions of Great Britain. There are not wanting, the while, references to America to support his monarchical principles; but when he comes at last to write the history of this country, his design becomes more open, and his toryism and disingenuousness are only equalled by his gross and unpardonable ignorance.

Yet this voluminous, and in many respects attractive history, has been diffused and read in this country to an extent that a patriot might covet for the best charters of our liberties, such as our immortal constitution, the life and writings of Washington, the Madison papers, and the like.

This spirit of embodying the principles, ideas and policy of England in her great Literary works, as Hume, Blackstone, Alison, &c., is a very powerful and most insidious species of propagandism, which our people have ever been ready to embrace and promote. So just and non-interfering—so anti-proselyting has been the whole career of the United States since the foundation of their independence, that there has been no pretext with England for any other mode of operation upon them. The course of this Government, the freest and most enlightened on the Globe, has been characterized by higher honor, justice, humanity and faith, (I say this unhesitatingly with all the clamor of repudiation, here and abroad, still ringing in my ears,) during its whole existence, than that of any other Government, for the same length of time. In this period, India, China, even Africa, and her own suffering and oppressed children can "a tale unfold," upon England, alike shocking to justice and humanity. Our course has been so different from that of France in her revolution, though the dangers and tendencies of our Institutions are by British politicians identified with hers, that England for a long time has had no excuse for doing any thing more than, at home and here, to disparage and undermine Republican Government, by insinuations, writings, libels and misrepresentations.

But alas! we are now compelled to open our eyes to other things, in addition to all this! Because it is proposed by some to receive into this Union an Independent country that seeks our fellowship and protection, an official despatch from an English minister of State proclaims England's determination to interfere with our domestic institutions—so peculiar in their nature, as to be indissolubly connected with the peace of our whole country, and the safety and lives of nearly half our citizens, and the polity of just half of these States! The indifference with which this extraordinary document, thus solemnly put forth, by the Censor morum of nations, is most astounding, and shows how difficult it is, in the heat of party excitement at home, to excite attention and reflection to indications from abroad. Scarcely more surprising than this general indifference is the attempt which some have made to fritter down this startling document and to represent it as perfectly consistent with the duty and respect that one nation owes another. No reference shall here be made to the Texas question.

farther than to state that in all the debate upon it, the Hon. Senator Rives was nearly the only one who seemed to attach any thing like its due importance to Lord Aberdeen's remarkable despatch.

In connection with the views I have already expressed, I had intended to prepare a special review of that State-paper; but I find the subject so fully and ably treated in the communication, which you have handed me, that I shall conclude with only a few thoughts not touched upon by that reviewer.* I find that I have been completely anticipated by him, in the tenor of the article, as well as in references to history and a proposed parody upon Lord Aberdeen's letter, to all of which I would invite the attention of your readers.

The writer alluded to has clearly shown that the propagandism of England in reference to slavery among us, is the same as that of France towards her, which she resisted with force of arms and with all the power of her eloquence, authority and police. But whilst her action is the same is her provocation the same? Has she any provocation, even in the vagaries of dreaming? The "democratic ambition," "the discordant passion for Independence," "the fervor of innovation," (all of which beautiful epithets we borrow from the liberal-minded Alison,) so opposed to the principles of English monarchy, were powerful political engines in the hands of an excited and unrestrained people. But how can slavery here have any effect upon the security or the permanence of British Institutions? England has declared herself ready for a crusade, sentimental as yet, for the sake of a philanthropy, most horribly disregarded in her own dominions, in reference to her own oppressed and famishing subjects. Thus we find her without excuse even, coming with her propagandism towards us, whilst she has not yet stopped her complaints against France.

Some say, "England has only declared her wishes, in reference to the abolition of slavery and no one can object to that; she expressly disavows any intention to interfere with it." This is not all she has done. She has avowed a determination to see her wishes gratified and to use all proper means to procure a "consummation," so "devoutly to be wished for." Proper means! She will have the choice of them, as well as the decision as to their propriety; and who knows not how readily the means come to be adapted to any end that is admitted to be ardently aimed at, or desired. English History can throw a Drummond light upon this subject! But this is not all! What means can be proper, in reference to such a delicate subject, intertwined with our laws, our constitutions, our habits and our interests, and that, too, in foreign and independent states, possessing every right and attribute that England herself does?

She declares that she "is constantly exerting herself to procure the general abolition of slavery throughout the world."* The United States are at least a part of the world, and slavery exists in one half of them;—hence she is constantly exerting herself to procure the abolition of slavery here.

"The means which she has adopted and will continue to adopt, for this virtuous and humane purpose, are open and undisguised."† * * * "the Governments of the slave-holding States may be assured, that although we shall not desist from those open and honest efforts which we have constantly made for procuring the abolition of slavery throughout the world," &c.‡ What, then, are those "open and undisguised means?" those "open and honest efforts?" Suppose her efforts ever so honest, the result will be the same. It must be effected directly or indirectly, and I can see no more improper mode than the one she is now pursuing, except an open war, "for this virtuous and humane purpose." The abolition of slavery in these States, however procured, will necessarily lead to conventions of the United States and all the States to form and ratify a new constitution:—it would alter the constitutions of all the slave-holding States and produce a thorough revolution in all the social and political arrangements of the people; and if effected in the mode and by the means now employed, will lead to most disastrous and appalling consequences. "Yet we shall neither openly nor secretly resort to any measures which can tend to disturb the internal tranquillity, or thereby to affect the prosperity of the American Union."§ What sublime logic! What shallow casuistry! Interfere with the political constitutions of a country and endanger the lives of its people, yet not "disturb its internal tranquillity!"

Even if England mean to do nothing, but engage in "open and honest efforts" for the abolition of slavery in these States, she must still occupy the same position that France did to her. Her efforts were open—and no people ever thought their efforts more honest. Whilst France had done nothing but declare her principles and invite the coöperation of all lovers of freedom, Great Britain commenced her denunciations, and even when she declared war, had little to proceed upon, but the avowed revolutionary sentiments of that misguided people. When England is the party acted upon, her ideas of right and justice are correct; but when John Bull wishes to gore another nation's ox, the whole affair is entirely reversed.

We have remarked that England has not yet ceased to cry out against the propagandism of France. The last number of Blackwood|| thus harps upon it.

In an article upon Lord Eldon, the writer sets forth the dangers that threatened England and Europe, from the French revolutionists and their emissaries. Referring to the events that followed "the cruel murder of the innocent and unfortunate Louis XVI," he says, "the French minister at the Court of St. James was ordered to leave the country, and war was proclaimed. The revolutionary committees in England now assumed increased activity. Communications were established between them and the Jacobin Government; and while France prepared for war, English republicanism prepared for revolution. The time of the struggle was fully come. The English minister now buckled on his armor. * * * Opposition never exhibited more brilliant parliamentary powers. Fox was matchless in declamation, alternately solemn and touching; Sheridan, Grey and a long list of practised and indefatigable talent, were in perpetual debate; but Pitt 'with huge two hundred away,' finally crushed them all. * * * He extinguished that principle of evil increase, by which all the efforts of foreign Governments had been baffled in their contests with Jacobinism," &c.

In strong contrast with the coloring always given to the conduct of other nations, ever stands the self-laudation of England; as a specimen of this, we will just quote a little farther from the same article. "On the continent, the conspirators against the State would have been thrown into dungeons for life, or shot. In France, the idol of the Revolutionist of all countries, they would have been carried before a mob tribunal, their names simply asked, their sentences pronounced, and their bodies headless within the first half hour. In England they had the benefit of the Law in all its sincerity, the assistance of the most distinguished counsel, the judgment of the most impartial tribunal, and the incalculable advantage of a trial by men of their own condition, feelings and passions." To swallow this, one must forget the whole history of State trials in England, where, as is too well known, the State has procured the conviction of nearly every prisoner upon whom it has once laid its stigma!

But this is departing from the subject. To return;—England now pretends to have very recent charges against the improper propagandism of France, and rumor says that they are likely to be made the pretext of a war against Louis Philippe. I allude to the Tahiti affair; and it is amusing, though instructive, to see what a face some British writers endeavor to put upon it. The immediate cause of complaint is an alleged indignity offered to Mr. Pritchard, the British consul, by the French on that Island. When the matter was recently alluded to in the House of Lords, the Duke of Wellington declared that a great outrage had been committed, for which reparation must be made. The reparation demanded by the British Government, is said to embrace "the dismissal of M. D'Aubigny; the recall of M. De Bruat, who on his return to Tahiti sanctioned the conduct of M. D'Aubigny; the demolition of all the fortifications raised in the island during the sovereignty of France; and finally, the establishment on the station of a fleet for the protection of the subjects of both countries." Very ample satisfaction indeed!

But there are other Tahiti transactions discussed in the English Journals, in that one sided mode, which the prejudices and strong nationality of England always adopt. From their account of these, and the long-established animosity and jealousy between the two countries, it is not wonderful that England should at length be able to put her complaints in some definite shape, so as to demand the satisfaction already alluded to. An article, in the Dublin University Magazine of July 1843, entitled "Propagandism in the Pacific," contains in substance the following statements.

In the first place it is charged that "For several years past the French Government of Louis Philippe, aided by the Romish Priesthood, have been persevering in their endeavors to obtain a political ascendancy in the Pacific; and had this been done in an open and manly way, our remarks might have been brief; we shall, however, as the matter stands, enter into some detail."

It thence appears, that a law of Tahiti prohibits the residence of any foreigner, without permission from the Government. In 1836, two French Romish Priests attempted to intrude themselves upon that island; but this law was enforced and they expelled, after milder measures had failed.

"The piety of Louis Philippe, however, was offended, and Captain Du Petit Thouars was despatched to obtain redress, and the conduct of this officer was sufficiently disgusting. The French captain, instead of treating with the native authorities at once, put himself in connection with the grog dealer, Moerenhout, who was at the same time consul for the United States and secret agent for France. The consequence of this dishonorable conference was a demand for an apology and for the sum of two thousand dollars as a fine for the conduct of the queen in dismissing the priests. Unless this was done, the valiant Du Petit Thouars threatened to batter down the town of Matavia, and establish a creature of Moerenhout's as sovereign. What follows is honorable to Englishmen: the unfortunate Tahitians had no money, but the sum was advanced by three British subjects, Mr. Pritchard, the British consul, Dr. Vaughan, and Mr. Bicknell, the son of one of the missionaries. We feel curious to know what became of this and other sums extorted from the Polynesians. Did it go to the French exchequer, or was it absorbed by that money-getting polypus, La Fayette's Utopia, and the best of all possible republics, Louis Philippe?"

This also shows the temper of the article: and in the decency of the closing lines, which we have italicised, even Martin Chuzzlewit might find something to delight his fastidious taste. But the courteous writer proceeds to state, that in April 1839, the French frigate, L' Artemise, Captain La Place, visited Tahiti and compelled the repeal of their anti-intrusion law, so that "Jesuits and runaway convicts may find an asylum in Tahiti." In May 1843, the French ship of war, L' Aube, Captain Dubuset, compelled the Queen of Tahiti to dismiss her police, because a drunken French captain had been punished, which "touched French honor."

He then returns to Du Petit Thouars, and every thing, even the encirclement of the Queen, is thrown in to heighten the enormity of that admiral's conduct.

"We must now come to the climax of these iniquities and the crowning exploit of Du Petit Thouars; and we may venture to assert that the odious combination of obscenity and falsehood, priestcraft and infidelity, is a disgrace to a nation calling itself civilized. But the iniquities of Du Petit Thouars were preceded by an appropriate prelude by the French consul, Moerenhout. 'This person, some months before the arrival of the French frigate, and apparently in anticipation of that event, and when the queen was absent from the island, endeavored to prevail upon the chiefs to sign a letter surrendering the sovereignty of Tahiti to Louis Philippe.'"

"After this fraud Du Petit Thouars arrived in September, 1842; and we have now to record acts which would have cashiered any English officer, and have permanently expelled him from all correct and moral society. For some days after the arrival of our buccaneer all was quiet, and many professions of peace were made on the part of the French. The Queen and principal chiefs were then requested to visit the frigate, that the commander might pay his respects to them, and of course it was understood that his visit was of a friendly nature. The poor queen however was in hourly expectation of her confinement, of which Du Petit Thouars appears to have taken unmanly advantage; and it will hereafter be seen that under any circumstances this officer was no fitting society for a modest woman. The mingled cowardice and meanness of what followed requires no comment. In the evening the British and American consuls received an official document stating the differences that existed between the Tahitian and French Governments, which would probably lead to hostilities; and all French, British and American subjects were therefore warned to take means for securing their persons and property.

"Before the queen or her friends could be consulted, or the day appointed had arrived, the French admiral had settled the affair by means of fraud and falsehood, equal to any thing to be found in the memoirs of his countryman Vidocq. A secret meeting was held during the night, at which four chiefs attended, and a document signed by them resigning the sovereignty of the island to the French king. Next morning, the queen was required to sign this act of abdication within twenty-four hours, or to pay a fine of ten thousand dollars. But a sad experience had taught the islanders the terrific power of France, and had rendered her very name odious among them. The queen declared she would rather die than subscribe to this swindling document; and although in a situation whose delicacy would have called for some forbearance and courtesy on the part of a gentleman, Admiral Du Petit Thouars was inexorable; and as the money could not be procured, she affixed her signature just one hour before the firing was to commence."

"No honest man can entertain a doubt as to the mode in which Tahiti was brought under the supremacy of France. It was compulsory in the strictest sense of the word; and it is therefore with a feeling of humiliation that we have to refer to Admiral Du Petit Thouars' official account of the transaction. Nothing can better show the opinion of the French Admiral respecting his own conduct than that he has been obliged, in order to give a plausible statement of these misdeeds, to fill his official report with falsehoods of the most disgraceful nature."

"Middleton's Letter was far from exhausting the parallels between ancient and modern Roman polytheism. The present history affords an instructive one. Licentiousness and the real presence proceeded with equal steps, and the rights of Paphos were identified with the progress of Popery. It remains only to be added, that all these transactions have met with the full approbation of Louis Philippe, who has bestowed on the Admiral the cross of the Legion of Honor. We would suggest, that in addition, he be created chief of the *Arreoy*s, and sent back to Polynesia with a cargo of Jesuits."

"We have thus seen the approved mode of obtaining the sovereignty over a defenceless people. Priests are smuggled in, in opposition to the police regulations of the country, a French agent or consul demoralizes the people by the sale of spirits, the greatest crime a European residing among barbarous races can be guilty of. The priest and the agent stir up strife, they are ordered to quit the country, French honor is insulted, a frigate arrives, demands a fine, calculated on purpose to be so high, that it cannot be paid, and as a compensation, the country is taken possession of under the sovereignty of France. This general statement is fully borne out by the conduct of the French in the Sandwich Islands, a conduct perfectly parallel to that pursued in the Society Islands, of which we will now give some account."

After giving other statements of a similar character, in the same courteous and conciliatory tone, the writer continues:

"The causes which have led to these strange transactions are not difficult to discover. No one will be simple enough to believe that piety or religious motives actuated the French Government in these crusades to the antipodes. We would as soon expect that the Religious Tract Society should publish a cheap edition of Volney's Catechism. In fact, it is purely a political speculation in which

* Feeling some compunctions for thus blackening the character of the French Admiral, he here adds the following exculpatory note.

"There is something in all this we cannot fathom. Admiral Du Petit Thouars is the son of a brave officer, who fell gloriously at Aboukir, and his uncle was an amiable and respected member of the French Institute. Still, we cannot accept him as a sample of French naval officers. We rather suspect that he and Captain La Place are not over fastidious, and therefore sometimes useful people, who will undertake duties which men of nicer feelings would decline."

any other form of religion would have been employed as readily as the Roman, provided it proved itself an equally efficacious instrument to bring about the ends sought for. We believe there are two objects more particularly aimed at, and also that the forcing of priests and brandy on the islands of the Pacific is only a small part of a very comprehensive scheme. One object of this propagandism is what may be called a dynastic one. We believe there is but little attachment to the Orleans family in France, while it is viewed with rooted aversion by that great part of the nation which calls itself liberal—and in truth, Louis Philippe occupies a lonely position more removed from the sympathies of his people than Louis the Eighteenth and Charles the Tenth. As some party is better than none the present attempt is to obtain the adhesion of the priest party, and of course along with it the friendship of Rome and Vienna."

Since England has such ideas of the piety and honor of France, what must we think of her conduct, if we apply the same charitable rules of interpretation? Is there nothing political in her philanthropic movements? Has she no political ends to subserve, by operating upon internal institutions here, dearer and more delicate than the laws or institutions of all the islands of the Pacific? She is "constantly exerting herself to procure" a change in our Governments, of far more consequence to us, than any in Tahiti can be to her. Yet whilst Sir Robert Peel is demanding satisfaction for the wrongs of Tahiti, Lord Aberdeen, as it were just across the room, puts forth a manifesto of worse interference and propagandism here. And Lord Brougham, a sort of superficial pantologist, with one breath lashes a very inconsiderable repeal agitator in the United States, and in the next, with a visage as benevolent as a Quaker's coat, has the impertinence to inquire what her Majesty's Government are doing with slavery here and in Texas! If England is in pursuit of good—if true Philanthropy is her motive, why does she refuse the petitions of Lord Ashley and Dr. Southwood Smith? Why does she trample upon the sufferings of her oppressed laborers? Why stifle the voice of her Indian slaves? Why tamper with the slave trade? For once, my Lords, let charity begin at home.

But we have not yet done with France and England. The scene now changes from the Pacific to the Mediterranean; The French fleet, under Prince de Joinville, is bombarding Tangier, a sea port town of the Kingdom of Fez, in Africa. It is a place of some trade, supplying the opposite coast with provisions, has a castle and is surrounded by a wall, and may be useful as an entrepot into Africa and the Mediterranean. What says England to this. The Tories tell Sir Robert to urge the Tahiti affair, and the Whigs call for war; and the continental powers, it is rumored, declare that "La Jeune France" must have a drubbing. What is Tangier to England? She has the impregnable Gibraltar on the opposite shore.

In 1683 Charles II. thought Tangier was not worth the expense of keeping and caused the works to be blown up. But now, it is one of the granaries of Gibraltar itself! Its cession to France will greatly injure the British merchants! Even the Paris Globe, the organ of M. Guizot, says, "England can only hold Gibraltar, as long as no great Power has possession of the coast of Morocco and Tangier. Place cannon on the African coast of the Straits, and the importance of Gibraltar will diminish one half." Of course England will magnify its importance, and the enormity of seizing it. There is no little truth, however, in the views of the Paris National which says, "Small as is this little island of Tahiti, it is a point on the sea, and every other nation is forbid to establish itself any where, without the permission of Great Britain.

This is the bottom of their way of thinking; they speak of honor and of ambition; they make a noise about Pritchard; but their ideas really run on having a domination every where sovereign. Under the cloak of international laws which they pretend have been violated, they pursue only a miserable object of cupidity, jealousy and covetousness."

Balance of power! Propagandism in the Mediterranean! The "Democratic ambition" of "young France!" These are enough to justify every thing. Under the impression that the Liberal party in France have a rooted aversion to Louis Philippe, and that there is very little attachment to the Orleans family, it is feared that on the death of Louis Philippe, there will be another republican outbreak in France and perhaps a war for the extension of free principles. This the crowned heads greatly fear, and thinking that the war will be waged under more favorable auspices, against the aged and pacific Louis Philippe, crippled perhaps by the disaffection of his subjects, it may ere long be commenced. The King of the French, it appears, has been none too quick in fortifying his capital.

A pretty picture of human rights this presents, the crowned heads of Europe precipitating a war to prevent the diffusion of glorious Liberty! They assume that they have a right to power by prescription, or jure Divino, and considering themselves aggrieved by every effort to extend popular freedom, they band together to arrest the onward march of human happiness and improvement. Millions must suffer and endure, whilst their toil sustains and pampers the few thousand that ride upon their backs, or trample upon their necks!

But let us take another view of the case, by reversing the picture. Are the principles of absolutism so negative and passive that there is no propagandism in their advocates? The friends of liberty are overwhelmed by the majority against them. They must be active. They have every thing to contend against and are not left free to assert their freedom, even within their own just authority. When despotism wars upon them, does not it assert and propagate its own essential principles? Thus is often perpetrated a grosser injustice, a more unjustifiable interference, than "Democratic ambition" was ever guilty of: I plead not the cause of Revolutionism, nor of Radicalism; but of constitutional liberty, "by law restrained;" such as our Republican fathers enjoyed and established. But England gives very nearly the same coloring to our Republicanism, that the writer above does to the character of Admiral Du Petit Thouars; and is by no means willing that we should be placed under favorable circumstances to develop the glory and power of our institutions. Our success will shame all her proud pretensions, falsify her prophecies and frustrate her hopes. But that there are difficulties to be encountered—inflammable materials here to be enkindled, we see as plainly as she does. To increase these difficulties, to ignite these materials will best promote her policy and her permanence, by casting opprobrium upon free government. We are beset by an insidious policy, by a cunning diplomacy, and may well be upon our guard.

Though slavery has been the primary ground of the foregoing views, yet I have given them a national bearing. I believe that non-interference with slavery is a national interest—as much as the defence of the North would be, by troops or munitions contributed by the Southern States. The interests and duties of the North and of the South in both cases are perfectly reconcilable. But I would not disguise, nor surrender my decided devotion to the South. It is a part of my education, a bequest from a venerated parent. My father, the late Christopher Columbus South, was one of the most ardent of patriots. Perhaps a sort of pride that he was named after the great discoverer, lent additional force to his attachment to his country. He was fond of recalling and dwelling upon the characters and exploits of the great ones of the Revolution. The best patriots and most upright were his greatest men—"Goodness is greatness," was his maxim. He endeavored to inspire his children with the same sentiments. As he was named after one great discoverer of America, he called me after another, and used to say to me, "Americus, let your name indicate your principles:—be an American. Love your country, your whole country, and let all your aims be for her and for God." He was also an old-fashioned Virginian, and thought it perfectly compatible with honor, conscience and religion to hold slaves; and that we had as much right to security and peace in their possession, as the non-slave-holders have to their cherished institutions. Hence, I have thought it right to let my whole name indicate my principles—an American Southerner:—

IN THE UNION AND FOR THE UNION; IN THE SOUTH AND FOR THE SOUTH.

THE TEMPEST OF THE SOUL.

BY MRS. MARIA G. BUCHANAN.

On stormy Doubt's tempestuous ocean,
Once struggling tossed my bacr of Life;
Loud was the billow's fierce commotion,
Fearful the wind's o'erwhelming strife.
The thunders hoarse of justice started
Affrighted conscience from her sleep—
And guilt's red lightnings wildly darted
Their lurid glare across the deep.

Sin's midnight darkness had enshrouded
The beaming "Sun of Righteousness;"
The golden star of faith was clouded,
Its rays cheered not my deep distress.
The warfare rude fair peace affrighted,
Her snowy wings she plumed for flight;
Not e'en hope's smile irradiant lighted
The gloom of that remembered night.

Death's icy form seemed hanging o'er me,
Upon my soul his terrors fell;
Despair's dark whirlpool yawned before me,
Beyond appeared the lowest hell.
Onward my fated bark was rushing;
Wild horror woke within my breast;
When Lo! the tempest calmly hushing,
A Voice was heard proclaiming "Rest."

Oh, God! oh, God! my glad emotion,
As mercy's seraph form appeared!
With glorious wing she swept doubt's ocean,
And high a golden banner reared.
The symbol on its folds engraven,
The Cross on which a SAVIOUR died,
Was to Religion's blessed haven
My, only true, unerring guide.

RELIC of FRANKLIN'S TOIL! Time-honored press!
Had'st thou a tongue, what story could'st thou tell
Of him who labored at thy bar so well!
But now thy mute oration hath not less
Of strange, mysterious power the mind to fill
With rev'rent thoughts of him who gave the age
New light and truth in each unfolding page,
And made the lightning herald of his will!
Old Press! Worm-eaten Press! I love to gaze
Upon thy quaint, old-fashioned form and style,
And think of FRANKLIN's genius all the while!
Though now obscured by Art's increasing blaze
And lost for Art's best use, thou still shalt share
His mighty name, and all his works declare.

Type of that grand, imperishable art,
Which sheds its countless rays from pole to pole,
Lighting the regions of the darkened soul,
Thy name enkindles fire within my heart!
Vast change the world hath seen between thy day
And this—and though worn out and laid aside
Unfit for use, 'tis with no common pride
We gaze upon thee now,—as well we may!
No marble pillar bears his honored name
Who wrought thee well—no cenotaph is graced
With fading characters upon it traced
To be the silent record of his fame;
The proudest monument to him we find
Is light and truth as lasting as the mind!

LORD ABERDEEN'S LETTER.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE AND DOCUMENTS RELATIVE TO TEXAS, from which the injunction of secrecy has been removed. Senate. 1st Session, 28th Congress. Doc. 341.

We do not intend at this time to discuss the Texas question. We refer to the documents above, only for the purpose of calling attention more particularly to the letter of Lord Aberdeen's at pp. 48-9, which we consider the most extraordinary State paper of the age.

That the reader may examine it attentively, we quote it. We beg him to read it carefully.

FOREIGN OFFICE, December, 26, 1843.

SIR:—As much agitation appears to have prevailed of late in the United States relative to the designs which Great Britain is supposed to entertain with regard to the Republic of Texas, Her Majesty's Government deem it expedient to take measures for stopping at once the misrepresentations which have been circulated, and the errors into which the Government of the United States seems to have fallen on the subject of the policy of Great Britain with respect to Texas. That policy is clear and simple, and may be stated in a few words.

Great Britain has recognized the independence of Texas, and, having done so, she is desirous of seeing that independence finally and formally established, and generally recognized, especially by Mexico. But this desire does not arise from any motion of ambition or of self-interest, beyond that interest, at least, which attaches to the general extension of our commercial dealings with other countries.

We are convinced that the recognition of Texas by Mexico must conduce to the benefits of both these countries, and, as we take an interest in the well-being of both, and in their steady advance in power and wealth, we have put ourselves forward in pressing the Government of Mexico to acknowledge Texas as independent. But in thus acting we have no occult design, either with reference to any peculiar influence which we might seek to establish in Mexico or in Texas, or even with reference to the slavery which now exists, and which we desire to see abolished in Texas.

With regard to the latter point, it must be and is well known, both to the United States and to the whole world, that Great Britain desires, and is constantly exerting herself to procure, the general abolition of slavery throughout the world. But the means which she has adopted, and will continue to adopt, for this humane and virtuous purpose, are open and undisguised. She will do nothing secretly or underhand. She desires that her motives may be generally understood, and her acts seen by all.

With regard to Texas we avow that we wish to see slavery abolished there, as elsewhere; and we should rejoice if the recognition of that country by the Mexican Government should be accompanied by an engagement on the part of Texas to abolish slavery eventually, and under proper conditions, throughout the Republic. But although we earnestly desire and feel it to be our duty to promote such a consummation, we shall not interfere unduly, or with an improper assumption of authority with either party, in order to ensure the adoption of such a course. We shall counsel, but we shall not seek to compel, or unduly control, either party. So far as Great Britain is concerned, provided other States act with equal forbearance, those Governments will be fully at liberty to make their own unfettered arrangements with each other, both in regard to the abolition of slavery and to all other points.

Great Britain, moreover, does not desire to establish in Texas, whether partially dependent on Mexico, or entirely independent, (which latter alternative we consider in every respect preferable,) any dominant influence. She only desires to share her influence equally with all other nations. Her objects are purely commercial; and she has no thought or intention of seeking to act directly or indirectly, in a political sense, on the United States through Texas.

The British Government, as the United States well know, have never sought in any way to stir up disaffection or excitement of any kind in the slave-holding States of the American Union. Much as we should wish to see those States placed on the firm and solid footing which we consciously believe is to be attained by general freedom alone, we have never in our treatment of them made any difference between the slave-holding and the free States of the Union. All are, in our eyes, entitled, as component members of the Union, to equal political respect, favor, and forbearance on our part. To that wise and just policy we shall continue to adhere; and the Governments of the slave-holding States may be assured that, although we shall not desist from those open and honest efforts which we have constantly made for procuring the abolition of slavery throughout the world, we shall neither openly nor secretly resort to any measures which can tend to disturb their internal tranquillity, or thereby to affect the prosperity of the American Union.

You will communicate this despatch to the United States Secretary of State, and, if he should desire it, you will leave a copy of it with him.

I am, &c.

ABERDEEN.

Right Hon. RICHARD PAKENHAM, &c.

Is not this the first time that the doctrine of foreign interference with our domestic concerns has been broached from the other side of the Atlantic! "Great Britain," says her Minister, "in constantly exerting herself to procure the general abolition of slavery throughout the world." He adds, she has already "adopted and will continue to adopt" means "for this humane and virtuous purpose." She "earnestly desires and feels it her duty to promote such a consummation;" but she "will not interfere unduly, or with any improper assumption of authority, or seek unduly to control" in the matter, "PROVIDED OTHER STATES ACT WITH EQUAL FORBEARANCE."

Mark the salvoes and the qualifications. No undue interference or control, no improper means, PROVIDED other States act with equal FORBEARANCE! Taught from early youth up, to believe that, from that Government, all means are undue, all interference improper, we regard this paper with abhorrence. The question of slavery with us, admits not even of discussion from such a quarter, much less will it brook interference.

Mark too, the effrontery with which this doctrine as to interference with our domestic institutions is put forth from the other side of the water. English interference with our system of slavery is claimed not only as a matter of right, but of duty. England feels it her duty to procure the abolition of slavery here! So writes Lord Aberdeen, and so says the letter.

Nor is this all. With the air and manner of arrogance boasting of virtue, his lordship goes further and reminds this Government that they, the English, "have never, in their treatment of them, (us,) made any difference between the slave-holding and free States of the Union." This document assures the Governments of the slave-holding States, that although England will not desist from the efforts which she is constantly making to procure the abolition of slavery among them, they are entitled to as much "political respect, favor and forbearance on her part" as the free States.

"FORBEARANCE!" Forbearance is a virtue; the exercise of patience; long suffering; indulgence towards those who injure us; DELAY OF RESENTMENT. Consult if you please the Lexicographers.

You are a scholar and a statesman, my lord, skilled in diplomacy. You know the force of words, and weigh well their meaning before you commit them on paper in the affairs of State; come tell us, therefore, why is it, since your Government has not yet supererogated so far as to intermeddle with our private affairs and domestic concerns, why is it that for that you claim for her the lowly and humble, the meek and christian virtues of forbearance. Is it our wholesome system of democracy that tries her patience? the example of a great republican government, prosperous and happy at home, strong and powerful abroad, that causes this long-suffering? What is the injury that has called for indulgence from her? Is it because we were too valiant in war, too great in peace? Or for what ancient grudge is the delayed resentment yet to come! for these are some of the conditions required to dignify the mere negative act of "cease to do evil" with the ennobling virtues of FORBEARANCE.

Perhaps his lordship will tell us too, what those means are which he says Great Britain has already adopted and will continue to adopt, what those efforts are which she is constantly making to procure the abolition of slavery here! We should like to know. When Governments boast of philanthropy and ministers prate about the feelings of humanity which actuate them, we always expect to see some terrible display of frantic benevolence. History tells us of a people that, "in the name of liberty, once got drunk with crime to vomit blood." Raving mad with new-fangled doctrines of social equality, they took off the head of their sovereign and threw it down in the arena of Revolution, a bloody gauntlet to the kings of Europe. They made oath to a new Constitution and pronounced it an "eternal anathema upon absolute thrones." Resolved no longer to treat with crowned heads, they viewed them and their subjects as "pacific savages;" they called all regularly accredited ambassadors, "titled spies," and declared themselves the natural allies of all free people. With liberty and equality for their watchword, they proclaimed the "rights of man," and preached to enslaved multitudes the captivating doctrines of political regeneration.

The course which a certain "sea girt isle" took, when such doctrines were propagated and as soon as she was threatened with the influence of French philanthropy, may perhaps afford England a lesson with regard to the doctrines of universal emancipation, the black philanthropy which she now preaches and the interference which she now threatens with regard to the domestic arrangements of the United States.

For twenty long years she and the allied powers of Europe urged fierce and desolating wars because there were French propagandists. England once complained, even at the cannon's mouth, that the discussions of the Clubs, and the political disquisitions of the people of a neighboring nation endangered the safety of her own domestic institutions. And, as the doctrines now preached by the world's convention and the anti-slavery societies of London, are, in principle, not far different from those put forth 50 years ago with such awful consequences by the Clubs of Paris—as the doctrine now proclaimed by Lord Aberdeen breathes the very spirit manifested in the famous decree of the 19th November, 1792, which made it known that the French nation "would grant fraternity and assistance to all people who wish to recover their freedom;" we propose hastily to point out a few only of these points of resemblance that they may serve us for subsequent illustration.

"The unprecedented and alarming proceedings on this occasion" (19 Nov.) says Alison the Historian, "joined to the rapid increase and treasonable language of the Jacobin societies in England, excited a very general feeling of disquietude in Great Britain"—as do now, in this country, the abolition societies of the North, encouraged and incited by those of London. England then invited a confederation against the French, and through Lord Granville proposed that the efforts of the allies should be limited in preventing their interference with other states, or extending their conquests or propagandism beyond their own frontier.*

Howsoever the plant may have been watered, the seeds of the French Revolution are to be found in the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, Raynal and the Encyclopedists. There, philosophical speculations upon religion and politics, disquisitions upon the condition of man here and hereafter, discussions upon political subjects took place and were all entertained in the widest range. The young amused themselves with visionary speculations as to the social compact, and the imaginative dreamed of equal rights, civil and religious freedom, until they were at last aroused from their slumbers by the cries from the guillotine. Thus arose one of the most remarkable eras afforded by the history of civilized man. And from a like source has arisen the present anti-slavery mania in England.

But let us first see, judging from the past, to what extent England would be likely to tolerate from her neighbors such an interference with her domestic concerns as Lord Aberdeen now tells us she feels it her duty to make towards ours.

Both Mr. Pitt and Mr. Burke, speaking for the English Government, said the decree of the National Assembly, which promised "fraternity and assistance" in the name of the French nation, "to all people who wish to recover their freedom", "was not levelled against particular nations, but against every country where there was any form of government established;" they said it was "a decree not hostile to individuals, but to the human race; and that was calculated every where to sow the seeds of rebellion and civil commotion." It was made the cause of war.

How awful and calamitous in her mind did this thing of foreign interference in the domestic institutions of nations appear when brought home to Old England; nay, half a century gone, and it was dreadful to all kings and people. The Clubs of Paris advocated the cause of popular liberty, discoursed on the sovereignty of the people, questioned the divine right of kings, and all Europe rose up in arms and put France in coventry for her principles. The Pitt and Granville act made it criminal for a British subject to hold even so much as a friendly correspondence with a French republican. The contagious influence of democratic principles might, it was dreaded, cross over the channel: therefore the people in England were forbid "peaceably to assemble and petition for the redress of grievances." If they complained of rotten boroughs, or asked for reforms in Parliament, they were told they were inoculated with French principles, an indescribable something, a sort of mal frances, and turned empty away.

So alarming was this doctrine of stepping behind thrones to interfere with people, so dreadful the idea of teaching them, or even telling them of the "rights of man," that as soon as the revolution commenced, kings on their thrones and ministers in their palaces were seized with a general consternation at its principles and its progress. Immediately their jealousies of each other were allayed, their passions stilled, and a general but rapid pacification throughout Europe took place, that they might combine in war to stifle its principles and prevent the contagion of French democracy from reaching their subjects.

"The first object of the war," said Austria and Prussia to Denmark in alliance, "is to form a bulwark against the revolutionary principles of the French Republic."

"Great Britain," said the English Ministry, "never claimed a right to interfere in the internal affairs of France, or to dictate to her inhabitants the form of government, or race of sovereigns they were to choose. The war was undertaken," said they, "not to partition or circumscribe its territory, but to oppose a barrier to the inundation of infidel and democratic principles, by which the Republic first shook the opinions of the multitude in all the adjoining states."

"The extinction of the Revolutionary spirit," says the faithful historian, after the lapse of half a century, "the stoppage of the insidious system of propagandism, by which the French democracy were shaking all the thrones and endangering all the institutions and liberties of Europe, was the real object of the war."

In reply to the arguments of Mr. Fox and Mr. Grey against the war in 1793, it was urged by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Burke in behalf of the Ministry, as one among the reasons why the war should be continued, that the French principles, the doctrine that national sovereignty resides in the people, was carried through Europe by means of the Jacobin societies. It was the seducing language of freedom used by these emissaries of the societies, that spread such consternation among the crowned heads of Europe.

Do not the abolition societies of London now, in their effects, and the bearings of their doctrines upon the domestic institutions of this country, offer some points of resemblance to the Clubs of Paris in the influence which their propagandism had upon the internal affairs of Great Britain at the end of the last century! Is not their language also seducing? And who so blind that he can not discover in this despatch of Lord Aberdeen the identical principle contained in the celebrated decree of Nov. 19, 1793, of the National Assembly, which England then considered and made cause of war? The objects are somewhat different, it is true; but the principle is the same. Wherein is the difference, as to principle, between the Jacobin Clubs of Paris with their affiliated societies preaching liberty and equality, the "rights of man," the sovereignty of the people, to the subjects of Great Britain and seeking to stir up insurrection among them in 1793,—Wherein, I say, is the difference in principle, between them in '93, and the anti-slavery societies of London in 1844. Have not these their affiliated societies here, their missionaries armed like those of the last century with the torch of insurrection, and preaching from the same text of liberty and equality, the captivating doctrines of "freedom to the slave," "the political regeneration of the African," the "emancipation everywhere of man from bondage to his fellow man!" In the terms of the historian, was it not the "seducing language of freedom," held forth by "French emissaries and British demagogues" to the "lower orders of society," that caused the seditious meetings of England in '95 and led to the act prohibiting the people of the realm, even peaceably, to assemble! Like causes produce like effects, the world over. Have not the agitation of the abolition societies, instigated by English emissaries,* called on the slave states for the enactment of more rigorous laws! These states, at least many of them, have been compelled to copy after the famous Pitt and Granville act, and make it criminal for the slaves peaceably to assemble, even to worship their God, unless, like the British subjects of that day, the meeting be held under the eyes of magistrates. In either case the bonds of servitude were already galling enough; and in both, the indiscreet acts of misguided friends made them chafe still more. Mr. Pitt himself was the advocate of parliamentary reform in England; was in favor of giving ear to the grievances of the people, of extending the political privileges, and of bettering the condition of the poor man in England, as the slave-holding states here were for improving the condition of the blacks. But the French people began with their propagandism, and so far from abating in the realm, these evils which his eloquence had held up in such strong colors, he opposed all reform. Judging it better to abide old evils than to try new remedies at such a time, he found it necessary for the safety of the country to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, to make all assemblages of the people seditious meetings in law; to draw tighter the already hard drawn reigns of Government and to rule with a stronger arm a people now becoming, at the instigation of the "friends of freedom," more and more restive of all restraint.

The same results in this country have marked the efforts of like societies here and in England to better the condition of the African. The Governments of all the slave-holding States commiserated the black men among them, and were actually casting about for the means of ameliorating their lot. Some of them, as Kentucky and Tennessee, were even discussing the question of immediate emancipation.

But in rushed the intermeddling and mischievous spirit, both foreign and domestic, of abolition, with its fanaticism, its turbulent doctrines and incendiary appeals, and the slave states, like England under Pitt, found themselves compelled to turn short round, and, for the sake of domestic peace, to make the black man's servitude still more bitter. The privileges of social intercourse were curtailed among slaves. The patrols were more rigid, and it was made by law a high offence to teach a slave his A B C. Manumission was surrounded with new difficulties, and the freed black man, once beyond the limits of the state in which his freedom had been obtained, was ostracised forever.* Thus, the efforts of the abolitionist, like those of the English Government, for the suppression of the slave trade, only aggravated the evil. Whenever that Government, or its people, have stepped from British soil to interfere with the condition of the Ethiopian, so far from bettering it, they have made it tenfold worse than before. The right of search is worth more in her eyes than the suppression of the slave trade. In all her efforts for its suppression, nothing but the right of search would do, notwithstanding the startling fact that with every new treaty for this right, the trade increased and its horrors grew. Since she commenced to suppress it by this means, which for more than thirty years has been a sine qua non, the trade has increased with tenfold horrors, and in numbers from 80,000, to hundreds of thousands of souls a year.

The unfortunate sympathy of that Government and the intemperate zeal of anti-slavery societies have caused blood to be spilled from the blacks more than enough, we religiously believe, to float the English Navy. If the embodied voice of the American slave and native African could be heard, it would be in the deepest tones of bitterness, God save us from our friends, the English and the abolitionists.

What would you have her do, it may be asked, let the African slave trade alone! By no means. We would have her pursue that course with regard to it, which common sense every where teaches and the principles of which we see put in practice every day. With her, nothing would do but the right of search. She tried it for thirty years; the evil increased the more. She extended this right until, counting the lives lost in battles among the natives for victims, and in transportation, and the number actually sold, as slaves, it involved the annual destruction in 1840 of not less than 300,000* human beings. Whereas, when she commenced to put down this trade, the largest estimates did not put the loss from death and slavery together at more than 80,000 souls a year. When we are ill and find ourselves growing worse under this or that course of treatment, we change the course, and try new remedies. But this England would never consent to do, until she was brought to it by us at the treaty of Washington in 1841-'2.

The African clause of that treaty was suggested by this journal—proof-sheets of which were sent by its late editor to Lord Ashburton and to members of the Cabinet on the arrival of the former in this country. The treaty presents a literal transcript of the plan there proposed.

And what has been the result? Let Lord Aberdeen tell. He stated in Parliament, on the 25th of July last, that the number of slaves torn from Africa from 1768 to 1841 had averaged from 58,000 to 100,000 a year, that in 1840 the number was 90,000, but in 1842-'3 it only amounted to 25,000—less than it has ever been known to be for 100 years. Such are the beneficial effects of this treaty of coöperation. And if England would but let the right of search alone, and use her influence with other nations, as the United States long ago proposed that she should, inducing them to declare the trade piracy and to coöperate each one with a naval force on the coast of Africa, in two years more a slaver would be as rare on the Ocean as a pirate now is. But at the time of announcing such satisfactory results of this, the American plan for suppressing the slave trade, his Lordship produced, amidst the commendatory plaudits of hear! hear! a new set of instructions to English cruisers, directing them to search vessels under the American flag to see if they were entitled to wear it!

The course which the same Government and the abolitionists are pursuing with regard to the question of slavery among us only aggravates the evil. This interference continually makes matters worse too. And here again the maxims of common sense, supposing England and the abolitionists sincere in their sympathy for the black, ought at least for his sake, to prevail with them. Their advice is spurned, and by officious intermeddling and their own indiscretion they have become exceedingly obnoxious to slave-holders. Your neighbor does not manage his domestic affairs as you wish that he should, and as you believe would be more conducive to the comfort of his family for whom you have a great regard. And in your frantic desire to see matters with him on a different footing, you tamper with his servants, fritter away, by intermeddling, the influence you once had with him, and make yourself personally offensive to him.

After this, though the object you have in view be really the most noble, and though you act from the best and most disinterested motives, still, after such a state of things has been brought about between you, would you not consider any direct interference on your part as tending only to make matters worse? You certainly would. If England and her abolitionists really desired to make the chains more galling upon our slaves, could any course be adopted that would so completely effect their object as the one now pursued? England feels it her duty to procure the abolition of slavery here!

Pardon this episode. We love justice and hate oppression whatever be its color.

Neither are we the advocates of slavery nor enemies to the slave. We hope we are his friend. But the institution with us, regard it as we may, is a matter which admits of no discussion, will brook no interference from abroad. It is a domestic institution. And neither the British Government nor its anti-slavery societies have any more to do with it here than they have with the peccadillos of the man in the moon. From the disposition of man, it is but natural that the censorship of England in this matter, like that of all anti-slavery intruders, should only aggravate an evil, of which, if let alone, we should be too happy to rid ourselves.

Fanaticism as it regards the Republican form of Government, and an ardent desire thoroughly to inoculate the subjects of Queen Victoria with democratic notions, and with our ideas as to the sovereignty of the people, surely would be as excusable in us as a people, as the anti-slavery mania is in Great Britain. Suppose therefore we should become as raving mad as to the political condition of her subjects as she is with regard to the domestic concerns of the slave-holding States of the Union, and that the American Secretary of State should write to the British Government the counterpart of Lord Aberdeen's letter. It is easier to imagine than describe his Lordship's manner and air at opening and reading such a despatch as this from the American Government:

"Department of State, etc.

"We desire to see Ireland free and independent. It must be and is well known both to England and the whole world, that the United States are constantly exerting themselves to procure the general dethronement of kings throughout the world, and to establish republican democracies in their stead. But the means which we have adopted and will continue to adopt for this humane and virtuous purpose, are open and undisguised.

"With regard to Ireland, we avow that we wish to see aristocracy abolished there as elsewhere. But although we earnestly claim and feel it to be our duty to promote such a consummation we shall not interfere unduly, or with an improper assumption of authority either with the people of England or Ireland in order to secure such a course.

* British estimate.

"The United States Government, as Great Britain well knows, have never sought in any way to stir up disaffection or excitement of any kind among the oppressed people of Ireland. Much as we should wish to see that island placed on the firm and solid footing which we conscientiously believe is to be attained under the Republican form of Government alone, we have never in our treatment of them made any difference between the aristocratic and democratic portions of the realm. All are, in our eyes, entitled, as component parts of the realm, to equal political respect, favor and forbearance, on our part. And the aristocratic counties of the realm may be assured that we shall not desist from those open and honest efforts which we have constantly made for the subversion of monarchies and the establishment throughout the world of free Governments founded upon the sovereignty of the people.

"You will communicate this dispatch to her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and if he should desire it, you will leave a copy of it with him.

Signed,

UNCLE SAM."

To complete the parallel, let us call together our world's convention to anathematise monarchies, and to curse the aristocracy of England, let our people send over to Ireland their emissary Garrisons, et al, preaching "war to the palace; peace to the cottage," universal suffrage, social equality, political regeneration of man every where. And the red hot democrats who would come over here from England to plot treason against her aristocratic institutions, let them be invited to conferences upon the subject by our cabinet ministers as the abolitionists from America have been by the English ministry. Moreover, let Congress recognize the principle of laying discriminating duties* in favor of merchandise, the produce of Republics—and to complete the parallel, let us suppose that one half of the people of this country be formed into repeal associations and anti-monarchical societies with their representatives in Congress constantly making calls on the Government in the name of these societies, for information concerning the effects in Ireland of their agitation, as Lord Brougham, in behalf of the anti-slavery societies of London, does of ministers in Parliament concerning the abolition of slavery with us.

Let such be the circumstances, and what in England would be thought of such a despatch from the American Government?

Both ministry and people would rise up against it in a body, and with one voice pronounce it more dangerous and offensive, wicked and alarming than the famous decree of the French nation granting fraternity and assistance to all people who wish to recover their freedom; and about which, England, dragging kings and emperors with her, plunged the whole of Europe in war for more than twenty years. Yet this letter is but a transcript of Lord

Aberdeen's, reference being made to political servitude instead of domestic slavery, to make the parody.

The tone of this letter, the connection between Lord Brougham and the anti-slavery societies of London, their sentiments, the principles which they avow, their course of conduct, and all the circumstances of the case between Great Britain and the United States as now presented, bring forcibly to mind that dreadful state of things which existed between France and Great Britain fifty years ago. The French then, were the friends of humanity par excellence, and felt it their duty to interfere with the domestic institutions of England. There was orator Brissot, like Lord Brougham, now, with his Societies des Amis des Noirs, preaching the doctrines of abolition and fanning the flames of popular insurrection, servile revolt and massacre.

England was then acting on the defensive; she was then, too, encumbered with slaves herself; and occupied, with regard to France, very much the position which we now hold with regard to her. Let us therefore apply to her the golden rule "do unto others —;" for history with its faithful pen, tells us exactly how far the renegade slave-holder was then disposed to tolerate any foreign interference whatever with the slaves of her subjects.

The circumstances which we would bring to mind, occurred 50 years ago in the British House of Commons, when the Canada bill was under consideration, and when the memorable debate took place between Mr. Fox and Burke on the French revolution. Great men were present, and it was in times of high excitement. The opposition was strong, ministers able, debate animated and eloquent. The British Parliament, adorned as it is with great names, never presented a more splendid array of talent than it did on that occasion. Pitt dazzling the world with the compass and splendor of his youthful mind was then at the head of the ministry. He was present on the occasion. There too were lords North and Granville, Grey and Sheridan, the excellent Willberforce and a host of others, not so great only because not so good. The two champions, the old man and his disciple, walked together and entered the house arm in arm. It was the last time they appeared as friends—and they had been bosom friends for twenty-five years—for they were about to split upon the "rights of man."

The scene was gorgeous and the auditory intent and eager.

"Feeble as my powers are in comparison with my honorable friend's, whom I must call my master, for every thing I know in politics," said Mr. Fox in the delightful tones of his oratory. "I owe to him, I should yet ever be ready to maintain my principles even against his superior eloquence. I will maintain that the rights of man, which he states as chimerical and visionary, are, in fact, the basis and foundation of every rational Constitution, and even of the British Constitution itself, as the statute-book abundantly proves: for what is the original compact between the king and the people there recognized but the recognition of the inherent rights of the people, as men, which no prescription can supersede, no action remove or obliterate.

* Discriminating duties were laid this year in England against slave grown coffee.

"If these principles are dangerous to the Constitution, they are the principles of my right honorable friend from whom I learned them. During the American war, we have together rejoiced at the success of a Washington, and mourned, almost in tears, for the fate of a Montgomery. From him I have learned that the revolt of a whole people can not be the result of excitement or encouragement, but must have proceeded from provocation. Such was his doctrine, when he said with equal energy and emphasis, that he could not draw a bill of indictment against a whole people. I grieve to find that he has since learned to draw such an indictment and to crown it with all the technical epithets which disgrace our statute-book.

"Taught by my right honorable friend that no revolt of a nation can spring but from provocation, I could not help feeling joy ever since the Constitution of France was founded on the rights of man, the basis on which the British Constitution itself is rested. To vilify it is neither more nor less than to libel the British Constitution; and no book my right honorable friend can write, how able so ever; no speech he can deliver, how eloquent so ever, can induce me to abandon or change that opinion.

"I, for one, admire the Constitution of France. I consider it, all together, as the most stupendous and glorious edifice of liberty which has ever been erected on the foundations of human integrity in any age or country."

Mr. Burke commenced his reply in a grave and solemn tone, befitting, says the historian, the solemnity of the occasion, and the rending asunder of ties which had endured unbroken, for the quarter of a century. After one of the most brilliant but touching displays of oratory that has ever been witnessed in the British House of Commons, he concluded in tones of deep pathos:

"It is perhaps indiscretion at any period, but especially at my advanced years, to provoke enemies, or give friends an occasion for desertion; but, if a firm and steady adherence to the British Constitution should place me in such a dilemma, I will risk all, and with my last words, exclaim, Fly from the French Constitution."

"There is no loss of friends," said Mr. Fox.

"Yes," said Burke, "there is loss of friends. I know the price of my conduct. I have done my duty at the price of him I love. Our friendship is at an end. With my last breath, I will earnestly entreat the two right honorable gentlemen who are the great rivals in this House, that whether they hereafter move in the political hemisphere as two flaming meteors, or walk together like brethren, hand in hand, to preserve and cherish the British Constitution; to guard it against innovation, and save it from the dangers of theoretic alterations. It belongs to the infinite and unspeakable Power, the Deity, who with his arm hurls a comet like a projectile out of its course, and enables it to endure the sun's heat and the pitchy darkness of the chilly night, to aim at the formation of infinite perfection: to us, poor, weak, incapable mortals, there is no safe rule of conduct, but experience."

Mr. Fox rose to reply, but his utterance was choked with emotion. The strain was heavy; the leaders of the whig party—the two great champions of human liberty—were melted to tears; the ties of a life time were broken, and the departing spirit of friendship which graced the scene and made the struggle glorious, was gone forever. The whigs held a meeting over this great schism in their ranks, and the next morning, the old man eloquent found himself read out of Parliament and excommunicated by his party. Confessing himself too well stricken in years to seek another, his spirit was yet too haughty for recantation, too proud to seek new alliances, he therefore bowed to the disgrace and left the House.

The following is from the Morning Chronicle of May, 1791:

"The great and firm body of the whigs of England, true to their principles, have decided on the dispute between Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke; and the former is declared to have maintained the pure doctrines by which they are bound together, and upon which they have invariably acted. The consequence is, Mr. Burke retires from Parliament."

Mr. Burke was in advance of his age, for political forecast. And it was during this debate that he sketched out in their practical bearings the doctrines proclaimed by the "Amis des Noirs" and the principles now uttered by England and abolitionists.

"Are we," said he, "to give them—the ancient Canadians—the French Constitution—a constitution founded on principles diametrically opposite to ours—as different from it as wisdom from folly, as virtue from vice—as the most opposite extremes in nature—a constitution founded on what is called the RIGHTS OF MAN? Let it be examined by its practical effects in the French West India Colonies. These, notwithstanding three disastrous wars, were most happy and flourishing till they heard of THE RIGHTS OF MAN. As soon as this system arrived among them, Pandora's box, replete with mortal evils, seemed to fly open, hell itself to yawn, and every demon of mischief to overspread the face of the earth. Blacks rose against whites, and whites against blacks, and each against the other in murderous hostility; subordination was destroyed, the bonds of society torn asunder, and every man seemed to thirst for the blood of his neighbour.

'Black spirits and white, blue spirits and gray,
Mingle, mingle, mingle.'

All was toil and trouble, discord and blood, from the moment this doctrine was promulgated among them; and I verily believe, that wherever the rights of man are preached, such will ever have been, and ever will be the consequences. France, who had generously sent them the precious gift of the rights of man, did not like this image of herself reflected in her child, and sent out a body of troops, well seasoned too with the rights of man, to restore order and obedience. These troops, as soon as they arrived, instructed as they were in the principles of government, felt themselves bound to become parties in the general rebellion, and, like most of their brethren at home, began asserting their rights, by cutting off the head of their general.*

Alison, at page 240 of his beautifully written history, says :

"Hardly had the cry of liberty and equality been raised in France, when it responded warmly and vehemently from the shores of St. Domingo. Independently of the natural passion for liberty which must ever exist among those who are subjected to the restraints of servitude, the slave population of this colony were rapidly assailed by revolutionary agents and emissaries, and the workshops and fields of the planters overrun by heated missionaries, who poured into an ignorant and ardent multitude, the new born ideas of European freedom."—Vol. II.

And again, in the faithful language of philosophy teaching by example, he ascribes the insurrection of St. Domingo to the inflammatory addresses circulated on that island by the self styled Amis des Noirs, the anti-slavery societies of Paris; and thus remarks upon the sudden transition from a state of slavery to one of servile emancipation : "A child does not acquire the strength of manhood in an hour; nor a tree the consistency of the hardy denizens of the forest, in a season. The hasty philanthropists,—(would Lord Brougham be less hasty now than Brissot then was ?)—who conferred upon an ignorant slave population, the precipitate gift of freedom, did them a greater injury than their worst enemies. To the indolence of the negro character, the blacks of St. Domingo have joined the vices of European corruption; profligate, idle and disorderly, they have declined both in numbers and in happiness; from being the greatest sugar plantation in the world, that island has been reduced to the necessity of importing that valuable produce; and the inhabitants, naked and voluptuous, are fast receding into the state of nature from which their ancestors were torn two centuries ago by the rapacity of Christian avarice."

When the opposition in the persons of Fox, Sheridan and Willberforce declaimed against the war in '94, as a contest "of doubtful policy in its commencement, and more than doubtful justice in its principles," Mr. Pitt in behalf of the English ministry replied : "Peace would at once prove destructive to the French West India Islands, by delivering them over to anarchy and Jacobinism, and from them, the flame of servile revolt would speedily spread to our Colonial possessions in that quarter;"* and, there in the halls of British Legislation, and in the name of the British government, he urged this, as one of the reasons for continuing to make war.

It was in those times too, and in reference to this very principle, of allowing other nations to interfere with their domestic concerns, that Mr. Burke made use of the famous simile which was never surpassed for felicity of application. He said, "If my neighbor's house be in flames, and the fire is likely to spread to my own, I am justified in interfering to divert a disaster which promises to be equally fatal to us both."

To this observation, says Tory Alison, the historian, no answer has ever been made. Thank you, Jew, for that word. And to it, no answer ever will be made, so long as the first law of nature, the duty of self preservation, written at creation on the heart of man, remains unrepealed by the great Jehovah. Texas is of most inflammable materials, and a spark falling there, from the frantic benevolence of Lord Brougham and his Brissots, or lighting there from the wild interference of Lord Aberdeen, might wrap a portion of this confederacy in a blood red conflagration.

Pray, my Lord, in your next despatch bear these things in mind; and recollect, that with regard to slavery in this country at least, England can not be permitted, at this late day, to enact the fable of the fox and the trap. When some self-righteous neighbour of yours, holding high his head, and thanking God that he is not as other men, shall tell you that the restraints put upon your servants are cruel, that though the rules you have adopted in your domestic arrangements with regard to them, are sanctioned by custom, yet they are wicked and oppressive; that the butler, the steward and cook, the boots and the ostler, should be admitted as your equals in society and treated as such at home, and that such being his sentiments, he felt it his duty to interfere with your domestic concerns, in order to promote such a consummation. When you, my Lord, shall be ready, quietly to sit down, and patiently to hear the ravings of such a madman, then, but not till then, may England tell America, she feels it her duty to procure the abolition of slavery among us.

Moderate ourselves, we would impose a spirit of caution every where upon the agitation of this question among us, and thus sever from the future progress of emancipated freedom, those bloody triumphs by which its past history has been often stained. Of this one thing, the abolitionist every where may rest assured, that the South, if it can not convince with reason, will at least resist with fortitude.

PART I.

"The spider's most attenuated thread—
 Is cord,—is cable, to man's tender tie
 On earthly bliss; it breaks with every breeze."

Young.

A soft and dreamy twilight was slowly robing in its hazy vesture the beautiful isle of Scio. Balm-y zephyrs, laden with spicy, aromatic odors, gently lifted the young flowret's bloom to drink in the refreshing dews of evening, ere it folded its tender petals for the calm repose of night:—while they passed o'er the limpid waters of the blue Ægean, with scarcely a perceptible motion, so unruffled was its surface, it seemed more like an unbroken, waveless mirror than a vast body of that element ever susceptible of violent and tempestuous agitation. Well might Scio be termed the "Paradise of modern Greece," for the scenery which meets the traveller's eye as he sails through the Strait, approaching the island, is pronounced to be unequalled by any thing in the Archipelago. The mountains are removed some distance from the shores, so that it appears in all its loveliness,—while the town of Scio presents a magnificent slope, covered with gardens extending to the very edge of the sea, all filled with flowery luxuriant and odoriferous plants. Trees producing the finest fruits in the greatest profusion form extensive groves of inexpressible beauty and richness, midst which, gleam the white houses of Venetian architecture, presenting a lively contrast to the ever-greens overshadowing them. While the loud and terrible war-cry, followed by the deadly blows of the yataghan dealt by the ferocious Turk, were devastating the whole of Greece with the noble blood of her slain, this "flower of the Levant" bloomed in peaceful beauty, basking in the sunshine of blissful ease, and enjoying Nature's vast store of unrivalled perfection. The joyous music of her bright-tinted birds breathed a melodious anthem of rest, as if they too were happy and grateful to thus chime their vocal tribute to the Great Creator for the blessing of so bright an abode. Could sorrow breathe her sigh, or fetter the heart, where so much scenic grandeur and loveliness saluted the eye? Hush! methinks I hear the murmur of a sad voice even in that Paradise—Ah! yes, there is no spot too bright, or too hallowed, since the loss of our primeval gift of perfect happiness, that can prove secure against the intrusion of her tearful visage.

"Alas! why is my spirit held in such sad du-rance," murmured Ino Del Castro, as she leaned against the open casement of her latticed bower, gazing out upon the smooth waters of the Ægean. A dreamy melancholy rested on her fair face; the cloudless azure of the high heavens was not more beautifully clear than was her full beaming eye, then humid with mournful tenderness. The evening's gambolling zephyrs had scattered her long flaxen tresses unrestrainedly over her soft cheek, which rested upon her small hand, whilst the other held a lute, from whose strings sweet sounds had but a few moments before floated on the odorous air—but they were hushed in deathly stillness, for Ino's heart echoed not their tones of gladness.

"Surely," continued she, "blessed with Adrian's love, I should joy in the present, and the magic wand of Hope conjures nought but a bright future to my ardent fancy—but yet, a shadow of darkness seems to pass o'er its brightness, and like a 'receding sail she flits into dimness,' leaving me oppressed with a boding dread of—I know not what."

Ino started—a long drawn sigh answered her musing query—the step of some one cautiously retreating from the closely surrounding shrubbery was distinctly heard, and as she bent forward, a few tinkling notes of a tambour caused her heart to beat with increased fear, for she knew it was an instrument rarely touched by a Greek, it being of Turkish invention and monopoly. But ere she had time to solve the mystery, a gush of joyful relief chased away the thrill of her terror, when she turned and beheld Adrian Marcova at her side.

"Ino," said he, "why is thy brow so contracted and shaded, or thy lute so ominously silent? Harm can not come nigh thee when Adrian is near." He seated himself at her feet, and looked inquiringly into her face, which soon regained its usual brightness. "It does indeed seem," continued he, "as if congenial spirits, even when separated, are subject to the same mysterious communings—for ere I sought thee, there was—nay, at this moment, there is a deadly weight upon my soul, a powerful struggle with internal gloom, which not even the holy calm of this hour, nor the sunlight of thy beauty and love can disperse from my mind. Yes, Ino, it is in vain to longer conceal from thee, that I am, even now, miserable and unhappy."

He paused. The varying changes of Ino's face, as she listened to so strange and unusual a confession, seemed to check the freedom of further explanation. The curls which had so luxuriantly shaded her brow and cheek, were wildly pushed back—every rosy tint had fled from the latter, while from her eye was banished the moisture of tenderness, as she bent it, bright and distended with startled scrutiny, upon the gloomy face of her lover.

"Not happy," said she, drawing a long breath while her lip trembled with aroused emotion—"why this sudden change, Adrian? a few days ago thou did'st confess thyself supremely blest with the full return of my affection. Hast thou since then had the slightest sign whereby Love's augury proved me false, or unworthy of thine?"

"By my plighted troth not one," replied he with ardor, taking her extended hand—"too truly doth my trusting heart own the purity and sincerity of thy love. But Ino, hast thou never felt that, even in the full tide of sublunary happiness, some unbidden woe seems to cast a weight upon thy bosom? 'Tis thus with me,—in spite of present bliss I feel such, because"——

But Ino's bewildered look caused Adrian to again pause in embarrassment.

"Speak out—keep nought back," answered she hurriedly—"though thy words may cause bitterness to mingle with my fondly imagined happiness. When thou did'st woo my love, I gave it freely—aye, freely as runs yonder fountain—I thought there was a response of heart to heart. When this hand was sought, which thou did'st declare the loudest trump of Fame, or the heaviest coffer of Fortune could not purchase, it was plighted with joy and confidence. And yet, thou art now unhappy—Oh! Adrian, why is it thus? speak,—yea speak freely to one incapable of suspicion or change towards thee."

Her voice was broken—her lip deadly pale—though her face was sorrowfully calm as she leaned to hear his answer.

"Ino, listen to me. I have sought thee this evening to freely pour forth my heart's every fear, hope and struggle. New emotions now stir within me, new incentives now nerve my every energy—the cause of which is, the strange warning of my dreams last night. It hangs upon my memory most fearfully, and I feel it will and must affect my future course of action. Methought I was in a land of brighter loveliness than even our own loved Scio. No Eden was more verdant with every natural beauty, and as I rested 'neath an umbrageous tree, laden with the golden fruit of knowledge and happiness, revelling in the ecstacy of blissful admiration, I wondered that Ino Del Castro enjoyed it not with me. Just then, I saw a being of surpassing loveliness rise before me. A golden circle somewhat obscured her features—in her hand she held a sparkling chalice, which she presented to my eager lips, whilst with the other, she showered from a glittering cornucopia innumerable gifts around me—but lo! as I prepared to sip the chalice, it was slowly withdrawn, leaving me the victim of a greater disappointment than ever annoyed Tantalus. Indignantly I vented my pleen upon her, when suddenly, the golden mist faded from her countenance, and Ino, my own loved one, stood before me in the form of the genius of liberty—I sprung towards her,—but alas! she raved me back, and casting down her chalice and horn of plenty, bade me to ignobly enjoy earth's pleasures, but Ino could never be mine, until Liberty owned me her champion, and I had raised my arm to strike a blow for my struggling country. I awoke, the victim of intense excitement—and the same feelings that burned within my bosom in my dream, still held their sway. My cheek became dyed with manly shame at my ignoble inaction: that I had so senselessly withheld my arm, impotent though it be, from the stern action of patriotic zeal and valor—yea, though through the very length and breadth of my native country, reverberated the din of an avenging war, and all hearts were nerved for the conflict, yet I had thought alone of an inglorious peace and ease—resigning myself to the joys and rapture of love and beauty, scarcely deeming by my apparent inanity those rights for which so many were sacrificing their all to secure, worth the hazzard of a die. This day accounts of the bloody revolution have strengthened those impressions, and increased the fire of my long slumbering energies. I have now, Ino, to hear from thy own lips, whether thou wilt wear the love of one, who thus cowardly and basely enjoys every national blessing and privilege, indulging in such unworthy passiveness, or whether thou wilt prove thyself the radiant genius of my dream, in strengthening my resolution to strike a blow for desolated, fettered Greece."

Ino had intensely hung upon the animating words of Adrian, and with every tone of his passionate expressions, changed the speaking lines of her countenance. When he reprehended his own inaction, that flash of scorn was reflected in hers; when his eye fired at the thralldom of his country, hers, so etherially blue, became darkened as the heavens, when agitated by elementary power, while her form, so like a frail reed, subject to each passing wind, and whose "motion of blushed at itself," became towering with heroic dignity, and she seemed in her majesty a being fit to 'Raise a mortal to the skies,

Or bring an angel down.'

"Forgive me, Adrian, my heart has done thee wrong—I give thee back my love, untainted by a single doubt. Go to the field of strife, where glory awaiteth thee, and when thou hast wove the chaplet of laurels around thy brow, return to Ino, that she may entwine her own gift, the evergreen myrtle, in an unfading diadem. The 'piping time' of peace I feel will not last long, when Scio thus insensibly resigns herself to the specious terms of the faithless Turk. Our present security rests upon the slight tenure of a tyrant's often violated oath of amnesty—and I tremble when I think of such fearful, murderous infidels. Stay not then, Adrian, for Ino, love, or any other equally inferior reason—but ere thou leavest me"—— The heroic valor of Ino's bosom yielded for a moment to her womanish weakness. She paused, gazing tearfully upon her kneeling lover. He rose, and parting the bright hair from her pale brow, while a similar emotion seemed to subdue his energetic firmness—"Enough" said he, brushing away a tear from his eye, "the past moment of weakness was for thee, Ino—but it is over and truly dost thou seem the genius of my dream. Yonder caique, (pointing to a small vessel moored on the water's edge of the garden distinctly seen from the bower,) is waiting to bear me to that scene, which thou, with the heroism of olden times, hast bid me encounter. I do thy bidding, loved one, and when absent may my parting token guard thy heart, for 'tis love's amulet." He cast around her neck a light wrought chain, with a small ornament chased with diamonds, and as he clasped it he mournfully asked for Ino's exchange token. "This," said she, passing her hand through her hair, and severing a rich curl, bound it upon his wrist—then taking from her shoulders a small, but gorgeously embroidered scarf, she tied it around his arm—"wear this badge on thy armor—'tis Ino's banner—look first to that of thy country, and then to her's—for upon it is emblazoned the device thou hast often admired—'Love, truth and valor.' If the first be true, the latter must, for she is the twin sister of patriotism, and following their dictates, thou ne'er canst prove a recreant."

The next moment Adrian Marcova was bounding the steepy slope of the garden, where waited a well-wrigged caique, properly manned, to bear him away. Long, long did the moistened eye of Ino roam o'er the blue waters of the Ægean, and when the mist of night's settled darkness made all things seem alike, then did she wend her steps towards her own silent chamber, there to feel the aching sadness of her heart's sudden solitude.

Ino Del Castro was the only child of one of Scio's most influential and wealthy noblemen. It was ever his proud boast and delight to count over the long line of princes and heroes from which he had descended, into the listening ear of her, his heart's pride—who had from her infancy been almost his only companion, while she, with equal delight, loved to hear a recapitulation of the noble deeds of her valorous forefathers, until it seemed as if the same chivalrous spirit had become deeply blended with her native gentleness and timidity. Enjoying with his high descent the lineal wealth and influence of his ancestors, Del Castro had become rather too independent of the world's sympathy, and seemed selfishly disposed to live in a proscribed circle of his own choice. Although it was not his nature to actually repulse the social advances of the islanders, yet he continued to move amongst them, without being in feeling, or sympathy, one of them, honored by all, but personally intimate with few. One month had passed since Adrian's departure, every evening of which, at their trysting hour, found Ino at the casement of her bower, watching the various caiques as they shot up and down the sea, hoping to receive some news from him, and then, when weary with watching, she would steal down the same steep bank to make "assurance doubly sure" by personal inquiries of those, whom by chance she tremblingly met. With a disappointed heart and mournful face she had turned her steps homewards one evening, and as she was tracing her way rather circuitously amongst the rocks, she paused in a narrow pass where they jutted out so far as to admit of only one person's egress, to give another lingering look behind, when her eye rested on the tall form of a turbaned Turk intercepting her pathway, and standing proudly before her.

"Fear not lady," said he softly, and bending low his lofty person, "thou beholdest a friend—for 'tis only before such beauty as thine, that Stamboul's heart hath ever bowed. Deign, then, to return him one glance of kindly feeling."

"My friend, indeed!" replied the indignant Ino—"away from me—and add not to thy natural cruelty the deeply dyed sins of falsehood and treachery. Can an oppressed Greek ever own a Turk for her friend? Dare she trust the specious overtures of one of thy hated race? Hence, from my sight and beware how thou dost compel Ino del Castro to cry an alarm within the precincts of her own home!"

"Unbend thy matchless brow, uncurl thy beautiful lip, fair Ino—I mean thee no harm. By the great Allah I do not! Hear me but one moment. I love, nay I adore thee—and when thou hast deemed thyself alone with thy own pure thoughts and the one mighty Allah, I, yea Stamboul, the hated Turk, was near thee, inhaling the very atmosphere, which oft wafted far away thy warmest sigh—I dared not intrude myself, for I feared to lose the momentary enjoyment of a vision of thy radiant beauty. Even now, I only appear before thee, to crave thy gracious smile—say then, most lovely Ino, that thou wilt hold me thy friend?"

"Away, sir, and cease thy plausible fawning," cried Ino stamping her foot with increased vehemence. "I would as soon seek out some deadly serpent to coil itself around me, as to take thee by the hand of honored friendship. Insult me not by thus intercepting my path; nor dare again to pollute my ear with expressions of admiration."

She proudly waved her hand for Stamboul to retreat—her person was elevated with resolute defiance, while her eye flashed with the fire of scorn, but he continued unmoved for a few moments—and then after gazing respectfully, but mournfully upon her, retired from the path with folded arms; and as he stepped aside to permit her to pass, he again bent upon her a scrutinizing look, while he said in a haughty, emphatic tone,

"Pass on, proud lady, all potent in thy present beauty and happiness—when next we meet, Allah grant thy nature may be softened, and though the proffered love of Stamboul, the Turk, may now be spurned with disdain, perchance there yet may come a time, when his friendly aid may not be scorned, nor deemed unavailing by Ino Del Castro."

Ino paused not to hear his retreating footsteps, but rapidly regained the family mansion. She forbore to apprise her father of the suspicious appearance of a Turk near their dwelling—for although he did wear the unsightly tarbouch, still there was an expression about Stamboul's face and an air of nobility about his whole person, that spoke greatly in his favor, together with his respectful manner towards her, when so wholly in his power. Her feelings were more of lenient pity than of revenge towards him, and hoping her scornful defiance and indifference would completely check any further insulting pursuit, she resolved to be silent about her singular and suspicious rencontre.

A few evenings afterwards Ino and her father sat on the beautiful portico of their princely mansion, watching for the signal of the vessel which they had been apprized would bring some tidings from Adrian. The daughter gracefully reclined on a low seat at the feet of her father, whose hand was fondly laid upon her head as he looked into her bright and anxious face with unspeakable pride and delight.

"Ino," said he, "methinks thy heart must be sad, for of late I rarely have been gladdened with the music of thy once joyous voice. Thou surely wouldst not keep from thy father aught that disturbs the hitherto gentle current of thy happiness."

Ino spoke somewhat hesitatingly. "No, dear father, nothing but the absence of Adrian and his long silence cause me uneasiness. Could I be other than happy with thee—so indulgent, and in a home so like the first Eden?" She pointed and looked around upon the scene before them, while Del Castro's eye followed hers with melancholy admiration.

"Daughter," replied he, "I often feel as if I will not be spared to bless thy union with Adrian Marcova. This scene, now so radiant with nature's lavish loveliness, may ere long be darkly changed. The sanguinary track of war—the bloody sword—the blackening fire-brand of the ferocious Turk may, ere long, awfully transform its present beauty and peaceful security."

"Oh! say not so, dearest father, such fears are but the consequences of yielding to thy natural despondency of mind. I too, feel them often cowering my very soul, but I shake them off, remembering that unsullied happiness seems never the destiny of man. If it were otherwise, why should he in the height of every bliss, so often feel an aching void? Ah! it is because the human heart is ever restless in its 'home of love, or lair of hate.' Let us then always hope for the best—endeavoring to cultivate that proper and happy balance of mind, which is neither too much elevated by prosperity, nor depressed by adversity."

A thoughtful silence ensued, which was broken by Ino's taking her father's hand and pointing to the moon, whose course was high in the heavens. She proposed retiring into the house, as the hour was late, and the night air too heavy for his exposure. Del Castro's nightly blessing was unusually fervent as he embraced his daughter, and ere he retired to rest, he affectionately charged her to discontinue her vigils for the signal, giving directions for the servants to be in readiness, should the vessel cast her anchor at their garden's slope.

But the anxiety and perturbation of Ino's mind, forbade the calm repose of sleep. She gave full sway to the rapid tide of thought, as she sat beside her chamber window, gazing upon the deep and silent slumber of Scio in its greenness and luxury, which did indeed then seem to her almost prophetic of her father's fears. The clear light of the moon shadowed brightly a picture, Ino looked upon with bursting pride and delight. Before her stretched a long and spacious piazza, supported by lofty pillars and balustrades of Venetian taste, overlooking a large garden verdant with sweet-scented shrubbery, and innumerable groves of orange, lemon, citron and almond trees. A wide and extensive court-yard which was beautifully paved with small slabs of variegated marble, that glistened in the soft, silvery moonlight, lay on an elevation leading to the garden. On the left, was a large reservoir several feet square; in the midst of which rose an exquisitely sculptured water-nymph, from whose hand poured a sparkling jet of limpid water. Near this fountain was Ino's cherished bower, immediately on the summit of the slope to the sea, and there too, had her untiring taste mingled with that of nature. It was covered with the far famed Sappian grape-vine, and many other fragrant twining flowers:—a cherished spot, consecrated by Adrian's first vow of love, and hallowed by his warmly breathed farewell. Well, indeed, might the darkness of despair hold the spirit in a fearful thralldom, when a presentiment of the desecration of a scene so fair, as Ino's eye then lingered o'er, would obtrude on the mind. A knell of woe fell upon her heart, when she remembered the precarious tenure of Scio's security, but gradually her innate buoyancy regained its wonted power, soothed by the unbroken harmony of nature, and she was soon enabled to banish all unwelcome presages of ill. Ino's life had passed unchequered by the contrasted shades of light and darkness; its stream had glided along unchecked by bitterness or disappointment, and never darkened by the troublous wave of sorrow. Adrian's absence had cast the first shadow o'er its surface, but still the talismanic voice of Hope whispered

"Bear on—bear nobly on,
Love's victory hath a goal in view,
Where rest will sure be won."

Giving her last thought and prayer to her betrothed, Ino sought her couch, where sleep soon banished all reality of woe, or anticipation of joy. Although her spirit roamed in a bright land of dreams, yet her slumbers were often disturbed, causing her to start with indefinable apprehension, and finally to awake in full consciousness that all was not well. Hark! could those fearful shrieks and piteous cries be only the phantasy of an excited imagination? Suddenly her chamber became awfully illuminated, while the roar of the cannon and the tumult without were almost deafening. She sprang to the casement—great Heaven! what a sight met her horrified gaze! Forests of gleaming sabres and heavy yataghans flashed around her; men falling on every side with piercing groans; flying women with babes clinging to their exposed bosoms, delicate maidens wild with horror rushing to and fro, children trodden down with demoniacal fierceness by the thousand turbaned fiends, who, with their sabres, felled the old and young, that flew before them. The shouts and howling cries of the Turks as they applied the fire-brand to the dwellings, causing the flames to enwrap every abode of wealth and splendor around, or in their unhallowed pathway, together with the moaning echoes of despair from the mangled, massacred Greeks, formed a scene, which none but that place where “the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched,” could equal in horror. Suddenly a barbarian seized an infant from its mother, and dashed it against the walls below Ino’s chamber; then with one stroke, holding the wretched woman by her hair, severed her head, and as he prepared to repeat his savage deed upon another, Ino could see no more; with a prayer upon her blanched lip, she sank down in dread expectancy of her own terrific doom. The tumult increased without; loud voices of rapacious plunderers and clashing weapons were then heard in the court below, crying out for “Del Castro’s hidden treasures and his own kingly blood!” The stairs resounded with their deadly tramp—a furious scuffle then ensued in the antechamber; with a deafening force, the door was burst open, and Ino was clasped in the arms of her courageous, though almost exhausted father.

“Thank heaven thou art here, and I see thee but one short moment, to bid thee make thy peace with God. Ino, my cherished child, treachery and ferocity claim us both their victims; see they come—Great Heaven preserve us!”

Ino’s wandering senses were rapidly recalled to a consciousness of the horrors of her situation, by the fierce array of reeking swords around her; as she clung to her father’s bosom, one arm clasped her, whilst the other bravely contended with some four or five Turks. She forgot her own danger, and rushing before the falling weapons, cried for mercy towards her aged parent. A bloody, ponderous yataghan was lifted, the ferocious eye of the murderous fiend glared upon her with determined vengeance, then, clenching his teeth, he let the heavy weapon fall, but a strong arm quickly averted the fatal blow, while a loud voice exclaimed—

“Down, down, down, inhuman monster! Thy hand is already fearfully imbedded in the blood of the innocent; thy devilish brutality cries out for vengeance against thee, and die thou shalt, though thou art my fellow-soldier.” The heavy form of the Turk rolled on the floor. It was a mortal stroke, his life’s blood flowed fast, laving the delicate feet of Ino in its crimson tide, while he who had sent his wretched soul into worlds unknown, coldly and scornfully drew his sabre from the still and senseless body, and turning to the awe-struck and silent soldiers, who had followed him, said in a tone of warning denunciation:

“Comrades, I slew him not in wrath, but a just shame and common humanity demanded vengeance, for where’er his eye hath rested, there fell destruction and death. Look without, see the roaring flames and suffocating smoke, hear the heart-rending cries of butchered innocents. Are not your eyes already gloated with sights of unheard of cruelty? Is not the air now heavy with the loathsome odor of freshly shed blood? Stop, then, in your sinful career, and spare this noble old man and his heroic daughter. All that your captain shares of plunder, or honor, shall be given to you, and Stamboul’s hand and heart will be proud to own you his followers. But, if your thirst is still unslaked; if your appetite for human gore is not satiated, then take my life, one of your own sex, and equal in strength, not that of an old man and a helpless female.”

“Leave me,” continued Stamboul, on receiving no answer from the silent spectators. “I claim these two as my captives; pause I beseech you in your butchery, and remember ye are men, and Allah looketh upon you!”

The tramp of the awed soldiers was soon heard receding from the chamber, leaving Ino kneeling beside the insensible Del Castro, while he, on whom she had showered so much indignant scorn, and who, in that hour of need, had made her feel the injustice of that scorn, by his noble protection and generosity, stood gazing with folded arms upon her, in stern, but mournful composure. She raised her father’s head upon her bosom; the cold dew of death oozed o’er his noble brow, his white hair was clotted with his own warm blood, that was then rapidly flowing from a wound on his temple, which Ino in vain endeavored to staunch.

“Father, dear father! Oh! live for these only child. Who will protect her midst such a fearful massacre? Oh! God, if thou seest fit to take him, let us die together! Stamboul, water from yonder vase may restore him,” cried she on seeing him rapidly sinking. “See, he revives; speak, father, it is thy Ino who now implores thee to speak.”

Del Castro moved faintly, and opening his eyes, feebly raised himself, while his glance fell shudderingly upon Stamboul at his side, he said in a clear, but low voice—

"Draw near, my beloved child. I die gladly, for never could I have beheld the devastation of my native isle—and never would I have lived the captive of a treacherous, blood thirsty infidel. But alas! my fair, frail flower, how wilt thou meet thy terrible fate? Take this, (drawing a small dagger from his bosom,) should dishonor hang o'er thee, let it be thrice plunged into thy heart. Like one of old fall upon its point, ere thou wouldst become the victim of thy captor. Ino—one kiss ere I leave thee—its glow will banish the chill of death."

Quickly the glazed and fearful seal of man's last foe dimmed the dying father's eye as it was fixed in speechless woe upon his agonized child, and then there rested against her now desolate bosom, the cold and motionless head of her last earthly protector. No wail escaped her—no frantic gesture of despair or grief—but gazing long and silently on the sunken face of the dead, she softly laid the head upon her lap, whispering—

"Hush, he sleeps!—see Adrian, how gently he breathes, how calm his loved face seems. I fear to move, lest it should arouse him. Here, (beckoning to Stamboul,) assist me to lay him upon my couch, it is more comfortable, and he will sleep longer."

Stamboul obeyed her, and carefully laid the body where she bade him. Ino bent over it, and tearing a piece of her robe she calmly removed the stains of blood from his brow and matted hair; after arranging the clothes upon the body with exact care, she turned to Stamboul, who stood wrapped in the same melancholy silence, and drawing near to him whispered, lower than before—

"Come, Adrian, we will watch together in our consecrated bower." Her hand was laid upon his arm, and as she steadfastly looked again into his face, reason returned—with one loud, wild shriek, she shudderingly retreated from him, and throwing herself beside the corpse, gave vent to her long pent anguish of soul. What a picture of grief met the softening gaze of her captor,—caused by the cruelty of his people! Sympathy and a noble generosity of feeling bid the tears, those bright diamonds from nature's mine, to glisten in his eye—and approaching the weeping orphan, he said soothingly—

"Fear not, Lady Ino—thanks to the great Allah, this arm hath availed thee more than my offered love, this hand will never be lifted to harm or insult thee, nor will this heart do thee greater wrong than purely love thee. Although thou hast said such a feeling is impossible with a Turk, Stamboul will yet prove to thee it is not. . . . The changes of war have made thee my captive, but fear not, perchance thou wilt find thy lot a happy one, compared to that which would have befallen thee from other hands."

"Yes, Turk, thou sayest true, that I am a debtor to thee for life. I yield to the dread result of this night's sanguinary conflict—but I bid thee remember my father's last injunction, (she glanced before him the dagger;) let not Ino Del Castro have cause to repent thy timely rescue. Be assured her hand would not tremble, nor her heart quail to be her own deliverer from dishonor. She relies upon thy feelings of generosity and humanity—let her then own the truth of one example of honor and mercy belonging to thy accursed nation."

The dawning light of day ne'er broke o'er a darker and more woe-cast scene than on the devoted, desecrated isle of Scio, the once bright abode of bravery, learning and beauty. Turks, still infuriated, were stalking forth in the streets, "seeking whom they might devour," trampling and denuding the dead bodies of all who lay in their pathway. One was seen to pierce with his sabre the head of a female, and raising it high above him, severed the long bright hair from it, and twined it in his turban as a trophy of his victory—whilst another would scoffingly pile together the limbs and heads, and then with one stroke scatter them around him in wider confusion, as if it was a pastime of delight to look upon the work of death and cruelty. In one place lay the mother with eyes fixed in the horrid stare of death upon the mutilated body of the infant she clasped, while only a few feet apart lay its reeking head.

Bodies of once gallant men lay in heaps near those dwellings they had in vain endeavored to defend—whose walls were then bespattered with the brains and dripping with the gore of their helpless inmates. Even at that hour of the morning, the groans of the murdered as they breathed their last moan filled the air, and a faint cry of mercy occasionally fell upon the cold ear of the hardened foe, as he passed along in his brutal examination of the slain. Soon the sounds of barbarous music announced the array of the captives, and with loud shouts and whoops they were brought forth. Many a fair maiden's burning eye eagerly scanned the ranks to detect her betrothed, and many a noble bosom almost burst asunder the thong of confinement, when their glance fell upon the fettered hands of those plighted to them with vows of unchanging love. The rude song of victory was then struck, and forth the numerous and despairing band was marshalled for the land of the tyrant, midst a disgusting scene of unhallowed revelry and obscene mirth.

Ino Del Castro was spared this inhuman and degrading exhibition. She was borne away ere sunlight arose, respectfully attended by her captor and his train. One only thought brought relief to her anguished soul—it was, that Adrian had been spared that horrible, maddening scene, and although the hope of ever meeting him again was faint and worse than vain—still it was sufficient to bind fast her expiring energies, causing her to remember amidst even the dark desolation of that hour—

"The gloomiest day hath gleams of light,
The darkest wave hath bright foam near it,
And twinkles through the cloudiest night,
Some solitary star to cheer it."

The groans of the hapless, massacred Sciotes reached the ears of their countrymen, giving a new impulse to their struggle for liberty, and hurling tenfold blows of vengeance on their hated foe. When the terrible tidings reached the ear of Adrian Marcova it bowed his gallant spirit to the very dust, almost crushing his heart with a paralyzing agony. He had, midst the battle's fiercest power, unshrinkingly faced the enemy, hand to hand he had met him in the thickest danger, and when swords were clashing o'er his head, and the loud cannon's peal rang in his ear, still he averred not. In imagination, the genius of his dream ever stood beside him, cheering him with the music of her voice, bidding him remember he fought for liberty and love, while his eye oft and anon rested on the cherished banner bound on his strong arm. But alas! how changed the scene of life! how crushed his buoyant energies! No genius wooed him with her encouraging smile. Where was the beauteous Ino? Perhaps mangled by the touch of the demon Turk, or more dreadful still,—her fair and delicate limbs were then bound by the degrading chains of some relentless captor. Each horrible picture, presented by fancy, harrowed his mind to the highest pitch of despair, and with a sickening heart, though faintly fluttering with hope, that she might with her father be amongst the number who were said to have taken refuge in the mountains, where they were safely concealed from their pursuers, he prepared to revisit the ill-fated land of his youth and love. It was at the hush of eventide that the light form of one muffled in disguise, sprung from a small caique—himself the only oarsman—and bounded up the rocky pathway leading to the garden of Del Castro's once magnificent dwelling. The silence of the grave rested on that sad scene, "all ruin'd and wild." The house was still standing, though a part of it was crumbling and blackened with the smoke of the flambeaux. The bright polish of the court-yard was dimmed by the terrible stains of the deadly strife, the fountain was still and the same spattered marks sullied the purity of the glistening marble water nymph, while the grass and flowers around were trodden down and withered. Ino's bower, strange to say, had been untouched by the hand of destruction, for the foliage around it was as brightly green and blooming as ever. He entered, there hung her lute already strung as if it had just trembled to the touch of her fairy fingers. The casement from which she had last beheld him was open and every arrangement wore the lamentable appearance of a recent occupancy—but alas! where was the presiding Egeria of that tasteful retreat! Inausibly Adrian wandered over the grounds, and then through the gloomy halls of the mansion. The richly carved wood-work was burnt to a cinder in every room. From the saloon he ascended to the chambers. A feeling of sickening woe chilled his heart as he stood in Ino's apartment, and when his eye dwelt upon the countless crimson spots on the floor, Adrian could gaze no longer, but flew wildly from that desolated scene, to roam he knew not where. It was with the greatest effort of self-command and prudence he forebore to hurl an avenging blow upon the few straggling Turks who crossed his pathway, but remembering he was there in pursuit of Ino he stealthily wandered o'er that still endeared spot for several days, in hopes of hearing something of her fate. At last he sought those secret glens and caves amongst the mountains, determined to explore every pass ere he gave up the pursuit. Evening found him wearied and sick with disappointment, and sinking almost exhausted on the green banks of a small stream to cool his parched thirst, he gave way to the agony of his soul. Soon the cautious approach of some one aroused him, when his eye fell upon a singular being standing before him. She was one of those hated, scorned, but unmolested wretches, known to all as the circe of the mountains: a sorceress, well skilled in the preparation of all medical herbs and familiar with the concoction of poisonous plants.

"Ah ha!" said she in a shrill voice, "I see a Greek, not hunted too by yonder blood-hounds! Thou must have a charmed life about thee, youth, to have thus escaped their insatiable gluttony for Sciote gore. What and whom seekest thou in these solitary mountains?"

Adrian was for the moment chilled by her scoffing manner and hesitated ere he replied. Like all who have ever yielded to despair he felt reckless about encountering further disappointment, but remembering that the knowledge and power of one of her race had often proved efficient, a sudden hope induced him to answer her question with respectful earnestness.

"Yonder once beautiful village was the home of my youth and manhood—I wooed and won one of its loveliest maidens—I left her at my country's call, and the bloody mantle which those savages in form of men have cast o'er the island now likewise rests on her fate. I know not where to seek her, something assures me she is not among the butchered—and yet my suspense can not brook the thought of her being in dishonorable captivity. Oh! if thou knowest aught of Ino Del Castro, in heaven's name tell me her fate and the eternal gratitude of Adrian Marcova will be thine."

"Know I ought of the most beautiful of Sciote beauty! Did not Lamia, the circe, as her enemies call her, stalk with the power of ubiquity through the carnage of that awful night. Did these glaring eyes behold the terrible woo of those helpless victims of ferocious treachery? Did not this strong hand snatch from each falling foe the deadly sabre, that it might lay low another? Did not her warning voice point out places of safety here in these mountains to the flying, maddened Sciotes? Yes, all this did she see and do, and surely the groans and cries of Scio's fairest queen, Ino Del Castro, reached her ear too."

Lamia paused, and resting her long, bony hands upon her sturdy staff, looked strangely into the anxious and terror stricken face of Adrian, who became almost frantic with impatience at her evasive language.

"Say on, hag, and tell the worst of thy fearful tale, but spare until then thy present look of fiendish exultation at the sight of my wretchedness."

A feeling of kindly pity passed o'er her face as she, unmoved, replied:

"Scoff on Greek, call me fiend, hag or any thing else, it is what Lamia is used to, but the accents of gratitude have sometimes been poured into her ear. Alas! the day star of glory shines not on fallen Greece now. Noble and heroic blood no longer flows in the veins of her sons—anarchy, homicide and parricide now stalk through her once flourishing habitations, for it is as often Greek to Greek, as a resistance to oppressive tyranny. Had Scio's bosom been not so senseless, she would not now lie weltering in her life's gore, her soil not so rich with the marrowy fatness of human bones, nor her sons and daughters wanderers and in captive chains. But Lamia will do thy bidding. Ino Del Castro saw the last struggle of her devoted father, her gentle hand smoothed his dank hair in the hour of death, but a noble captor stood by, whose timely aid averted the blow that would have sent her pure spirit to Paradise. Stamboul, the Turk, Mahmoud's General, owns Scio's flower for his captive. She suddenly disappeared, for I sought her midst that tearful band in vain, ere they left for the Sultan's dominion. I have told thee, Adrian Marcova, all that these poor eyes saw and all I know, what further aid can Lamia render thee?"

"Thou art said to be skilled in the powers of divination, and can, unmolested, encounter yonder ruthless tyrants—assist me then in seeking and rescuing Ino—give me thy counsel what course to pursue, and oh! Lamia, if aught from human hands can avail thee, Adrian Marcova's will be ever ready and true to assist thee. Wealth shall be thine, a home will be given thee in a far off happier land, and if unchecked happiness can follow a good deed, Lamia will assuredly enjoy such."

A derisive smile passed o'er the features of the sorceress as she listened to his earnest petition—it faded, giving place to one of conscious importance and superiority.

"Fangh Greek! thy offers fall upon a senseless ear, they pass as a light wind o'er my resolutions, for knowest thou, Marcova, Lamia the circe is far above thine as well as all human aid. What she will do for thee must be free as the waters of this rippling stream. But think not her heart is dead to all kindness, though unkindness from others has made her what she now is. Thou beholdest in her the victim of perjury and outraged love, who, in the hour of remorse and despair, sought these secret glens, vowing vengeance against thy faithless sex; nay, a deep hatred to all of the human species. Ere that massacre of hellish origin took place in Scio, nought delighted me so much as the work of destruction and bloody deeds—no task was so pleasant as the decoction of deadly poisonous drugs, which oft were administered with my own avenging hand. But that epoch of my transformed nature, those beastly and inhuman desires have passed away, and Lamia now wishes to die a woman, yet it is only here, in these mountain wilds, will she breathe her last; here will she end her days. Listen then to my counsel. Disguise thyself as a Turk, put on the tarbouch, trowsers and flowing kirtle—the chibouk in thy mouth, savage ferocity in thine eye and journey to the Sultan's kingdom. The slave markets are daily crowded with Greek slaves of both sexes, where perchance thou mayest either gain a sight of Ino Del Castro, or some tidings of her fate. If not at first, be cautious in thy enquiries of Stamboul, and if thou art prudent in so doing, I feel confident thou wilt be successful. I will now bide to yonder village to procure for thee the hateful disguise and arrange thy further plans. When I have fulfilled some of my various missions here, perchance I may follow on to stand by thee in the hour of peril or danger. Dost thou accept Lamia's counsel?"

"Most gladly, and if a strict adherence to thy directions, with the aid of a greater power, doth ensure me success, Oh! Lamia what would not this grateful heart sacrifice for thee!"

Lamia complied with her promise. In a short time Adrian Marcova was wending his way to the land of tyranny and slavery, habited as one of that justly accursed race, and so closely disguised that not even the keenest penetration of the most suspicious Turk could cry him false.

HOPE.

An echo from the — of — — — So. Ca.

If I were called upon to name the emotion of the human mind, which is most efficient in its influence upon mankind, which suggests the grandest enterprises, and which supports under the most trying reverses, I am certain that I should only be anticipating your own judgment in pronouncing Hope to be that feeling.

The earliest visions of childhood are tinged with its golden hues, and the reveries of the boy and of the man are filled with the gorgeous palaces and regions of delight, which it can plan and build.

It animates the schoolboy at his tasks, it emboldens the soldier for the battle, it nerves the sailor against the perils of the sea, it gives light and strength to the patriot who is contending for his country in its darkest day. There was a time when it encouraged a little band of men to leave the green fields and hills, in which their youth was spent, and the wives of their heart, and the children who had grown up around them; and to venture out amidst untravelled regions of the deep. Hope led them on, though the warnings of the wise, and the laugh and scoff of the witty, and the regrets and lamentations of the loving, were ringing in their ears. Hope led them on, though the prejudices of their education, and the solemn dictates of science opposed their course. Though the mountain billows of the Atlantic rose up before them, and the rude winds of heaven blew around them, and their frail bark trembled beneath the mighty voices of the deep, yet Hope was at the helm, and they were guided by it until they rested from their labors, doubts and fears, upon the borders of this new and noble continent.

Though less splendid results, than accompanied the struggles and success of Columbus, may attend its exercise; yet, in the every day affairs of life, Hope is not less active in supporting the weak, encouraging the strong, and beckoning the prosperous to more extended and energetic efforts.

It sits with the mother by the side of cradled infancy, winds the wreath of laurel around its little brow, and teaches her to love not only that which is, but that which will be; when weakness puts on strength and walks, when knowledge has brought its treasures, and when wealth and fame and honor shall attend his steps. It goes with the student to his books; it stands by the side of the man of business in his daily toils; it mounts with the statesman up the steep of office: it lies down with the rich upon the bed of anguish; it walks with the strong upon the path of vigor: there are none so low as to be without its companionship, there are none so high as not to need its help. As an old poet has described it:

"Sweet Hope * * * by thee
We are not where, or what we be,
But what or where we would be: thus art thou
Our absent presence, and our future now."

And finally, it leaves no man until he come to those

"Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
And rest can never dwell, where hope
Which comes to all, can never come."

Our holy religion shows itself to have come from the God of our nature and our mind, by the provision it makes for the employment of this noble faculty; and as eternity is greater than time, so are the objects of Hope which it proposes greater than any which can be aspired to on earth. The objects of anticipation, held out by this world, were not enough for the encouragement of mankind. The wealth, honor and power, which it could give, were too limited in their value and duration; they failed too soon themselves, or the human power of enjoying them was too fleeting: and as man was himself immortal, he longed for the certainty of those immortal anticipations, which he hoped were true.

This certainty, the Scriptures which were written aforetime, give us. They dissipate the mysteries of human life; they show that all our prospects are not bounded by the grave, they open through its narrow walls the gate of everlasting life, and they teach us how we may be empowered to go in thereat. "Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope."

They speak to us first of patience.

This patience exercised, they bring us comfort.

And thus we rest on solid ground of Hope.

This is a blessed, a precious hope; a hope when all others fail, fadeless and pure, a hope that never deceives, but which rewards the expectant with greater bliss than that which he imagined.

In all things else Hope promises but to delude; it builds fairy palaces, but they vanish as we approach them; it throws its enchantments around distant objects, only to disappoint us when we grasp them; it surrounds a wished-for honor with a glorious halo, it exaggerates the enjoyments of wealth, it paints a Paradise in the pleasures of the earth—but when obtained, the honors descend upon an old and aching brow, and the pleasures and the wealth can only be displayed to mock the bitterness of heart which can not enjoy them, and aggravate the wretchedness of a condition which was already miserable.

"Vain pomp and glory of the world I hate you," has been the language of more than one unsuccessful aspirant for earthly honors: and in such an hour, all that the services of a long life had obtained, would be given for the humblest title to that hope which maketh not ashamed.

This hope is an anchor to the soul in every period of life: the more violent the gales we encounter, the stronger is its hold, and in the final shipwreck of the human spirit, its greatest power and tenacity is displayed.

To change the figure and to conclude:

A worldly man who is growing old is like a pilgrim who has long been struggling up the steep sides of some lofty mountain, but whose strength at last has failed him, and who is beginning to descend. His prospects once were boundless, but now they are becoming narrower with every downward step; village after village is hidden from his eye, field after field disappears from before him, until at last he sees nothing but the green hillock beneath his trembling feet, which is soon to be hollowed out for his gloomy and narrow grave.

The Christian also is a pilgrim, and the mountain side is steep, which he is endeavoring to ascend, and he is weary and worn with his upward toil. But he has no earthly nor despairing thoughts. He has no cares nor anxieties to drag him down. His treasures are in heaven, and thitherwards he constantly aspires. He commits his way unto the Lord—his body is buried on the mountain top, and angels bear his soul to heaven.

THE CICISBEO, OR CUSTOMS OF SICILY.

BY LIEUT. WM. D. PORTER, U. S. A.

CHAPTER I.

The following events and scenes occurred on the Island of Sicily, partly in the city of Messina. Turning into the Straits of Messina, avoiding Scylla and Chyribdis, sailing along the coast of Calabria, you pass a little fort seated like a gull on a projecting point, termed a "mole;" you enter the quiet harbor of Messina and land in front of a line of beautiful public edifices, before which, extending along the water, is a walk neatly paved with square limestone. Passing through arches covering the streets, you enter a wide, well paved street, on either side of which the stately palaces of the nobility meet your gaze. At the head of this street, near a turn of the Bay, or arm of the Straits, stands the stately palace of one of Messina's haughtiest nobles, the Count de Cheveta. Ostentatious, haughty and reserved, the Count seldom appears in public, but as a member of the Council. His palace, or palazza, as it is generally termed, is situated in the most romantic and secluded portion of the city of Messina: the verandah overhangs the clear, quiet arm of the Bay; the gardens extend along the shore of the Straits; on one side you have a view of the coast of Calabria, on the other Mount Ætna appears almost to overhang the cypress trees and myrtle bowers which beautify and grace his property.

It was the last of the carnival, and one of those soft evenings so peculiar to Sicily;—the Count and his friends were, as usual on occasions of this kind, gathered at the front windows of his palace, pelting the masquers with sugar plums, which were returned with great spirit, and sometimes with interest. The gardens of the Count were illuminated with various colored lights, throwing among the arbors and shrubbery a soft and mellow radiance; the moon also lent her silvery rays, giving a still softer effect to the quiet of the garden. In this garden, two children were playing at hide and seek, their joyous laugh rang among the bowers as each detected the other's hiding place. While engaged in this childish sport, another joined them. He was the brother of one and the cousin of the other. The last of these children was a boy not above sixteen, yet he walked with the steady step of manhood, and o'er his brow was already seated the sedateness of mature age. "Gerald," remarked Constantine De Cheveta, "the Count, my father, requires your presence in the hall; leave off this childish buffoonery with Ada and come with me."

Ada, thus referred to, was only thirteen; her soft, black hair curled in long glossy ringlets over an alabaster neck, and almost swept the ground. She was for her age very slight and delicate, but active as an antelope, she bounded over her father's lawns and made the tall cypress groves merry with her laugh. Her eyes were blue, resembling the soft heavens overhanging her native land, her brow was fair and pencilled by eyebrows of raven hue; in her manner, she was peculiarly soft and volup-tuous, showing at the age of thirteen, all the Sicilian. Gerald, her cousin and playmate, was about to leave home to join the army as a page. In all he was a Sicilian.

The two youths left the garden together and were soon with the Count, who gave Gerald his final instructions previous to his departure and turned to the window again to amuse himself by throwing sugar plums at the passing masquers.

After Gerald left the garden, Ada sought a favorite retreat at the foot of a large cypress. Thoughts of love, far above her years, passed through her mind. She had not long remained in this secluded spot before Gerald again stole from the hall and sought the same retreat.

"Ada," he whispered, "where are you?"

"Here, Gerald, at the foot of the cypress," was the reply, in a voice so musical and mild, that it might have been mistaken for the soft voice of the nightingale.

Gerald seated himself by her and placed one arm around the delicate waist of Ada, who unconsciously placed her hand in his, leaning her head upon his shoulder, and turning her soft blue eyes up in his face. A gentle sigh escaped her, the first sigh of love.

"Gerald, what detained you so long! I had almost determined to return to the Casa and join in throwing sugar plums."

"Ada," replied Gerald, "Uncle detained me to receive his benediction and advice, previous to my leaving Sicily, I am afraid, Ada, for a long time."

A tear stole down the cheek of Ada at this announcement, which was kissed off by Gerald.

"Gerald, do not forget the little song I taught you, and do not teach it to any one, for if you do, cousin, I won't love you."

"No, Ada, I promise you I will not, nor will I again sing it until we meet."

The children arose and tripped, laughing and singing, back to the palace.

CHAPTER II.

The last night of the carnival was succeeded by a day of solemnity. The churches were crowded by the nobility of Sicily, who, to all appearance, were as penitent, as the day before, they were joyous. The Count De Cheveta and family proceeded to the church of St. Paul's to offer up prayers to their patron saint for the safety of their only son, and Gerald, their favorite nephew. Ada and Gerald kneeled in front of the Virgin, their hands clasped in each other's, and their young hearts poured forth in silence a prayer for the welfare, safety and prosperity of each other.

The family returned to the palace of the Count, where a slight breakfast of chocolate and toast was already waiting. The hearts of Gerald and Ada were too full to partake even of this slight meal. Too young to conceal their thoughts and feelings, or even to be aware of the extent of their affections, they gave free vent to their sorrow on parting.

Constantine and Gerald embarked on board a light Xebec, which loosing her wide white sails to a gentle breeze, gracefully swept around the point which forms the harbor of Messina, and was soon gliding through the straits, her sails swelling and hull bending to the increasing breeze. Constantine was on deck gazing with boyish wonder and surprise upon the snow-capt mountains of Calabria, until his spirits became as buoyant as the light bark that bore them o'er the bounding waves. Gerald, on the contrary, had thrown himself upon the deck and watched the gradual disappearance of Messina, in the distance, nor did he move from his position until the dome of St. Paul's sank beneath the horizon; then rising, he slowly walked to the prow of the vessel and appeared to watch the sparkling foam as it danced in the beams of the golden sun, while in fact he thought only of Ada.

On the departure of her brother and cousin, Ada rushed to her room, which overlooked the harbor, and gave full vent to her sorrow in a flood of tears. The separation from Gerald was the more distressing to Ada in consequence of his being her confidant and playmate. She was the only daughter of the Count and Countess, who were loth to send her early to a convent, the usual school for young Sicilian girls; but now that the two boys had left, and having no one to confide in, she proposed to herself the necessity of finishing her studies. For this purpose the convent of St. Urmola was selected. It was necessary that lent should expire previous to her departure, and in the interim the Countess was preparing Ada for the separation.

The moment at length arrived when she was to be placed under the care of the Lady Abbess of St. Urmola, who, on the admission of her pupil, received the usual fee, and promised to attend strictly to her religious and mental education.

CHAPTER III.

Several years had passed since the transpiration of the events mentioned in the last chapter, and Ada De Cheveta had bloomed into full womanhood; her figure was still slight, but began to assume a more graceful appearance; the eye had gained a deeper blue and her whole manners were soft, lovely and love-infusing. The Count and Countess were anxious that Ada should unite her affections to those of some rich and influential noble. Associating with the best Sicilian society, since her return from the convent, had to all appearance eradicated from her mind the remembrance of Gerald. She was the gayest of the gay, and her musical laugh and soft, sweet voice enraptured all who became acquainted with her.

About this time, or a little previous to it, a young English merchant settled in the city of Messina. He was of a sedate turn of mind, and presented credentials that at once admitted him into the very best society of Messina. He saw and soon became enraptured and in love with Ada, who appeared not averse to his addresses. He continued his attentions, and in a very short time her hand was partly promised him by her parents. During this time, her brother arrived in the city; he had grown to manhood and looked upon all foreigners with distrust; he was averse to the alliance and reminded Ada of her youthful affection for Gerald, which often drew forth a sigh from her, but the ties of consanguinity prevented any matrimonial engagement taking place between them.

Ada did not love Gerald less for her attachment to Mr. Johnston, but the wealth of the Englishman, and her parents' wishes determined her to give her hand to this foreigner. Mr. Johnston was rich, young, handsome and accomplished,—to none of which could any lady have a very serious objection, much less Ada, the daughter of a Sicilian Count, whose fortunes had long been on the decline.

Frank Weston, a friend of Johnston, arrived in Messina the evening previous to the final arrangements between the parents of Ada and Mr. Johnston. Frank was about thirty-five, slightly made and rather hard featured; he could not exactly be termed a rake, but was one of those truly flippant beings whom we meet every day in good society,—one of those butterflies always fluttering around and among the ladies, laughing and making witty remarks without meaning them,—whose constant boast is, that they are not susceptible of love, yet are deep in its mysteries,—who are always using the worn out adage of "Ladies' hearts are trifles light as air," only to be played with, not owned: and yet are deeply engaged in winning the trifles, ever near it, yet never gaining the object. Weston was in fact a cosmopolite, in the strict sense of the word; he had travelled over nearly every portion of Europe, like an old trunk, collecting dust without becoming polished. By some curious and singular incident in Johnston's early life, he became acquainted with Frank Weston, and though their characters were entirely dissimilar, they became sincere friends.

Frank, while at Naples, had heard that Johnston was in love, and the intention of his visit to Messina was to persuade his friend to give up his Sicilian love, and remain in single blessedness like himself. Though Weston was selfish, he felt a sincere friendship for Johnston; probably this very selfishness of heart caused the feeling, as it was reasonable to suppose if his friend once married, the companionship would in all likelihood cease.

Weston sought his friend and found him reclining on an ottoman at the Count's. "Tom, my dear fellow, how do you find yourself?" was Weston's first remark, on entering the saloon.

"Well, my good friend, Frank; you are in time to be a witness to my marriage ceremony."

"Ah! Tom," remarked Weston, "you know not what you do. Oil and fire will sooner unite in harmony than a Sicilian and an Englishman. I know the parents of your lady love. The Count is haughty and the Countess proud; they would look upon you with distrust, and believe me, you can have no hopes of thawing them into compliance. I understand you have been dancing attendance here now two months, without any prospect of success, and that her brother, the heir apparent to a penniless title, treats you as haughtily as though he owned the whole of Sicily, and could command Mount Stromboli."

"Frank, my dear friend, forego for once your opinions; the Lady Ada is beautiful; to-night I serenade in the Italian style under her window; she is then to answer me; to-morrow, I demand her of the old Count, my fortunes against his titles, and I am not mistaken in the result."

These remarks only brought forth a laugh from Weston, who touching his friend gently on the shoulder with the point of his cane, replied, "Tom, that is too good, 'tis very good; well you are and always have been of a sanguine temperament. I will admit the lady Ada is beautiful, her blue eyes fringed by long silken lashes, arched and pencilled eyebrows and raven hair curling down an alabaster neck, are within themselves sufficient to create love within a breast less susceptible than yours. I must confess I have at times felt a warm sensation akin to love around my heart, but withal she is a Sicilian girl, her blood thrills hotly through her veins, and a dull phlegmatic English husband will soon be changed for an enthusiastic Sicilian Cicisbeo. Ah! Tom the customs of Sicily are far different from those of 'Old England'; the sunny skies, soft airs and sweet perfumes from citron groves produce feelings far different from those generated by the foggy climate and dingy woods of England. What effect must a soft climate have upon those who are born under its influence? Look at the pliant, graceful figure, the soft and melting eyes of the Sicilian girl, the uneducated and careless grace of action, the voluptuousness in every smile, love in each look that sends the warm blood rushing through the veins of the entranced gazer! Ah! I tell you, Tom, a husband in Sicily is only a convenience; the Cicisbeo is the true lover."

A slight blush covered the cheek of Johnston, but it was only for a moment. Rising from the ottoman a little excited, he replied, "Frank, your picture is too highly colored, I say she has no other lover than myself; I never hear the guitar under her window; nor do I ever see those sure indications of love, flowers on her table; besides, has she not promised to leave her 'sunny land,' and live in 'foggy England'? Believe me, all is well; farewell Frank, we will meet at the signing of the contract."

"Farewell, Tom, good luck attend you, but beware the Cicisbeo."

"Never fear," replied Johnston, "that will be settled in the contract."

The two friends parted,—Johnston to prepare for his future happiness, and Weston to the hotel Du Roi Del' Angleterre, where his friend and friend's love were soon buried in a bottle of "old south side madeira." Johnston felt the full force of his friend's warning; the word "Cicisbeo" rang in his ears even after he had reclined his head upon his pillow. A thousand plans passed through his mind to be adopted for the purpose of inducing the friends of his betrothed to relinquish the custom of placing the word Cicisbeo in the marriage contract. Ada had frequently in discussing the point told him that it was a mere matter of form, a legal technicality which no one thought worth while abolishing, or adopting. With a troubled mind and heavy heart sleep overcame him; nor did he again awake until the morning light warned him it was time to rise.

CHAPTER IV.

Constantine's aversion to all foreigners was a sufficient reason for his objection to Mr. Johnston, but in addition to this, the national antipathy of a Sicilian to an Englishman determined him to throw every obstacle in the path of Johnston. His cousin Gerald, for whom he had more than a brother's affection, had induced him to visit Rome, to obtain a dispensation in favor of Gerald; but as he had not been enabled to receive an answer to his application, he returned to Sicily to have the progressing arrangements postponed indefinitely. He had concealed the arrival of Gerald until both of their wishes were fulfilled. With these views in his mind, he sought Ada and found her seated quietly in her favorite boudoir near the old cypress. Tapping her gently with his glove, he pleasantly remarked, "Why Ada, my sister, still thinking about your future foreign husband? or may be in hopes of a Sicilian one."

"Pshaw, brother, why do you continually harp on a Sicilian husband? Can't an Englishman be as accomplished and as handsome as a Sicilian?"

"Yes, Ada, my beloved sister, but you are wrong, very wrong to countenance these foreigners; they may be rich—in fact we know Mr. Johnston is wealthy; we also know him to be an accomplished gentleman, but Ada, he will not understand your Sicilian heart. He is dull, heavy and austere; you are soft, confiding and affectionate. Ada, do you recollect your cousin Gerald?"

"Yes, brother, I recollect him, but as a boy. He was not more than fifteen years old when he left home to join the army; but still I can love Mr. Johnston, though he is not a Sicilian."

"About as much, Ada, as a Sicilian girl should love her husband, that is, spend his money, receive him with affection when the day's business is over, give him your lap-dog to carry and not allow him to be too inquisitive about your little love affairs. Do you think Mr. Johnston will agree to all this?"

"Certainly, brother, I think he will agree to any thing I like." The little beauty tossed her head and returned to the house, not, however, without an uneasy thought crossing her mind.

Gerald concealed behind the shrubbery, was listening to the conversation between Ada and her brother. She had scarcely disappeared before he came forward, where Constantine was standing, biting his lips in anger. Gerald had disguised himself as a minstrel, or common Sicilian singer. He asked his cousin if he thought Ada would recognize him in that costume, "you know I am changed but little since I was a boy." While they were in conversation, Ada returned to apologize to her brother for the hasty manner in which she had left him. Gerald was the first to see her.

"Ah! here she comes," remarked he, "how lovely she looks." His emotions were so great that Constantine had repeatedly to tell him to be careful and not betray himself.

Ada approached her brother, at the same time extending her hand, and apologized in the sweetest manner for her haughtiness, as she termed it, which was by Constantine evidently forgiven. Ada in turning again to depart, observed Gerald in his minstrel's costume, she was struck with his beauty, and asked her brother if that was the minstrel he had brought with him from the army, and would he permit him to attend her wedding.

"Yes, my dear sister, this is the minstrel you have so often heard me speak of, would you like to hear him sing?"

"By all means, brother." She looked at him for a moment, and in a low voice said to Constantine, "Gracious heaven! how he reminds me of my little cousin Gerald! come forward, senior minstrel," said she aloud. Gerald advanced, his heart almost bursting its bounds, and addressed her in a low voice, at the same time kneeling at her feet. "Lady, I know a little song taught me by a younger not many years ago; he had then but a few days joined the Army."

"Pray sing it," said Ada. Gerald took rather longer to tune his guitar than he might wish Ada's countenance. Ada becoming impatient and annoyed by his gaze, said, "pray sing." Gerald struck the accompaniment and sung the following verses:

Swiftly rows thy gondolier
That wafts thee love from me;
The breeze that fans my cheek must bear
This song of love to thee.
By yonder shining orb I swear,
Those stars which brightly shine,
That nought can make thee, love, less dear.
Ah! no! till death I'm thine.
Swiftly rows thy gondolier, &c.

Ah, here is still the citron grove,
Aye breathing sweet perfume;
The myrtle bow'rs you loved to rove
Still brightly, sweetly bloom.
Yon changeful orb may pass away,
Those stars may cease to shine,
Yet naught can change this heart; my lay
Shall still be thine, love, thine.
Swiftly rows thy gondolier, &c.

During the performance of the minstrel, Ada appeared to become rooted to the spot on which she stood; as line after line flowed in music from his lips, her cheeks at one time became crimsoned, the next moment a deadly paleness crept o'er them. She listened in mute surprise, and even after the minstrel had risen and was waiting for the usual presents on occasions of this kind, Ada remained silent, and was only aroused from her stupor by her brother reminding her of the usual fee due the minstrel, who immediately retired upon a preconcerted signal being given him by Constantine. Ada in great agitation turned to her brother; the tears running down her cheeks, and her voice choked with emotion, she said—

"Oh! Brother! what dreams of pleasure does that little song call forth! I taught it to my cousin Gerald, and methinks I see a likeness of him in the minstrel; but no! it was but my fancy, and yet that fancy almost creates a belief in my mind that this minstrel is Gerald."

At this moment the Count and Countess entered the walk where their children were conversing. Constantine called to his mother and told her that his sister Ada had lost her heart with a poor minstrel; "for would you believe it, dear mother, he sang an old love ditty to her and presto her love for Mr. Johnston was clean gone." This was said with a laugh peculiar to Constantine when he intended to be sarcastic. The Countess with that haughtiness peculiar to Sicilians, reproved her son in the following manner. "Constantine, my son, I am tired of all this minstrelsy, the country is overrun with it; and besides, my son, it is time you should begin to assume that dignity which suits the high station you hold, and which the ties of your family require." The Countess was peculiarly haughty. To cast ridicule upon the titles of her noble lord was in her opinion one of the unforgiven sins. Constantine knew this and thought it a propitious moment to seal the fate of Johnston and advance the prospects of his cousin Gerald. With a sarcastic laugh, he replied, "Mother, Mr. Johnston says he can purchase a Sicilian countship for a sixpence, and I think our broken fortunes and the sacrifice we are about to make, almost induce me to believe it true." This remark his mother felt, but recovering from a momentary feeling of shame, she mildly replied, "Fie my son, this is not dignified, particularly on the day your sister's marriage contract is to be drawn up, signed and sealed. We have come to search for you and Ada to be present; the priest and lawyer are at the house, and are only waiting the arrival of Mr. Johnston; so come, my children, we will return."

The party returned to the palace where they found all waiting. Mr. Johnston and the lawyer appeared both agitated as if they had been in a dispute. The Count inquired if the contract was ready, and the reply being in the affirmative, it was handed him to sign. Mr. Johnston at this moment stepped towards him and begged that a favor which he was about to ask might be granted him. The Count laid the parchment upon the table and awaited the request. "Sir," said Johnston, "previous to signing and sealing that contract, may I request that one word be altered in it, and if this be granted I will add thirty thousand pounds to your daughter's settlement. It is the word 'Cicisbeo.'"

The discharge of a bomb could not have created more surprise among the party, than did this request. The fingers of the Count relaxed their hold of the pen in them and it fell to the floor; the Countess rolled her pious eyes to heaven, and ejaculated, "Saint Ursula protect us;" the priest crossed himself; Constantine smiled with inward satisfaction, and his bitter sarcastic laugh was just audible. Ada thought of her cousin Gerald, and a slight flush passed over her cheeks. The priest was the first to recover from his astonishment, and explained to Johnston that it was one of those customs which could not be abolished. Johnston turned to the Count and with a voice choked with agitation asked him if he would consent. "The Count replied through his teeth, "No, I'll not abolish an ancient custom."

The mind of Johnston was harassed by feelings which could not be appreciated by his Sicilian friends; in signing the marriage contract his hand almost refused to do its office; his agitation was by the Count and his lady attributed to the anxious desire on his part to have it speedily fulfilled; but Constantine, always jealous and suspicious, attributed his uneasiness to its true cause.

The contract being now signed, all but Ada retired to a small private parlor to partake of some refreshment.

Ada's thoughts were still on the minstrel. It can not be, (she mentally remarked,) her cousin; no, it was some poor beggar picked up by her brother; then, the song! Why should this minstrel create such feelings in her heart? And again that song! Gerald promised not to sing or learn it to any one. At this moment her eyes fell upon the contract, she advanced towards it and the first word noticed was "Cicisbeo." Gerald again passed across her mind; the notes of a guitar struck her ear; it could be no other than Gerald's. The contract was dropped, and Ada hastened towards the direction of the sound. Ere she had reached the door, she was met by her brother, who told her that the minstrel wished to sing one more song before he left. Ada with a heavy heart consented. The minstrel was called in. Ada had seated herself upon an ottoman; tears stole unconsciously down her cheeks, and she scarce heeded the musician. Tuning his instrument, he struck a plaintive accompaniment and sang these extempore verses.

Tears, lady, dost weep in sadness,
Thou, once joyous and gay,
Breathing o'er earth thy spirit's gladness?
Tears on thy bridal day!
Where, oh! where is the laughing brow,
Where light curls gently wave,
Like dancing sunbeams upon snow?
Oh! give them not to the grave.
Tears, tears, on thy bridal day!

Oh! weep not so, thou'lt wed to night
The flower of chivalry;
Tears will but dim thine eyes' soft light:
Would'st change thy destiny?
Then prithee, sweetest lady, call
Thy spirit back from its dreary thrall,—
Back to the laughing earth now spring,
And let thy voice its music ring,
For this is thy bridal day.

The last note had nearly died away when Ada unconsciously took up the lay; the minstrel accompanying it with his guitar.

Ah yes, the world may laugh and think
We're happy, e'en upon the brink
Of some dark abyss of unchanging woe,
Which none but we can see or know.
For ah! how can they think the eye,
So seeming bright, beams agony?

Ada ceased and appeared to be lost in a deep melancholy. Constantine had carried on the masquerade, he thought, quite long enough. "Look up, my dear sister, look up and see your playmate, lover and cousin Gerald." Ada raised her eyes and gazed upon him for only a moment; then throwing herself in his arms, exclaimed:

"It is,—it is my own dear little cousin. Oh! how happy you have made me; long, long have I looked for your return, but alas I am about to be married, and there is the contract." Gerald looked at the contract and observed, "Your English husband that is to be, dear Ada, does not object to your having a 'Cicciseo,' he does not deprive you of your lovers."

"No, Gerald, but he consented with a very bad grace; to think, Gerald, of a Sicilian girl without a Cicciseo! What would I do for some one to bring me flowers, to write love songs, and in short to love me as a Sicilian girl should be loved when her husband is pouring over his musty counting-house books: it destroys the monotony of a married life. I think you have grown very handsome, dear Gerald."

"Do you, Ada? come, this is your wedding night and though our consanguinity forbids a marriage, we are not forbid to love, let us visit the 'old cypress tree.'" Away they both joyously took their course to the old favorite spot.

They had scarcely left when Johnston entered, and seeing the contract lying open, he took it up and saw still the hated word "Cicciseo." With his knife he tried to erase the word and alter the reading of the contract;—the seal and wax being on the table, he folded and sealed it and left the room.

The lawyer came in directly afterwards, and seeing the contract sealed, attributed it in his mind to the priest, he took it as a matter in the line of his business for safe keeping, until it was to be delivered to the priest, previous to the marriage ceremony, which was to take place that evening at the Church of Saint Paul's.

CHAPTER V.

The church of St. Paul's is situated near the great square in Messina. The wealth of many nobles has been expended in its decorations; chaste Mosaic, in figures, flowers and historical sketches, beautify the pave of the building; the artist has displayed his talents and ingenuity in embellishing its vast dome and walls, in costly frescos, principally incidents from the life of St. Paul; nor has the sculptor neglected to display his taste and ability, in filling the various niches and altars with figures of the most graceful and striking character. In one, the Holy Virgin is sculptured in parian marble; in another, the patron saint stands out boldly, shaking from his hand a serpent; the altar fills one end of the vast building, and is surmounted by a massive silver cross, upon which hangs the Saviour; Candelabras of silver, massive and rich, decorate the altar, and the whole is enclosed within a massive rail of pure white Italian marble. The dome is supported by pillars of an unknown and lost marble, massive and antique in their appearance, but having the freshness of yesterday. It was at this church the ceremony was to take place, which was to unite the Lady Ada with Mr. Johnston, and as the Count De Cheveta traced back his ancestors as supporters and founders of this building, it was decorated and lighted for the occasion by himself.

We must now return to the Count's palace, where preparations were making upon a scale equal to the rank and wealth of the parties to be united. Ada seated on an ottoman, dressed in her wedding suit, attended by her bridesmaids, waited the moment of announcement for her to enter the costly carriage which was to convey her to the church. Over her countenance was a shade of apparent melancholy, a tear stole down her cheek, and as her bosom swelled in anguish, an unconscious sigh escaped her: she finds too late her hand is given but not her heart. A page announces that her future husband is ready to receive her. Rising and followed by her bridesmaids, she was received at the door by her mother, who presented her to Mr. Johnston; passing through the spacious well-lit halls of the Count's palace, Ada was handed into her carriage by her affianced; the wide gates of the court yard were thrown open and the cavalcade passed slowly under the archway, and emerged into the open streets, amid the shouts of nearly the whole populace of Messina—shouts of "Long live the Count De Cheveta."

At the church of St. Paul's, Ada was received in the arms of her father, and lifted over the steps of the church, as the superstitions of the Sicilians lead them to believe that a bride touching the steps of a church, is a forerunner of an unhappy marriage. Passing up the spacious building, the bridal party kneeled at the altar. The priest and two assistant brothers of the same order, commenced a low chaunt, the Sacrament was then administered to the young couple, and the priest offered up a blessing in behalf of the pair who were about to be united in love. The marriage contract was then received from the lawyer, blessed and purified by holy water, a low chaunt was again performed, a blessing offered and the contract placed in the hands of Ada; the ring was then received by the priest from Mr. Johnston, blessed, purified, and placed upon the finger of the bride. Two wreaths of pure white Jessamine were then placed by the priest upon the heads of the bride and groom, marriage promises were responded to by both, a prayer and benediction were then offered, and given by the priest, after which all united in a solemn chaunt and prayer.

The ceremony performed, the parties returned to the palace, where was assembled all the beauty, nobility, and fashion of Messina. The vast palace of the Count, on this joyous occasion, was refuted on a scale sufficiently magnificent; the halls were hung and festooned with the finest and richest damask. Tapestry of the rarest and most costly kind, representing historical, love and rural scenes, covered the walls; chandeliers of every description, wrought by the most skilful mechanics, and massive in appearance, lit the rooms. A thousand varieties of wild shrubbery and cultivated plants were intermingled, bearing flowers of every hue, from the purest white, through all the different tints to crimson, blended with cerulean blue, and golden colors were called in to form artificial groves throughout the mansion. Even the vast gardens of the Count were fancifully arranged and illuminated, and his hospitality on this night extended even to the lazaroni. Minstrels were employed and united to add their soft music and wild song to enliven the evening; jugglers, a class so famous throughout Sicily, could be seen showing their tricks without a fee to the gaping crowd in the gardens; nothing was left undone which the utmost ingenuity could invent, or a refined taste accomplish, to render the evening pleasant.

Weston was, as usual, fluttering around the ladies. He sighed to the sylph-like Lady Cecilia, and boisterously laughed with Madam Gross, drank punch with Senior Cosmo, and gambled with Don Pelata, eat pistacchiois with young Munchenarro, and waltzed with the laughing Selima Penaro. Suiting himself to all characters, he soon became the general favorite. Passing round the room he saw his friend Johnston, leaning against one of the marble pillars which supported the roof of the hall, looking intently at a couple who appeared to take no part in the festivities.

The lady was neither tall, nor short; her figure had assumed a plumpness bordering on the voluptuous, a full formed forehead denoting mirth as most prominent, a skin rather brunette, large, black, swimming eyes, fringed by long silken lashes, that overshadowed them, giving them a soft and languishing appearance. Her face was turned up, and looking at a gentleman leaning over her, she appeared to be listening to him with great attention; at one moment blushes dyed her cheeks, and her eyes fell; at another, anger, love, grief, and all the different shades of passion appeared to take possession of her countenance. The gentleman was tall, dark-eyed, and handsome. The two friends' attention was attracted to this couple. Weston asked his friend who they could be?

"Probably husband and wife," replied Johnston.

"No," remarked a Sicilian, "that is Lady Remar, one of the most talented and accomplished ladies in Messina. She is married to one of the most disagreeable men in this place, and that gentleman is her Cicisbeo."

"Bah!" said Weston, "he is a happy dog."

Johnston hurried away in disgust, and as he turned, his eye rested on Ada waltzing with her cousin Gerald.

THOUGHTS.

BY DR. JOHN C. McCABE.

In the studio of J. P. Merrill, in Fredericksburg, stood the Portrait of a young and beautiful girl. As my heart did homage at that shrine, (a beautiful woman,) that man pauses before but to fling incense, the following thoughts suggested themselves.

The young maiden at the Casket, one soft hand resting there,
While the sweet cool winds of evening play amid her clustering hair;

In the other hand a miniature—the face of one who keeps
A place within her thoughts, perchance,—and as the warm tide leaps

Within her blue-veined fingers, and to her sweet, bright cheek,

Awakens a strange feeling whose thoughts she may not speak.

Sweet maiden at the Casket, with forehead fair and high,
With beauty on thy kindling cheek, and in thy bright blue eye;

I would I had the wizzard's lore thy destiny to read,
Upon thy hand's fair palm; and it should pleasant be indeed!
I'd read to thee of smiling skies, of pathway strewn with flowers,

Of all the bright and beautiful to charm thy girlhood's hours.

Before thee is a pedestal, surmounted with an urn,
Enshrining memories of joys that never may return;
And 'round an open lattice the wild and straggling vine,

Its tendrils leaping up with joy, all carelessly doth twine;
But what are these? the beautiful is stamped upon that brow,
'Tis written on the smooth fair cheek that glows before me now;

'Tis kindling in that soft blue eye, and in that lip's sweet smile,

Well might the Anchorite break his vow, and yield him to their guile.

Oh maiden at the Casket! though I no wizzard be,
Still would I gladly, gladly read, a pleasant fate to thee!

Thy brow should be unclouded, and thine eye should never shed

A tear for joys departed, or above the treasured dead;

And thy young heart in its gladness, with holy beat should thrill,

To the music of life's poetry untroubled by an ill.

And thy lip should ever smile as now, thy face be all as fair,
And the gentle winds should wanton still within thy clustering hair.

Yet, maiden, close that Casket. Put back the locket there,
Look not into the future—it may be sad or fair;

Still, still methinks I see upon that distant rosy cloud,

A destiny all beautiful; above the little crowd—

And to my eye the vision now distinct and bright is given,
And it tells of happiness on earth, and endless bliss in Heaven.

TO MAXIMUS.

When I have been arguing in court, it has often happened that the judges, though not prone in general to compromise their dignity, have risen and applauded simultaneously, and as it would seem, involuntarily; and often in the senate I have gained such distinction as most of all flatters my ambition. But never did I receive higher gratification than from what Tacitus lately told me. At the circus, he said, he sat near a Roman knight and conversed with him on various literary topics; after which the knight asked, "are you an Italian or a provincial?" "My literary character seems not unknown to you," replied Tacitus. "Then you are either Tacitus or Pliny," the knight rejoined. To find our names thus sacred to letters, and familiar by reputation to those who never saw us, gave me inexpressible pleasure. Something like this had occurred a few days before. Fabius Rufinus, a man of character and standing, reclined near me at a feast; and next him a villager just come to Rome, to whom Rufinus pointing me out, asked, "Do you see that man?" And then spoke of my habits of study. "It must be Pliny then," replied the man. Such an incident, to tell the truth, is to me a full recompense of all my labors. The Greek orator had a right to be proud when an old woman of Athens pointed him out with the words, "There goes Demosthenes;" and why may not I exult in a similar mark of fame? Yes, I was delighted, and shall not affect to deny it: nor need I fear the charge of vanity, in repeating merely what others say of me, forbearing self-praise; especially since I write to one who envies no man's good name and is a friend to mine. Farewell.

TO TACITUS.

I give you leave to laugh, as doubtless you will, when you hear that I, your old acquaintance, Pliny, have actually killed three boars, and very fine ones they are. What, you? you ask. Yes, in truth and honesty; and that too with little sacrifice of philosophic ease, for, to tell the truth, I merely sat near and watched the nets. I had taken with me, not the boar spear and lance, but a pencil and tablet; and, meantime, selecting a subject, wrote down such ideas as occurred, so that I might return from the sport with a full note book, at least, if with empty hands. Now, don't ridicule this mode of studying; for it is wonderful how the mind is raised by the excitement and exercise of the body. The quiet solitude and deep silence which the hunter finds in the woods are powerful aids to reflection. Whenever you hunt, remember that you have my example for carrying a writing tablet as well as your bread bag and wine flask; and credit me, you will meet Minerva wandering in the mountains as often as Diana. Farewell.

TO FUSCUS.

You ask how I pass the summer days in my Tuscan villa. I wake spontaneously, and generally about six o'clock, often before and seldom later. The window blinds remain closed, for the mind is invigorated by silence and darkness. Retired from all business, and absorbed in a book or reverie, the thoughts cease to be diverted by surrounding objects; and the eyes, having nothing to engage them, appear to see whatever the mind is contemplating. If engaged with an unfinished composition, I reflect upon it carefully, and with as close attention as if actually writing or revising; and compose more or less according to the facility or difficulty of the subject. I then call an amanuensis, and admitting daylight, dictate what is thus elaborated; after which he leaves me for a time, but is again sent for and dismissed again. About 8 or 9 o'clock, as it may chance, (for I am not very exact in measuring time,) I repair to the portico, or summer house, and again compose and dictate. I then order the carriage, and even during the ride am employed as when walking or reclining; for I consider the change itself a sufficient recreation without intermission of study. On returning, I sleep a short time, and then walk; and next read Greek or Latin in a clear loud tone, to strengthen the chest rather than the voice, though both are improved by the exercise. Afterwards I walk again, dress, exercise and bath. At supper, if my wife or a few friends only be present, some book is read aloud. After supper we have comedies or music. Finally, I walk with my household, which reckons some learned men in the number. Thus the evening is spent in diversified conversation, and the day, though the longest in the year, is quickly conducted to its close. Sometimes the order of the day is a little varied; for if I have meditated or walked more than usual, after reading and the siesta are dispatched, I ride, not in the carriage, but on horseback, which is a more expeditious because a more energetic mode of exercising. Sometimes friends from the neighboring towns visit me, and civility claims a part of the day for them; though at other times, when fatigued with study, they afford me a seasonable recreation. Occasionally I hunt, but never without a note book, so that I may bring home something though I should catch nothing. Farmers in general, as they seem to think, are never at leisure; so, let their complaints commend my literary diligence, which would not be disagreeable even to a city gentleman. Farewell.

TO TACITUS.

I often argue with a learned and ingenious man who considers brevity as the highest excellence in forensic arguments. I however think brevity desirable, if the case will admit it; otherwise, it is a mere prevarication, to omit what ought to be spoken, or to pass slightly over what ought to be amplified and fixed in the mind by reiteration. In many cases argument gathers force and weight by progression, and sinks into the mind, as steel pierces the body, as much by protracted impulsion as by a sudden blow. In this conflict of opinions we resort to authorities; and from the Greeks he cites Lysias against me, and Cato and the Gracchi from our own countryman, whose orations are certainly very brief and concise. To Lysias I oppose Demosthenes, Æschines, Hyperides and many others; and against Cato and the Gracchi, counterpoise Pollio, Cæsar, Cælius and especially Cicero, whose longest oration is adjudged his best. And in point of fact, every good book, like other good things, is better for its size. It is admitted that statues, images, paintings, and in short, the figures of men and animals in general, if designed with taste, are highly recommended by ample dimensions. The same principle obtains in works of the mind; and magnitude alone seems often to give weight and authority to books. All this and much more I often urge in support of my opinion; but he contrives to evade it, (being extremely subtle and versatile in argument,) and contends that these men, on whose authority I rely, published their orations at greater length than they delivered them. I think differently. Many speeches of various orators might be alleged, and among others, Cicero's for Muræna, Varenus, &c., in which the crimes charged are indicated by a brief and barren catalogue of titles alone. From these it is evident that he spoke much in court which was omitted in his published speeches. In the oration for Cluentius he said that he had argued the cause at large, without assistance, in accordance with the ancient custom; and in that for Cornelius, that he had spoken four days. Nor can we doubt that in a speech of several consecutive days he must have dilated amply what was afterwards reduced so as to be compressed into one large pamphlet. But a forensic argument is not an oration, it might be objected. I know that some persons think so; but I am well convinced, (though perhaps I am wrong,) that a good law speech may be an indifferent oration, but not conversely; for an oration is the exemplar and archetype, as it were, of forensic speaking. Accordingly, in the best of each kind, we find a thousand extemporaneous strokes of art; and even sometimes in published speeches, as in that against Verres; an artist? What artist?—you say well: it was Polyclætus. It follows therefore that pleading approaches perfection as it resembles an oration, provided sufficient time be allowed to give it due expansion; and if such time be denied, it is no fault in the orator, but a grievous one in the judge. This opinion is supported by the laws, which give abundant time, and recommend, not brief, but copious, or at least elaborate arguments, which are incompatible with brevity except in the most unimportant cases. I will add what that excellent master observation has taught me. I have had some experience as an advocate, a counsellor and a judge. Men's minds are variously moved, and arguments which seem feeble often produce a great impression. Our judgments, feelings and prejudices are much diversified; and hence, from the same argument we often draw different conclusions, and sometimes the same conclusion, but by different mental processes. And besides, each man is partial to his own original view; and is apt to regard the speaker as a deep logician when he hears him insisting on what his own sagacity had already discovered. Therefore, all should be given something which they can recognize as just and regard with partial favor. Regulus once said to me in a casual interview, "You think it necessary to urge all that can be said in every case; but I at once perceive the throat and grasp that"—and, indeed, he grapples manfully with whatever he seizes, but often mistakes his mark. I replied that a man might mistake the knee, or the calf, or the ankle for the throat. "For myself," said I, "since I can not always discern the throat, I assault every part successively, and in short leave no stone unturned."* As in agriculture, I cultivate vineyards and fields, as well as rear nurseries of trees; and in fields sow not wheat or rice alone, but barley, beans and other pulse; so in pleading I sow various seeds broad cast, and reap whatever comes up. For the minds of the judges are not less obscure and deceptive than the qualities of the soil and the changes of the weather. Nor have I forgotten what praise the comic poet Eupolis gives that consummate orator Pericles:

"For passion's rapid energy he knew,
Yet could be gentle and persuasive too;
Could calm the heart, diffusing peace around,
Or leave a sting to rankle in the wound."

But Pericles himself could never have blended soft persuasion and soothing gentleness with brevity and rapid energy, or with either, (for these expressions are not synonymous,) unless an ample range had been allowed him. For to soothe and to persuade demand a liberal scope of amplification; and he may leave a sting in the minds of his hearers, who not simply punctures, but fixes it deeply. Add what another comedian† says of the same Pericles:

"He thundered, lightened and convulsed all Greece:—
for it is not a short and mutilated speech, but a

* "παντα denique λιβον κινῶ."

† Aristophanes.

lofty and majestic oration that thunders, lightens and throws all into mingled tumult. "Some measure, however, should be observed:"—who denies it? Yet he as much fails to keep that measure who sinks below, as who soars above the proper mean,—he who is too succinct, as much as he who is too diffuse. You hear the epithets feeble and sterile as often as turgid and redundant. In the one case the orator exceeds his subject; in the other he fails to develop it properly: each errs in part, but one from weakness and the other from strength; and the latter is the fault of a noble intellect, though not of a chastened taste. In saying this, I do not mean to commend excessive proximity even in Homer; but rather,

"His words fell deepening like the winter's snow."

Nor yet am I always displeased with

"A story brief indeed, and unadorned," although, if forced to choose, I should prefer an oration that fell like snow, that is copious, deepening, continuous, and in short, celestial and divine. "But many prefer short speeches:"—they do, but the indolent alone, whose fastidious objections it were ridiculous to respect as reasonable. And if you take them into counsel, you will have to proscribe all speeches, long or short. Thus far you have my opinion, which I am willing to change if you oppose it; but in that case I beg you will explain your reasons for dissenting. I ought, 'tis true, to bow to your dictum alone; but in a matter of such importance, I would rather be vanquished by reason than authority. So then, if you agree with me, you can write as short a letter as you like; but write nevertheless, for I want my judgment confirmed. If you think me wrong, however, then prepare a long and elaborate epistle. A subtle form of bribery, is it not?—to burthen your dissent with the labor of a long letter, and let you off with a short one in case you concur with me. Farewell.

TO FUSCUS.

You ask what plan of study I think you ought to pursue in your present agreeable retreat. It is highly useful, and many writers advise it, to translate Greek into Latin, or Latin into Greek; for by this exercise you attain a correct and elegant phraseology, store of metaphors, and the art of clear and forcible statement, as well as the mind's general improvement in imitating the best models. Besides, the translator must encounter fairly many things which the careless reader escapes. In this way the understanding and judgment are ripened. It will also be well to select from books you have read some theme of which you remember the substance and argument, and write as if in emulation; after which, compare your production with your author's and examine every sentence critically to see whether yours or his mode of expression is preferable. If in any respects yours is better, you will have just ground of self-gratulation; but some cause to blush, if yours is inferior in all. Nor will it be amiss to select occasionally the most celebrated authors, and thus contend with the highest. The effort may be bold, but not improper, because it is withdrawn from the public view. Yet we see many acquire fame by daring rivalry of this sort; and some who can scarcely follow their authors as humble imitators, presumptuously hope to surpass them. Occasionally revise what you have written, after you have had time to forget it, and retain, erase, interline and alter as improving judgment dictates. It is a heavy and wearisome task perhaps, but of benefit proportioned to the effort it costs, to return with resolution to a discarded essay, and interweave with the old fabric new figures harmonizing with the whole. Your first aspiration, I am aware, is forensic eloquence; but notwithstanding, I would not advise you to cultivate exclusively a contentious and argumentative style: for the mind is strengthened by exercise in various departments of thought; as the earth's fertility is restored by a succession of different crops. I would have you at times compose a historical essay; at times practise epistolary writing, and at other times compose verses; for at the bar a style of narration, not historical simply, but almost poetic, is often requisite; and brevity and purity of expression abound most in letters. In versification, do not attempt a long, continuous poem—for that requires much time to perfect—but short and piquant epigrams, which may aptly employ the intervals of leisure occurring in every occupation. Such verses we call jeux d'esprit;^{*} but trifles though they are, they sometimes gain as much celebrity as graver compositions; and therefore let me assume the poet in urging you to cultivate poetry.

As ductile wax receives whatever form
The artist's plastic fingers would impart,
And Cupid now, now Venus bright and warm,
Now Mars, and Pallas now displays his art;
As water's sacred stream will flames arrest,
Or deck the dewy turf with vernal flowers;
So should the mind, with every art impress,
As variously display its various powers.[†]

* The translator has ventured to use a French phrase, because the original word lusus has a half technical meaning, which the English will hardly reach. But apology is scarcely necessary, for Pliny's letters are quite copiously besprinkled with Greek, a language which, in point of refinement, fashion and foppery, bore nearly the same relation to the Latin that the French does to the English.

† Subjoined are the original words of this indifferent epigram:

Ut laus est ceras, mollis cedensque sequatur
Si doctos digitos, jussaque fiat opus,
Et nunc informet Martem, castaque Minervam.
Nunc Venerem effingat, nunc Veneris puerum;
Utque sacri fontes non sola incendia sistant,
Sæpe etiam flores vernaque prata jurant:
Sic hominum ingenium flecti ducique per artes
Non rigidas docta mobilitate decet.

In this way have the minds of the greatest orators, and even of the greatest men, been invigorated or amused—indeed, I may say, both amused and invigorated; for it is wonderful how the intellect is refreshed and quickened by such light exercises. They give expression to love, hate, resentment, pity, compliment—in short, all that belongs to life, or is canvassed in courts and law-suits. There is also an advantage common to this and all other versification, that the constraint of rhythm enables us to wanton with delight in unfettered prose, as we most willingly engage in what experience teaches us we can do with greatest facility.

Perhaps I have already written more than you wished; yet one thing is omitted, for I have not told you what books you ought to read, though that you might infer from the directions given for writing. But remember the adage, “Read much, but not many books:” and therefore select carefully the best authors in their respective lines. Which these are, it is superfluous to point out; and besides, this letter is already so unconscionably long that the time it urges you to spend in study is consumed in reading it. So, resume your pen, and proceed with your interrupted labors, or else select something from the topics I have recommended. Farewell.

TO TACITUS.

I am glad to hear of your safe return to the city. You have come too at a time when I have special need of your assistance. I have been staying these few days at Tusculanum, in order to perfect a little work now on hand, fearing that if my diligence is remitted before it is finished, I shall hardly be persuaded to resume it. Meantime, that my fit of industry may not be interrupted, I beg leave, in what may be called a precursory letter, to anticipate a request which will be renewed when I see you. But first understand the occasion. A short time since, while on a visit to my birth-place, a youth, the son of one of my countrymen,* came to pay his respects to me. I inquired whether he was pursuing a course of study. He replied that he was. “Where?” I asked. “At Milan.” “Why not here?” “Because we have no teachers here,” replied his father, who was present and had himself brought the boy. “And why are there none?” I asked;—“for it deeply concerns you who are fathers,” (and by good fortune many fathers heard me,) “to have your children finish their education here. For, where can a boy have a more agreeable residence than in his native town? or be better restrained from bad habits than under his father’s eye? or be more cheaply educated than at home? How much better would it be then to retrench the board and travelling expenses and other incidental charges now paid for tuition in distant towns—all which are a heavy tax—and with the money thus saved employ competent teachers! For myself, I have no child, it is true, but for the good of our community, as for a child, or parent rather, I am willing to advance a third of whatever sum you are pleased to contribute. Indeed, I would promise the whole, but I fear that such a gift might be misapplied to improper purposes, as I have observed has frequently happened when teachers have been hired at the public expense. For this evil there is but one remedy, which is, to leave the negotiation of the contract to the parents alone, by which a deep interest in selecting well is superadded to the conscientious obligation. For men are not apt to be careless of their own interests, though they often neglect those of others; and they will be induced to see that none but competent preceptors are engaged, if the cost is to be defrayed in part by them as well as by myself. Therefore deliberate and resolve, and assume a liberal spirit from my example, who desire that what I have to contribute may be as large as possible. You can not adopt a measure more honorable and beneficial to your children, or more grateful to your country. Let them be educated here where they are born, and then they will early learn to love their natal soil, and to prefer it as a residence before all others. And I trust you may employ professors of such celebrity that in a short time young men will resort hither from neighboring towns, just as your children now repair to complete their education at distant colleges.” I have thought it best to communicate all that occurred, from the fountain head, so to speak, that you might better know how great an obligation you will confer by undertaking what I enjoin. I commission you therefore, and considering the importance of the subject, I even beg you, that among the many men of letters whom your literary fame assembles round you, you will seek out preceptors to whom proposals may be made; but with this reservation, that my faith is not to be given to any, since all the details of the contract must be left to the parents themselves. They will judge and select: to myself I reserve merely a portion of the trouble and expense. Therefore, if you find a man who relies so far on his acquirements, let him go with the express understanding that he must consider nothing certain but his own competent ability. Farewell.

TO VALENS.

After speaking, lately, before the judges in Quadruple session, I happened to think of the time when, as a young man, I had practised in the same court. My mind, as usual, proceeded farther in the train of reminiscences thus opened. I endeavored to recal the names of my early associates and competitors; and of all these it appeared that I alone survived and continued at the bar—such changes had mortal frailty, or fortune's inconstancy produced. Some of these lawyers are dead, others in exile; one has been forced from practice by age and ill health; another has retired, voluntarily, to enjoy the luxury of ease; a third commands an army; and a fourth is a court favorite, and thereby exempt from the toils of business. I too have known many reverses. I have been promoted, endangered, and promoted again by professional studies; been benefitted, injured, and again am benefitted by the friendship of good men. Count the years and the time is short, but seems an age if reckoned by vicissitudes. From such experience we learn the wholesome lesson never to despair, never to presume, since life's revolving orb brings such diversities of fortune. And now, if you ask a reason for this letter,—it is my custom to communicate all such reflections to you, in order to instruct you by the same precepts and examples which I use for my own self conduct. Farewell.

TO HISPULLA.

I know that you have ever been a pattern of domestic virtue, requiting your excellent brother's love with love as deep and warm; and that your affection for his daughter leads you to supply the place of the father she has lost, as well as fulfil the duties of an aunt. Doubtless, then, it will give you the highest pleasure to hear that she is altogether worthy of her father, her aunt and her grandfather. Her natural sense is excellent, and her household economy admirable: she loves me well, and her love is the best pledge of conjugal virtue. Her literary taste, acquired from me, is sedulously cultivated. She possesses my works, and reads and even studies them indefatigably. When I have an important cause to argue, she is filled with solicitude; and if success attends my efforts, it gives her the deepest satisfaction. During its progress she stations emissaries, who report to her whatever approbation and applause my speeches excite, and whether the decision of the court is in my favor. When I recite a poem, she sits among the audience disguised with a veil, and listens to the praises bestowed with the greatest avidity and delight. She also sings my songs, and adapts them to the harp, that best of all teachers, love, supplying to her the place of a musical instructor. From all this I confidently hope that perpetual and ever-strengthening concord will cement our union; for her affections are not fixed upon my person, which declining years have now somewhat impaired, but on my character and fame; nor would a mind less elevated become a pupil on whose education your care and instructions had been bestowed; who saw nothing under your roof condemned by virtue or religion; and who, in fine, had been trained up to love me by your judicious influence and advice; for while you seemed to regard my mother with the respect and affection of a child, you were also in some sort my preceptress in boyhood, and in your partial view considered me as promising then all that my wife thinks I now exhibit in maturer age. Let us both, then, offer you the most grateful acknowledgments,—I, as indebted to you for her, and she as recognizing a corresponding obligation, since the selection on both sides was made by yourself. Farewell.

TO MONTANUS.

You will be moved both to wrath and laughter when I have told you what otherwise you would never conceive. On the Tiburtine road, and within the first milestone, (I marked the place well,) is a monument to Pallas with this inscription: *In reward of his fidelity and dutious obedience to his patrons, the Senate decreed him pretorian ornaments and fifteen millions of sesterces.—but he, content with the honor, declined the gold. I have never marvelled, it is true, that dignities of state have oftener been the reward of fortune than of merit: but this epitaph is a convincing proof how vain and worthless are such honors as those lavished on this filth and refuse of humanity;† honors which the scoundrel‡ presumed not only to accept, but in part to refuse, transmitting the fact to posterity in praise of his moderation. Yet why be angry? It is better to laugh, that such men may know how little they gain when raised above their sphere merely to be laughed at. Farewell.

TO THE SAME.

You will have learned from a former letter that my attention was arrested by this inscription on Pallas' monument: In reward, &c.§ I afterwards thought it worth while to examine the decree to which it referred; and found it so copious and fulsome, that the magnificent epitaph appeared modest and humble by comparison. If those ancient dignitaries, Africanus, Achaicus, Numantius and others, or even those of later years, Marius, Scylla, Pompey and the rest—for I will not descend lower—be compared with this court favorite, their honors will sink into meanness before the splendor of his. But the Senators themselves, shall we ascribe their decrees to courtesy or necessity? Courtesy I would say, but that such a principle misbecomes so dignified a body. Necessity then!—but no man, however enriched, need be reduced to this. Ambtion then, and the lust of rising in court favor! But who would consent to his own and his country's infamy, for the sake of promotion in a State which offers its highest honors to the man who first flatters Pallas in the Senate? I pass by the fact that pretorian ornaments were pressed on a slave's acceptance, for they were slaves who offered them. I pass by the decree that the emperor would not only urge but compel Pallas to wear the golden rings, for the Senate's majesty forbids the praetor* to wear irons. These are light matters and deserve but a passing notice. What follows demands more attention. The Senate gives Cæsar thanks in Pallas' name, (was the hall ever purified after such profanation?) because he had not only distinguished him with the highest honors, but had vouchsafed to the Senate the privilege of testifying its affection towards him. Certainly, for what could better beseech the Senate than to show its devotion to Pallas! It adds, that Pallas, (to whom they all professed themselves so much beholden,) might reap the well-earned reward of his singular fidelity and remarkable industry. You would think he had subsidized armies for the republic, or enlarged the bounds of its empire. To this it is added, since the grateful liberality of the Senate and Roman people could be displayed as well in no other way as by augmenting the resources of this most faithful and economical guardian of the royal treasure. This then was the Senate's ambition, this the people's triumphant joy, this the consummation of grateful liberality, that the Senate should be allowed to add to Pallas' wealth by a lavish donation from the public treasury! Hear what follows: The Senate indeed wished to decree that fifteen millions of sesterces should be presented to him from the treasury; and since his mind is so far removed from sordid avarice, that our public father should be earnestly entreated to compel him to yield to the Senate's wish in this particular. For they had not power to decree that the refractory man should be dealt with by public authority; and therefore Pallas must be implored to indulge the Senate, and Cæsar himself, his master, be called in lest his proud and intractable moderation should disdain the proffered fifteen millions. He did disdain their oblation, which was all he could do, and in that displayed more arrogance than if he had accepted it. Yet the Senate, humbly complaining, converts that too into praise, in the following pathetic words: But when our most excellent prince and public father, at Pallas' request, desired that so much of the decree as related to giving him fifteen millions of sesterces from the treasury might be rescinded; the Senate declared that they had willingly resolved to offer that sum among the other honors decreed, as in discharge of a public debt to the fidelity and diligence of Pallas; but that in this they humbly obeyed their prince, because in any case they deemed it impious to oppose his will. Just imagine Pallas vetoing, as it were, the Senate's decree, moderating his own honors, and refusing, as too much, the fifteen million sesterces, yet consenting to accept the pretorian ornaments as if they had been of less value. Imagine Cæsar, in presence of the Senate, obeying his freedman's wishes, or rather commands—for the freedman ruled his patron, when his wishes prevailed before the Senate. Imagine the Senate obsequiously declaring that they had gratefully resolved to decree Pallas that sum, with his other honors,—ay, and would have persisted in their purpose but for the emperor's will, which it was impious to oppose in any thing. And so there was need both of his own modesty and of the Senate's loyalty, to prevent his depriving the treasury of fifteen million sesterces. In this, forsooth, above all things else, they would have disobeyed, if disobedience had been pardonable in any thing. Did you think that was all?—wait a little and hear what follows: Wherefore since it is expedient that the emperor's beneficence, ever ready to commend and reward the well-deserving, should be published everywhere, and especially where it may most incite to similar good deeds; in order that the distinguished fidelity, integrity and diligence of Pallas in the discharge of his duties may provoke an honorable emulation, it is ordered that the particulars related in large detail by our most excellent prince, on the 4th day of February last passed, with the Senate's decree thereupon, be engraved on a brazen monument to be placed near the mailed statue of the deified Julius. It was not enough for the Senate hall to witness such shame; but the most conspicuous spot is selected that the record of infamy may be read both by contemporaries and posterity. They were pleased to perpetuate all the honors of this fastidious slave, those he disdained as well as those which, so far as the Senate was concerned, he actually bore. His praetorian honors, like ancient treaties, like the sacred laws, are sculptured and inscribed on public monuments designed to be eternal. To think that the prince, the Senate and Pallas himself should have exhibited such egregious—what shall I call it!—for the arrogance of Pallas, the submission of the emperor and the abject servility of the Senate were thus decreed to be placed before the eyes of all the world! Nor did they blush to allege the reason of such meanness—the good and satisfactory reason, to wit, that Pallas' reward might provoke others to zealous emulation—so cheap and worthless were even those honors which Pallas scorned not to accept! Yet men of honorable family were found who desired and strove to obtain what they have seen bestowed on a freedman and promised to slaves. I heartily rejoice that my lot has not cast me upon those times, of which the history scandalizes me as if I had lived in them.

* In the absence of the consul, the praetor was empowered to convene or prorogue the Senate at discretion.

You sympathize with me, I doubt not; for I know how frank and warm your heart is; and therefore you will more readily excuse me, as having shown too little rather than too much feeling, although in some places indignation may have transported me beyond epistolary propriety. Farewell.

TO NEPOS.

I have remarked that the sayings and doings of illustrious men and women are not always celebrated in proportion to their heroism; and this will appear by what Fannia told me yesterday. She is the grand-daughter of that Arria who was her husband's solace and example in death. She related many things of her ancestor not inferior to that magnanimous act, though unknown to the world; and I think you will be as well pleased to read the account as I was to hear it. Her husband Cæcinnus Pætus and their son both lay ill at the same time, and as it then seemed, of mortal sickness. The son died, a beautiful boy of modest manners, and beloved by his parents as much for his excellent promise as because their child. His mother prepared the funeral and conducted the obsequies, concealing his death from her husband. On entering his chamber, she pretended that the boy still lived and was recovering. When he inquired after his son, as he often did, she would say that he had rested well and had a fine appetite; and when unable to suppress her tears, she would leave the room and abandon herself to grief; then drying her eyes she would return with a serene aspect as if the mother's anguish had been left without. It was a noble deed, certainly, to unsheath the steel and bury it in her breast, and then withdrawing the poniard, present it to her husband with those immortal and almost divine words, Pætus, it is not painful. But a vision of eternal fame may have incited her to this; and therefore it displayed more greatness of soul when, without such a motive, she restrained her tears, concealed her grief and assumed the air of a happy mother while her son lay dead on his couch. Pætus was of Scribonianus' party when he took up arms in Illyrium against Claudius; and on his leader's death was arrested and brought to Rome. On entering the ship Arria prayed the soldiers for leave to accompany him, "because," she urged, "an ex-consul is entitled to servant's assistance in preparing his food and making his toilet:—all this I will undertake alone." Her entreaties were disregarded. She then hired a fishing skiff, and thus followed the ship. In the presence of Claudius, she said to the wife of Scribonianus, who had appeared as a witness in the case, "Shall we listen to you, who bear to survive your husband though slain in your bosom!"—from which it is plain that her high-spirited death was not the effect of a sudden impulse. Besides, when Thrasea, her son-in-law, in deprecating her fatal purpose, said among other things, "Would you have your daughter die with me if I were put to death?" She replied, "I would, if she had lived as long and happily with you as I with Pætus." Her friend's anxiety increased, and they watched her more closely. She perceived it and said, "Your labor is vain; you may make my death a hard and painful one, but death in some form you can not forbid." With these words she sprang from the chair, and struck her head violently against the opposite wall, and immediately sunk to the floor. When consciousness returned, "I told you," she said, "that I would find a rough road to death, if you denied a smoother one." Now does not all this, through which she forced her way to death, seem more than her thrice famed It is not painful, Pætus!—and yet a halo of glory encircles her dying moments, while what I have told is buried in oblivion. Thus you see is proved what I first asserted, that the world's applause is not always the meed of magnanimity. Farewell.

NIGHT.

BY E. B. HALE.

"Oh! night, how queenly is thy majesty!"

The maiden moon goes sailing by,
In gallant, gallant trim;
And right and left the fading stars
Hang flickering and dim.

Bath'd in the soft and liquid light,
Fair nature slumbering lies;
Hush'd is the busy hum of men,
And clos'd the weary eyes.

But 'round and 'round in merriest mood,
Beneath the greenwood tree,
The goblin trips the frolicsome reel,
And sports in lightsome glee.

And on the gently swinging boughs,
And 'mid the quivering leaves,
The elves of merry mischief full,
Sing to the whispering breeze.

And here and there, and ev'ry where,
Along the flowery green,
In joyous groups they cheerily trip,
Around their Fairy-Queen.

O, give me night, the glorious night,
The moonbeams in the sky!
'Tis the time to draw the breath of life,
And a glorious time to die!

Ay! time of times! fling off the coil,
The weary chain unbind;

O, who would tie the spirit up,
Or bind the immortal mind !

So sings the Heaven-panting soul,
Weary and worn with care ;
Wooing the climes of purer light,
That tread the upper air.

But when the soul is bound to Earth,
By many a tender tie ;
Oh ! 'tis a hard and crushing thing,
To lay one down and die !

And when one's very bosom-friends,
Are bosom-friends no more ;
And all the tender sympathies
Of life and love are o'er ;

O, ask the mourner not his grief,
Bid not his tears to flow :
His all of love and joy are gone,
And what is left but wo !

O, 'tis a night for purest love ;
Blest are the happy twain,
Who gaze into each other's eyes,
With sympathising pain !

And blest are they who arm in arm,
Sweet converse lingering hold,
While Fancy smooths the rugged path,
And strews the flow'rs of gold !

Oh ! if the human heart can thrill,
With love's divinest pow'r ;
'Tis in the glorious summer-time,
At night's bewitching hour !

When the maiden moon comes sweetly up,
All beautiful and bland ;
And breezes from the curling sea,
Woo the alluring land !

And streams with softer ripples run,
And voices softer tell
Those pleasant things that shall for aye,
Within the memory dwell.

And if there is a mournful time,
Bereft of joy and gladness ;
A dark distressing weariness,
A lone and lingering sadness ;

Or if around the human soul,
No sympathy has wove
The time-enduring tendril bands,
Of joyfulness and love ;

O, lonely is the glistening night,
And lonely is the shade ;
And lonely is the loveliest spot,
Where truthful friends are laid ;

And lonely is the waterfall,
Lonely, the gushing stream ;
For life, with all its loveliness,
Is but a lonely dream !

FRIENDSHIP.

[Translated from the Italian.]

Besides your parents and other near relatives that nature has bestowed upon you, besides your instructors who have so richly merited your esteem, and whom you delight to reckon among your friends, you will probably experience a peculiar sympathy for others, whose virtues are less known to you, especially for young persons about your own age.

When ought you to yield to this sympathy and when repress it ? The answer is not doubtful.

We owe our good will to all, but we ought not to carry it to the degree of friendship except for those who merit our esteem. Friendship is a brotherhood, and in its highest sense, is the beautiful of fraternal attachment. It is the perfect harmony of two or three souls, never of a great number, that have become necessary to each other, that have found the greatest disposition to comprehend each other, to render mutual assistance, to put a noble construction on each other's actions, and to incite each other to excellence.

"Of all associations," says Cicero, "none is more noble, none more stable, than that which is formed by good men, when they are united by the bond of friendship and a congeniality of disposition."

Dishonor not the sacred name of friend, by giving it to a man of little or no virtue. One who contemns religion, one who takes not the greatest care of his dignity as a man, who does not feel that he ought to honor his country by his talents as well as by his blameless conduct ; one who is an irreverent son or a malevolent brother, though he were a wonder for the attractions of his person and the elegance of his manners, for the extent and variety of his learning, and even for some brilliant impulse to generous actions ; such a man ought not to prevail upon you to become his friend. Though he were to manifest for you the liveliest affection, admit him not to your intimacy ; the virtuous man alone has the requisite qualities for a friend.

Before ascertaining a person to be virtuous, the mere possibility that he is not so, ought to confine you, in regard to him, within the bounds of general politeness. The gift of the heart is too important a thing ; to be in haste to bestow it, is a culpable imprudence ; it is an indignity. Whoever attaches himself to degraded companions, degrades himself, or at least, draws their infamy upon him to his own disgrace.

But happy he who finds a worthy friend! Virtue, left to its own strength, often languishes; the example and approbation of a friend redouble it. Perhaps he is fearful at first, feeling himself inclined to many faults, and not possessing a proper consciousness of his own merits; the esteem of a man that he loves, raises him in his own estimation. He still experiences a secret shame that he does not possess all the worth which the indulgence of another supposes, but his courage increases by his efforts to correct himself. He rejoices that his good qualities have not escaped the notice of his friend; he is grateful to him for it; he has the ambition to acquire other claims to his esteem, and thanks to friendship, we sometimes see a man advancing vigorously towards perfection, who was far from it, and who otherwise would have remained so.

Make no strenuous efforts to acquire friends. It is better to have none at all, than to be forced to repent of having chosen them with precipitation. But when you have found one, honor him with an elevated friendship.

This noble affection has been sanctioned by all philosophers; it is sanctioned by religion. We find some beautiful examples of it in Scripture: "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul." But better still, friendship was consecrated by the Redeemer himself. He pillowed upon his bosom the head of the sleeping John, and when he was suspended upon the cross, before he expired, he pronounced these divine words full of filial love and friendship: "Mother, behold thy son,—Disciple, behold thy mother."

I believe that friendship, (I mean elevated, true friendship, which is based upon high esteem,) is almost necessary to man to draw him away from his propensities to evil. It imparts to the soul something poetical, a sublime and noble strength, without which he rises with difficulty above the miry slough of selfishness.

But this friendship once conceived and promised, engrave its duties upon your heart. They are many! nothing less than to render yourself all your life worthy of your friend.

Some persons advise us not to contract a friendship with any one, because it takes too strong a hold upon the affections, distracts the mind and produces jealousy; but I hold with a very excellent philosopher, Francisco di Sales, who, in his Philothea, calls this "an evil counsel." He grants that, in the cloister, it may be prudent to guard against particular attachments: "But in the world," says he, "it is necessary that those should unite together, who wish to combat under the banner of virtue, under the banner of the cross. Men who live in an age where there are so many obstacles to be overcome in their way to Heaven, are like those travellers, who, in rugged and slippery paths, hold together for mutual support, in order to walk with greater security."

The wicked join hands to do evil. Should not the virtuous combine to do good?

LOVE SKETCHES.

Maiden! on whose placid features
Childhood's beauty lingers still,
Who hast never known the shadow,
Of a proud, imperious will,

Dreary hours are dark before thee,
Hours that try the soul they task,
But the skies are starry o'er thee,
Mercy grants what faith shall ask.

Care can never soil thy spirit,
Deepest grief shall soon depart,
For thou'rt strong in all the aiding,
Heaven sends the pure in heart.

Bertha half sat, half reclined on a lounge, and played idly with the fragrant cluster of roses she held in her hand. Clara was busily occupied with her embroidery, and Herbert was reading aloud to them from that lovely prose-poem, the "Home" of Frederika Bremer. A sweet and tranquil summer afternoon was drawing brightly to its close, and the undisturbed beauty of the world without seemed not more peaceful than this trio of dreaming hearts. Herbert read well and feelingly, and he had reached the touching portion of that fascinating home-chronicle, which paints the melancholy death of Henrich, his mother's most gifted and best beloved, the "summer-child" of many hopes and prayers.

"Close the book, Herbert," said Clara, as he paused at the conclusion of this sad scene, "such pictures are uselessly sorrowful, and the impression they leave is too painful. We take from life much that makes it great and glorious, by imagining an early doom the ordinary lot of the unusually talented. Such records depress the spirit, and I do not like, even in fiction, to dwell on the disappointments of hope."

"How different our tastes are!" returned Bertha; "I feel more sympathy with griefs and events like these, than with gayer ones, and to me there is something of a higher peace, a purer tendency, in the moral humility such tearful lessons teach us."

"And is there not enough in the daily and hourly experience of our feebleness, in the frailty of our own best purposes, to teach us humility?" replied Clara bitterly. "I would acquire in its stead strength and power, the strength to combat, the power to control circumstances, to mould them to what they were not, to what we will. It is time enough when disappointment inevitably comes, to learn passively to endure it."

Herbert's gaze was bent on her earnestly as she uttered these words, and though he doubted her philosophy, he did not contradict the proud expressions that so well became the impassioned beauty of their speaker. And yet they awoke reflections in his mind, which grieved and perplexed him, and he felt as he marked the momentary and unconscious dejection which at times flitted over her faultless face, that the shadows were dark on her heart and that all was not peace within. The elasticity of her youth—that charm which returns not—was prematurely vanishing and giving place to the care-tinted thoughts of womanhood, and he feared that, with all her brilliant endowments, her self-relying pride, she had none of the quiet, abiding principle, which brings even to the deluded visionary, an enduring hope and solace. Herbert dwelt on this calmly: there was no sentiment in his heart for her now but the true, deep solicitude of a brother's affection, and that involuntary interest which ever follows the destiny of the one we loved first. He knew her faults well, and though he would willingly have sacrificed much for her happiness, she was dear less for herself than as Bertha's sister. He admired her too, as men always admire beauty, and he felt that sympathy in her aspiring tendencies, which the cultivated intuitively experience towards the mind which soars beyond the commonplace aims of life, and strives, however unwisely, however vainly, to work out and realize the loftier portion of its intellectual nature. There is in all the high spirits that have once hoped proudly and have watched the world well, an emotion of kindness, perhaps mingled with compassion, towards the ambitious, and it may be, that with Herbert this feeling strengthened, because he now regarded her tranquilly and philosophically. He had learned to reason on her character, to read at once its insufficiencies and its aspirations; he saw in them much to pity, yet something to approve, and he admired her more, because he loved her less. And well Clara knew this, and bitterly in her secret soul she felt and mourned it, and sometimes as she looked on Bertha's innocent and placid face and saw the guileless enjoyment of which it bore the lovely impress, she would turn away in irrepressible regret, and thoughts would overcast her spirit, whose sudden and envious sorrow startled and appalled her as they passed.

"Is all the purer and better portion of my nature lost?" She wrote thus in her diary, "have I suffered one dream to concentrate every gentler and softer feeling, to prompt every impulse, to sway every motive, and is all else harshness, despondency and wretchedness? I pause as I trace that word, for the habit of concealment has grown to be natural, and I can scarcely deal candidly with my own thoughts. I would not willingly acknowledge even to myself that such a change has swept over me, and yet I may as well write as feel that I am wretched. My interest in things around me is lessened, the poet's page has lost its charm, and literature, the enchanting dream-world of my purer days, is no longer a source of pleasure. Fiction wearies me; I am too really and earnestly sad to find entertainment in the portrayal, however skillful of imaginary events. Society gives me but momentary excitement and distraction; I return from scenes of gaiety and my spirit feels its loneliness the deeper from their contrast. I am too proud to appear melancholy, and the effort to seem happy is a constant trial. How many such mental mysteries, such useless, and self-imposed martyrdoms as mine, the social world might show, and while each one mournfully feels his own depressing burden of care and its concealment, how little he sympathizes with those who, like himself, are living on in silent and passive endurance, and not one light word is restrained by a kind thought for the heart, perchance breaking beside him! We know not the mysteries that control our nature, that make our impulses marvels to ourselves, changing the tenor of our human destinies and altering the future for our souls. We divide all that is dearest in existence, pleasure is essentially a sympathy, and our joys are in part the property of others to be known and shared. But our griefs, life's shadows and its truths, the things that make us what we are and turn us aside from what we might have been, the haunters of our memories, the diggers of our graves—ah! they are wholly and undisturbedly our own, to be buried in the stillness of the heart that bore them, and covered with the dust of the hopes they broke." "And yet I was created for something better and higher than this idle, complaining nothingness; I have strong yearnings that might guide me upward to nobler aims, that might fulfil my holier dreamings. When I look on the past, brief and bright as it is for me, there is yet a sentiment of disappointment that so many of my anticipations should already have proved vain, that my womanhood has so faintly sustained, so feebly worked out the beautiful ideality of my childhood. It is a hard lot too, to be incessantly pursued by this wild, taunting desire for the admiration of the many, and yet to have so little in common with them. I begin to believe that talent, accompanied by such imaginative tendencies, is nothing but a curse, and I would joyfully relinquish every ray of intellectual superiority, to attain the placid peacefulness that sheds so holy, so changeless a lustre over my sister's quiet and loving life. Well! this can not endure for ever; all things will fade, even as hope fadeeth, and we are but wanderers and strangers here, and pilgrims—whither!"

Bertha was alone, and her movements were quick and excited as those of one whose thoughts were unusually and painfully restless. Very different from her ordinary composed and pensive happiness, was the trace of shadowy care now darkening her forehead, as if a cloud swept over its fairness. She closed and locked the door of her apartment, and then, with a burst of irrepressible tears, gave way to the only tumultuous sorrow that had ever ruffled her tranquil existence.

Ah! it is a dark and fearful thing, the young soul's first realization of its power to suffer, its obligation to yield to the trespasser it strives in vain to repel. Many a shattered illusion is then trodden in the dust, and numberless are the enchanting hopes that then take their final flight for heaven. The shade may pass from the dreamer, but the mind has learned to doubt; fear for the future blends with enjoyment of the present, the sunshine has grown paler, and many anxious hours of questioning and regretting lie beyond the mournful threshold of youth's first real grief.

For several minutes Bertha could not restrain her tears, and rested her head on her hands in trembling and agitated silence. Then the unflinching resource of her heart returned to soothe her, and when she again looked up, there was peace on her brow; reliance had brought her composure, and prayer had bade her look upward and be strong. And truly hers was no idle repining, but earnest cause for tears and prayers lay heavy on her spirit. She was about voluntarily to dissipate the loveliest vision of her life, to put aside the radiant delusion of her earnest love, to give to one affection the priceless offering of another. She had observed of late the depression hovering around Clara, her listlessness and dejection, and that petulant, sarcastic bitterness of tone and speech which betokens a mind diseased. She had watched her closely with devotion's unerring solicitude, and gradually the dark truth dawned upon her, and from the true tenderness of her own nature, she learned rightly to divine the existence of another's love. It was a terrible thought to Bertha that she had, however innocently, interfered with her sister's happiness, and none knew the voiceless suffering with which day by day she continued her silent observation, and gathered a thousand trifles to confirm her first suspicions. Herbert, too, she scanned narrowly; she saw his eye follow Clara's graceful movements in unconcealed admiration; she heard his eager and ardent replies in conversation; she felt that he was interested in her sister's views and character, but more than this, not even her watchful investigation could detect. She discovered in his conduct nothing to regret, no change nor swerving, and she marked this with a thrill of pride in the knowledge that one who had been so dear, so well deserved such preference. And yet, she believed that if unshackled by another engagement, his feelings of interest might be fostered into something warmer, and with the inherent humility of her character she fancied he would perhaps be happier with Clara than with her. Bertha's estimate of her own virtues was lowly and unjust, she was prone to doubt her capability of inspiring love, and to fear her ability to retain it. Her doubts and fears on this subject were morbidly acute, and she had none of the vanity and self-approval, which would have successfully combated their representations. It never for a moment occurred to her that Herbert knew best how to promote his own happiness, and that while Clara was more ardently admired, she might be more fervently beloved; but even to enter into such competition seemed like inflicting a wrong on one she believed almost perfect. She did not perceive the selfishness, the lack of self-control in Clara's giving place to the sentiments she experienced, and the want of that high and compensating principle, which can unhesitatingly sacrifice all things to its innate sense of right. It seemed to Bertha so natural that Herbert should be loved, and there was so evident an effort on her sister's part to conceal, if not to conquer her emotions, that the less favorable view of the case never appealed to her judgment, and she remembered only that Clara was altered and unhappy.

It was with meditations and intentions like these that Bertha had sought solitude to commune with herself, and which finally determined her to be no longer a hindrance to Clara's tranquillity. Sorrowful enough were her vivid dreamings, as step by step imagination wandered forward, and unrolled the sad chronicle of long and lonely years to be. And yet with all, a gleam of comfort blended and she was strong in the true consciousness of her own purity, and felt an honest pride in the self-command that proved itself so intense in its hidden power to sacrifice. But frequently in the time that came afterwards, did she look back on the reflections and resolutions of that hour in sorrowing wonder, and marvel at the delusions which had made such visions hers: and alas! the period arrived too, when she realized that these struggles were all unavailing to secure her sister's peace, for Clara's was one of the minds whose unrest lies within, and for whom external circumstances, however favorable, can bring but temporary contentment.

And yet who that has resignedly suffered, shall say such trials are in vain, if they lead thought onward a single step toward its better bourn, if in stealing bright realities from this world, they add brighter hopes to the everlasting treasures of another?

That evening Bertha completed a closely written letter, and though her cheek was wan, and her hand trembled, as it traced Herbert's address, there was neither shrinking nor faltering in the spirit that had knelt down in its trusting simplicity and humility, and found consolation and repose.

GERALDINE.

BY HENRY B. HIRST,

Author of "Isabelle," "The Burial of Eros," &c.

The martins twitter 'neath the eaves,
 The swifts adown the chimney glide,
 The bees are humming 'mid the leaves
 Along the garden side;
 The robin whistles in the wood,
 The linnet on the vane,
 And down the alder-margined lane
 The thrush sings, and by the flood
 The plover pipes again.

But ah! alas, alas, no more
 Their merry melodies delight—
 No more along the river's shore
 I watch the swallow's flight;
 And bees may hum, and birds may sing,
 And silver streamlets shine,
 But on the rocks I sit and pine
 Unheeding all, for thought will cling
 To nought but Geraldine.

Oh! Geraldine, my life, my love!
 I only wander where we met
 In emerald days—when blue above
 The skies were o'er us set—
 Along the glens, and o'er the vales,
 And by the willow tree,
 I wander, where, at even, with thee
 I sung the songs and told the tales
 Of olden chivalry.

I stand beneath the sombre pines
 That darkle all thy father's hall,
 Begirt with noisome ivy vines
 That shroud me, like a pall.
 Aye, there, where ruin frowns around,
 Until the cock doth crow,
 I watch thy window-panes below,
 Upon the soddened, blackened ground
 Where nothing good will grow.

I've watched thy lattice as before,
 To see the glimmer dimly pass,
 When thou wouldst open thy chamber door,
 Of lamp-light on the glass;
 But no light from thy lattice peeps,
 And all within is gloom,
 And silent as a vacant tomb,
 Save when a bat, affrighted, cheeps
 In some deserted room.

Why comest thou not! Night after night
 For many a long and weary year,
 'Neath many and many a May-moon's light,
 I've waited for thee here.
 Aye, blackest night and wildest storm,

When frowning in the sky,
 Have glanced on me with lightning eye,
 And charnel figures round my form
 Have gleamed and hurried by.

Why comest thou not, or wilt thou soon!
 The crimson sun doth wax and wane
 Day after day; the yellow moon
 Gildeth thy casement pane
 Night after night; the stars are pale
 Expecting thee; the breeze,
 Rustling among the dreary trees,
 Sighs for thee, with a woful wail,
 Who art beyond the seas.

They tell me thou wilt never come,
 Alas! that thou art cold and dead,
 And slumbering in the green sea, foam
 Along a coral bed—
 That shriekingly thy ship went down
 Beneath the wailing wave,
 And none were near to heed or save;
 And they smile to see my frown—
 To hear me groan and rave.

Thou dead! no, no, it cannot be,
 For, if thou wast, thy ghost had kept
 The solemn trist thou madest with me
 When all save passion slept—
 Thy ghost had come and greeted me,
 And bade me be at rest,
 And long ere this upon my breast
 The clod had lain, and I with thee
 Were roaming mid the blest.

REMARKS ON VARIOUS LATE POETS.

Semper ego auditor tantum, nunquamne reponam,

No. 1.

LEIGH HUNT.

We propose to devote a few essays to the examination of some of the late aspirants for immortality in English poetry, weighing the claims advanced for them by their admirers with their merits as shown in their works. The complaint has often been made, and unfortunately not without reason, that American criticism is apt to be wanting in courage, when applied to foreign productions. The ipse dixit of the Edinburgh, or the Quarterly, is too frequently taken by us as a boldswallowed down and digested without question or examination; and it is frequently even worse. An English author is praised by his own clique, who raise a storm of applause over the chicken of their own hatching; we hear the echo of their mock thunder rolling down the wind, and, too distant to ascertain its real nature, take it up and roll it back again, much to the amusement of the true thunderers at home, who perhaps have been all the while laughing at the paltry Salomoneus. Again, in England there are numerous critics ever on the look out for a novelty, and perpetually eager to be the discoverers and patrons of some great, but hidden genius. These men fasten on every new poetaster, every unfledged tacker of rhymes, and proclaim him "the master spirit of the age," "the commencement of a poetical revolution," with sundry other stereotyped phrases, which have no doubt wearied our readers as frequently as they have ourselves. These catchwords are sent from mouth to mouth among this set, and we, good, easy yankees that we are! take it all for Gospel, and wonder at the fungus reputations which thus appear to spring up in a night, while they may notwithstanding be totally unknown to the class of readers who give the real and final stamp of approbation.

These reflections have just been stimulated anew in us by the perusal of a late work—"The New Spirit of the Age," by R. H. Horne. The author, himself a poet, though of no great celebrity, in his remarks on the English rhymers of the present day, shows a singular degree of partiality towards the ideal dreaming school which seems to have so completely spread its influence over the recent English poetry. We are still free from it—may we continue so! Mr. Horne's predilections may be summed up in a word,—he considers Alfred Tennyson as a greater poet than Byron, and exalts Leigh Hunt to an equality with Wordsworth, whom he regards as the poet of the age. Such criticism, however, can not endure long. True poetry can be understood by the many, and such alone will live. It does not require a separate education to enable a man to appreciate and enjoy Shakspeare, or Milton, or Byron,—they wrote for the universal mind, and in language not to be mistaken. It is only the pretenders, the smaller fry, the minnows of these tritons, whose readers must undergo a separate course of study to fit the mind for a proper enjoyment of their productions. These poets write not of man, or of nature, as they are in reality around them, but as they appear in a self-created world, and the misguided followers gradually assume the same sickly tone of mind, until they can relish no healthy, no natural food, and shrink from the energy and power of the real masters of the human lyre. Scott was in the right when he read his "Lady of the Lake" to a neighboring farmer, and judged of its merit by the effect it produced on an acute, but uneducated mind. Such we find to be the case with all those poems which the world has pronounced immortal, and such will it be, long after the present school of dreamers has vanished and been utterly forgotten.

It would be an interesting thing to trace the rise and progress of this peculiar sect, though it would take too much space, and too much time at present. Undoubtedly Shelley and Coleridge may be considered as its founders; but the cloak, which adorned the shoulders of these prophets, serves but to expose and heighten the deformities of the pretenders, who are endeavoring by its assistance to impose their trivialities on the public for inspired dreamings. Some few credulous souls have been taken in, as by Father Miller and Prophet Joe Smith, but the imposture will soon be discovered, and the quacks consigned to their native oblivion.

Among the most conceited and outré of the present race of bards may be named Leigh Hunt. His literary history is rather a curious one. At the age of sixteen, he published quite a ponderous volume of poems, singularly good, considering his age, but totally worthless in every other point of view. He then appeared as an essayist, and gained some little attention by his youth and the strength with which he delivered his opinions. This continued for a number of years, during which he chiefly contributed to a paper named the Examiner, conducted by his brother John, until for some libellous expressions towards the Prince Regent they were prosecuted, and were foolishly imprisoned for two years. This, of course, stimulated Hunt's vanity, warm enough before, and inflated by the applause consequent on his youthful efforts, raising him, in his own opinion, to the dignity of a martyr. While in prison, he published "The Descent of Liberty, a Masque," and on leaving it, his "Story of Rimini," the greater part of which was written during his incarceration. Since then, his efforts in verse have not been frequent. "Foliage" appeared in the course of some two years after the Rimini, and then his Pegasus took a long rest. Some years since he produced a drama or too, and more lately a volume of "Tales in Verse." These constitute nearly the whole of his poetical attempts. During this time, the Tory journals, of course, took every opportunity of attacking such a man, and the savage criticism of Gifford, and the coarse personalities of Wilson were poured on him unsparingly. He was praised in the Whig Reviews, when mentioned, but it was done timidly, more for the man than the poet, and they evidently saw that the wisest course lay in letting him alone. He laid himself open in his works to every kind of attack, and yet, it must be confessed that he was frequently treated with more harshness than he deserved. Wilson's critical lecture upon his "Choice," in the "Noctes Ambrosianæ," is perhaps as well executed and ferocious a mixture of criticism and personality as the annals of magazines can afford. These assaults continued for a number of years, and he was constantly exhibited on the pillory of abuse for the amusement of the profane,—but now times have changed with him. The mighty men of old, with whom he used to be compared, have disappeared. Byron, Shelley, Scott, Coleridge, Campbell and Southey, have gone, while Moore, Wordsworth, Rogers, and all who remain, are mute, or nearly so. The critics must therefore lower their ideas, and Hunt will bear a very tolerable comparison with Tennyson, Barry Cornwall, Haynes Bayley, Eliza Cook, et hoc genus omne, and thus, in his old age, he is reaping the harvest of praise that was denied him in his youth. Pity that the latter fate were not as well deserved as the former! Even Christopher North turns round and condescends to approve of his former "re del Cocknio Parnaso."

Such has been his literary history. The revolutions of favor which he has experienced were shared alike by Wordsworth and Coleridge, but not in so great a degree, and, at the same time, much better merited. The chief wonder would appear to be, how a man with no more talents than Hunt possesses could manage to attract so much attention through so long a series of years. But this admits of an easy explanation. Ever since the year 1801, in which he commenced his authorship, he has been industriously engaged in writing and sending forth his works, both in prose and poetry, to the world. His intense vanity, apparently, will never suffer him to be at rest unless he has the satisfaction of knowing that some one is writing or talking about him; which pleasure he can generally procure by his smartness and some natural talent.

Considering the length of time during which he has been engaged in writing poetry, his productions in that branch of literature are singularly few and insignificant. It may be that he writes with difficulty, and employs much time in finishing and polishing. If so, he has the happy art of concealing his art, for his poetry all seems as if it were written "stans pede in uno," without the slightest care, either in the composition or revision. We would rather put him in the class to which Horace consigned himself, "raro et perpaucalloquentis." This is in poetry, for his prose essays and works are innumerable as the leaves of Vallombrosa, and in one of his autobiographies he acknowledges, that some of them are superior to any of his verses,—a truth he does not much relish.

It might be expected, that in poems extending over so many years, there would be observable a great difference in style and manner,—but this is scarcely the case. After his "Juvenilia"*

* We will say no more concerning this production. Considering it as poetry, it is beneath criticism, and we will only quote his own remarks on it (Autobiography prefixed to Descent of Liberty, p. 4.) "My verses were my own, but not my will. The pieces were written with sufficient imitative enthusiasm, but that is all. I had read Gray, and I must write something like Gray; I admired Collins, and I must write something like Collins; I adored Spenser, and I must write a long allegorical poem, filled with 'na's,' 'whom's' and personifications like Spenser." This is some time elapsed before he published any thing more in a poetical form, and during that time he appears to have formed that system of poetry to which he has since adhered. This system is, in reality, a kind of cockney variety of Wordsworth's, enriched with an admixture of the faults of the old English poets, and pedantic allusions to the ancients, particularly the Greeks. It can readily be seen, that such a plan would materially injure the effect of the highest genius, and it is therefore not surprising that it destroys the little with which Leigh Hunt has been blessed.

This system is more particularly carried out in "The Story of Rimini" than in any other of his poems, and as that is at once the most ambitious and the best of his productions we will examine it more particularly as an exemplification of his merits and demerits. The story itself is excellently adapted for the purposes of the poet; it has great capabilities, and the little episode which Dante has made of it in his Commedia Divina, touched, as it is, with the hand of a master, is considered as the most beautiful passage in that great poem. Hunt's production is in parts quite good, and sometimes rises to the pathetic, but his "system" is continually interposing itself between him and his better poetry and injuring the effect of his most striking passages.

The poem opens with the description of a fine spring morning—one of the best of which he can boast, for he is not usually very felicitous when speaking of nature.

"The sun is up, and 'tis a morn of May Round old Ravenna's clear-shown towers and bay.
A morn, the loveliest which the year has seen,
Last of the spring, yet fresh with all its green;
For a warm eve, and gentle rains at night,
Have left a sparkling welcome for the light,
And there's a crystal clearness all about;
The leaves are sharp, the distant hills look out;
A balmy briskness comes upon the breeze;
The smoke goes dancing from the cottage trees;
And when you listen you may hear a coil
Of bubbling springs about the grassy soil;
And all the scene in short,—sky, earth and sea,
Breathes like a bright-eyed face that laughs out openly."

Now this is really quite pretty, notwithstanding the faults of style, and the air of jauntiness and smartness which pervades it. These blemishes, however, it has in common with the whole poem, and, indeed, is remarkably free from them, considering that it was written by Hunt.

Our author then proceeds to describe the scene in Ravenna where Guido, the Prince, is awaiting the coming of "bold Giovanni, Lord of Rimini," to whom his fair daughter is to be married. There is a very long description of the gorgeous train of perfectly true, (except that the poems are not exactly like Gray's, Collins' and Spenser's), and no doubt, if he lives forty years longer, he will have as just an idea of his subsequent efforts.

the expected bridegroom—we extract a few lines as a specimen.

"With various earnestness the crowd admire
Horsemen and horse, the motion and the attire.
Some watch as they go by, the riders' faces,
Looking composure, and their knightly graces;
The life, the carelessness, the sudden heed,
The body curving to the rearing steed,
The patting hand that best preserves the check
And makes the quarrel up with a proud neck.
The thigh broad pressed, with spanning palm upon it,
And the jerked feather swaling in the bonnet.

Others the horses and their pride explore,
Their jauntiness behind and strength before;
The flowing back, firm chest and fetlocks clean,
The branching veins, ridging the glossy lean,
The mane hung sleekly, the projecting eye
That to the stander near looks awfully,
The finished head, in its compactness free,
Small, and o'erarching to the bended knee.
The start and snatch as if they felt the comb,
With mouths that fling about the creamy foam,
The snorting turbulence, the nod, the champing,
The shift, the tossing, and the fiery tramping."

We have no doubt that Mr. Hunt considered this labored passage as a most vigorous piece of description, but we doubt whether he will be able to find any one of his opinion. What, for instance, are we to think of "the riders' faces

Looking composure, and their knightly graces."

And who ever heard of "the jauntiness behind" of a horse, while certainly a "flowing back" would render him very unfit for the saddle. Altogether, who that ever knew any thing about a horse would pretend to describe one of the above fashion? It is just what might be expected from a cockney, who about once in five years enjoys the opportunity of seeing one out of harness. As to the diction, any remarks of ours would but injure the happy effect which it must produce on the reader. A couplet like

"The flowing back, firm chest, and fetlocks clean.
The branching veins, ridging the glossy lean,"

Or

"The thigh broad pressed, with spanning palm upon it,
And the jerked feather, swaling in the bonnet,"

is enough to condemn the whole batch of cockney poets to the shades.

But to proceed. The train passes on, and at last, while Guido and his fair daughter Francesca are anxiously looking for the bridegroom from the balcony of the palace, a voice

"exclaims, 'the prince! now—now!'
And, on a milk-white courser like the air
A glorious figure springs into the square."

The author does not stop to inform us why the prince's courser was like the air, (probably because the next line ends with "square,") but goes on to say that Francesca falls in love, at sight, with this "glorious figure," which she of course deems to be her husband—but her father has been too cunning for her. Extremely anxious to have the match take place, and knowing that "She had stout notions on the marrying score,"

he has had recourse to artifice. Giovanni di Rimini is a stern and bold warrior, but little used to the niceties of female intercourse, and, through the advice of Guido he has sent his brother Paulo to marry Francesca by proxy, and conduct her to Rimini. She, believing Paulo to be her destined husband, gives her consent, and finds her mistake too late to retract it. Paulo is entangled by her beauty, and thus, in the first Canto, we have enough seeds of misery for the other three.

The second Canto is occupied in detailing these various intrigues, and in describing the bride's journey home. From this we can extract but two lines.

"plashy pools, with rushes,
About whose sides the swarming insects fry,
Opening with noisome din as they go by."

The third Canto naïvely commences, after the following silly and egotistical fashion.

"Now why must I disturb a dream of bliss,
Or bring cold sorrow 'twixt the wedded kiss!
Sad is the strain with which I cheer my long
And caged hours, and try my native tongue.
Now, too, while rains autumnal, as I sing,
Wash the dull bars, chilling my sicklied wing,
And all the climate presses on my sense,
But thoughts it furnishes of things far hence,
And leafy dreams affords me, and a feeling,
Which I should else disdain, tear-dipped and healing," &c.

We suppose that as Milton deploras his blindness and his having "fallen on evil days," Hunt presumed that he might bemoan his two years' imprisonment, and the cold rains of Autumn which "washed the dull bars." As might be expected, such a mistake carries its own punishment with it.

He then draws the portraits of the brothers, Paulo and Giovanni. The latter is excellent as a character, and is only spoilt by the low and vulgar language used.

"Bold, handsome, able if he chose to please,
Punctual and right in common offices,
He lost the sight of conduct's only worth,
The scattering smiles of this uneasy earth,
And, on the strength of virtues of small weight,
Claimed towards himself the exercise of great.
He kept no reckoning of his sweets and sour;—
He'd hold a sullen countenance for hours,
And then, if pleased to cheer himself a space,
Look for the immediate rapture in your face,
And wonder that a cloud could still be there.
How small soever when his own was fair."

Of course Francesca finds it difficult to love this unengaging husband, being already smitten with his engaging brother. She sees all the affections and attentions, with which she endeavors to conquer the unlawful love, thrown back upon her, and yet still she strives.

"And did she chance at times like these to hear
Her husband's footsteps, she would haste the more,
And with a double smile open the door,
And ask him, after all his morning's doing,
How his new soldiers pleased him in reviewing,
Or if the boar was slain which he had been pursuing," &c.

In the meanwhile, the situation of Paulo was scarcely more to be envied. For some time he was unconscious of his love, and the description of his self-deceit is admirably true to nature, with the same faults of language and expression. Thus they remain for awhile, each hour attaching them more strongly to each other, and opening their eyes to their true state, till, one fatal afternoon, they were reading the old tale of Launcelot—

"And Paulo, by degrees gently embraced,
With one permitted arm her lovely waist,
And both their cheeks, like peaches on a tree,
Leaned with a touch together thrillingly;
And o'er the book they hung, and nothing said,
And every lingering page grew longer as they read.
As thus they sat, and felt with leaps of heart
Their color change, they came upon the part
Where fond Geneura, with her flame long nursed, Smiled upon Launcelot when he kissed her first.
That touch at last through every fibre slid;
And Paulo turned, scarce knowing what he did,
Only he felt he could no more dissemble,
And kissed her lovely lips, all in a tremble.
Sad were those hearts, and sweet was that long kiss.
Sacred be love from sight whate'er it is.
The world was all forgot, the struggle o'er,
Desperate the joy. That day they read no more."

There is so much that is beautiful in the foregoing passage, that we have not the heart to criticize its faults as they deserve, even the "all in a tremble," and we have only to regret the slight vulgarity of the concluding lines. Hunt had better have kept still closer to Dante.

Giovanni soon discovers the intercourse between his brother and wife by her talking in a dream. He immediately rises and forces Paulo to follow him to the tilt-yard, where they fight; when Paulo throws himself on his brother's sword and expires. His death is beautifully told, but Giovanni mourns over him in stuff like this—

"I trust we reap at last as well as plough;—
But there, meantime, my brother, liest thou;
And Paulo, thou wert the completest knight,
That ever rode with banner to the fight;
And thou wert the most beautiful to see,
That ever came in press of chivalry;
And, for a sinful man, thou wert the best,
That ever for his friend put spear in rest;
And thou wert the most meek and cordial,
That ever among ladies eat in hall;
And thou wert still, for all that bosom gored,
The kindest man that ever struck with sword."

Francesca dies on hearing of Paulo's end. According to his last request, they are both buried together at Ravenna, and the poem concludes thus,

"They say that when Duke Guido saw them come
He clasped his hands, and, looking round the room,
Lost his old wits forever. From the morrow
None saw him after. But no more of sorrow.
On that same night, those lovers silently
Were buried in one grave, under a tree.
There, hand in hand, and side by side they lay,
In the green ground;—and on fine nights in May Young hearts betrothed used to go there to pray."

The faults and beauties of the poem can easily be seen from the above extracts. The story is well developed and well told, and some of the scenes and characters are described with a fidelity which shows Hunt to be a man of some observation in his own small sphere, though they are all so common-place, that they prove him to have had no conception of a character beyond the most ordinary kind. But all the good points of the poem are more than overbalanced by the low poverty of the language, the occasional vulgarity of the ideas and the extreme harshness of the versification.

As respects language, he observes in his preface, "the proper language of poetry is, in fact, nothing different from that of real life, and depends for its dignity upon the strength and sentiment of what it speaks. It is only adding a musical modulation to what a fine understanding might really utter in the midst of its griefs or enjoyments." We do not intend to dispute this point, which has been so often debated, or to repeat the arguments in favor of it, which have been already urged ad nauseam, and refuted ad misericordiam, but will only say that, granting the truth of Mr. Hunt's proposition, he will still be convicted. He not only uses common but vulgar language, which certainly no "fine understanding" would use under any circumstances; and he commits the glaring error of not varying or rising with his subject. A man under the influence of his passions of course speaks in a more elevated manner than when his mind is in a state of repose; but Hunt, writing in a forced style, is unable to catch even these common distinctions, and describes a fine spring morning in language as good, or better, than the scene of high wrought interest where Paulo—

"could no more dissemble,
But kissed her lovely lips all in a tremble."

It is really pitiable to be so completely brought down by the folly of the author as one must be by such expressions; and they are frequent, occurring on almost every page. Thus, what can we say, when told that Duke Guido on hearing of his daughter's death,

"looking round the room Lost his old wits for ever,"

or the information that the Princess Francesca

— "had stout notions on the marrying score?"

and the lament of Giovanni over the dead body of his brother comes like a cold shower-bath upon one's feelings, really moved by his untimely fate. It tempts us to throw down the book in disgust at the man who has so lessened himself.

But it is not only in using low and vulgar phrases that his language is bad. As Wilson says, he is "re del Cocknio Parnaso," and Bow-bell is heard through all the notes of his hand-organ. The passages that we have quoted above bear ample evidence of this. If more is wanted, his use of the words "neat," "nice," and "fine" would be sufficient to convict him in any court in Christendom. Nearly every thing of which he approves has one of these adjectives liberally bestowed on it, and frequently in places where none but a cockney would use them; but "fine" is his chief favorite,—we meet with it on almost every page.

"Some of the finest warriors of the court."

"Never was nobler finish of fine sight."

"Reaching, with stately step, at the fine air."

"With orange, whose warm leaves so finely suit," &c.

and in the "Descent of Liberty," he dignifies a good old man with the title of "fine old Eunomus!"

But, as if all this were not sufficient to destroy the effect of any language ever written, his style has to suffer still further degradation from his use of old and obsolete words, manufactured phrases, and out of the way terminations. This arises in a great measure from his admiration of the Elizabethan poets and his scorn of Pope and his school. Spenser is his great favorite, and, in adopting the faults of his versification, without its beauties, and in catching up an occasional word from him, Hunt no doubt, in the inmost recesses of his little heart, imagined that he was becoming, not a parodist, but a rival.

Thus, we are continually meeting passages like the following from Rimini—

"And the far ships, lifting their veils of light
Like joyful hands, come up with scatterly light,
Come gleaming up, true to the whiffed-for day,
And chase the whistling brine, and swirl into the bay."

These adjectives like "scatterly" he is very fond of, and is continually manufacturing them when there is a halt in the metre to be filled up. Thus we have "shiny peace," "a sphery strain," "springy-strengthened," "winy globes," "pillowy fields," "clumpy bays," "knify way," "pillowy place," "grapy coats," "pinkly lashes," "sweepy shape," &c., and one of his sonnets commences

"A steeple issuing from a leafy rise—
With farmy fields in front and sloping green."

Another favorite crutch to assist the gouty feet of his measure is the termination "ness;" "leafiness" and "lightsomeness," he is very partial to, and uses them continually, with "sunniness," "floweriness," "beamingness," "gladsomeness," "rosiness," "surfy massiveness," &c., &c. Then we are constantly meeting with "sidelong," as "sidelong deck," "sidelong eye," "sidelong hips," (these we can partially understand, but what does he mean by "sidelong meekness!"—and "sleek," as "sleek sea," "the mane hung sleekly," or,

"For as the rack came sleeking on, one fell
With rain, into a dell,
Breaking with scatter of a thousand notes,
Like twangling pearl; and I perceived how she,
Who loosed it with her hand, pressed kneadingly,
As though it had been wine in grapy coats,
And out it gushed with that enchanting sound,
Like a wet shower to the ground."

Nymphs.

Pray, did Mr. Hunt ever see a dry shower of rain?

Sometimes these conceited and outré words produce a most ludicrous effect. A long poem called "The Nymphs," in "Foliage," is full of them. Thus,

"There lie they lulled by little whiffing tones
Of rills among the stones,
Or by the rounder murmur, glib and flush,
Of the escaping gush," &c.

Or,

"And there the Hamadryads are, their sisters,
Simpler crown-twisters,
Who of some favorite tree, in some sweet spot,
Make home, and leave it not,
Until the ignorant axe downs its fine head,
And then the nymph is fled."

Or,

"And now I find whose are the laughs and stirrings
That make the delicate birds dart so in whisks and whirrings."

Or,

"And hey! what's this? The walls, look,
Are wrinkling as a skin does,
And now they're bent
To a silken tent.
And there are crystal windows;
And look! there's a balloon above
Round and bright as the moon above!"

But it is not only in expressions that we have to find fault with him, but frequently also in ideas. There is nothing, in any of his poetical works, really immoral or licentious,* but there is frequently

* We have frequently been amused by the straightlaced morality of the Tory critics who abused Hunt as the defender of evil passions in "Rimini," while they praised to the utmost "Parasina," a story very similar in general outline. Not that we would for a moment institute a comparison between them, but surely, if the former is calculated to do harm, the infinite beauty of the latter would only heighten its powers of evil.

a cockneyish vulgarity about him, especially when speaking of women, which is truly disgusting.

For instance, how appropriate such passages as the following are, in a serious poem!

"And for the poet, when he goes to hide him,
From the town's sight, and for the lass beside him."

But, when he gets among the nymphs, he lets his fancy run riot,

— "some upward eyed
Feeling the sky, and some with sidelong hips
O'er which the surface of the water slips."

It is not easy to understand the size of these ladies who were engaged in "feeling the sky" while reclining on the surface of the ocean.

Again—

"some in the water sporting
With sides half swelling out, and looks of courting."

Or,

— "another only shewed
On the far side a foot and leg that glowed,
Under the cloud; a sweeping back another,
Turning her from us, like a suckling mother;
The next a side, lifting her arms to tie
Her locks into a flowing knot; and she
That followed her, a smooth down-arching thigh
Tapering with tremulous mass internally," &c., &c.

But enough and too much of this; we might pardon the downright vulgarity of these descriptions if they were in the least degree necessary to the conduct of a poem, and there are things fifty times worse in nearly all of our "classics," but these are entirely gratuitous—merely introduced for their own sweet sakes, and to gratify the susceptible feelings of the author.

It is time now that we should turn to Mr. Hunt's versification and harmony, a point on which he professes to have bestowed great attention, and to be able to teach like a master. He holds in utter abhorrence Pope and all subsequent poets, down to Rogers and Crabbe; he allows some credit to Dryden, but he evidently and conscientiously believes that, since the days of Shakespeare and Spenser, no one has in reality been able to write an heroic line, with the exception of little Leigh Hunt. The fault he finds with Pope is the cant of the time in which he wrote—that of too much sameness, and a melody too unvaried. This, and the modest opinion of his own powers are not advanced in one place, or in two, but they are fixed ideas and as immutable in his mind as his system and style. On reference to the copious extracts made from "Rimini," (entirely at random with respect to the versification,) the reader will see what kind of irregular jangling metre he would substitute for the smooth and easy flow of Pope's lines. We submit a few more specimens, taken almost without examination from the same poem, as proofs of his sense of both rhythm and harmony, and they are such as may be found on every page without searching:

"A little rainy, and towards night-fall chill."

"Society her sense, reading her books, Music her voice, every sweet thing her looks."

"Each by a blooming boy lightsomely led."

"Some with a drag, dangling from the cap's crest."

"Some turning a trim waist, or o'er the flow
Of crimson cloths hanging an arm of snow."

"Of snortings proud, and clinking furniture."

"As to a friend appreciated at sight."

"My master bade me say then," resumed he,
'That he spoke firmly when he told it me.'"

"Firmly to speak, and you firmly to hear."

"That he was forced this day, whether or no."

These three last examples, by the way, occur within the space of five lines!

These lines might be considered as very indifferent prose, but being presented to us as poetry, they could scarcely be excused in a poetaster with six months' practice. In an old rhymist like Hunt, who is continually enlightening the world on the subject, and abusing his superiors for being better than he, they are ludicrously unpardonable. But it is part of his "system," and he therefore perseveres in it to the destruction of the little pleasure left his reader by his style and manner; though he modestly informs us in his preface that in writing thus, he is merely doing what Chaucer and Shakespeare did!

One of Hunt's most remarkable productions is his little collection of poems entitled "Foliage." The said "Foliage" is, with the true diffidence of genius, divided into "Greenwoods," or original poems, and "Evergreens," or translations. Byron once pronounced the volume "the most monstrous centaur ever begotten by Self-Esteem upon a Nightmare;" but this, we presume, was in one of those fits of morosity during which he used to abuse every one for the pleasure of saying the hardest things he could. The main features of the work in question, according to the author, (see preface,) are "a love of sociality, of the country, and of the fine imagination of the Greeks." The latter is evinced in the translations, of which more anon. As to love of the country, with a man like Hunt, that means a place like his favorite Hampstead, where you have brick and mortar round you, and all the delights and conveniences of a suburb to a great city, but in reality no country. He does not understand the country, as passages already quoted will abundantly testify, though he is continually prattling about it, and occasionally breaking out into fits of enthusiasm, such as evinced in the following charming couplet—

"The two divinest things this world has got,
A lovely woman in a rural spot!"

With regard to the "love of sociality," his claims to that are chiefly founded on his epistles to various friends. A few lines from one to Hazlitt will be quite sufficient as a sample. He is describing a visit in anticipation.

"Then have Mozart touched on our bottle's completion,
Or one of your fav'rite trim ballads venetian :—
Then up for a walk, before tea, down a valley,
And so to come back through a leafy walled alley,
In which the sun peeping, as into a chamber,
Looks gold on the leaves, turning some to sheer amber;
Then tea made by one, who, although my wife she be,
If Jove were to drink it, would soon be his Hebe,
Then silence a little,—a creeping twilight,—
Then an egg for your supper, with lettuces white,
And a moon and friend's arm to go home with at night."

Now this exactly fulfils a cockneys idea of "love of sociality" in which the "bottle," the "tea," the "egg" and "lettuces white" are a necessary ingredient, and if Hazlitt was able to resist an invitation containing so glowing a picture of dinner and supper, not to forget the tea, he must have been made of as stern stuff as Jeremy Bentham himself, who never stirred out of his house. At all events, Hunt appears to relish it very much, for he gives us twelve or fifteen pages of similar nonsense, of which the above is a rather favorable specimen, revealing a number of secrets in the household economy of Mrs. Hunt and himself. But whenever he attempts to be light and sportive, he misses it sadly. Take for instance the opening lines of a long address to a musical box.

"Hallo!—what!—where?—what can it be
That strikes up so deliciously?
I never in my life—what, no!
That little tin-box playing so?
It really seemed as if a sprite
Had struck among us swift as light,

• • •
Touching out, smooth, clear and small,
Harmony, and shake and all,
Now upon the treble lingering,
Dancing now as if 'twere fingering,
And at last, upon the close,
Coming with genteel repose."

And here is a part of a long ode upon his son. It should have entitled him to the laureateship.

"Ah! little ranting Johnny,
For ever blithe and bonny,
And singing nonny, bonny,
With hat just thrupon upon ye;—

• • •
Sir Richard, too, you rattler,
So christened in the Tatler,
My Bacchus in his glory,
My little cor-di-fiori,

My tricksome Puck, my Robin,
Who in and out come bobbing,
As full of feints and frolic as
That fibbing rogue Autolycus,
And play the graceless robber on Your graver brother Oberon,— Ah Dick, ah Dolce-riso,
How can you, can you be so?

• • •
And when we home must jog, you
Shall ride my back, you rogue, you,
Your hat adorned with fine leaves,
Horse-chesnut, oak, and vine-leaves,
And so, with green o'er head, John,
Shall whistle home to bed, John."

This is certainly a very pleasing exhibition of paternal fondness and partiality, and proves the author to be a very respectable and affectionate papa, though he does complain of his offspring's

"getting me expenses
By losing balls o'er fences," yet we can not, in our moral blindness, see the propriety of publishing three pages of such balderdash to prove it.

In a very different strain are some lines to a son on a sick bed. Simple description of natural feeling is sure to please, and on reading these verses we are ready to excuse the numerous faults of expression, and to regret the "system" which has induced him to incur them. We had intended to have extracted the whole piece, but are already exceeding our limits, and must be content with a few stanzas.

"Sleep breathes at last from out thee,
My little, patient Boy,
And balmy rest about thee
Smooths off the day's annoy.
I sit me down and think
Of all thy winning ways,
Yet almost wish, with sudden shrink
That I had less to praise.

Thy sidelong pillowed meekness,
Thy thanks to all that aid,
Thy heart, in pain and weakness,
Of fancied faults afraid,
The little gentle hand
That wipes thy quiet tears,
These, these are things that may demand
Dread memories for years.

• • •
To say "he has departed,"
"His voice"—"his face"—"is gone,"
To feel impatient-hearted
Yet feel we must bear on;
Ah! I could not endure
The whisper of such woe
Unless I felt this sleep ensue—
That it will not be so."

With respect to Mr. Hunt's appreciation of "the fine imagination of the Greeks," we think it not impossible that he may do so, in himself, but, most certainly, nothing that he has ever written would tempt one for a moment to believe it.

Take for instance the following passage from Homer. He says, in his preface, that his translations from the Iliad are an experiment to render the Maonian with as much energy as possible. As usual, he makes his favorite mistake of adopting vulgarity for vigor.

Priam, in lamenting the death of Hector, addresses his surviving sons thus,

"Off with a plague, you scandalous multitude,
Convicted knaves, have you not groans enough
At home that thus you come oppressing me?
Or am I mocked, because Saturnian Jove
Has smitten me and taken my best boy?
But ye shall feel yourselves, for ye will be Much easier for the Greeks to rage among Now he is gone; but I, before I see
That time, and Troy laid waste and trampled on Shall have gone down into the darksome house."

So saying, with his stick he drove them off
And they went out, the old man urged them so.

"— Be quicker, do, and help me, evil children,
Down-looking set! Would ye had all been killed,
Instead of Hector at the ships! oh me!
Cursed creature that I am! I had brave sons,
Here in wide Troy, and now I can not say
That one is left me. Mestor like a God,
And Troilus my fine-hearted charioteer,
And Hector, who, for mortal, was a god,
For he seemed born, not of a mortal man,
But of a god; yet Mars has swept them all;
And none but these convicted knaves are left me,
Liars and dancers, excellent time-beaters,
Notorious pilferers of lambs and goats!
*Why don't ye get the chariot ready and set
The things upon it here, that we may go?*"

It is really difficult to understand the mental obliquity which could so degrade this noble passage, and then flatter itself for its "vigor." Yet, after such an attempt he has the audacity to turn round and remark that "Pope, in that elegant mistake of his, in two volumes octavo, called Homer's Iliad, turns the Dodonean oak of his original into smooth little toys." We are no great admirers of Pope's Homer, yet we would not degrade it by naming it in the same day with Hunt's travesties of some of the finest passages in the Iliad. If we were to follow out his elegant meta-

* We suspect that while Mr. Hunt was cogitating upon this last couplet, during a rural walk near Hampstead, he overheard some retired cheesmonger, about to take a jaunt, rating his servants for laziness, and using the same words

"Why don't ye get the buggy ready and set
These here things upon it, that we may go?"

This being what "a fine understanding might utter in the midst of its griefs and enjoyments," the happy inspiration seized him, he added "musical modulation" to it, and the couplet now stands out in bold relief,—a miracle of art happily combined with nature.

phor given above, we might truly say that his Hampstead lathe manufactures it all into Tunbridge kitchen ware.

His love of the fine imagination of the Greeks has led him to parody several idylls of Theocritus, some of the odes of Anacreon, &c., and we can only say that they are worthy of the passage above quoted. He then descends to the Latin, and favors us with some translations from Catullus, and we can see that he evidently thinks well of his powers as a translator, from his attempting the two most difficult pieces in that not easy author—the "Atys" and the imitably beautiful Epithalamium of Julia and Manlius (Hunt terms it "refreshing"!!!) As might be expected, these are complete failures. The opening lines of the latter will serve as an ample specimen.

"O Divine Urania's son,
Haunter of Mount Helicon,
Thou that mak'st the virgin go
To the man, for all her no,
Hymen Hymenæus O;
Slip thy snowy feet in socks," &c.

What would Catullus think of himself if he could see his most charming poem so vilified? If he and Hunt should happen to meet in the Elysian fields, we fear it may go hard with the latter. Certainly, in the whole range of English poetry, from Chaucer to Tennyson, there is no couplet any where which can be compared for mingled force and elegance, to

"thou who mak'st the virgin go
To the man, for all her no,"

to say nothing of its melodiousness; or to the tavern direction of

"Slip thy snowy feet in socks."

Hunt must have imagined Manlius to have been an inn-keeper, and that Hymen was a guest desirous of getting to bed.

He is also a "trim sonneteer." We have sonnets to his wife, and to his friends, to grasshoppers and other such small deer, and sonnets descriptive, and meditative, and two on being crowned with ivy by Keats, and three on receiving a lock of Milton's hair from "——, M. D." We extract one of these to show how he succeeds in this most difficult of all species of writing.

"I felt my spirit leap, and look on thee,
Through my changed color with glad grateful stare,
When, after showing us this glorious hair,
Thou didst turn short, and bending pleasantly,
With gracious hand gav'st the great lock to me,
An honoring gift, indeed! which I will wear
About me, while I breathe this strenuous air,
Which nursed his Apollonian tresses free,
I'll wear it, not as my inherited due,
(For there is one, who, had he kept his art,
For freedom still, nor left her for the crew

Of lucky slaves, in his misgiving heart,
I would have begged thy leave to give it to,) Yet not without some claims, though far apart."

Comment would but injure the effect of this delightfully anticlimactic effusion, which proves the author to be most blissfully ignorant of the laws which govern the true sonnet. The chief sentiment that it excites in us is that of wonder how the author's spirit could leap and look through his changed color, and how Southey could manage to survive the vital thrust aimed at him in that long parenthesis, even if he escaped the deleterious effects of having "a crew of lucky slaves in his misgiving heart."

In one of the early numbers of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ," Wilson has a most savage review of a poem which he states to be by Hunt, in imitation of Pomfret's "Choice." As we have never been able to meet with this in any of the collective editions of his poems, we presume that it must have appeared in some magazine or newspaper, and that the author felt afterwards very properly ashamed of it. If we recollect aright, it commenced somewhat after this fashion—

"I have been reading Pomfret's 'Choice' this spring,
A pretty kind of sort of kind of thing,
And yet, I know not; there is skill in pies,
In raising crusts, as well as galleries," &c.

It may, however, very likely, be but an outrageous hoax of Wilson's, who had talent and impudence sufficient for any thing of that nature. Had it been attributed to any one else, we should reject it without hesitation, but there is really no knowing of what absurdity such a man as Hunt may not be guilty.

Since the date of the "Foliage" Hunt has published very little in verse. Some eight or ten years since he brought forth "The Legend of Florence," a drama, which was favorably reviewed at the time. It contains fewer faults of language and expression than his former pieces, but the characters are unnatural, and the plot devoid of interest. A year or two ago, he published some little metrical tales. These we have been unable to procure, but as far as we could judge from copious extracts given in a favorable critique of the time, he had retained his former style, and his "system" was still an incubus which weighed him down, and like Sinbad's old man of the sea, could not be shaken off.

In taking a general view of Leigh Hunt and his poems, we would say that he was a man with the materials for a moderately good poet, destroyed by attempting too much. He looked around and saw that all the chief poets of the age were forming schools for themselves, and writing each after his own genius, no longer recognizing any one as a model or as a master. There was Byron on one path, Shelley on another, Wordsworth on a third, Scott on a fourth, with Moore, Coleridge, Campbell and Southey, each after his own fashion. It therefore naturally occurred to him that, in order to rival these successfully, it was necessary for him to form a separate track of his own, and having no very decided genius to show him the way, he chose that which he deemed would best suit the spirit of criticism which was then arising. In this manner he formed his "system," and instead of modestly confining his genius to what it was suited for, he has been ever since pushing it into ambitious attempts, and aspiring to sit in the chair of the master. Like the frog in the fable, he has been aping the ox, and though his overstrained skin may never have burst, still it has been in such a ludicrous state of distention, that its own small but not inelegant proportions have been completely disguised. It is only when he is least ambitious that he is pleasing.

His talent lies principally in the delineation of common characters, such as he could see around him any day in London or in his dearly beloved Hampstead, but of any thing beyond the most every day walk of life he has not the most distant idea. If, however, he were satisfied with this, he might have acquired some real and lasting reputation by confining himself in poetry to subjects such as Miss Austin has treated in prose, or by descriptions of natural feeling, such as the lines to a Sick Son, quoted above; but this is too low a pursuit for his ambition. He is continually attempting higher themes, but the cloven foot shows itself through all, and he can never divest himself of his cockney accent. Thus, in Rimini, a poem which gives opportunity for the highest and most exquisite delineation of character, there is not a personage who might not be found in nine houses out of ten throughout London. Were this intentional, it might be excused, though it would plead sadly against his taste, but he is evidently striving to render them more exalted, and, with such a mind as his,

"ceratis, ope Dædalei, Nititur pennis."

The mixture of finery and vulgarity produced by this is continually annoying.

In the Legend of Florence he takes a still bolder flight, and, resolved to shake off the trammels of the common-place, he soars into the impossible. The heroine is all goodness, self-devotion and meekness; the hero, one of those fiery, self-denying lovers, such as one meets with in sixth-rate novels and no where else; while the jealous husband, the necessary villain of the piece, is character such as the world ne'er saw; without loving his wife, he is ferociously and unaccountably jealous of her, ready to slaughter her, or to scold her on the slightest provocation, and yet mild and amiable to every one else. Altogether it is a tissue of absurdities.

With respect to his versification, nothing can be said that will be too harsh, nor any thing that can be harsher than it is itself. He is continually censuring all the poets of the eighteenth century for their smoothness and harmony, and giving us to understand that he alone understands the true laws of rhythm and melody, while, in the numerous and copious passages that we have quoted, the reader can scarcely find half a dozen really melodious lines; his ear, indeed, seems to have been singularly defective, and what he wanted in knowledge he made up in assumption. He even seems ignorant of the fundamental law, that the further in the line that we place a misaccentuation the more glaring it becomes, for, when he wishes to relieve us from the pains of regular versification, he usually substitutes a trochee for the iambus of the fourth foot, in the heroic line. In one place, he compares Pope and the subsequent poets to a church-bell, where the Elizabethan men represent the organ. If this be the case, he may truly be likened to a set of pan-pipes, emulating the latter, but without the regular fulness and power of the one, or the varying and spirit-moving harmony of the other.

Another thing which militates strongly against Hunt's taking a high rank as a poet, is his want of imagination. He seems to be aware of this himself, and to have generally endeavored to get on without it. The only pieces of any length in which he has endeavored to exercise any play of imagination are the "Descent of Liberty," "Feast of the Poets," and "The Nymphs," and these, at least in our humble opinion, are utter failures. To this constitutional coldness we may also attribute his inability to project himself into the characters of his story, a power so necessary to the success of a great poet. When we take up one of Byron's poems, we see that he identified himself, for the time being, with the character which he was describing, and that he felt the same passions, griefs and triumphs which he was depicting. This is the true secret of success, and without it, it is impossible to awaken the interest and sympathies of the reader. Shelley's Revolt of Islam, though beautiful as a poem, and full of the most exquisite passages, never thoroughly arrests the attention, while his unpretending Rosalina and Helen, or magnificent "Cenci" moves the deepest recesses of the spirit. The poet must feel, or seem to feel what he is writing, and he will then write in earnest. This is the art beyond all art of which Hunt was totally ignorant.

We began with the intention of only considering Hunt's poetical works, or we should certainly venture some remarks upon that miserable book, triply born of monstrous egotism, sickly vanity and envious hatred—the "Notices of Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries." The true secret of Hunt's course in respect to this book, we think, lies in a nut-shell. Byron's vanity, and Hunt's intense self-esteem and egotism could not, of course, coalesce, and Byron's powerful mind naturally bore down the weak one of his companion. To such a man as Hunt, this would take the form of a positive injury, aggravated by his brooding over it, and by the sense of real benefits received from the injurer. This feeling long rankled in his mind, growing stronger and stronger each day, until it finally burst forth in mingled froth and venom in the volume mentioned, after the removal by the death of Byron of the barrier which kept it in. The chief curiosity in the book, however, is the "Notices of the Author's Life," appended to it. Hunt seems to have felt the same reverence towards himself that Boswell did for Johnson, and accordingly he, "Boswells" himself most completely, relating every little anecdote of his infancy, his boyhood and his maturer years, and giving copious portraits and anecdotes of his ancestors, relations, friends and schoolmates, with their acquaintances, servants and tutors. The English language may challenge the world to produce such another biography—the only one that has a chance of rivalling it is Goëthé's, with its tiresome portrait galleries. That of Hunt is interesting in one point of view, at least, as it enables the observer to trace out all the small passions and motives of his little soul; indeed, he frequently does this himself, and anatomizes and lays bare his petty feelings with a candor quite remarkable. Rather than have nothing to say of himself, he would say ill.

We suspect that, notwithstanding his unpleasant literary course, Leigh Hunt has always been a happy man. He is a good husband and father, (if we take his own word for it,) and a pleasant friend where his vanity is not concerned. His views of life are singularly just and cheerful, much more so than we should expect in one with the bitter experience he has had. We can not resist quoting a few lines from the preface to "Foliage" as a good instance of his way of thinking, and of the execrable style of his prose. "For my part, though the world as I found it, and the circumstances which connected me with its habits have formerly given me no small portion of sorrow, some of it of no ordinary kind, my creed, I confess, is not only hopeful, but cheerful; and I would pick the best parts out of other creeds too, sure that I was right in what I believed, or chose to fancy, in proportion as I did honor to the beauty of nature and spread cheerfulness and a sense of justice among my fellow creatures."

How few are there who, after the continual attacks which Leigh Hunt had borne, could have given utterance to such a sentiment!

THE FORSAKEN.

BY ANNA M. HIRST.

They tell me, in the giddy crowd
 No laugh is half so loud as thine,
 And that the homage of the proud
 Is frequent at thy shrine—
 That mid the dance, and in the song,
 And where the red wine freely flows,
 Thy step is light, thy voice is strong,
 Thy cheek with pleasure glows.

They tell me beauty smiles to hear
 The magic music of thy tongue;
 That, when thou singest, the votive tear
 Falleth from old and young—
 They tell me this and smile to see
 My heaving breast and heavy eye,
 Though well they know that loving thee,
 I love until I die.

Well, go thy way; and never wake
 The feeblest memory of me,
 To wring thy worthless heart—I break
 Thy chains and set thee free.
 Thou! to thy mirth! I, to my gloom!
 Health to the coldest of the twain!
 The fennel draught be mine, the doom
 Of those who love in vain.

LINES, WRITTEN AFTER SICKNESS.

BY MRS. E. J. KAMES.

I.

I bless Thee, O my God!
 That from the shadowy path of sickness thou hast led
 My faltering feet once more, tho' with slow step to tread
 The haunts so long untrod.
 That thou hast suffered, these clouded eyes again
 To rest with Hope renew'd, on nature's green domain:
 That yet there is a spell in balmy breeze and bough,
 To still the throbbing veins upon this aching brow—
 That the soft summer sod
 And all its loving flowers, a welcome seem to give,
 So to my trembling touch they cling, and bid me live;
 I bless Thee, O my God!

II.

I bless Thee, O my God!
 That thou hast lifted up this weary head, long bow'd,
 And shone upon me through the stormy trouble-cloud—
 That thy chastizing rod
 Hath to deep lowliness subdued this soul of mine—
 That sorrow's "long still work" hath drawn me to thy shrine.
 Hence thou the murmurs of my erring heart hast still'd,
 And with a Sabbath calm my fainting life-pulse fill'd—
 That from its dim abode,
 (Whate'er the trials of my earthly lot shall be,)
 My Spirit may go forth, and find its strength in Thee—
 I bless Thee, O my God!

ANSWER TO "FAIR PLAY."

To the Editor of the Sou. Lit. Messenger.

SIR:—Having just received by your welcome Messenger for August "Fair Play's" reply to "a Subaltern," and believing that even he has made some mistakes in the statement of the Augusta Arsenal case, I send you herewith a short history of that affair, which I will substantiate by documents.

On the 1st of April, 1843, the company of Artillery in question arrived at Augusta Arsenal, Georgia, and its Captain assumed command thereof, by virtue of General Order, No 21 of 1843, which was issued at Washington on the 8th of March of the same year; and which, previous to being issued, was laid before the Honorable J. C. Spencer, then Secretary of War, for his consideration and approval, both of which he gave to it. On the 14th of March, 1843, the Acting Chief of the Ordnance Corps remonstrated against the above order, in a letter, addressed to the authority issuing it, which said letter was also laid before the Honorable Secretary of War, J. M. Porter, and was returned with the following endorsement thereon—viz:

"General Worth will be required to detain the company of Artillery destined to Augusta Arsenal, till the necessary arrangement of the Ordnance Bureau can be made for removing the Ordnance officer and discharge of the hired men, when he will leave there a store-keeper and two or three ordnance men to assist in the care of the arms. The store-keeper and his men will have quarters, so as not to interfere with the company, or be liable to exclusion or charge."

The above endorsement was sent to the Acting Chief of the Ordnance Corps, with the following instructions in a letter from the proper officer, dated Washington, March 17th, 1843—viz:

"Orders having been dispatched to detain the company at St. Augustine until the arrangement referred to has been made, you will please give all the necessary orders and instructions conformably with the Secretary of War's endorsement, and report, for the information of the Commanding General, when the arrangement is completed, which it is supposed will be within a few weeks."

With the view of giving the Ordnance Department a chance to carry out the above instructions, and with the expectation of returning to their quarters in "a few weeks," the company of Artillery evacuated the post on the 17th of May, 1843, and took up lodgings in an old dilapidated farmhouse outside the military post; after which, the following state of things presented itself—viz: To the east of the Arsenal and about a mile off, (I am thus particular to gratify my friend "Fair Play"), was quartered the Captain of the company; towards the south-east, and about three quarters of a mile off, was stationed the Assistant Surgeon; and to the north, and about half a mile off, were stationed the subalterns and the body of the company, there not being sufficient quarters in its immediate vicinity for the Captain and Surgeon. All these separately hired buildings. Instead of the troops returning to their proper public quarters in a "few weeks," as was ordered, this state of things continued all summer, and in the fall, the Captain had to give up his quarters and crowd himself, subalterns, men, and all, into the same building, which had formerly been used to accommodate, as a summer residence, one family; and some correct idea can be formed of its value, when I inform you, that the rent paid for it was only one hundred dollars a year, and such was its shattered condition, that this rent had, according to agreement, to be expended in repairing the house before it could be made habitable at all; whilst the public building occupied by the subaltern of Ordnance, cost the Government eleven thousand dollars, the legal interest on which, in Georgia, would be eight hundred and eighty dollars. Thus we have a subaltern of Ordnance, luxuriating in quarters at nearly nine hundred dollars a year, whilst a senior Captain of Artillery, three subalterns, and a whole company, are furnished at the rate of one hundred; yet "Fair Play" can not see the odious distinction referred to by "a Subaltern."

In August or September, 1843, the Mayor and City Council of Augusta petitioned the Secretary of War to have the company restored to their proper quarters in the Arsenal, but finding that this had no effect, they sent on a petition to the President of the United States, signed by themselves and about four hundred respectable citizens of Augusta and its vicinity, praying the President to remove the company from its uncomfortable quarters and to put them in the Arsenal. This petition was sent to Washington early in December, 1843, and on the 21st of the same month the President granted their prayer by giving directions for the whole company of Artillery in question, to be ordered back into Augusta Arsenal. These instructions of the President lay dormant somewhere in the War Department, not having reached the proper promulgating authority until the 5th of January, 1844, at which time an order came out from the Honorable Secretary of War, J. M. Porter, a mutilation of the one above referred to, by which the company of Artillery was divided, one half of it sent into the Arsenal under a Subaltern, who was junior to the "generous, courteous, magnanimous above all praise, and gallant" subaltern of Ordnance; thereby securing to this gallant young soldier the command of this military post, with the additional benefit of its being made a double ration one, by this very accession of troops; whilst the senior Captain of Artillery was forced to dismember his company, and with a moiety of it proceed to a distant post in North Carolina, which can scarcely furnish comfortable accommodation for one company, much less for one and a half, its present garrison.

But let me return to the instructions of the President given on the 21st of December, 1843; and ask "Fair Play" if unofficial intelligence of these instructions did not reach Augusta Arsenal, Georgia, on or about the 26th of December, 1843, and if it were not after this time, and about a month or six weeks from the time of their having signed this petition, that some fifteen of the four hundred who had signed said petition, "withdrew their signatures by letter;" and who it was? that thus, and about this time, "made known and explained to them the operation" of said petition; and finally, if it were not upon the reception of these asked for, counter letters, that the Honorable Secretary of War, J. M. Porter, changed the President's instructions of the 21st December.

A "hired guard" of fifteen men was established at Augusta Arsenal, in the spring of 1841, to protect the public property therein deposited, because a company of Artillery could not then, as formerly, be spared from the field for this purpose, (see letter of the chief, I mean senior officer, of the Ordnance Department, dated Washington, March 24th, 1841); and although this was a species of soldiery not known to the laws of our country, yet the exigencies of the service at that time required its employment. But did not this necessity cease to exist after the arrival of the company at the post? and if so, as was most undoubtedly the case, why were not these men at that time discharged, as we have seen above was directed by the Honorable Secretary of War? But so far from this having been done, we find by the following extract, taken from the letter of remonstrance of the Acting Chief of the Ordnance Corps, that these hired men had increased to twenty-five—viz: "The force now at the post consists of one officer and seven ordnance men, and twenty-five hired persons, making in all thirty-three; a night guard or watch is maintained, and it is believed that the safety of the stores is assured by the means adopted and pursued for some time past."

For the nine months, commencing with April 1st, 1843, the day on which the company of Artillery first took up its quarters within the walls of the Arsenal, to the 31st of December of the same year, the amount, for wages alone, paid to these hired men, was six thousand one hundred and sixty-three dollars, and forty-one cents, of public money: which for the year, at this rate, would make eight thousand two hundred and four dollars and fifty-four cents; to say nothing of all the incidental expenses connected with the purchase of timber, metals, paints, tools, &c., &c., necessary to keep up this show of the mechanic operations which are nominally expected to be going on at this post—I say nominally, for in reality, there is little or nothing done here of a public constructive nature, and indeed I think it would puzzle "Fair Play," and even the "gallant, generous and magnanimous" Lieutenant himself, to point out half a dozen gun carriages or other implements of war, that have been constructed at this Arsenal since his stay there. It is true, that in 1842, some ten thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress for the repair of the public quarters, and the erection of a "timber-shed" and "gun-house" at this Arsenal, but so utterly unnecessary as a store-house, for guns, was this latter building, that it was, soon after its erection, converted into a stable and carriage-house, and used for these purposes by the Lieutenant of Ordnance, though borne on the official returns of the post as a "timber-shed" and "gun-house." Report says too, that of these ten thousand dollars, thus appropriated, six thousand were expended on the individual quarters of the Commanding Lieutenant, and the other four on this "timber-shed" and "gun-house," leaving the men's Barracks very much in want of repairs. Should we be misinformed on this head, perhaps "Fair Play" can set us right.

"Fair Play" makes quite a to-do about the important error of "a Subaltern," in stating that the company was quartered three miles, instead of half a mile off; but it would naturally strike one as an additional argument against his cause, for had the company of soldiers been three miles off, there might have been some shadow of excuses for keeping this "hired guard" still in service at the Arsenal. The company, however, being "scarce half a mile off," how can "Fair Play" justify the enormous abuse of keeping in the employment of Government, at an expense of nearly ten thousand dollars a year, this heterogeneous soldiery, unauthorised by the laws of the country; against the instructions of the President; against the orders of the Honorable J. C. Spencer, who was well acquainted with the duties of the Department of War; against the first and unbiased orders of the Honorable J. M. Porter, Secretary of War; and against the reiterated orders of the Commander-in-Chief, on the authority of these two Honorable Secretaries of War!

"Fair Play," says, speaking of the Head of the Ordnance Bureau, "He earnestly urged upon the Secretary of War the impropriety and inexpediency of the occupation of the Arsenal by the company intended as its garrison;" and "he stated the utter insufficiency of quarters to accommodate, both those employed in the public service for Ordnance purposes, then at the Arsenal, and the additional force not yet arrived."

Now, as to the propriety and inexpediency of the measure, I must beg leave to appeal from the opinion of "Fair Play" to the repeated applications of the Mayor and City Council of Augusta; to petitions signed by large numbers of the most respectable and enlightened inhabitants of the place; to the repeated efforts of distinguished senators and other members of Congress from Georgia, for the last six years, to have a company of troops stationed at this military post. I appeal to the opinion of a late distinguished Secretary of War, the Honorable J. R. Poinsett, who, seeing the importance of having a company at this post, promised the civil authorities of Augusta, that as soon as the exigencies of the service in Florida would permit, he would withdraw a company from that quarter for this station; to the gallant Commander-in-Chief of the Army; to the two Lieutenant Colonels of Artillery, under whose immediate auspices and care this military post was established; and indeed to every enlightened officer of the Army do I appeal for the propriety and expediency of the measure; and I would appeal to the clear and discriminating mind of a certain "Acting Chief," one "whose standing, during thirty years service, has been above reproach," were it not that the similarity of names has led me to suspect a relationship between this officer and the Lieutenant of Ordnance, whom "Fair Play" represents as the personification of a "courtesy and magnanimity, above all praise." But I must carry my appeal a little further, from older and enlightened heads, to older and enlightened nations, and endeavor to light our path by the lamp of experience. Does England trust large collections of arms and munitions of war to the safe keeping of a handful of mechanics? Does France? or in fact, do we find any of the old and experienced governments thus lax in their duty to the peaceful communities, amongst whom they have established their depots of Arms? It may be said that the cases are not analogous; that we are a peaceful people. 'Tis true we are a peaceful people, and peace should be, as it always is, the polar star of our policy; but we are nevertheless human nature, and subject to its outbreaks, as the recent unfortunate circumstances in a neighboring city, but too clearly show. Near to this city is an United States Arsenal, and like that of Augusta, is made the repository of military stores; and previous to these riots was not supplied with a garrison of soldiers, but it was found necessary to send near a hundred miles for a company of Artillery to guard these stores herein deposited.

To show the utter fallacy of the objection on the score of insufficiency of quarters, it is but necessary to state the fact, that from the time the post was established up to the time the troops were withdrawn for service in Florida, its regular garrison was never less than one company, and, that for nearly a year, it accommodated from two to five companies. During this time too, there was much more duty of an Ordnance nature to be performed than at present, but instead of hiring men at as enormous cost to government, the Major of the line, then in command there, was in the habit of making a monthly detail of eighteen or twenty men from his Artillery soldiers to perform these duties.

Some fifteen years back when the Ordnance was amalgamated with the Artillery, and before this, and some of the other staff corps became such a burden and expense to the Army, it was customary to make periodical changes in the posts of Regiments, in order to promote the health of the officers and soldiers; and there was no difficulty about funds to carry out this most desirable object. But now, a regiment which has served through three Indian wars, the Cherokee, Creek and Seminole, has been three times depopulated and re-reunited, and can not now number on parade half a dozen officers, or a dozen of the old soldiers who first followed its colors to the field in the recent Indian disturbances, many having died from the fevers of Florida, and many having left from weariness at being forced to dwell, year after year, under a tropical sun, with the utterly hopeless prospect of ever being again permitted to breathe a cool and bracing air; this regiment, which has been for nearly ten years in the South, can not be moved for want of funds. Yet we see, literally thrown away at a "secondary Arsenal," some ten thousand dollars a year, which would be more than sufficient to move half a dozen regiments of the present strength. In the British service, this system of change is rigidly observed, and when a regiment is sent to an unhealthy or undesirable locality, they are buoyed up with the certainty that the fostering hand of government will, at the end of a stated period, extend to them this benevolent and salutary justice. But look how different is the course pursued towards this particular company of Artillery in question. It was stationed in the interior of East Florida before the Seminole war; in 1835, while marching from Tampa Bay to Fort King under the lamented Major Dade, was totally destroyed, every officer and man; it was recruited and continued to serve in Florida, when in 1837, having been very much reduced, it was increased to the legal standard. In the summer of 1838, it marched to the Cherokee country, and after the removal of that tribe returned immediately to Florida.

In 1840, being again reduced to less than a platoon, it was a third time filled up, and continued to serve at one of the most unhealthy posts in the territory, until every officer and man in it was completely prostrated by sickness, and to save it, it was found absolutely necessary to remove it to some more healthy station in the territory. After serving through the Everglade campaigns, it was in the spring of 1842, sent to New Orleans, but in the course of the same summer was ordered back to Florida, where it remained till the spring of 1843; and the Florida war being over, it was to be hoped that some respite would have been given to it; but lo! and behold! it has scarcely taken post at Augusta Arsenal, before it is again cast out, as it were, into an old out of the way house, where, besides the discomfort of the thing, it was very difficult to keep up that proper discipline, which is so easy to maintain within the walls of a military post. Add to this the humiliation which its officers were called upon to suffer, in seeing their military pride thus sacrificed to the aggrandizement of one who had left this very same regiment while it was yet serving in the field, almost destitute of officers; for in 1837, as many as two and three companies were under a single Lieutenant, and he a junior to our "magnanimous" youth.

I have not referred to the regiment in question, nor to the "courteous" Lieutenant, with the view of giving any peculiar credit to the one, or detracting from the other, for they have but done their duty, and that is expected of every officer and soldier, however high his rank or low his station; or however "magnanimous" or degraded; but to exemplify some of the many abuses which have crept into our little Army, and to show how injuriously they operate upon the well being of the "Army proper," have I laid these things before your numerous readers.

VERITAS.

"WOMAN, THY PLACE IS BEHIND THE THRONE."

Lines suggested.

Go to the plains of Shinar, "great" Nineveh stands there,
With spire, dome and minaret, high battling in the air,—
Look on the proudest city that ever graced the earth,
And ask the magic power that brought it into birth—
And hark! the clarion voice of fame,
The welkin rings with woman's name.

Go to the merchant city—mistress of the sea,
The rival of imperial Rome, the haughty and the free,
Ye search the annals of the past, and scan the roll of fame,
And 'mong its blazoned heroes seek the lordly founder's name—
But mark the vessel's foaming track,
And woman's name is echoed back.

Go ask the flying Xerxes, the recreant and the knave,
What means the sinking galleys on Salamin's red wave—
And where the glit'ring myriads that covered land and sea,
And mindful, at their master's word, so late did bend the knee—
Alas! had woman's voice a place,
They had not lain in death's embrace.

Go ask the lordly Briton, glorying in his birth,
Who deems his own lov'd Albion the pole star of the earth;
Ask of its culmination, Britannia's golden age,
When fairest in the galaxy, it shone on History's page—
And lo! the brightest hwo seen
Circles round the "Virgin queen."

Go ask the mighty hero, but now the exile lone,
Bound in his gloomy, sea girl home, "unnoticed and unknown"—

Ask when his star of glory sank from its zenith height,
And mantled in dark, gloomy clouds, refused its pristine light—

And list;—a voice floats o'er the main,
And woman's name blends with the strain.

And shall the "haughty whisker'd Russ" forget his peasant queen?

And deep in Lethe's turbid tide, shall Scotia plunge her sheen?

Ay, women, modern lore now bids thee abdicate the throne,
Behind it is thy fitter place, stand there and there alone—

No scept' red away awaits thee now,
No regal gem shall deck thy brow.

Yes, back—nor lift thine eyes to the "cloud capt tower" of fame:

No herald from its battlement proclaims thy lowly name—
And tho' upon the altar the laurel wreath may be,

Back, alas, poor woman! 'tis bright, but not for thee.

Then learn before his majesty,

To veil the face and bend the knee.

THE COLONIAL HISTORY OF VIRGINIA.

TO THE LEGISLATURE OF VIRGINIA.

In appealing to you in behalf of the History of our State, we need offer, we trust, no other justification than the importance and dignity of the subject, and the obvious relation it bears to your offices as the guardians of the State, and to your interest and duty in preserving and perpetuating her public character.

Nothing so nearly touches the honor of a State as the due preservation of her historic archives. Deplorable indeed would be the lot of that people, who felt no pride or exultation in its past! What just cause for the indulgence of these feelings Virginians have, they best know who are best acquainted with the remaining fragments of her history. These, too, most deplore the loss of her records and would risk and expend most for their restoration. But surely, there is no need of enlarging upon the importance, or the charms of this fruitful subject, to your Honorable body, who yourselves in such great degree, stamp her character upon the State, and by your acts, as it were, manufacture her history. Should any chasm now occur in your proceedings, you would doubtless lose no time in repairing it. In former times, such breaches were made, and though they have remained so long an insuperable and distressing impediment to those who would explore the history of the Colony, it is believed that they may now be almost entirely closed, at comparatively little expense, by the efforts of your honorable body.

The mode of accomplishing this great and most desirable object has been open for many years; but the recent success of some States has now removed every obstacle that might have once existed, and invites all others to make similar attempts.

Whilst the unavoidable neglect of an unsettled and perplexed Government, aided by time, fire and devastation, was consuming our colonial records here, copies of them were carefully preserved in the Public offices of England; and there is every reason to believe, that an inspection of those records there will dissipate the thickest clouds that hang over our colonial era. By the Liberality of the English Government, they are laid open to the accredited agents of the States, and copies of them allowed to be taken. Of this privilege, New-York, Georgia and North Carolina in part, have already availed themselves, and their labors have prepared the way and led to arrangements, which will greatly facilitate the investigations of any who may follow their example. New-York has sent out a special agent who has probably just returned, bringing with him documents that will create a wide sensation. Georgia, too, sent a special agent, and has now in the charge of her Historical Society, twenty-two M.S. volumes of important colonial documents. She has also a gentleman engaged in writing her history, and with a most praiseworthy liberality has expended some six thousand dollars in procuring the materials, though only for the short period of forty odd years! Our blessed mother was more than a hundred years old, when Georgia was born; and shall the first, not only in date of settlement, but in fame and in importance, be so far surpassed by the youngest of the "old thirteen!" For the object proposed the provision of so great a State as Virginia, who has so much to expect from the undertaking and such just cause of pride in her past career, should be ample and liberal; but it is highly probable that she can procure every thing desirable at far less cost than Georgia did. Let her appoint a competent agent and send him forth with ample means to execute the work well, that it may be a monument for future times.

Though North Carolina made a move in this matter as far back as 1827, she has not yet derived any real benefit from it, though she knows precisely the nature and value of the papers relating to herself. They were all registered and the list sent home to her, in accordance with a request made by her Governor, of Hon. Albert Gallatin, our minister at the Court of St. James. Their very titles alone constitute an octavo pamphlet of 120 printed pages. The faculty of the University of North Carolina have now organized themselves into an Historical Society, and may do something towards procuring copies of those documents, thus catalogued for her.

South Carolina has her volumes of historical collections recently made by Mr. Carroll, but she too may be anxious to enjoy the stores in the offices of England. The two Carolinas might empower the agent appointed by Virginia to act for them; or if they prefer it, send out special agents of their own.

May not the hope be indulged, that your honorable body will so favorably regard the proposition herein most respectfully submitted, as to lose no time in reaping the fruits now offered to us? Due diligence would soon place us in possession of the rich treasures that now lie mouldering abroad; every delay but encourages the ravages of Time.

It is our object at this time only to broach this interesting subject, to which we shall recur in our next number. In the meantime, we invite a correspondence from all who feel any interest in the matter, and earnestly commend the revival of the late Virginia Historical Society, that it may exert its salutary influence in behalf of the present and other useful undertakings. It is our purpose to lay some of the letters that may be addressed to us upon this subject, before our readers; and we would be particularly glad to have the views of some of the leading members of the Legislature, of course without regard to party.

13 JB. Minor

THE SOCIETY OF ALUMNI OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE SOCIETY OF ALUMNI OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA. On the 4th of July, 1844. BY FRANKLIN MINOR.

It is not too late, we trust, to notice this excellent address, whose perusal has in a great degree compensated us for the loss we sustained in not being able to mingle with our brethren, at their last meeting. We were with them in spirit, and deeply regretted our inability to add another to their number. We look upon the Society of Alumni as yet destined to exert a happy influence not only upon the fame and usefulness of their "Alma Mater," but also upon the cause of Education in this and other States. This may require time, but they may even now begin to "sow in hope." Mr. Minor's address is far above the rank of such productions generally, and he was judicious in abandoning the vague declamation and unprofitable generalities of such occasions, and discussing some tangible question, useful in its application. His subject, "National and individual honor," was highly appropriate and illustrated with ability, force and beauty. The distinction between "glory" and "honor" is well drawn, and nations and individuals earnestly persuaded to seek glory only in the paths of honor. We thank him also for enforcing the great truth that Religion is the only basis of National happiness and prosperity.

Though prevented from meeting our brethren around the family altar and sharing their worship, their joys and their labors, we rejoiced in the opportunity soon afterwards of bowing at the dear old shrine. A tide of delightful reminiscences flowed in, as we revisited the scenes of former labors, pleasures and emulous struggles. The improvements about the University, the substantial enclosure, and above all the convenient Chappel were eminently gratifying. We do devoutly hope, that the visitors and her Alumni will make her welfare an object of their chief solicitude and exertion; that her faculty may soon be complete and efficient, and her halls filled to overflowing with gifted youths ambitious of virtue and knowledge. With her endowment, the distinguished auspices under which she was founded, and the extent and splendor of her accommodations, her career should be conspicuous, and a source of pride to all her sons.

DESULTORY NOTES ON DESULTORY READING.

Literary Remains of Willis Gaylord Clark; Guide to Laurel Hill Cemetery; Grave-Yards in Towns; "Melisinda," a poem, a specimen of fine writing; The Prince de Joinville's Note on the State of the French Navy; Navy of the United States; The Pride of the Nation; The Estimated value of Science; Warming Dwellings by Hot Water; Effects Produced by Breathing Air Heated by Stoves, Illustrated; Jeaffreson on Diseases of the Eye.

The tomb is a great sanctifier of men's good works; it obliterates the minor blemishes and asperities which belong, to a greater or less extent, to poor human nature. The works of an author are often enhanced by his death, especially if he die young, while yet a promising but unblown bud; his works are read without jealousy, or envy, or rivalry, for who can experience an emotion of jealousy, or envy, or rivalry, connected with the offspring, or outpourings of a soul that has gone from our midst. Those who have a bias towards the perusal of "Literary Remains" will read with pleasure the "Literary Remains of the Late Willis Gaylord Clark," alias, the pleasant Ollapod. Alas! Clark has gone! The gentle, the affectionate, the pure-minded aspirant of earthly honors, and yet the pious, cheerful Christian. We knew him; and admired the sprightly simplicity of tone which characterized his well-stored intellect. There is a beauty, a charm about this collection of Clark's writings, enhancing their value, perhaps even above their intrinsic literary merit. It is derived from the vein of affection running through the whole of his works; and then there is something touching in the fact that a twin brother shows his strong love for the departed by bringing together the scattered pieces of prose and verse of one who died too young,—for the pleasure of others and his own solid fame. "Death, the pale messenger, has beckoned him silently away; and the spirit which kindled with so many elevated thoughts; which explored the chambers of human affection, and awakened so many warm sympathies, has ascended to mansions of eternal repose." He has obeyed the law of nature, and he has been fortunate to have kindled affections to record his obedience and weep aloud for his departure. How many obey this law and leave none to note their entrance to the tomb, or point out the good they have done to their fellow men! We thank thee, Lewis, most heartily and sincerely for publishing this volume.

GUIDE TO LAUREL HILL CEMETERY.—A beautiful volume of royal octavo size, containing 180 pages, elegantly printed and illustrated by many excellent wood cuts and well-executed lithographs. Besides descriptions and views of many monuments, and a history of Laurel Hill Cemetery, it contains a history of the group of statuary, by Thorne, of "old mortality," his pony and Walter Scott. There is also a selection of various articles in prose and verse relating to the Cemetery. We learn that the mortal remains of the following distinguished persons repose at Laurel Hill. GONFRET, the inventor of the Quadrant; General HUGH MERCER of Fredericksburg, Va., who was killed in the battle of Princeton; CHARLES THOMPSON, the first, and long the confidential Secretary of the Continental Congress; COMMODORE HULL; COMMODORE MURRAY; M. MORGAN, M. D. a surgeon in the Navy, distinguished by his public services and great private worth; JOSEPH S. LEWIS, the originator of the Fairmount water works; JULIUS R. FRIEDLANDER, Principal of the Pennsylvania institution of the Blind from its foundation; JOHN VAUGHAN, whom every body knew; and ADAM WALDIE the publisher of the well known "circulating Library." The list of lot holders includes at least a thousand names, among whom are many of the distinguished citizens of Philadelphia. Already we have the tombs of great men in politics, in the Army, Navy, science, philanthropy and usefulness; and not many years hence Laurel Hill will be a place of pilgrimage almost, to visit the sepulchres of the great and good of our land. It is a place to be proud of not only by Philadelphia, but by the whole country, and he who devised and put into execution its plan deserves the thanks of his fellow citizens. It is a lovely spot, and the time will come when Pere la Chaise will not compare favorably with Laurel Hill. The author of the "Guide" has afforded a beautiful illustration of what Laurel Hill is, and all those whose affections have a sad remembrance there will be grateful for the work.

It is now pretty well settled that burial places in large towns are deleterious to the living. We find this subject mentioned by Edwin Chadwick in his "Report on the sanitary condition of the laboring population of Great Britain." He states, (see Medical Examiner of Philadelphia,) a remarkable circumstance:

"A bird fancier who lived near Clare Market, London, in a situation particularly exposed to the combined effluvia from a slaughter house and tripe factory, found he could not rear his birds in this place. Birds fresh from the country would die in a week. He had previously lived in the same neighborhood in a room over a crowded burial ground in Portugal street; at times in the morning he had seen a mist rise from the ground, and the smell was offensive. That place was equally offensive to his birds. On removing to another situation not exposed to such emanations, he was again able to raise birds."

The inference is plain, and there are strong reasons which might be urged in favor of extra-urban cemeteries, independent of the influences exerted by the gaseous matters escaping from grave-yards into the atmosphere breathed by the living.

MELZINGA; A SOUVENIR BY C. A. D.—New-York, 1845. A small gilt edge volume in pale sulphur colored paper binding. This volume is the product of an elderly lady of fortune, who has been sorely afflicted by two very distressing maladies, from which she never can recover in all human probability. She evidently has the cacoethes scribendi very badly, which has been superinduced by a very lasting affection not easy to name or describe. The character of the disease, however, so closely resembles that known under the vulgar expression, "troubled with the fools," that a sagacious person would find great difficulty in distinguishing them.

Whether the authoress has children or not we do not know, but to judge from this literary effort we should set her down as one fitted "to suckle fools and chronicle small beer." The volume contains some contributions from J. Q. Adams, E. Everett and L. M. Sargent, which are not exactly poetic byjoux. As a favorable specimen of the lady's poetic powers, we submit the following:

"No church without a bishop!

No state without a king!

No poet in America

This doleful change to ring:

"Her rivers flow, her mountains rise,

Her valleys swell in sweet surprise.

'Tis the roaring of John Bull I hear,

He fills my mind with wondrous fear,

"That after all his pious care,

His feeble offspring to prepare

For Life's noble duties,

They should pour forth such feeble ditties.

"Brother Jonathan can fight,

But alas, alas, he cannot write—

In the field of battle, alack, alack,

He's often cast the furious bull flat upon his back."

After this specimen it may be well to mention that the book was got up by subscription; no body has published it, and any publisher would have risked too much in such an undertaking, both in fame and fortune. We recommend the lady's friends to watch her carefully and not permit her mind to be exposed again naked to the public. Paper, ink and pen should be kept out of her reach, for with such powers and such a disposition to use them, it is impossible to forestel the deep distress she may bring upon the public, to say nothing of those who become her supporters, by subscription. She ought to be taught that the possession of wealth does not authorize a woman to exhibit her folly to the world of letters. She would do well in future to submit and defer to the opinion of her male literary friends all her own productions before she commits them to the printer.

NOTE SUR L'ETAT DES FORCES NAVALES DE LA FRANCE.—A pamphlet of 40 octavo pages attributed to the Prince de Joinville. The author assumes that in as much as England is the first naval power in the world, and as France is deficient in many essential points in her navy, the British navy should be a criterion for that of the French. He urges that a naval force moved entirely, or at least in part, by steam, is peculiarly adapted to the genius of the French nation, whose commercial marine is too limited to furnish seamen in sufficient numbers for the navy. But in steam ships of war, very few professional sailors comparatively are needed, and at a moment's notice, regiments of soldiers may be embarked to manage the batteries and do the fighting. He condemns the practice of building small vessels under the name of larger; that is, a frigate should mean a vessel say of 50 or 60 guns, and never of 30 or 40, and so of other classes.

He urges too, that when one nation builds vessels of sixty guns called frigates, it is vain for another nation to build frigates of fifty guns to cope with them. England is preparing a large steam force, therefore France ought to build an equally powerful steam navy—may we not ask why the United States should not also make similar preparations.

Our navy is being reduced; ships of the line have been withdrawn from active service, and many if not all frigates are to be laid up, leaving sloops of war as the emblems of our naval force abroad. This our pride may learn to bear, but continue the plan for only a few years, and the navy will have few officers whose experience would give them confidence in the management of a frigate, or ship of the line. A man might be a most admirable seaman in a schooner, brig or sloop of war, whose qualities would fail to bear him out in the management of a large frigate, a ship of the line, or a squadron. I should dislike to trust myself at sea in the Pennsylvania, commanded by a man who had never sailed or served in a ship larger than a sloop of war. Mr. Editor, let some of your nautical correspondents take up the subject and answer me the question; Is it fair to suppose that officers who have obtained their professional education in small vessels only, and who have never disciplined a crew of over two hundred, are able to manage frigates and ships of the line, with crews of 500 and 1000 men, as well as if their professional career had given them experience in large ships? Do merchants ever select to command large packet ships, men who have only sailed in pilot boats and schooners?

What is this nation proud of? What does the nation hold to be above a money value? Is it any art, or science, or superiority, or excellence in any branch of human knowledge? Does the nation feel itself degraded by being under the necessity of sending to Europe for optical instruments, whether telescopes for our observatories, or microscopes for the close observance of organic matter? Is it any reflection upon us that the nautical almanac, essential to the navigator, is produced in England, and we are not yet scientific enough, or what is the same thing, there is not confidence enough among our navigators to trust to the science and printing of a nautical almanack from American hands? Is it any reflection upon our practical knowledge of working iron that English rail road iron is preferred to our own manufacture? Do we trust to American chronometers? Have we ever made a watch from the rough material? Do we encourage men to seek perfection or perfectibility in any sort, or any branch of human knowledge? Is there any proper reward for excellence in any human pursuit offered by this nation or its public opinion? What is the ambition of the nation, the people of the United States? Money making facilities occupy a great deal of our thoughts, and hence it is that, inasmuch as perfection in any art requires long and arduous toil, and as time and labor must be paid for, in some manner, we shrink from the cost of perfection.

We were struck with the value set upon science, in reading, a few days since, a prospectus of a proposed American Steam Navigation Company. To provoke men to buy the stock, an estimate of the cost of building, equipping and sailing an Atlantic steam ship of 2000 tons was stated. The pay of the captain $120 per month, first mate $80, chief engineer $80, third engineer $40, carpenter $25, steward $25, cook $22, and surgeon $40 per month!

Let all young men who aspire to the distinguished honors of surgery and medicine, reflect that their services are worth forty dollars per month, that is, just eighteen dollars more than a cook, fifteen more than a carpenter, and half as much as the superintendent of a steam engine. Is this a sufficient sum to tempt a young man of education and talent to engage in the study of such a science as that of medicine and surgery? Is $480 a year a compensation to tempt a trustworthy surgeon to leave the shore for a sea life? Would any man who can pay $125 for being carried across the Atlantic, be willing to trust his life, in case of necessity, to any surgeon, (so called,) whose knowledge and skill would not be worth more than $480 a year? We hope the passengers would think their lives worth more than such a risk.

The scheme estimates an annual net profit of $102,042. Let us suggest to the company, that out of all this annual profit a salary of $100 a month, with boarding or rations in addition, would be little enough for the services of a surgeon who could be trusted to amputate a limb or set a fracture at sea. We adduce this as an example of the little value set upon science by the people of the United States, as well as the small liberality experienced by medical men at the hands of a money making people. We think too much of money, and on this account the navy is to be permitted to go down to a dozen sloops of war and schooners. It costs so much money to sail frigates and ships of the line.

I repeat the question, what is this nation honestly proud of? Is it not cheap government, and its numerous, great politicians by profession?

HOOD ON WARMING BUILDINGS BY HOT WATER. London, 1837.—The best and most economical means of securing a comfortable temperature in dwellings and public buildings of all kinds is a subject worthy the attention of the inhabitants of a region like that of our middle States. Indeed a great deal has been thought on the subject, and a great many experiments have been made. Many plans have been for a time approved and subsequently rejected or abandoned for improved methods.

The various means of warming buildings for human comfort and protection may be briefly enumerated. The hearth and wood fire, wood stoves of various descriptions; grates for burning bituminous and anthracite coals; stoves for the same kind of fuel; hot-air furnaces or stoves, gas stoves; and the circulation of steam and hot water by means of iron pipes laid through the building to be heated.

Wood fires are cheerful, but too expensive in cities and inappropriate to large apartments. They seem, however, not to exercise any injurious influence upon the atmosphere, and what is of very great importance, they contribute to ventilation. Similar remarks apply to bituminous coals burned in open grates. Anthracite fires in open grates, without the power of warming comfortably in all its extent a large apartment, dry the air to such a degree as to render it exceedingly oppressive to the respiration of many individuals.

The effect of highly heated iron stoves on the atmospheric air is injurious, by robbing it of its moisture, by decomposing a part of it, and by burning various particles always in the atmosphere, as well as the various gaseous matters, constantly escaping from the human body into it. By the heat of the iron these matters are resolved or converted into various gases, which, although in small volume, are more or less prejudicial to the health of those breathing them. The air undergoes a change by passing over intensely heated metallic surfaces, which is one reason, if not the reason, why many persons find apartments heated by hot air as unsupportable as they do the open anthracite fire. The exact nature of this change has not been ascertained; there is little doubt, however, that both its chemical and electrical conditions are different from those of air in the natural state.

As an illustration of the prejudicial influence of the change alluded to, we quote the following, taken by Mr. Hood from the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society—

"A quantity of air which had been made to pass through red-hot iron and brass tubes, was collected in a glass receiver and allowed to cool. A large cat was then plunged into this factitious air, and immediately she fell into convulsions, which, in a minute, appeared to leave her without any signs of life. She was, however, quickly taken out and placed in the fresh air, when, after some time, she began to move her eyes, and, after giving two or three hideous squalls, appeared slowly to recover. But on any person approaching her she made the most violent efforts her exhausted strength would allow to fly at them, inasmuch that in a short time no one could approach her. In about half an hour she recovered and then became as tame as before."

There is very little reason to doubt that a similar effect would have been witnessed had the subject of the experiment been a human being instead of a cat. The sense of tightness across the forehead, giddiness and constraint of respiration experienced by nervous individuals upon entering apartments heated by air, dried by hot iron stoves, or anthracite fires, or furnaces, may be referred to the change alluded to above.

To obviate this difficulty it is only necessary to contrive a stove or heating apparatus which will warm the air of a room to 70° or 75° Fahrenheit, without becoming itself hotter than boiling water or 212° Fahrenheit's thermometer. In very cold weather this can only be done by extending the surface from which the heat is communicated to the air, or in other words, augmenting the size of the stove to dimensions far beyond those now in ordinary use.

The rapid circulation of water at a temperature of from 180° to 200° through iron pipes of from one to four inches in diameter, furnishes perhaps the very best means of obtaining the least objectionable kind of warmth for inhabited apartments. The principle of circulating water is very simple. Cold water is heavier than hot water, and the apparatus is so contrived that the water finds its way back to the boiler in consequence of increasing its weight by losing its warmth. The principle is illustrated on a small scale by the not unfrequent plan of supplying hot water to bath rooms, remote from the kitchen, by means of what is known by the name of "hot water back," placed behind or above the kitchen fire.

In London the hot water apparatus is extensively used in private dwellings. In the United States we see it chiefly in hot-houses, conservatories and some few public establishments. It is particularly well adapted to warming hospitals, asylums for children, prisons, insane establishments, &c., because there is no access to fire, no smoke, nor dust, and the consumption of fuel is considerably less.

There are various plans for employing hot water as a means of heating. One set of plans provide for the circulation by taking advantage of the difference of weight between hot and cold water, and the other plans all circulate the hot water by pressure, procured by heating water to a very high temperature, from 275° to 375° and even 400°, in a hermetically sealed apparatus. This latter plan has many advocates, but is objected to on the ground that it dries the air, is liable to leakage and explosion, and consumes more fuel.

Heating by steam is also practiced to some extent but is liable to similar objections. The sealed apparatus patented by Perkins, is in operation in a part of the New York Custom-House, and is spoken of in terms of high approbation.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE ON DISEASES OF THE EYE.—By William Jeaffreson, &c. 8 vo. p.p. 307. London, 1844.

"Meadows of margin and rivulets of print" on white paper produce a pretty book. Mr. Jeaffreson was surgeon of the Bombay Eye Infirmary in the Hon. East India Company's service, and wrote this volume to show up the results of twenty-five years practice and the treatment of fifty thousand cases of diseases of the eye. He seems to have been highly successful, and much esteemed, for on taking his departure from the Presidency of Bombay, the Parsee and other Indian inhabitants of the city expressed their regret in a complimentary letter, from which we extract the following sentence:

"As a token of our affectionate remembrance and gratitude, we beg your acceptance of a piece of plate of the value of three hundred guineas, which we hope will in after life afford you some pleasure, as having been presented to you by those who appreciated your virtues and had experienced your fostering care."

From such an announcement we expected something rarely excellent, but the work contains scarcely any thing that is not found in similar works, except self-glorification. It will not be republished we guess on this side of the Atlantic.

So much for you Mr. Editor and for your readers. Let them take my hints and save or spend their money accordingly as they deem best. I have endeavored to open their eyes to their interests in a branch of literature, and I trust that not in vain will be the warnings of

THE HONORS OF POESY—TO WOMAN.

Must the warm, beating heart be crushed,

Ere richest odors may be breathed!

Joy's gladsome notes in wo be hushed!

The brow grow pale ere 'tis inwreathed!

Doth grief alone call forth the lay

For which the world entwines the bay!

Look at a Hemans' lonely part!

How sadly, mournfully, each line

Doth tell the deep void of the heart—
Its yearnings ever to intwine
Its weakness round some faithful stem,
For which to earn the diadem.

Look at a Landon! meeting death
In awful and forbidden form,
When she had found her orange wreath
Might not defy a tropic storm;
And this because the heart too long
Had borne the burden lone of song.

Look at a Norton! drop by drop,
Distilling balm from bitterest herb—
Strewn, too, by one whose oath to prop
Grew into purpose to disturb:
A childless mother, in her pain
Dying, resigned, "God doth remain!"

O, dear bought triumph! ask it not,
Ye who in humble peace may dwell!
O be content with your sweet lot,
Nor ask to strike the tuneful shell!
A May-day Queen, for one day long,
Is happier than the Queen of Song!

Notices of New Works.

Our table contains some works deserving a more extended notice, than we shall be able to give them. Oftentimes nothing but an extended review can impart much information as to the contents of a work. Our bibliographical notices are designed to impart a knowledge of the current publications, with some idea of their merits and character; and from the nature of the case must generally be brief.

LEA & BLANCHARD: PHILADELPHIA. 1844.

Have, through Messrs. Drinker and Morris, sent us the following:

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE, EARL OF ORFORD, TO SIR HORACE MANN, his Britannic Majesty's resident at the court of Florence, from 1760 to 1785. Concluding series, 2 vols.

The first volume of these agreeable and instructive letters was issued some months ago, and many of our readers have become acquainted with them, either through that volume, or the English and American notices of the work. The letters to Sir Horace Mann, in the volume before us, extend from 1776 to Sir Horace's death, in 1786. These are followed by letters to George Selwyn, the duke and duchess of Gloucester and the Rev. W. Mason. The volume also contains a Memoir relative to Walpole's income, "short notices" of his life and a description of his villa, Strawberry Hill, which is so frequently mentioned in his correspondence; all of which are by the Earl himself. The letters to Sir Horace Mann contain much interesting information of the times, and very constant notices of our struggle for Independence. Walpole's sentiments were quite liberal and he often speaks freely in condemning the course of England. The style of the letters is familiar and often humorous and readily engages the attention of the reader.

The author is rather minute and prolix, and his letters have hence been compared to the "Annual Register" and "Hansard's Debates."

We commend the work to our readers. It is handsomely gotten up, and bound in cloth.

THE HISTORY OF CHIVALRY, OR KNIGHTHOOD AND ITS TIMES. BY CHARLES MILLS. Author of the History of the Crusades, &c., &c.

This is another work of the valuable "Library of Standard Literature;" and is to be followed by Niebuhr's Rome, Ranke's celebrated Histories of the Popes, the Reformation, and the Ottoman and Spanish Empires, and the works of Proctor, Guizot, Wrazall and others.

We rejoice to see some indication of a revival of chivalry. Our times are sadly deficient in that spirit of gallantry, to which it gave rise, and we are sorely tempted here to indulge in a tirade upon the beaux of the present day. We commend to their selfish natures, the study and practice of chivalry. Especially let them read and ponder on Mr. Mills' chapter upon "Dames and Damsels and Lady-love." When the unfortunate Marie Antoinette fell, Burke eloquently declared that the days of chivalry were gone. Burke was a philosopher and a prophet. The days of chivalry are gone. The beaux of these latter times, (too many of them at least,) have laid aside chivalrous feelings of disinterested gallantry, and given themselves up to a species of genteel loafing and dignified ease-taking. Few pay their devoirs to the fair, but those who are "courting," and too many "court" only to mend their fortunes. "Dames," and a most worthy class of "damsels," politely called "wall flowers," because they are often too sensible for foolish chit chat, or not pretty enough to be flattered, are entirely neglected. Ladies escort themselves about—or take their little brothers, or elderly relatives with them; or send to some well known bachelor friend; whilst the beaux parade in double files and think it honor enough to condescend to talk to the ladies when they meet them, at parties and other places.

Out upon such craven laggards! Can't some Pope seize his pen? Can Salmagundi speak no more? If these gentlemen don't improve their gallantry, they shall feel the denunciations of chivalry, the displeasure of the fair and the bitter invectives of B. B. M. American South.

RELIGIO MEDICI. ITS SEQUEL, CHRISTIAN MORALS. BY SIR THOMAS BROWNE. KT. M. D. With resembling passages from Cowper's Task and a verbal index.

These two works contain a mine of wisdom and truth from which many subsequent writers have dug some of their richest ore. Religio Medici seems to have been one of the favorite companions of the poet Cowper, whose poem, the Task, contains many passages bearing a striking resemblance to parts of it. These are all collected by the Editor at the close of this volume. Sir Thomas evinces much reflection and no little learning; and the perusal of this little volume will exert a good influence upon the mind and character of the attentive reader.

THE KITCHEN AND FRUIT GARDENER, A SELECT MANUAL OF KITCHEN GARDENING AND CULTURE OF FRUITS. The whole adapted to the climate of the United States.

This is a very useful little work, intended as a companion for "The Complete Florist," and the other household volumes, recently issued by the same publishers.

THE CYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL MEDICINE, Edited by Dunglison, has now reached its XI. No. To be completed in 24 parts, 50 cents each. It will constitute a library of itself.

THE MEDICAL STUDENT, OR AIDS TO THE STUDY OF MEDICINE. A revised and modified edition. By ROBLEY DUNGLISON, M. D.

A work well worthy of the careful examination of Medical Students and those who are soon to assemble in this city will do well to procure it from Drinker and Morris.

HARPER & BROTHERS. NEW-YORK, 1844.

PICTORIAL BIBLE. We have received the 7th, 8th and 9th No.'s of this splendid illuminated Edition of the Bible, through Messrs. Randolph & Co., and Drinker & Morris.

THE SPOON. No. 4. From Randolph & Co. This is a very curious book, containing much that it is singular any man should have treasured up. It is attributed in New York to Mr. Eubank, the author of a late very valuable work upon Hydraulics. He is a sort of scientific antiquarian, taking great pleasure in investigations, that would hardly be thought of by another.

A GRAMMAR OF THE GREEK LANGUAGE, principally from the German of Kühner, with selections from Matthiæ, Buttmann, Thiersch and Rost. For the use of schools and colleges. By Charles Anthon, LL. D.

This Grammar comes out under well known, excellent auspices; and seems to supply a hiatus that has been a cause of stumbling to many students of the Greek language. Hitherto, many students have jumped at once from Valpy to Buttmann, or perhaps to Matthiæ. The wide chasm between these has not only been filled up by the work before us, but Prof. Anthon's known judgment and ability have been employed in embodying in it what was most useful in the works of these and other eminent German grammarians. J. W. Randolph & Co. have it.

SCENES, INCIDENTS AND ADVENTURES IN THE PACIFIC OCEAN, or the Islands of the Australasian Seas, during the cruise of the clipper Margaret Oakley, under Captain Benjamin Morrell. Clearing up the mystery which has heretofore surrounded this famous expedition, and containing a full account of the exploration of the Bidera, Papua, Bandor, Mindora, Sooloo and China Seas, the manners and customs of the inhabitants of the islands, and a description of vast regions never before visited by civilized man. BY THOMAS JEFFERSON JACOBS. Illustrated by numerous engravings.

The contents of this volume correspond with the above title. We have seen a notice of it, in which some "old tar" impugned the credibility of its statements. They are truly striking and wonderful, but we have long since learned not to doubt things from their apparent improbability. The most authentic narrations would at once stamp such a course with folly. Still it may be well carefully to canvass the marvellous and the pretended "hitherto unknown." If Mr. Jacobs' accounts be authentic, they are worthy of serious examination. We can only mention a few things that struck us. In the first place he became connected with the expedition by fraud and stealth. Morrell, offended because two agents or supercargoes had been sent out with him, seems too easily to have satisfied himself with his determination to abuse the confidence that had been reposed in him by the outfitters of the expedition; and the author, after all, by no means "clears up the mystery that has surrounded this famous expedition." He expressly abstains from making disclosures; and contents himself with some very general vindications of Morrell—that he was not so bad a man as had been represented. Of what occurred after he left the Oakley, in China, he relates little except her loss. Papua, Bidera, &c. are said to be native names for New Guinea, New Britain, &c. which lie in the Pacific Ocean, just under the equator, and N. E. of New Holland. The explorations of the Oakley also extended out into the circumjacent seas, and to islands said to have been by her first discovered. The manners and customs of the islanders are full of interest. Here we must condemn the course often avowedly pursued towards the natives and the unnecessary effusion of human blood. In some of the islands there were evidences of a considerable progress in Arts, and traditions of valleys inhabited by men in an advanced state of civilization. The author indulges in some speculations as to the settlement of these islands, in connection with the peopling of America. Some of the islanders are said to have been circumcised.

The visit to the English settlements on New Holland is interesting. The English do not occupy the most fertile parts of this Southern Continent, and the attention of colonists is directed towards it. The Australian islands are represented as perfect paradises, the climate being most delicious and salubrious, and nature furnishing a superfluity of the greatest luxuries.

The publishers have well contributed by print, style and embellishment to render the volume attractive.

McCULLOCH'S GAZETTEER. No.'s XVI and XVII, received through Randolph & Co.

We can only slip in the receipt of the following works sent us by Drinker and Morris, just as we were closing for the month. NEAL'S HISTORY OF THE PURITANS. Part VII. SELECT NOVELS No. 3, containing "Tales of Glasper Spa," by Miss Sedgwick, and Messrs. Paulding, Bryant, Sands and Leggett; THE WANDERING JEW, by M. Eugene Sue. No. 2; and KRITH'S LAND OF ISRAEL, with maps and many beautiful embellishments, gotten up in Harper style, and bound in cloth.

WILEY & PUTNAM. NEW-YORK, 1844.

The extensive catalogue of this large house is on our table. Hitherto they have been engaged almost exclusively in the importation of English books, of which they have kept one of the finest and best assortments in this country. We are pleased to learn that they are now turning their attention to publication. They have already made some very neat issues of excellent works; among which is a beautiful illustrated edition of Downing's Landscape Gardening, the theory and practice of which we heartily commend to all of our readers, who can at all afford it.

HEWET'S PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE. Edited by Verplanck.

Our last No.'s of this rich work, up to No. 18, in continuation of Romeo and Juliet, keep up their wonted taste and beauty.

King Lear has since arrived in Royal Style. Vide No.'s 20 and 21.

THE ILLUSTRATED BOOK OF CHRISTIAN BALLADS. Edited by the Rev. Rufus W. Griswold. Lindsay and Blakiston. Philadelphia, 1844. This is one of the richest and most brilliant works of which the American press can boast. As a specimen of typographical embellishment it is of surpassing beauty. It is also illustrated with engravings printed in tints and in Gold; and the ballad gems fully correspond with the elegance of their setting. They are drawn from the greatest variety of authors, and those of the highest excellence. The design of the work, literary and artistical, deserves all praise and the execution is worthy of the design. Call on Drinker & Morris.

THE CHARLESTON BOOK. S. Hart, Sr., an enterprising book-dealer, of Charleston, South Carolina, is about to issue a large and tasteful volume, with the above title. Its design is similar to that of works, heretofore published in the Northern Cities. It will be beautifully gotten up and bound, and will contain choice productions, in prose and verse, by the numerous amateur and professional authors, who have shed such a lustre upon the literary character of Charleston. Our knowledge of many of the contributors and of the proprietor warrants us in promising something rare in the proposed work. The subscription price is only $2.

GERTRUDE; A NOVEL.

CHAPTER III.

Judge N. B. Tucker

At length the day came, as come it must, which had been fixed for Gertrude's departure. But the fate of Empires has depended on the weather; and though the Almanac-maker knows certainly that Saturday will follow Friday, he cannot be sure when rain may follow sunshine. So it was that the dreaded day was one of storm so furious, that none but a madman would leave his home in such weather, except on business of life and death. Gertrude of course remained where she was. Not so Henry. The business of his court was done; and he had retired to his bed the night before, full of the thought that, on the morrow, his beloved Gertrude would leave his father's roof and go forth into new scenes, to form new friendships and to encounter new influences on which his fate might depend. To-morrow he would return, and she his companion, his sweet confiding friend, the beloved of his heart, would not be there to welcome him. There was no anodyne in such fancies, and, in feverish impatience, he revolved the thought, that if the night were long enough, he would yet see her before her departure. Midnight was past, and presently the rain, driven by the wind, came pattering against his window. He looked out upon the night. It was dismal and terrible. But the stern voice of the blast was not uncongenial to his feelings, and he again threw himself on his bed, soothed by the tumult of the elements. He was sinking to sleep, and fancy, mounting her throne of dreams, began, as usual, to mingle her imaginary creations with the realities of the scene. The form, which had indistinctly floated before his waking eye, now became palpable. Gertrude was before him bonneted and cloaked, and the coach was at the door. But the storm would make itself heard by the sleeper; and she seemed to be aware of it too, and she looked up to the clouds, and a smile was on her lip at the thought of spending another day in the home of her youth, and the bonnet was laid aside, and the coach drove empty from the door. He awoke with a start, and sprang to his feet; his horse was ordered, and, tossing a dollar to the ostler, he sprang into the saddle, and soon disappeared in the thick darkness.

The night had again come down. The clouds had disappeared, the stars shone bright, and every thing gave promise of a "glorious morrow." Mr. and Mrs. Austin had retired for the night and Gertrude sat alone in the drawing-room, engaged in one of those pretty occupations which ladies know how to make so graceful and becoming. In short, she was drawing, and as her work grew under her hands, her eye brightened, and a smile of pleasure was on her lip. The sketch was finished; she gazed on it tenderly; then pressed it to her heart, while a tear stole down her cheek. She looked up, and the original stood before her. She screamed with delight, and, yielding to the influence of long habit, threw herself into his arms. In a moment she recovered her self-possession, disengaged herself, and, blushing deeply, resumed her seat on the sofa.

Henry placed himself by her side, and, taking her hand in his, bowed his head upon it, and pressed it to his forehead and his lips. His spirit yearned to prostrate itself before her, and every action spoke its yearning. A deportment so new, surprised, but it reassured her, and, when at length he spoke, her faculties were all under command.

"Dear Gertrude," he said, "how fortunate I am to find you alone! You have not misunderstood what I said to you at parting, and now I come to ask whether your heart has taught you to rejoice that I am not your brother!"

"O, Henry! how can you ask such a question! Rejoice that you are not my brother! No, indeed, for if you were my brother, what more on earth should I have to wish for?"

This was a turn for which he was entirely unprepared; for the coarseness of man's nature does not understand how the love of woman can take such a form. "I do not understand you," said he, "your words seem to sound the knell of my hopes, and yet there is something in them that might awaken hope, though it were dead."

"You do not understand me! Should I not then have a protector? Would not your home be mine? There would be no need that we should ever part, and I am sure that I should never wish to leave you. But now they tell me I must marry somebody, to provide myself a protector and a home."

"And whom, dearest, should you marry, but him from whom you never wish to part?"

"Aye, Henry! But I must not marry you, because we are both poor."

"And is this the only reason?"

"Certainly. What other could there be? Whom is there, besides my mother, that I love half so well? What society affords me so much pleasure as yours! And what more would be necessary to the happiness of my life, than to be always near you? Were you indeed my brother, I should have an answer to all importunities about marriage. I should not want to marry any body. I do not want to marry any body. But they are always telling me that I must marry, and that I must marry a rich man. But there is something horrid in the thought of marrying any man that I do not love, and I cannot see any reason for loving a man just because he is rich."

"God, I thank thee," exclaimed Henry fervently, "for this proof that all my power over the feelings of this noble creature, has left her pure as she came from thy hands! Dear Gertrude, it was not to obtain any pledge from you, that I sought this interview. It was to ascertain the state of your feelings toward me. As yet you do not understand them fully, but I do. You love me, Gertrude, as woman can never love more than one, and with a love that would make it sinful to marry any other. You love me with that love, which God himself implants in the pure heart, and by which he makes them one who were before twain. This is that mysterious union which he forbids man to violate, and while the sentiments you have just avowed, reign in your bosom, none but I can be your husband in His sight. I do not ask you to promise to marry me. I do not ask you to promise not to marry any other man. But, in the name of God, I charge you, never to give your hand to any one whom you do not love with the same hallowed affection you now feel for me. On my part, in the face of High Heaven, I here devote myself to you. Whether I become your husband, or not, for you alone will I live. To your service will I devote all my powers. If my labors can purchase for you all the comforts and enjoyments of life, they shall be yours. If it has pleased God to endow me with faculties, which may make your preference honorable to you, I will exert them to the uttermost in that cause. I will seek distinction. I will win honors and you shall wear them as a garland. I will strive 'To make thee famous, with my pen,

And glorious, with my sword.

I'll serve thee in such noble ways,

As ne'er was done before.

I'll deck and crown thy head with bays,

And love thee more and more.'

And I will die an hundred thousand deaths, ere break the smallest parcel of this vow! God of the just and pure in heart, hear and record it!"

Gertrude was completely borne away by the energy of this language, and the fervor of Henry's manner. She threw herself on his bosom, and then, lifting her streaming eyes to his face, she cried, "and I too on my part."

"No, my Gertrude, make no vow. Let me not now, for the first time, have to reproach myself with having come between you and your duty to your mother. I am willing to trust my hopes of happiness to the constancy of your affection, the purity of your heart, and the soundness of your principles. Should your affections ever fix upon another, it would be as sinful to marry me, as it would now be to marry any one else. Should you ever so change, as to be capable of marrying another, while your heart is mine, my vow will remain on the registry of Heaven, and it shall be fulfilled; but I will see you no more. The glorious being, that I now fold to my bosom, I shall ever wear in my heart; but I shall give no sigh to the polluted wretch that sells herself for gold. Pardon me, dearest," he added, as he felt her shuddering in his arms; "I speak only of that which is impossible. There is nothing sordid in your nature, and all that there may be of elevation in the sentiments I have just uttered, is derived from my communion with you. I have but given voice to the thoughts that lie deep in your heart of hearts. You need no vow to bind you to fulfil its dictates, and the instincts of your nature. From all but these you are free. Remain so. God is with you. He loves the pure in heart. Put your trust in him, and he will protect and guide you."

Gertrude never felt before how deeply and fervently she loved; and, in all the warmth of her innocent heart, she poured forth her tenderness into Henry's bosom, and retired to her chamber the happiest creature upon earth. The delicious mystery of Love was disclosed. The treasures of the heart were unlocked. The fountains of the great deep of bliss were broken up, and she seemed to float on a shoreless Ocean of delight. She now thought of her intended journey, if not without regret, at least with complacency. It presented nothing to awaken hope or apprehension. Go where she might, Henry would be ever present with her, and she with him. She felt as if, with his burning words, his exalted and intrepid spirit had entered into her soul, and become a part of her. She felt that God indeed had made them one, and her heart rejected, as adulterous, any thought which would not have been pardonable, had her faith been plighted at the altar, in the face of Heaven and earth.

In a review of what had passed, Henry saw no thing that it seemed his duty to reveal to his father. He had brought Gertrude under no engagement. He had merely devoted himself to a course of life, and a purpose which others might deem romantic and extravagant, perhaps presumptuous, and there was no need that any other should be admitted to his thoughts, and put in condition to compare his high aspirations with the feeble and unavailing efforts to which they might prompt. His secret was hid in his bosom; and it could only be seen that, from that night, his views were loftier, his purposes more definite, his measures bolder, his spirit more enthusiastic, and his whole character roused to new energy. A force of mind, not before suspected, was developed; and he rushed forward in the career of life with a vigor and rapidity, compared with which his former progress seemed but the measured step with which the racer advances to the starting post.

CHAPTER IV.

A cordial and flattering welcome awaited Gertrude in Washington. Her aunt, Mrs. Pendarvis, perfectly understood the situation and circumstances of Dr. Austin and his family, and was well aware that her sister was desirous that her daughter's career should speedily terminate in marriage to a man of worth and especially of wealth. This wish, so natural and so reasonable, Mrs. Pendarvis saw no reason to condemn, and was happy in an opportunity to aid in its accomplishment by any honorable means. To her therefore, at her own request, had been committed the task of ordering dresses and selecting jewels. In each of these a sumptuary limit had been prescribed, Mrs. Pendarvis claiming, in every particular, the right to transcend it at her own expense, and Mrs. Austin being quite willing that she should do so. Such, in the end, was the result of the magnificent tastes, and benevolent generosity of Mrs. Pendarvis, that Gertrude, who left at home nearly the whole of her simple country attire, found herself suddenly the mistress of a wardrobe splendid beyond her conception. She had never before visited a city; but the intelligent and polished circle in which she moved at home, had made her familiar with all the established forms and maxims of general society.

Naturally graceful, whatever there might be of gaucherie, in her simple manners, seemed to become her. Stocks and posture-masters are for the use of the awkward, corsets, tournaures and pads for the badly formed, and rouge and pearl-powder for those whose complexions need the aid of art. But the beautiful and graceful need no such sophistication, and the cheerful, amiable and intelligent, gifted by nature with acuteness and tact, are at once at home in every society. They conform to its laws as if in obedience to the promptings of instinct; and their accidental departures from usage and convention, are received as improvements on established forms. The laws of society are like grammars and dictionaries of the vernacular tongue, made for the use of those who cannot learn the language without such aid. But the man of genius and taste knows that these works are based on the authorities of writers of the very class to which he belongs, and, without condescending to the instruction of pedagogues, takes his place among those who give the law to language—invents new idioms, and coins new words, and makes mankind his debtor, by giving a voice to thought not heard before. Thus, too, an elegant and accomplished woman places herself above the authority of forms and usages; in departing from them she improves them; she seems to “catch a grace beyond the reach of art” and becomes “the glass of fashion and the mould of form.”

Gertrude Courtney was one of these gifted beings, and the impression she made on the brilliant circle into which she was now introduced, filled her with delighted amazement. She was not—no woman can be—indifferent to such things; and the first time that she retired to her chamber, after a fashionable soirée got up by her aunt to welcome her appearance; as she stood before the glass to remove the ornaments from her jewelled hair, she started at beholding a form of light, that seemed to belong to another sphere. There it stood, robed in the hues of the sky, the cheek glowing with excitement, the lips smiling and parted, as if to utter the thoughts of a beatified spirit, and the eye beaming with unearthly brightness. Could this glorious image be the reflection of herself! She must test the reality of what she saw. She smiled, and the smile was answered. She waved her snowy hand and rounded arm; she parted the ringlets on her sunny brow. The figure did the same, and, in each action, displayed new beauties; she stretched forth her arms as if to embrace the being that seemed rushing to meet her embrace; but the envious glass interposed, and they folded on her bosom in all the rapture of delighted and innocent self-admiration.

In the thoughts of that delicious moment, Henry Austin had no part. In the figure before her, she saw nothing to identify it with the simple country girl, who, but three nights before, had rested her head upon his trusting bosom. Then she thought all of him, and nothing of herself. Now, self was all in all, and he was forgotten.

Scarcely had she laid her head upon her pillow, when this reflection occurred to her, and bitterly did she weep at the thought. She had not been unfaithful to him, even in imagination; but she had forgotten him, and the disparaging comparisons, which she had expected to draw between him and those by whom she was now surrounded, had not been made. She had, in truth, been pleased—delighted. Some of the happiest moments of her life had passed, and no part of her happiness had flowed from him; and no care of his happiness had occupied her mind. She felt guilty, she knew not of what. She was sunk in her own estimation, for the moral reflection of herself, as seen in the stillness of the night, had none of the unearthly beauty of the figure she had beheld in her mirror. She shrunk from the thought of being continually exposed to influences which might change her into a being so different from that her Henry loved; and heartily did she wish that she had not given her promise to ride the next morning with Col. Harlston in his phaeton. But there was no retracting.

Colonel Harlston was a bachelor, in the prime of life, a member of Congress of respectable talents and unquestionable honor, handsome, of a high aristocratic family, agreeable manners and great wealth. His sense of these advantages was manifested no otherwise than by that quiet pride which sits so gracefully on a well bred and modest man, and is the surest indication of essential worth. In his feelings there was nothing mercenary, and the idea of any thing mercenary in affairs of the heart was abhorrent to his principles. He was the last man in the world to think of marrying beneath him, but in estimating the merit of a lady he was not one to take money into the account. In short, he was a man of high honor and great merit, and no mother could desire a more fortunate match for her daughter.

These qualities had already secured to him the friendship of Mrs. Pendarvis, and made him a favorite object of her extensive and elegant hospitality. He made one in all her parties; he had the entrée of her house; as he rose in her esteem her manner towards him daily wore more and more the air of kindness, until he had learned to look upon her as a sincere and valuable friend. In all this she had no views for herself or any other; but when the proposed visit of Gertrude was announced to her, it inevitably happened that she thought of the possibility that he might not be insensible to the charms of her niece. Of these indeed she had heard so much, that such a result seemed quite probable. The great difficulty, as she had learned from Mrs. Austin, was to find one capable of exciting an interest in the mind of the young lady, and she was happy in the thought that her cherished friend, so endowed with the gifts of nature and fortune, might chance to make the desired impression.

The morning came and Gertrude looked in vain in her mirror for the same brilliant figure that had dazzled her eyes the night before. She was paler and her countenance was somewhat sad; but others might have seen, though she saw it not, a softened beauty in her meek and downcast eye, that might belong to that higher realm, where rapture is melted into holy bliss. She selected her simplest apparel; her hair was plainly parted on her brow; and she entered the breakfast-room, with an air so gentle, so modest, so humble, that Col. Harlston, who was already there, felt assured that the charms which had bewitched him the night before were but the least of her attractions. To his eye she seemed formed to realize the beautiful idea of the Scottish maiden, when, after having been bathed in the purifying waters of fairy-land, she returned to earth, freed from all the infirmities and passions of human nature.

In this mood Gertrude felt little interest in the business of the morning and promised herself no pleasure in the fashionable dejeuner, to be followed by a drive of all the assembled company, to see the little that is worth seeing, in that great city of dust and distances. But she rated her pretensions too low, to think that she had a right to yield to all the impulses of her feelings, and to suppose that others were bound to think her very agreeable, or even to bear with her, while doing nothing to contribute to the satisfaction of the party. She readily seconded the efforts of those who tried to rally her spirits, and was so far successful, that, by the time the equipages drove to the door, she had an eye to admire their splendor, and a heart to find pleasure in being whirled along in the most beautiful of old-fashioned vehicles, a phaeton drawn by four superb bays. When placed by Col. Harlston, she felt the propriety of cultivating such a state of feeling as might make her conversation agreeable to him; and thus her own sense of present duty engaged her to keep down those thoughts and sentiments, which, but the night before, she had fondly vowed to cherish at all times and under all imaginable circumstances. Thus it is that women, often placed, by causes over which they have no control, in false positions, are condemned to stifle their deepest convictions, and to disengage themselves for the time from those fixed principles of thought and action, so necessary to consistency, respectability and happiness. In his intercourse with the other sex, man is always the regulator of circumstances, and thus master of himself. He is free to choose his company, his occupations and amusements, all of which, in the case of a young woman, depend on the choice of others. Passive, yielding and accommodating from the necessity of her position, the very excellence of her nature makes her the victim of the artful or inconsiderate measures of those who thus regulate her destiny.

In the conversation of Col. Harlston there was nothing of that rich fund of thought to which Gertrude was accustomed, and which made that of Henry at once interesting and instructive. Had it been so, it might have justified a more favorable opinion of him, but it might also more frequently have reminded her of the friend that was away, thus provoking comparisons, which partiality would not have failed to make disadvantageous to her companion. Had there been any thing to awaken tender and romantic sentiments, those sentiments would have carried her away to her rural home. She might have sighed, but her sighs would have been for Henry. But the small talk, the badinage, the raillery, the little gossip, and all the conventionalities of a man of fashion had no such effect, and struggling as she did to shake off a load from her spirits, this strain of conversation was more amusing, and more acceptable than any other. She was wiled away from herself—cheated into self-complacency, and returned from her excursion with a heightened color, a brighter eye, and renovated spirits. She had found Col. Harlston very agreeable, but she felt that she only looked upon him as a gentleman and a pleasant companion, and that, even when most interested in his entertaining conversation, her thoughts had often turned to her lover. Thus finding nothing to reproach herself with, she was restored to perfect composure and serenity.

The afternoon was spent in writing to her mother. The thoughts uppermost in her mind were such as she dared not communicate, and the little occurrences of the day necessarily formed the staple of her letter. These it was not prudent to exhibit in the same light in which they appeared to her more sober thoughts. It was in better taste too to paint them coulour de Rose, and by doing this, their seducing influence on her mind was renewed and strengthened.

CHAPTER V.

Mrs. Pendarvis was a kind, benevolent woman, cheerful in temper, social, hospitable, bountiful. But she was a woman of the world. Society was the element necessary to her existence, and the laws of society were the laws of her second nature. The very kindness of heart, which made her seem indifferent to money, did but give her a deeper sense of its value. Her enjoyments were all expensive. She could neither indulge her hospitable spirit, nor advance the prosperity of a friend, nor do an act of charity without money. She was as free from selfishness as belongs to the nature of woman ; but the most disinterested do not love misery, and, without the means of doing these things, she felt as if she must be miserable. So she thought in her own case, and so she was apt to think for others. She loved her sister. She remembered to have loved her niece as a child ; and now that she saw her an amiable, beautiful and fascinating woman, she found herself drawn toward her, almost with a mother's love. The heart puts forth its affections, like the filaments of a creeping plant, which stretch themselves around in quest of their appropriate objects. Not finding these, they wither and die ; but others again spring forth, and darkly grope after that to which they may cling. Such is the feeling of maternity. It belongs to the sex, and appears even in infancy. It next displays itself to younger brothers and sisters ; and to the last, it reconciles the unfortunate old maid to coldness and neglect, if she can but get leave to love the children of those who alight her. It preys upon the spirits of the childless wife, and suggests all sorts of caprices, and seeks a succedaneum sometimes in lap-dogs and kittens, sometimes in flowers, painting, embroidery, or any thing which may be recognized as its own creation. To such the desire to appropriate the children of others is irresistible, and a lovely orphan, or the child of a poor relation is received as a god-send.

It was this strong instinct, in the heart of Mrs. Pendarvis, that fastened upon Gertrude, who seemed designed by Providence to supply to her the place of children of her own, and her interest in the future welfare of the poor girl seemed hardly less intense than that of her own mother. She herself indeed lived in affluence, but without the means of making a permanent provision for her niece. On becoming a widow, she had commuted all her interest in her husband's estate for an ample life annuity ; and to this she had so exactly adapted her charities, her benevolences, and the scale of her establishment, that each successive year left her neither richer nor poorer than it found her. Her death, of course, must put an end to all the resources which others found in her bounty ; and she therefore had as much reason as Mrs. Austin herself to wish to see Gertrude respectably and comfortably settled in life. To this purpose her aid had been invoked, and she prepared to lend it by all means consistent with the high duties which, in her estimation, woman owes to herself, to her sex and to society.

The efficiency of Mrs. Pendarvis's coöperation was not less than her zeal. No woman could be better suited to the task she had undertaken. Her arrangements had all been made in advance. The very existence of Gertrude was kept concealed from the gentleman whom above all she wished to see captivated by the charms, and successfully seeking the favor of that young lady. There was no need to cultivate new acquaintances, to form new intimacies, to change the fashions of her house, or to enlarge the sphere of her hospitality, or her style of entertainment. Dinners, balls, routes, dejeuners and soirées were in the ordinary course of things, and Gertrude fell into the system as a mere accident, in reference to whom nothing appeared to have been done or intended. Indeed Mrs. Pendarvis was notoriously no manœuvrer, but a woman of the greatest openness and sincerity. Kind, affable and cordial in her manners, she professed no friendship that she did not feel, and never affected to find pleasure in any thing that did not please her; and, least of all, in the society of the dull, the illiterate, the common-place, or the vulgar. Magnificent in her habits, splendid in her tastes, aristocratic in her feelings and notions, independent in her circumstances, and confident in the attraction of her manners, person and conversation, she felt sure of her place in society, without the least wish to occupy any other. She courted none, but to those who pleased her she knew how to be pleasing, while, regardless of the wealth or station of all others, she bore herself toward them with an air graceful and courteous indeed; but in which they were sensible of a something that made it impossible to enter the charmed circle within which her friends and favorites revolved around her.

Mrs. Pendarvis was a right-minded woman. She had loved her husband and been happy in his love, and had never learned to think that mercenary considerations should ever drive a lady into the arms of any but the man of her choice. Yet she was prudent and no enthusiast, and honestly believed that the heart is not so absolutely independent of the sense of duty and the faculties of reason and prudence that there may not be room for the exercise of some judgment, in the very act of falling into love. Of one thing she was sure:—that there is much in the power of those who are entrusted with the choice of a young lady's associates, and that to the neglect or abuse of that power are to be attributed many of those indiscreet alliances which are commonly charged to the imprudence of youth. The parent chooses the daughter's company, has constant opportunities to observe the tendencies of her inclinations, and full power to withdraw her from pernicious influences. Who is to blame, if she becomes enamored of a man who should never have been admitted to her presence; of a libertine, whom her brother introduces as his esteemed friend; of a shallow coxcomb, whom her father treats as if he were a man of sense, when he might have drawn him out, and exposed him in her presence, so as to make her see and despise his folly? So reasoned Mrs. Pendarvis. Her natural kindness and sympathy would have made it difficult for her to stand between two hearts burning to be united; and her delicacy and pride of sex would never have endured the thought of forcing a pure-minded woman into the arms of one whom her heart did not own as its master.

But there was nothing in this to prevent her from cordially coöperating with her sister, in the attempt to give such a direction to Gertrude's affections as might lead to the enjoyment of all the comforts of affluence, as well as the delights of love.

I have felt it to be an act of justice to give this sketch of the character of Mrs. Pendarvis; as I am not sure, that it will be fully developed by the history of transactions in which she was herself deceived, while seeming to deceive. The other characters I shall introduce to the reader may be left to display themselves.

The little party at which Gertrude had first seen Col. Harlston was arranged before hand to take place the day after her arrival. No trumpet was blown before her, and as the weather had delayed her a day longer than had been expected, her very existence was unknown to the gentleman until, on his entrance, Mrs. Pendarvis said to him, with a gracious but careless smile, "My niece, Miss Courtney, Col. Harlston." Having said this, she left things to take their own course.

In one particular she plainly saw, that her wishes had not been disappointed. The charms of Gertrude had manifestly not been lost on the Colonel. The different phases of her character, exhibited in the exciting gaiety of the evening party, the sober decorums of the dejeuner, and the sprightly conversation of the morning drive, were all fascinating, for all were graceful, and, at the same time, obviously simple, natural, unaffected. It was certain that Gertrude would see enough of the gentleman, to enable her to discover and appreciate his merit; and so highly did Mrs. Pendarvis estimate that, as not to doubt that any lady whom he should distinguish by his preference, might be honestly expected to return his affection.

Even in London a new face is said to produce an excitement; but in a place like Washington, haunted, from year to year, by the same set of husband-hunting damsels, the advent of a lovely creature, like our Gertrude, was a subject of intense interest. That evening the door-bell of Mrs. Pendarvis was rarely silent, until a quiet "not at home" had sent away the whole tribe of visitors, and left the ladies to the calm enjoyment of a domestic tête à tête. In this Mrs. Pendarvis acted not less from judgment than inclination. She had no mind that the taste of Gertrude for the pleasures of fashionable society should pall by too hasty enjoyment; nor that her power to please should be lost by the flagging of her jaded spirits. Above all she wished to show herself chary of the jewel she possessed, and determined not to cheapen its value in the estimation of others, by keeping it constantly before their eyes.

The ladies then quietly plied their needles, and, secure from interruption, talked of absent friends and household anecdotes. The frankness and kindness of Mrs. Pendarvis soon made its way to Gertrude's heart and banished all constraint. She soon felt as if she had known her aunt all her life, and thus unconsciously displayed all the beauties of her temper, heart and mind. In these Mrs. Pendarvis found all that she could desire in a daughter, and while she gazed and listened with delight, she secretly vowed to accomplish for her charming niece a destiny as brilliant as her various merit. The time for retirement was near at hand, when unexpectedly the door-bell tinkled, and presently a servant entered bearing a card. "A lady, Madam." But he had hardly spoken the words when Mrs. Pendarvis was on the stairs, and Gertrude immediately heard the voice of cordial welcome, answered with the bird-like laugh and cheerful ringing tones, that can only issue from the lips of a young woman. And so it proved, for in a few moments Mrs. Pendarvis returned, conducting a lady both young and beautiful, in a fashionable and rich travelling dress. "My niece, my dear. My friend, Miss Bernard, Gertrude."

Gertrude rose to meet the new comer, who approached her hastily, and then, checking her step, gazed on her with an expression of intense admiration, and then, advancing more slowly, took her hand, and kissed her, with a tenderness that went to Gertrude's heart.

"We shall be friends: I am sure we shall," said Miss Bernard, still holding Gertrude's hand. "But bless me, Mrs. Pendarvis, what a surprise you have prepared for me! Why did you not tell me of this?"

"I thought I had," said Mrs. Pendarvis with surprise. "Did I not invite you to meet my niece? I think I mentioned it in my note."

"O yes! You said you expected a niece. But such a niece! I came expecting to see a genuine country cousin. But here!"

"I could but tell you what I knew. I have not seen Gertrude since she was a child, and you may see that she has in fact so much of the country cousin about her, that her face is burning at praise, even from a lady's lips, such as would hardly call a blush to your cheek if offered by a gentleman."

"I hope Miss Courtney will pardon my rudeness," said Miss Bernard, again taking Gertrude's hand gently, and with an air of deferential tenderness. "I hope she will pardon me. I have indeed been enough in society to learn to value the compliments of coxcombs at their true worth, but not enough to repress my feelings always when I ought. When Miss Courtney has heard as much hollow flattery as I have, the recollection of a burst of sincere admiration, even from one of her own sex, may seem like a green oasis in the waste of memory."

In uttering these last words, Miss Bernard's voice assumed a tone so slightly pathetic, that to the most practised attendant on the theatre it would not have suggested the least suspicion of art.

Gertrude certainly had none such; and, with a moistened eye, she returned the pressure of Miss Bernard's hand, and again held up her rosy lips for the proffered kiss of peace and love.

"I am the elder of the two," said Miss Bernard: "a perilous confession for a spinster; and you must allow me the privilege of seniority to make the first advances. Gertrude, did you say?" turning to Mrs. Pendarvis, "Is that the name? Well, mine is Laura, and you must call me so. We won't waste time, first in ceremony, then in dispensing with it, and then in apologies for having done so. We are friends from this moment. Are we not?" And here again the rattling, reckless voice sunk to that "deep yet melting tenderness of tone," which goes, at once, from heart to heart. "We will be friends; and I will teach you as much as you ought to know of the ways of this bad world, and you may teach me, if you can, what, once unlearned, I fear is never learned again, the sweet simplicity that baffles art and triumphs over it."

For this once art triumphed over simplicity. The heart of Gertrude was won, and she retired to rest, happy in the acquisition of a friend so intelligent, so kind, and doubtless so sincere.

[To be continued.]

NIAGARA.

I heard and thought of thee with awe, Niagara,

I deemed thee stern and rude,

But I behold and hear thee now, Niagara,

With joy alone imbued.

O beautiful the wild play of thy foam,

The same, yet changing ever,

Swift rushing and wreathing on thy broad emerald bosom,

Seen where the spray clouds sever.

Thou takest the irrevocable leap, Niagara,

Calm in thy conscious power,

Rich with tribute from five broad lakes, Niagara,

The waiting ocean's dower;

While rainbow hues that on thy columned spray

Fitfully come and fade,

O'er thy eternal waters hover now,

As when thou first wast made.

Beautiful art thou to the eye, Niagara,

O beautiful and bright!

But more with thy mighty voice, Niagara,

Thou mov'st me with delight.

There is no harshness in thy varying tones:

Thy echoes glad and deep,

As if from nature's inmost heart they came,

Across the spirit sweep.

Thine is no angry, chiding voice, Niagara,
 Though far its thunders roll,
 But 'tis the full, triumphant shout, Niagara,
 Of joy beyond control.
 The faintest whisper by thy side is heard,
 Thou drownest not man's voice,
 A lofty self-communion is thy song,
 Alone dost thou rejoice.

I thought thy waves would speak to me, Niagara,
 Before thy cliffs I trod;
 But on, on to the sea thou roll'st, Niagara—
 Thou heedest nought but God.

THE YOUNG MOTHER.

How beautiful the infant's earliest smile,
 First welcome token that the budding soul
 Hath well interpreted the fond caress,
 And felt the sunshine of a parent's love.
 For not more gently fall the dews of heaven,
 Upon the unopened flower that darkling grows,
 Till struggling forth, it bursts its prison green
 And drinks the hues of heaven, than on the heart,
 Falls the still influence of the speechless love
 That broods within the tender mother's eye.
 And oh! if smiles and gentle loving words
 Might be the lifelong portion of the soul,
 How fairly would the flower expand and shed
 Fresh odors from its bosom, to refresh
 The hearts of those who watched the spirit's dawn.

THE ECONOMY OF LIFE.

The history of the great family of man is a history of moral and intellectual perversion, and of physical disquietude and suffering. And individual life is too often but a series of disorders, complaints, remedies and disappointments. This seems to be the lot of man both physical and moral. And would it not be well to inquire how far this is natural and inevitable, and how far dependent on our own unnatural habits and their unhealthful consequences. In the knowledge of ourselves we are prone to run ahead of the first great lesson; we stop not to study the first letters in the long alphabet of life. Men spend whole lives in anxious pantings after an imaginary fount of happiness, without ever settling the important question what it really is, and what are the essential agents in its acquisition. We will fret and wear away a thousand days in as many disappointments, in pursuit of an object, which when obtained, falls so far short of its promises as to be scarcely recognized and not at all enjoyed.

Life has been called a tragedy, and not inaptly so, for in it are exhibited all the dark powers of passion, and all the fatal out-workings of malignant depravity. It is again characterized as a bubble swelled by the breath of flattering hope to burst in the winds of stormy reality. We know not, and study not ourselves, and those things which immediately pertain to our personal well-doing. We will expend our money, labor and time, to learn what others have done, in past ages, and what men are now doing in remote parts of the earth—what is the character and condition of all parts of our globe, and where and what are the ethereal worlds by which it is surrounded. We will endow colleges to teach us the sciences of metaphysical and material things, tongues and systems,—all in the grand pursuit of happiness, and all very well too, as far as they go. But we forget to learn the science of life, the history and true state of ourselves, our adaptation to, and peculiar fitness for the reception and enjoyment of those life-giving things which we seek, in all these varied fields. The result is, that we mistake the true object of pursuit, and should we gain that which we grasp after, we find it wholly wanting in those happy qualities which our pampered and perverted nature craves. In the kindest amour propre, we are given to look upon our lack of happiness as the result of uncontrollable circumstances, which are fortuitously thrown around us. And all our unwearied efforts are brought to bear, in altering or removing these pestiferous agencies, without so much as thinking of the many inward and self-abiding causes of our discontent. We read of a certain king of Epirus who was always preparing to be happy, after he had conquered the world; never dreaming that the same world was all the time conquering him, as in the case of another great conqueror, who found after he had subdued the outer world, that there had grown up within him a world of sensuality and brute ambition which had conquered his peace and allowed him to rest not upon the earth. Thus, in our effort to mould things to ourselves, we forget to mould ourselves so as to fit us for the object of our aims.

Happiness is the universal object of pursuit, and the means used to acquire it are as various as the tastes, characters and follies of the pursuers. A whole race of men engaged in the pursuit of a single object, and thereby filling the world with an incessant tumult and active contention, is a subject of most serious and astonishing contemplation. Innumerable branches of science, and trades and callings of every grade and variety are made subjects of laborious application by way of putting our lives to the most useful purposes, in drawing to us that ideal something called happiness, while the true nature of our acting bodies and minds, and the laws and relations by which they are governed, are no where taught as a necessary part of the armor of knowledge with which we go out to the great battle of life. Happiness must be of both mind and body jointly. Mental peace cannot exist perfectly without physical ease, and the bed of down becomes a mere mat of straw under a miserable mind. We may assert, without meddling with controversial points, that the physical system is the medium or machine through which the mind acts, and upon the regular order and healthful condition of which the state of the mind depends. Hence, it becomes both foolish and fruitless to seek contentment and to expect activity of mind, whilst we overlook that even and healthful harmony of our organic system which is essential to their existence.

There is nothing in the character of men so astonishing as their great and almost universal ignorance of the laws of their nature. Persons suppose themselves good judges of "human nature," as it is termed, when they have some acquaintance with the arts and crafts by which men are apt to operate upon one another, and the minor and impulsive motives which usually govern them in their decisions and actions in life. But the great universal laws by which the physical man is governed, and under the administration of which the mental faculties operate, are matters upon which there is less attention bestowed and less real knowledge possessed than all others with which our welfare is concerned. The great want of success, so generally felt by philanthropists and moral reformers, must be ascribed in a great degree to this want of attention to and understanding of these laws. It is really saddening to reflect upon the immense amount of well-meant labor that is thrown away on this account. The form and the shadow of evil is fought without regard to its essence and spirit. The zealous lecturer will portray the pleasures of mental culture, the beauty and richness of intellectual stores, and the pure happiness their possession brings; and the delighted listener resolves to himself, henceforth, to be a pursuer and a possessor of these desirable acquisitions. But he has not been told that he needs physical regeneration to fit him for the practice of his high purposes. The beauty and attraction of the object fail not, but the mill-stone of physical habit, with its consequent intellectual apathy, yet hangs about his neck, which, though the burden of his life, is so familiar as to go unnoticed. The same result is seen to follow the labors of the moral reformer and the misguided resolves of his disciples. Every physician knows the difficulty of establishing practical reform in physical habits. The patient will swallow any quantity of the most nauseous drugs with scarce a complaint, if directed for the restoration of lost health, by any person, whether entitled to confidence or not; but should the most skilful judge of his disease attempt to interfere with his habit of eating or drinking, no regard is paid to the prescription, although it may be doubly important in effecting the result aimed at.

Diet, in regard both to quality and quantity, cannot be of less importance to the physical and mental prosperity of man, than soil in its kind and condition is to the vegetable kingdom. If a particular tillage, temperature and humidity are necessary to the growth and maturity of vegetable products; and if upon the degree and variety of the former depend the character and amount of the latter, so should we expect the same laws and relations to govern, and similar results to follow our own self-culture, or the nurture and management of our physical systems. Yet, strange as it may appear, this subject scarcely receives a serious thought, and never a practical or laborious effort; whilst to "make two blades of grass grow where but one grew before," is enough to entitle the author to the immortal honors of "one of the greatest benefactors of mankind." Great labor is often given to the restoration of lost health, but for the preservation of that which is already good, very little care is bestowed. The consequences of this ignorance of the laws of ourselves, and the agencies by which our life and comfort are governed, are every where to be seen and often most deplorably felt. Who is there that is uniformly well? Pains, aches and uneasinesses make up much the largest column in our account current with ourselves. And a day of exemption is but an opportunity seized upon to renew the causes of complaint. A close view of the state of physical comfort and mental quietude throughout civilized society generally, presents no very flattering tokens of amelioration, notwithstanding all the boasted improvements in all the arts and sciences, and all the tremendous moral reforms that are said to have been wrought in these latter years. It may be very true, that man has acquired great facilities in gathering possessions around him, such as should be conducive to happiness; but he has yet his perverted tastes and insatiable propensities to deal with. Outward circumstances are improved, but the inner man yet needs mending. Physical inaction and dietetic excess have more torturing power than poverty can ever obtain. The excitement and exertion of acquiring give all the pleasure, and the possession nothing. The illusive joys of possession are but the task-masters in disguise, to make the man work out his own comfort in the labor to acquire.

So far has the general pursuit of happiness failed, that the world is almost unanimously voted "a world of trouble"—"a vale of tears," and "a low ground of sorrow." Half the race of man dies in infancy, and another portion before the years of maturity, and life, when lengthened out, is as we have said—too often but a succession of ailments. This universality of suffering in the human race is anomalous in the order of nature. The lower animals, with the partial exception of those which are under the subjection of artificial laws and restraints, are seldom cut off in infancy, or their powers enfeebled by disease. They live out the measure of their days in health, and die when the term and purpose of their existence have been accomplished. All teaching, and every thing tending to meliorate the physical system, and to preserve the existence and healthful action of organic life, have been referred to man in a state of disease, and given up to the medical profession.

True, it is a great part of the study of this profession to learn and prescribe the laws of health, as well as to investigate the nature and to practise the cure of disease, but as we have before remarked, the doctor's advice, in regard to the management of our health, is never heeded, and hence the improvement in prevention has not kept pace with that of cure. We have the records of disease and its remedies for twenty-five centuries,—from the times of Hippocrates to our own, and although the discovery of remedies, and their appropriate application to disease have been great, yet they have barely kept pace with the increase in the variety and frequency of disease. The amount of physical ailment is scarcely less than in former ages, or in the infancy of the healing art; while the average life of man is said to be shortening with every successive age. As rational beings, we are bound to attribute this to some cause. Anomalies in nature do not occur from natural causes. The fact is, we are grossly ignorant of the absolute laws, ordained and operative for the government of our natural bodies. We are not only ignorant of these laws, but when they force themselves upon our notice, we are careless towards their requirements, and they are both neglected and woefully violated; and in these violations we may find the active cause of our incessant sufferings, which are no more than the just penalties annexed to the violations of laws given us for our protection and happiness. These are natural laws, which uniformly and universally govern natural bodies. The law that keeps a ship from sinking in the ocean is uniform in its application to all bodies of like character, and universal wherever its action is called into exercise. So with other laws that govern natural bodies. Man is alike subject to these universal physical laws, with other physical objects. But he is, moreover, an organized being, and is further subject to organic laws. He receives the means of his nurture and growth from external and foreign agents, and applies, digests, and assimilates them to his own structure through the agency of his own organs. These organs are so nicely adapted to their purposes, and so completely subject to these organic laws, that to produce their legitimate results, no unnatural agent is admissible, and all misapplications of agents, and irregular action of the organs, will invariably produce unnatural and irregular phenomena.

Man is evidently endowed with faculties and capabilities suited to the great universe in which a wise Creator has placed him: yet it is gravely contended, by many dolorous philosophers, that “Man was made to mourn.”

But when we contemplate the means so profusely scattered and thrown along the pathway of life, which are in their nature adapted, and evidently intended to minister to his happiness, and when we discover that he is endowed with all the organs and senses for their application; and moreover, that he is blest with intelligence, which enables him to discriminate and select, and a keen sensibility to detect a misapplication. In view of all these evidences, we say, we cannot avoid the conclusion, that man was made, fitted and circumstanced to be happy. The pain and ills that flesh is heir to are no more than the benevolent penalties, which the Creator has affixed to the violation of his universal and conservative laws. We say benevolent, because no institution of the Deity has for its exclusive object pain; and further, these pains are only the sentinels of the law, that step in to prevent destruction. If no pains, or uneasiness, could follow an excess in any of our natural privileges, how long could our organic functions be maintained! How soon would we destroy ourselves! The whole system of our being, physical, mental and moral, must act in harmony. He who gains his sustenance by the wild chase, and the savage life of the woods, exercises his animal attributes chiefly, and is found to be essentially, and often exclusively animal, in all his character. The exercise of one class of faculties obscures, if it does not obliterate, the others. So the man who would cultivate his intellect to the entire neglect of his physical powers, finds the latter to give way, and by their languor, feebleness and organic disorder, to counteract his inclination, and thwart his hopes of happiness. He suffers from the excess of mental sensibility, whilst those attributes from which he might enjoy animal life, are lost, or greatly impaired. This we often witness in the lives of those who are laborious in the exercise of their minds. Aristotle informs us, that all the great men of his day were hypochondriacs. Thus, throughout the whole circle of nature, we find that no section of the organic laws will suffer itself to be violated, without inflicting the assigned penalty. These just penalties constitute what are generally viewed as the direct chastisements of Divine Providence, and to deny the immediate agency of the supreme hand in them is often viewed as no better than denying the existence of a divine supervisory power. But this short-sighted view of the subject is refuted in a few words by Bishop Butler, when he says,

"If civil magistrates were able to make their laws execute themselves, or every offender to execute them upon himself, we should be just in the same sense under their government then, as now, but in a much higher degree and more perfect manner. If God annexes delights to some actions, with apparent design to induce us to act so and so, then, he not only dispenses happiness and misery, but also rewards and punishes actions. If the pain we feel upon doing whatever tends to injure or destroy our bodies is appointed by the author of nature to prevent us from doing what thus tends to our destruction, this is altogether as much an instance of his punishing our actions, and of our being under his government, as declaring by a voice from heaven, that if we acted so, he would inflict such punishment upon us, and inflicting it whether it be greater or less."

We may further illustrate our meaning by an example. It is known and well settled, that a certain quantity of alcoholic spirit will produce intoxication. This operation of the natural laws is well established by experiment. By the effects of this intoxication, the man is both punished for his violation of the law, and restrained from carrying it to his destruction, as his stimulated taste would certainly induce him to do, did not the effects so stupify and prostrate him, as to prevent his carrying it thus far. Now, would it not appear unreasonable and absurd in a man, to take the required quantity of liquor, and pray, or even hope, that it would not have its legitimate effect. And no one is to be found so utterly absurd as to take the spirit, and when he has suffered the penalty, complain of the severe inflictions of Divine Providence.

Yet actions and absurdities as palpable as this would be, are daily practised by men and society. We are wont to promise ourselves immunity from sufferings, the occurrence of which experience and reflection assure us of, and then complain, that we are unfortunate, and that we are providentially deprived of our just expectations. It will not do, to say that men are naturally unable to obey the organic laws. Most of us are educated, and habituated, in disregard of them,—but let men be educated to study them as a matter of both duty and interest, and also a high source of happiness, and they will be found to regard and obey them.

I WILL WEEP.

BY THE YOUNG BARD OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. Editor,—I send you some more lines by the Young Bard of New Hampshire, of whom I have written to you before.—AMERICUS SOUTH. R. B. Minor

And I will weep; the world can hold more tears;
There long has been a turmoil in this breast,
Which cannot be allayed by rolling years;
As well the rising tide may be suppressed,
And ocean's stormy billows hushed to rest.

'Tis not because of every joy bereft,
And hopes all blighted in earth's desert air;
'Tis not that I in loneliness am left,
To wander on, I know—I care not where,— Without one friend to breathe for me a prayer.

'Tis not that fortune has o'erturned the schemes,
That youth full oft, too rashly might devise,
Or disappointment proved my hopes but dreams;
The rainbow even that decked my morning skies,
A harbinger of after storms to rise.

I will not grieve tho' disappointment come,
To startle vain ambition with its tread;
To steal away my fondest friends and home,
And every darling that my heart has wed.
'Twere useless grief for joys forever fled.

If all these cherished flowers should cease to bloom,
That hang so sweetly o'er life's thorny plain;

If all things beautiful should throng the tomb,
And not a charm in this cold world remain,
I would not weep—for weeping then were vain.

But there's a cause, that cannot be defined,
For grief, of which no stranger heart may know;
Undying longings in this restless mind,
For grandeur, such as never dwells below,—
For something which this world can not bestow.

Those pent up thoughts, in one eternal tide
That far within the musing spirit roll,
Those longings that can not be satisfied,
Those stifled aspirations of the soul,
At last break loose defying all control.

This earth might charm each fonder wish away;
Yes, musical its changing seasons run;
Sweet are the blushes of the dawning day;
Bright are the glories round a setting sun,
But all, alas! all smile on man's delay.

Full well I know, there's music in the skies,
Far, far away from this beclouded ball,
Where never fading beauty meets the eyes;
Where death ne'er comes to spread his gloomy pall,
And time's unwelcome shadows never fall.

PART II.

"Land of my sire! what mortal hand
 Can e'er untie the filial band,
 That knits me to thy rugged strand!
 Too well—I love thee better still,
 Even in extremity of ill."

Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Several weary months had glided by, and still Ino Del Castro's spirit mourned in her splendid prison home, which, though one of unwilling captivity, was far from being that of privation or disgrace. The gorgeous magnificence of oriental taste surrounded her—the luxury of wealth, and every source of refined amusement were freely bestowed upon her; but amidst all, Ino sighed heavily for a glimpse of her own blue sea and a "breath of her own free heavens." The listlessness of dark despair seemed to deaden her once buoyant mental energies, while it dimmed her bright and sunlike beauty with a shade of the deepest gloom. The mystery clouding the fate of Adrian Marcova became daily more impenetrable, until the wing of soaring Hope had almost ceased to hover o'er the enthralled spirit of the heart-forsaken captive. Stamboul had in vain laid the offering of his noble and devoted love at her shrine with all the respectful delicacy her own pure nature would have exacted. True her spurning scorn often forced him to betray an impetuous vehemence towards her, still the generous character of his devotion forbade any coercive measure in making her his bride, hoping that time would weaken her prejudice and deaden a remembrance of the past, while a gentle patience on his part would arouse a mutual feeling of kindness and gratitude in her desolate bosom. Like a miser over his hidden store, he had preserved her from the rude gaze of all, save a small retinue of well tried domestics—for he was well aware that were the Sultan to hear of the beauty of his captive, she would no longer be his, nor enjoy that unmolested retirement which his delicate generosity had never interrupted.

Stamboul's mother was a high born Greek,—his father one of the enemies of the oriental kingdom, and in his character and person were strongly blended the national traits of each parent. His high, daring valor, his firmness and urbanity of manners had gained him unbounded influence with Mahmoud and his subjects. Ever filling some important post of honor and performing some trusty service in the wars Mahmoud was then carrying on, it was not often that Ino was subjected to an intrusion from him upon her privacy, and when she was, it was impossible for her to be insensible to his disinterested kindness and respectful tenderness. Candor compelled her to admit her situation, contrasted with thousands of her unfortunate countrymen, a blessed and happy one; and could Scio's groans and tears have been forgotten, the poignancy of Ino's grief would have been greatly mitigated, and time would have brought a patient endurance of her gilded captivity. But alas! the deadly fang of memory still keenly pierced her, which not all the regal splendors of her bright and luxurious home could banish, or even ameliorate. A longer interval than usual had elapsed since Stamboul's last interview, which caused Ino no little gratification, when a messenger arrived with tidings of his master's immediate coming. So hopeless and apathetic had become her mind when pursuing the even tenor of her way, that the announcement which had always caused unpleasant surmises and feelings respecting the visits of her devoted captor, failed to excite her interest in any respect.

It was about sunset that Ino, wrapt in meditation, reclined upon a richly cushioned divan in an apartment which would have vied with that of the most potent Sultana,—so garish with Eastern magnificence, then made bright by the flashing radiance of the setting sun's light. A slave sat upon an ottoman at her feet, while her fingers carelessly played with her tambour as she occasionally lifted her dark eye to the face of her mistress in tender solicitude. After every effort had failed to attract the interested attention of the dejected Ino, Zeida arose, and taking a lute from a lounge near re-seated herself to try the effect of that favorite instrument, but ere she struck its chords, Ino laid her hand gently upon hers saying—

"Not now, Zeida—I could not bear to hear from thy lute the voice of the past, for such ever seems its music. In my present mood its tones would cause my soul to shrink—for too well do I remember the last time my own fingers touched its strings, to soothe the melancholy of those now lost forever. Oh! what an hour, what a night of blackness that was when my eye first rested upon this, my prison home. I felt as if the heavens were hung with the drapery of death, and the 'sun and moon in a huge eclipse.' Although I have cause to be thankful for many comforts and blessings, yet, Zeida, thou hast never perhaps had to endure the agonizing sight of the unhallowed desecration of thy native home. Thou wert born a slave, and thine eye ne'er dwelt upon a brighter scene than the present, (pointing to an open window,) which thou mayest indeed deem most beautiful, but ah! thou knowest not how tenaciously

'The parted bosom clings to wanted home.'

"Thou sayest true, my lady,—all that thou speakest of I ne'er have seen or felt—but methinks the noble Stamboul's captive could not be otherwise than happy. Thy lot is one, even Asma Sultana, the sister of the great Mahmoud, would covet, for all do say she woos the love of the valiant Stamboul, but," added she, "the love of one so great as he could not be more faithful than that of thy devoted slave, Zeida."

The dark eye of the slave beamed brighter with affection as she drew nearer to her mistress and clasped her resistless hand, pressing it with fervor to her ruby lip. No two beings, forming a greater contrast, could have been grouped together—Ino so pale, sad and lovely, whose transparent purity of complexion was considerably increased beside the dark olive tint of the Turkish slave, while the rich and peculiar beauty of the latter, lost none of its attraction from the contrast. It was impossible for that faithful look and action to pass unobserved by the sensitive Ino, who bent over the kneeling girl with reciprocal fondness, and as she pushed back the long, black tresses from the slave's smooth brow, she graciously touched it with her beautiful lip, then trembling with aroused emotion, while she said tenderly,

"Yes, Zeida, thy kindness and untiring love have greatly lightened the tedium of my captivity, and truly it seems an oasis to my desolate heart, made so cheerless by misfortune. But come, methinks I will arouse my soul from its present stirless apathy, by listening to thy sweet music. Any emotion, however painful, is preferable to the oppressiveness I thus insensibly yield to." Ino stooped and took up the lute, bidding Zeida to play, who cheerfully and quickly obeyed her. Her touch was so sweet and soul-melting—the scene without o'er which Ino's eye then freely roamed, was so gloriously inviting, and the hour one so endeared to memory, it was not to be wondered that

"E'en her captive spirit tasted, Half oblivion of her woes."

"Lady," said a slave entering and approaching Ino with the most reverential obeisance, "a messenger from my master awaiteth without, and humbly craves thy attention. He bears a missive from the great Stamboul, which he was commanded to deliver only into thine own hands."

"Let him appear," replied Ino in a faint, sad tone; and then, as if forgetful of her permission, she buried her face in the velvet cushions, entirely disregarding the entrance of the messenger. He stood before her silent, and not until the soft voice of Zeida announced his presence, did Ino raise her bowed head. A shudder and feeling of fear crept o'er her as she bent her glance carelessly upon the turbaned soldier, whose face was almost entirely concealed, as he bent his head low upon his broad bosom. Ino averted her glance, while she asked tremblingly—

"Thy message, Turk; say quickly what is it thy general wishes made known to his captive!"

The soldier approached, and bent his knee as he offered her a missive tied with blue ribbon, answering hoarsely—

"Read for thyself, fair lady; his command was to deliver it to thee in person."

Ino turned not to look upon the kneeling soldier as she stretched forth her hand to receive the missive, which she quietly read, and then throwing it beside her, she haughtily waved her hand, without deigning to change her reclining and averted position, saying calmly—

"Thou hast executed thy mission—return with my answer, that Ino Del Castro is always prepared for Stamboul's presence, also for any news he may think proper to impart. Away, I would not that any one of thy cruel nation, save Stamboul, should tarry in my sight."

"Thou shalt be obeyed, lady," replied the soldier rising and heaving a deep sigh, "his faithful aid-de-camp, Odessa, would be the last person to distress one so dear to his general, by his hateful presence."

When Ino turned to gaze upon the messenger he was gone. His voice struck a chord of vibration within her bosom, by its melancholy and singular tenderness. She felt disappointed that she had not been more courteous towards him, or that she had not looked in his face. Strange to say she was almost induced to despatch Zeida in quest of him, but ere she had decided to do so, a start and exclamation of surprise from the slave, caused her to turn her eye in the direction she pointed. A wild and unearthly looking being stood on the threshold of the door, leading into the gardens. It was the person of an aged female, whose appearance bespoke more the decrepitude of grief and misfortune than that of years. She was habited in a fantastical dress of black, red and yellow—an under short skirt of black, fully revealed her small sandalled feet—a red kirtle flowed loosely from the waist; a striped yellow mantle hung around her shoulders, o'er which fell long plaits of black hair knotted at the ends with large bows of various colored ribbon. A curious cap of shining material, something like morocco, rested upon her head and brow of lofty height. Beauty might have been said to have once beamed in her face, but for those dark, shaggy and uncommonly large eyebrows, which gave an unearthly and masculine character to her whole face, and beneath which gleamed eyes of the most startling brilliancy. None ever felt their power more fearfully than Ino Del Castro, as she gazed upon the strange being before her, who continued leaning her hand upon a staff, unmoved, and apparently gratified at the sight of Ino's evident alarm.

"Hast thou ought with me?" asked Ino, endeavoring to speak.

oring to become composed, "or art thou too the messenger of unwelcome tidings?"

"I crave a few moments of thy time, fair lady; but I would be alone with thee—bid thy slave retire to an ante-room, ere I make known the purpose of my visit."

The female somewhat authoritatively waved her staff towards Zeida, who, on perceiving a nod of assent from Ino, immediately withdrew.

"Doubtless, lady," said she, approaching quite close to Ino, "thou art happy in so beautiful and splendid a cage as this, (glancing around the room,) made brighter too by the love of such a noble captor as Stamboul!"

"Ah!" sighed Ino as she spoke, "thou knowest not the might of holy affections—thou hast never felt the yearnings of an imprisoned spirit for the home of its childhood, or thou wouldst sooner believe mine a splendid misery. What is home or happiness but with those we love! Void is that heart unless thus blessed."

"I marvel much to see thy manner and language contradict what rumor saith of thee, viz: that thou art blessed, and supremely happy in thy present abode. How is it that the chains of captivity could so oppress thy feelings, as to render thee insensible to the luxuries and unusual advantages surrounding thee?"

"Stamboul hath indeed acted with noble generosity and delicacy towards me, which has greatly lightened, though not endeared, my gilded bondage. But he, and all in this barbarous land would fail to fill the dreary waste within my lacerated bosom, made utterly miserable by deeds never to be obliterated. Ino Del Castro has only one wish now, to leave this weary, tempest tossed world, for 'tis a vast blank to her."

"Would it seem thus, if Adrian Marcova shared in with thee? Art thou true to thy betrothed?"

Ino started to her feet, while a flash of radiant joy passed over her face as she fearlessly clasped the female's bony hand.

"Oh! tell me if thou knowest aught of one so dear to memory, and truly, fondly cherished in my heart. The very thought of his present existence imbues me with a new life and hope."

"He lives—but he has heard thou wert untrue; that Stamboul owned a willing captive—nay, he has been assured thou wouldst soon become his bright and loving bride. But fear not, the dread news has but increased his love for thee and interest in thy welfare, for Adrian Marcova is not inferior even to Stamboul in generosity and fidelity."

"Is it in thy power to undeceive him?" asked Ino anxiously—"make me happy once more by so doing; bear him every assurance of my unchanging affection, and implore him to rescue me from my present bondage, more galling than ever, since I know that he lives. Oh! promise me this whoever thou art—for methinks I can see pity and kindness beam in thy countenance."

Ino had assumed an attitude of supplication as she looked entreatingly into the strange female's face.

"Bear on," replied she, feelingly, and gazing with admiration upon the kneeling maiden—"bear on, thou mayest yet be happy,—Lamia, the Circe, will not fail to thus gladden the heart of thy disconsolate lover—give her thy betrothal ring to add greater weight to thy message of love."

Ino drew a ring from her finger, and placed it in her hand with a smile of joyful confidence, but ere she had time to pour forth her grateful thanks, Lamia was gone, with a sudden rapidity, that caused the bewildered Ino to look around, almost afraid the whole was but a delusive dream.

The morrow brought Stamboul, and notwithstanding the animated expression of his face when he, as usual, bent in adoration to his fair captive, Ino was startled by the look of deep dejection that succeeded the rapture of his greeting.

"Most beauteous Ino, would that I could here, at thy feet, breathe out my whole existence, for thy heart is all the kingdom I would own, thy hand a dowry above all price, and thy bright smile a reward most precious in Stamboul's eye."

"Rise, Stamboul," replied she coldly, "it is not to a poor captive, like Ino Del Castro, that such as thou shouldst bend the knee of homage. Her broken, blighted heart, would be a desolate kingdom for the subjection of a love like thine,—her hand a worthless gift, and her smile too faithfully shadows forth the agony of her bosom to continue sunlike in thine eye. Rise, I would quickly hear the dreadful news thou hast forewarned me of in thy yesterday's missive."

"When beauty so matchless as thine blesses the vision, it is meet that the heart should yield its warmest adoration and it is only then, as a worshipper at thy shrine, that Stamboul will obey thee. Alas! would that in so doing I could lighten, instead of increasing the weight of thy present misery. Rumors of thy beauty have reached the Sultan's ear—how, I cannot conjecture, for my visits to thee have ever been made with the strictest secrecy. I was summoned to his presence a few days since, and commanded to bring before him my captive. Evasion and every entreaty were employed to revoke the mandate, but they were vain, and seemed to increase the more his suspicions and desire to behold thee. At the forfeit of my life, though it has ever been spent in his service, I was enjoined to obey. To-morrow the Ramadan fast is ended—the day after commences the three days festival of the Bairam, the last of which is the one appointed for Mahmoud's examination of the captives taken during the present wars, and thou too must prepare thyself for that humiliating ordeal. Oh!" continued he, passionately seizing her hand, "though the anguish of thy soul may have been unspeakably great, yet it is even weak compared to that which now wrings the heart of Stamboul at the thought of parting from thee, under circumstances perhaps far more disgraceful, than those which made thee his honored captive."

Stamboul, the valiant hero of many dangers, bent his face upon his breast in tearful woe. Ino had resistlessly permitted her hand to rest in his—so pulseless was her heart with fear, and so statue-like the agonizing expression of her face while she listened to him; but suddenly a burning color o'er-spread its deadly paleness, and as if musing alone, she murmured:

"What a fate is mine! Oh! righteous providence may it be thy last stroke! Stamboul, listen to me: thy honor and delicacy have alone prevented this hand from executing my father's last injunction; but think not I cling so tenaciously to life, that I would still shrink from the dread act of suicide were it necessary. Never will Ino Del Castro become the favored slave of Mahmoud—but sooner than thou shouldst forfeit thy pledge I will submit to his degrading scrutiny—for the result, her faithful dagger, (laying her hand upon her bosom,) will prepare her. I owe thee a heavy debt of gratitude. I yield to the dread alternative for thy sake alone,—and oh! would that I could have died without an increase of my terrible repugnance to thy country and people."

"Fear not, Ino," returned Stamboul with sudden animation as if some new hope nerved him, "the dread act you contemplate will not be for thy pure, innocent hand. I care not for the jeopardy of my life, wert thou not to appear before the Sultan, for could my death avert future misery or dishonor from one so worthy of every sacrifice, freely, gladly would Stamboul's life be forfeited—but I would feign wish to live only to serve thee, and to accomplish thy release. I now sanction a fulfilment of the disgraceful mandate, for I have in view several means whereby thy release may be effected. Mahmoud's coffers are greatly exhausted by the late wars; to prosecute further sieges and gratify his inordinate ambition for extending his dominions, it is necessary they should be replenished: a high ransom may set thee free. If this should fail, I have an unrepaid claim, upon his oath, for some signal personal service, which shall be called into requisition to serve thee. Rest satisfied and cheer thy sorrowful heart with this assurance, that every effort shall be made by Stamboul—and oh! if success crown his exertion——" he paused a moment, and then imploringly added, "Ino forgive the selfish thought which will intrude—but say, if thou art freed will thou then accept this heart and hand? another lovelier land will he own his home if Ino Del Castro will bless him with her love."

Ino's face was turned away in agitating grief;

the big tears coursed rapidly down her pale cheeks, and when she met his entreating look, as he awaited her answer, emotions of pity and gentle sympathy completely bid back the power of articulation, causing naught but sobs to fall upon his eager ear. At length those tears vanished, and sorrowfully calm was her voice when she replied:

"Stamboul, I do indeed grieve to appear inexorable, and perhaps coldly insensible to thy generosity by again declaring my repugnance to thy offers of love, but I could not be so unjust towards thee as to promise a hand without a heart, the latter can never be thine, for such is not now in Ino's power to bestow, it being devoted to another. The bond of gratitude which thy kindness has thrown around me is too strong already. I regret that any further act of thine should increase it, for if thou wert to release me from the most hateful captivity again and again, I could never return thee what should be thine, viz: a full measurement of love. Long ere I saw thee, all the heritage of my heart was given to Adrian Marcova, the companion of my early childhood. Amidst all the darkness of my recent woe has the light of that tenderly cherished love beamed o'er my stricken soul: it is not even extinguished now, for I feel confident that we will once more renew our vows and yet be blessed. Now that I have made this confession, say, could such a nature as thine be satisfied to share but a spot, but a corner in the heart of one thou lovest so warmly? No, Stamboul, happiness would never be thine or mine, and there is often but one step from love to hate when disappointment chills that love."

Stamboul slowly arose from his kneeling posture and stood silently before the trembling Ino, whose firmness and animated excitement seemed to quail 'neath the calm and fixed gaze of his stern, dark eye. She shrunk back, when in a deep, hoarse whisper he asked:

"How knowest thou that Adrian Marcova now lives?"

"Such convictions may be the mysterious communings of my longing, anxious spirit," said she evasively, "but although they may prove delusive, yet Hope whispers too sweetly to render me faithless to my plighted vows."

"Be it so," replied he musingly, "but oh! thy words have stilled the current within, (laying his hand upon his bosom while his head fell heavily on it,) no light beams here. Yet Stamboul still claims the prerogative of serving thee. Inform me where I may find thy betrothed. I have hundreds of emissaries who could easily bring me correct tidings of him if it be possible."

How bright became Ino's face as she listened to the changed but calm voice of her captor—but suddenly, when gazing anxiously upon his immovable and stern countenance, that brightness faded into doubt and misgiving, for she feared all his manifest disinterestedness was but a specious show of generosity, called forth to basely deceive her. He quickly perceived her varying color and seemed to be aware of its cause; folding his arms, he replied in the same haughty tone as when he parted from her after their first and memorable interview:

"Ino Del Castro, it is in vain to expect common justice from thee, for it is sadly evident that thy natural ingenuousness is darkened whenever a Turk offers thee aid, though it may spring from—as pure a stream of feeling as that which refreshes the bosom of a Greek. Even now thou dost suspect I only seek Adrian Marcova to subvert some ignoble, selfish purpose. For once extend to me thy confidence and belief, when I assure thee my offer was made with a pure desire of promoting thy happiness, that thou mightest at last end thy sorrowful pilgrimage in this land, and in the blessed haven of mutual love, forget that thy sea of life had ever been so fearfully agitated by the tempest of past misfortunes. Long and perhaps equally as painful hath been my probation of hopeless, scorned and repulsed love—but since thy confession, I feel every chord of hope or desire severed, and a recklessness of the future. Fear not then for thy lover's safety, were he in the power of Stamboul, whose hand hath never yet been wilfully imbrued in the blood of even a daring enemy, much less of an innocent rival. Dimmed as his sabre hath been with that dread stain, it is incapable of the fiendish blow of assassination from any petty revenge, and it is hardly possible now, when his whole nature hath become tempered to softness by thy tuition and the power of a pure love, that the remnant of his blighted life should be branded with such a Cain-like mark. I go, therefore, to institute inquiries respecting Adrian Marcova,—four days hence we will meet, previous to thy appearance before Mahmoud. If I come not to conduct thee to that hated scene, it will be the effect of some unavoidable detention. Despair not, only trust to Stamboul's word to release thee, which never yet hath been broken, and by its truth will he firmly stand. Farewell Ino Del Castro."

"One moment, only one Stamboul," cried Ino, throwing herself before him as he mournfully turned to leave her, "forgive thy poor captive for every thought in which she rendered thee injustice. 'Swifter than a shadow, shorter than a dream' have they vanished, leaving her sensible alone of thy nobleness of soul. Hear me! this heart can but bid thee God speed in thy successful inquiry after Adrian, for I cannot forswear its truth by saying otherwise—but hear my decision; shouldst thou bear me certain tidings that he is not amongst the living, then, Stamboul, take this hand, (a deadly paleness o'erspread her glowing face as she extended it towards him,) it shall be thine freely, and this heart thou mayest gain in patient time. True a few tears of irrepressible sorrow for my lost love may long tarnish the gift, but perchance its former lustre may at last be regained, for next to Adrian Marcova would Ino Del Castro be the brave Stamboul's bride."

No smile of gladness or willing assent chased the sadness from the lofty brow of the proud, but noble Turk, when he slightly touched the delicate hand offered, but shaking his head, he slowly let it fall, while he calmly replied:

"No, Ino, there lies between us a chasm which not even the death of thy lover can fill, or cause our fates to be united. Stamboul could not be content with a renewed love, even though it be that of the beauteous Ino Del Castro. Take back thy impulsive vow, recall thy decision, for such a love as thine for Adrian cannot fail to be blessed—mine for thee was too sinful, because it was superior to that claimed by the great Allah from his creatures. No! Stamboul's bride shall be his country,—his abiding, faithful companion shall be his sword, and his last breath shall be spent in honor's service, in glory's cause. Farewell, once more we may meet; it will be our last on earth and then will end thy sorrowful captivity."

The tall form of the Turk, with bowed head and folded arms, was soon lost among the thick grove of almond trees, shading the entrance of Ino's gorgeous pavilion. In sorrowful silence the captive maiden lingered on the threshold until the echo of his retreating steps could be heard no more; she then bent in prayer, when words of supplication for Heaven's choicest blessings to rest upon her generous captor were breathed with a fervor in which not one selfish thought of the absent Adrian mingled.

The Ramadan fast, one of the most famous rites in the Turkish religion, was over. The gloom and unsocial silence which the rigors of its penance cast o'er the great "city of the Sultan," gave place to revelry and jocund festivity, for that welcomed jubilee, the feast of the Bairam, began. It seemed as if some bright spirit of joy and happiness had suddenly waved its magic wand far and wide, so tumultuous was the mirth that prevailed in every part of the city. Travellers represent the season of the Bairam as one of unrivalled and uninterrupted festivity. On the night preceding its commencement, every minaret of the numerous mosques is illuminated, as also all the public resorts and buildings, and no sooner the faint glimmerings of the morn break through the East than loud and joyful shouts are heard from every one, announcing that the hour of indulgence and pleasure had arrived, to dispel that tomb-like silence and devotional abstinence which this great leant so rigidly demands. All traffic and business is suspended, and arrayed in his holiday costume, every one wears a new smile, as he proffers and receives the various compliments and hospitalities extended on this interesting season, which is of three days continuance. The first day is one of important ceremonies at court. The Sultan receives the homage of the different orders of the State at the Seraglio, and afterwards proceeds to attend the service of the mosque of the Sultan Achmet, escorted by a brilliant retinue,* and although, according to late travellers, this procession, together with the forms and ceremonies on this occasion, are not so zealously performed by the present ruler of Turkey as by his illustrious predecessors, still, at the time we allude to, they were engaged in with more spirit and animation than is now displayed. Mahmoud, in honor of his officers and grantees, had prepared a magnificent entertainment on the third and last day, at which he had issued orders for the exhibition of all the captives taken during the late wars. It came. The spacious state-room was crowded with the dignitaries of the Empire, all superbly arrayed in the rich and garish show of the oriental costume. Conspicuous amidst that imposing pageant sat the Sultan upon his burnished silver throne, dazzling in his regal splendor. On his right was an elevated seat covered with a gorgeous carpet of crimson and gold, and evidently reserved for some distinguished individual, while on his left stood the Lerskier Pacha with his attendants. Before him were seated, in a circular range, all the principal ministers and great officers, at the back of each was stationed a page richly dressed, and somewhat in the rear stood the most noted oulemas, or men of the law, forming a scene which the testimony of travellers pronounces one of astonishing splendor.

How felt the delicate and sensitive Ino Del Castro, as she prepared to obey a mandate involving so public and humiliating an exposure of her beauty as a captive before that august assemblage! Had not Stamboul left her his guerdon, that her release could be effected, and she in return consented for his sake to obey the summons, the agony of her mind as the decisive hour approached, would perhaps have induced a faithful execution of her father's solemn injunction. But her hand and will were stayed by a firm reliance upon her noble captor's word and power, and yielding to the cheering influence of Hope, she passively submitted the array of her person to the entire taste of the admiring and attached Zeida. Custom had always imposed upon those thus especially summoned to the presence of the Sultan, the most magnificent display of dress, and although this conspicuous bedizenment of the person was revolting to Ino, yet policy and a desire to avoid that notice which an unusual departure from such would not fail to attract, caused her to likewise adopt all those blandishments of attire calculated to please the eye. Never had Zeida beheld her lady so radiant with beauty as when she gave the last touch of her own tasteful exertions to the toilet of the melancholy but sanguine captive. True, no brilliant flash of joy or happiness danced in the violet blue of Ino's eye, but there gleamed the fire of insulted, yet subdued dignity from its speaking depth; no blooming rose freshened on her soft cheek as in her day of pride and unfaded beauty, but its transparent and changing hue was far more lovely than all the deep and mantling color of health or joy; the bright pencilling of her beautiful lip alone remained unchanged in its full and matchless curve. Her light hair flowed in loose curls o'er her shoulders, entwined with glistening pearls, while from her polished brow they were waved back by a dazzling tiara of diamonds. A snow white kirtle, tissue with silver, hung gracefully over the folds of a light blue robe, flowing from her delicate waist, which was encircled by a girdle of the rarest and largest pearls, while the sleeves full to the elbow, were caught midway the arm by a fillet of magnificent jewels; a small but richly wrought chain, Adrian's parting token, was the only ornament resting on her neck, and as she pressed it to her lip, she tearfully murmured: "Would that this could prove a talisman against all degrading and impertinent scrutiny. Alas! Adrian, though it has been love's amulet, yet its magic charm cannot shield thy betrothed from a stern fate."

The soft voice of the affectionate slave aroused her from her sorrowful reverie.

"Forbear, lady Ino, those tears, they will dim the brightness of thy beauty, which would cause the great Sultan to laugh to scorn the reports concerning the noble Stamboul's captive."

"And thinkest thou, Zeida, it would disappoint me were Mahmoud not to award a favorable glance on this poor, fading, bedecked form? Next to the wish of meeting with Adrian Marcova is that of being entirely shielded from his dishonorable admiration. Bring hither my veil, which, although rarely worn by a Greek maiden, especially when a helpless captive, yet I will dare to adopt its blessed concealment—for one of Del Castro's noble blood, though of the frail sex, cannot tamely submit to all the insulting requirements of an infidel court."

The gentle hand of Zeida had hardly adjusted the thick white folds of the veil over the pale face of her mistress, when a messenger announced, "That all was ready, and Stamboul's retinue awaited to escort the lady Ino to the palace."

"Farewell, Zeida," said she in a voice broken by deep emotion, as the faithful slave twined her arms around her, o'erwhelmed with grief at parting from one so tenderly loved, "would that thou wert permitted to stand by me in the approaching hour of trial. Alas! who will support and protect me, for even Stamboul has failed to gladden the darkness of this moment by his promised coming and assistance! deeply, deeply have I drained the chalice of bitter misfortune—farewell, come what may,

Dr. Clarke gives an interesting account of these festivities in his description of the manners and customs of the Turks.

Ino Del Castro will remember thee with grateful tenderness."

"Allah's smile will cheer thee, for thou art pure and good, lady, and though all may forsake thee, his great power will overshadow thy shrinking soul, and preserve thee from harm or evil. But stay, promise thy Zeida one thing, if thou art ransomed, that she shall share in the joy of thy liberty, as she has done in the sorrow of thy captivity. Oh! grant her the happiness of continuing thy faithful slave through all changes!"

"Alas! Zeida," replied Ino, gazing tenderly upon the anxious face of the slave, as she knelt before her, "would that it were in my power to grant thy wish, but thou knowest that I too sigh 'neath the galling chains of bondage, and no freedom of my will or action can avail any thing, unless sanctioned or directed by Stamboul."

She bent down her trembling lips and affectionately pressing the brow of the weeping girl, hoarsely murmured, "Farewell, my only friend." In a few moments, Ino Del Castro was rapidly conveyed in a close vehicle, attended by a well selected retinue, to the palace. It was with a burning cheek and beating heart she mingled with the captive throng, awaiting the summons for its appearance before the Sultan. Suddenly a loud flourish of music and the aroused excitement of those around her, proclaimed the approach of some distinguished individual. It was the brilliant train of Asma Sultana, the sister of the Sultan, on her way to the state-room, and for whom the low throne on Mahmoud's right was reserved. This amiable princess hoped by her presence and personal influence to mitigate somewhat the excesses to which this degrading exhibition might be carried, nor did she fail to remonstrate with indignation against the injustice and inhumanity of thus reducing rajahs, (as the Christian subjects were styled,) to slavery. Revolting as was the sight to one of her gentle nature, still a noble humanity impelled her to become an unwilling spectator, and doubtless to her eloquence and persevering importunity may be attributed the subsequent suppression of that barbarous custom.*

When Asma paused to survey the unhappy looking band, ranged on each side to admit the advance of her attendants, the expression of deep compassion and sympathy, so visibly imprinted on her gentle countenance, induced Ino to cast aside all feeling of restraint or fear, and throwing herself before her, she humbly, but vehemently, implored her protecting influence.

"Who is it that claims Asma's aid in this sad hour," said she, kindly taking the kneeling captive's hand, "withdraw thy veil, unfortunate Greek, and speak without fear, for a woman's heart feels for thee, and her ear ever hearkens to the accents of distress."

"It is Ino Del Castro, an orphaned Sciote and the noble Stamboul's captive," replied she, rising and lifting her veil, while she stood firm and unawed before the silent throng. Transfixed with admiration the Sultana gazed for some moments upon the beautiful face of the suppliant, then passing her hand over her eyes, she sighed deeply, and as if alone said in a low voice—

"No wonder Asma hath in vain wooed the eye and love of Stamboul, when such a being held his heart in thralldom"—then adding in a calmer tone, "do I indeed see before me the far-famed captive of that great and valiant general,—one whose beauty all now so eagerly desire to behold! Doubtless I see too in thee the betrothed of his gallant love?"

"No, great Sultana, thou only beholdest a poor heart-stricken Sciote, at present unprotected even by her generous captor. Ino Del Castro could never prove faithless to the betrothed of her early, happy youth; and Stamboul is too noble to accept the sacrifice of an unwilling hand, when Adria Marcova owns the devotion of her heart."

A second flourish of martial music interrupted the short pause of Asma's train. It proceeded from a full band of gorgeously dressed eunuchs in flowing robes, richly embroidered, and caps with waving plumes, who loudly announced the mandate of the Sultan. With a brief assurance of friendly protection, Asma bade Ino resume her place in the captive procession, which then slowly moved towards the state-room, and in a few moments stood awe struck in the presence of the "mighty one of earth." Ino saw not the vast crowd around her. She was insensible to the atmosphere of titled greatness which she was then inhaling, but instinctively her eye was raised to the face of Mahmoud upon his silver throne. That flatterer, Hope, which had so shriekingly fled from her despairing bosom, suddenly flapped its bright wing o'er its wonted resting place, when she beheld a pleasing expression of benignity in his countenance, instead of that fiend-like ferocity which her imagination had always so vividly pictured:† and wondering that one could so strangely contradict in his deeds of savage cruelty that index of the soul—the face—which was stamped with kindly feeling, she stood calm and collected amidst that imposing scene. Not until her name was loudly called was her revery of thick and coming fancies broken, or her bewildered senses recalled to a full reality of her situation.

"Approach Ino Del Castro, that our own eyes

† See Mr. Stephens' description of Mahmoud in his travels in Greece, Turkey, &c.

may acknowledge the truth of what rumor saith concerning our general's cherished captive."

Mahmoud's voice seemed to be attuned to the softest and most silvery cadence when he thus spoke.

With bowed head, though scarcely conscious of her motion, Ino obeyed, and without unveiling her face, she stood alone at the foot of the throne.

"Deign, fair lady, to dazzle our vision by withdrawing that jealous veil, which methinks thou must have adopted to enhance our surprise, since it is rather unusual for a slave, or captive, to be thus graciously shielded."

A slight hesitation at first withheld her hand, but, as if nerving herself with desperate fortitude, she drew it hastily aside, and stood, flashing with all the pride and scorn of incensed virtue, which the scene was so well calculated to arouse. Then gathering around her person the thick folds of the fallen veil, she raised her head and bent upon the Sultan a look of calm disdain apparently unmoved by the least tremor of fear.

"Allah be praised!" exclaimed Mahmoud, "we blame not the brave Stamboul for his Argus eyed watchfulness over thee, though we do confess he has proved a timid sportsman in not securing the tenderest note of love from a bird of such surpassing beauty. Come, we propose a change of cages, and would fain select thee, our favored slave of the harem."

Mahmoud arose, and with his extended hand was about to place a crown of bright flowers upon the head of the immovable Ino, when the shrill blast of a clarion caused every one to start with unwonted surprise. A sudden breaking away amongst the dense crowd was seen, and a soldier, brandishing high above his head a threatening sword, rushed through the line of officers and grandees, and casting himself before the throne, as the Sultan had just descended the last step, vehemently exclaimed.

"Forbear, forbear great Mahmoud, thy proposed selection, or further insult to yonder spotless Sciote. Behold at thy feet the champion of her innocence in Stamboul, thy favored general. Twice has it been in his power to save thy life from treachery, and in the first moments of grateful emotion, thou didst give him this jewelled cross, (holding up a cross of great brilliancy,) consecrated by thine oath, that whatsoever Stamboul should ask of thee in future, it should be faithfully granted. But it has never been his need to test a fulfilment of that oath until now; hear then his present petition. It is, (continued he rising and advancing towards Ino,) that thou wilt give me back my captive, with a promise to molest her no more."

A shade of disappointment passed over the face of the Sultan, when Stamboul paused, then as if some sudden thought flashed through his mind, a smile of scornful derision curled his lip as he said,

"By the great Mahomet! Stamboul, thy generosity and disinterestedness towards thy captive bird, is indeed marvellous, thus to desire her return to thy golden cage, after she has so long refused to respond to thy soft wooing. Methinks thou art somewhat selfish to deprive us the warbling of her music, since it is denied thine ear."

The fine form of Stamboul seemed to expand with muscular emotion; his piercing eye glared with the fire of deadly wrath, and his teeth were fiercely clenched to suppress the deep bitterness, which the taunting language of Mahmoud had aroused. But the tempest of passion passed away, ere he suffered his blanched lip to give vent to its direful force, and drawing himself erect, in all his towering height, he slowly replied—

"Since Mahmoud's oath is so slight a bond, Stamboul hath yet another plea which may not prove so fruitless in accomplishing his desires. Thou hast informed me thy coffers need replenishing; a high ransom may give me what thy honor has denied; name it, Sultan, yea if it be the price of Stamboul's head, thou shalt freely possess it." He paused in the excess of withering contempt.

"Ha! thou art indeed considerate, general, and hath touched a chord more sensitive, in Mahmoud's breast, than the beauty of thy captive could have vibrated. But we require and estimate thy valiant exertions too much, to permit the price of thy noble head to be the stake. A surrender of half thy vast estates would not, methinks, be too high a ransom for Ino Del Castro."

Stamboul approached the Sultan, and laying his sword at his feet, stepped back, saying in a clear, calm voice,

"All, every thing, and myself would be but a slight sacrifice, if it secured the freedom of Ino Del Castro, and now take with thy ransom Stamboul's sword. Perish thy oath's emblem, (throwing down the jewelled cross, and with fearful force crushing it beneath his feet,) for, in its glitter, Stamboul beholdeth only thy falsehood, and never will his hand wield a sword in the service of a perjured monarch."

A deadly silence seemed to hold every one breathless with fear; all eyes turned from the undaunted Stamboul to the abashed Sultan, whose brow was deeply contracted with suppressed rage and shame. But a soft, tremulous voice broke upon that ominous stillness. It was that of Asma Sultana, who descending her throne and extending her hand towards Stamboul, said gently,

"Stamboul, permit thy friend and princess to share with thee the ransom of thy virtuous and beautiful captive: Asma Sultana will render half of what the exaction of Mahmoud requireth of thee."

"No, most generous lady, Stamboul cannot consent to share a deed of justice with even thee, and what he hath said, by that will he firmly stand. Gladly now will he leave his country, for not the smallest portion of its wealth would he possess, so long as the tie of loyalty has been so ignobly severed. Ino Del Castro, (turning to the bewildered maiden, and respectfully taking her hand,) thou art free—aye as free as when Scio's beauteous isle owned thee its fairest flower. Although Allah hath smiled upon my efforts to restore thee thy liberty; yet, alas! I grieve to say that the joy of thy heart, in this hour, cannot be enhanced by the return, or any successful tidings of Adrian Marcova, thy betrothed. Stamboul hath sought him in vain, but rest assured that though his vow is still unpaid, yet it is deemed too sacred to be set at naught by any present failure, and no future exertion will be spared to secure thee that happiness, in love, which thy constancy and virtue deserve."

"Behold, most noble Stamboul, he whom thou hast so faithfully sought, acknowledges thy unparalleled generosity. Ino, my beloved, and is it thus we meet?" A manly form stood before him, then a faint cry, one single bound and the brave bosom of Adrian Marcova, habited as a Turkish soldier, held firmly the betrothed of his glad youth. He raised her head from his shoulder, saying in a tone of trembling joy—

"Smile now, Ino, thy tears have all been shed. Stamboul, in Odessa, thy aid-de-camp, thou beholdest Adrian Marcova, who, on hearing that his destined bride was thy captive, entered thy service hoping to gain more certain tidings of her fate. Imagine my anguish when rumor confidently asserted she was thy willing and happy captive, in consequence of which, I so eagerly accepted thy offer of bearing her thy last missive, that I might be assured of its truth, or that the 'love of other days' possessed her heart; I was convinced of her truth and fidelity, but as thou hadst so graciously confided to me thy wishes and intentions regarding her release from captivity, I forbore revealing myself, fearing that any rash act of mine would probably involve her in greater misfortunes. Besides, I had resolved to anticipate thee in rendering the ransom, and without delay sought the assistance of a friend in securing one, that the most rapacious or insatiate heart could demand. Take back thy generously forfeited estates, for Adrian Marcova claims the prerogative of releasing Ino Del Castro and can give thee, most exacting Mahmoud, double the amount of thy stated ransom."

He waved high above his head an embroidered scarf, as a signal for the appearance of some one expected. It was Ino's parting token, and no sooner was it lifted, than there stalked through the gaping, wondering crowd, a fierce and singular looking being, who passed before the throne, and scornfully threw a heavy bag of gold at the Sultan's feet, then, with a countenance expressing the most blasting ire, Lamia, the Circe of the mountains, gave vent to a loud and hissing laugh, as she spurned it with her foot, and extending her long, bony hand towards Mahmoud, she said in a voice of bitter defiance,

"Ha! Stamboul, thou mayest well blush for thy allegiance to such a blood hungered tyrant, thou hast already risked a life too precious, and wielded a sword too true in the service of such as Mahmoud. Thy resolution is a noble one, and there let it sleep quiet in its scabbard ere thou unsheath it to advocate perjury and insatiate avarice. Adrian Marcova, doff the unsightly tarbouch of the barbarous infidels, and deign no longer to wear even the semblance of subjection, to one deaf to the voice of honor or common humanity."

Lamia received the tarbouch which Adrian immediately cast from his head, and seizing the sabre from his hand, she severed it into numerous pieces, then scattering them before the silver throne, she uttered another discordant, pealing yell, adding in a tone of fearless denunciation,

"Thus may thy kingdom be blasted by the winds of destruction, and the blood of every butchered Sciote fall upon thy accursed head with tenfold vengeance."

"Stay, hag," replied the Sultan, rising as Lamia turned to depart, "Mahmoud will yet prove himself worthy of the sceptre he now wields, as also of the faithful loyalty of all his subjects; yea, even that of the magnanimous Stamboul. Not one piastre in this bag will he accept in ransom for Ino Del Castro; receive, Adrian Marcova, with thy peerless bride, the fairest portion of thy once beauteous isle as her dowry, for he now freely granteth to thee a full patent to return to Scio. Mahmoud's blessing goeth with thee. Stamboul, my valued friend and general, listen to my overtures. Although, in the moment of chagrin, I yielded my better nature to the tempter, yet conscience and honor now demand a candid retraction, which thy Sultan hesitates not to make before this present assemblage; permit him then, to renew his former oath of obligation with thee, and now not only doth he grant Ino Del Castro an unransomed liberty, but also that of every Christian captive present; regard their release as a reward of thy noble bravery, and say, can Mahmoud's overture regain thy sword's service?"

"Enough, most mighty Sultan," returned Stamboul, receiving his sword from Mahmoud, "gladly will thy general renew the blessed covenant of friendship with thee and reiterate the pledge of his life's devotion to thy will, and his country's good. Henceforth the latter shall be his only desired bride, and at her shrine alone will he bend the knee of homage. Accept then of Stamboul's most grateful thanks for this day's act of justice and humanity in releasing so numerous a band of heart-stricken captives, and proudly will his memory ever recur to it, because the event so strongly proves he serveth a noble king in heart and deed."

But Adrian and Ino's heart had become too sorely lacerated by the direful massacre of their native island, to accept of Mahmoud's patent to return to a spot so desolated. Beneath Italy's blue sky did they seek a home as beautiful, though not so endeared by early memories, where the current of their pure and united love flowed more gentle and sparkling, because of that darkness with which the cloudy past had so fearfully shadowed its once smooth and limpid brightness, and thither, too, were they attended by the faithful slave, Zeida, Stamboul's parting gift to his loved and lovely Sciote captive.

SONNETS FROM PETRARCH.

BY MARY G. WELLS.

IV.

"Benedetto sia 'l giorno, e'l mese, e'l anno."

Ah! blessed be the day, the month, the year,
 The season, time and the propitious hour,
 The lovely place, where first my sight came near
 The beaming eyes that bound me in their power.
 How blest the first sweet trouble of my breast
 That came when Love disturbed its wonted rest,
 The bended bow, the deeply piercing dart,
 The wounds inflicted on my captive heart;
 And blest the oft-repeated, tender word,
 Calling aloud my lady's cherished name,
 The scalding tears, the sighs so frequent heard,
 The pensive verse which makes her known to fame;
 And blessed be the thoughts which bid hers dwell
 The only image in my bosom's cell!

V.

"Discolorato hai Morto il piu bel viso."

Ah! Death, thou'st paled the fairest, loveliest face
 That e'er was seen, and dimmed the brightest eyes;
 Thou'st loosed the bonds that bound unto its race
 The purest soul that had on earth such ties.
 In one sad moment thou hast torn from me
 All that I loved, hast stilled the sweetest voice
 Ear ever heard, made me weep mournfully,
 Bid me in outward things no more rejoice.
 For rest and solace when oppressed by grief
 To where Religion leads her eye would turn,
 And 'mid life's cares it was her sole relief:
 Could'st speak like her, with such a lustre burn,
 Then might I smile again, then might I move
 Not man's heart only, but wild beasts to love!

VI.

"Movevi'l vecchierel canuto e bianco."

As moves the ancient man with hoary hair
 From the sweet place his age doth still adorn,
 Leaving his little family in despair,
 The absence of their well loved sire to mourn,

Far from his home with trembling step and slow,
 E'en in the darkening twilight of his day
 Intent his distant pilgrimage to go,
 Though bent by years and weary of the way:
 He reaches Rome fulfilling the desire
 His great and blest similitude to see,
 Whom yet to meet in heaven he doth aspire:
 Thus, sad and wearied, seek I patiently,
 Lady, if possible, to find a face,
 Whose features shall resemble thine in grace!

VII.

"Nill'eta sua piu bella e piu fiorita."

In life's most beautiful and most flowery morn,
 When Love exerts his all puissant sway,
 Leaving on earth her earthly form of clay,
 Laura, my very life from me was torn.
 Lovely and living to the skies she rose,
 From there she rules me, and from there commands;
 Alas! why sever not these mortal bands,
 Whose sundering shall another life disclose,
 That, as my thoughts must linger with her still,
 So, joyous, spurning sadful grief's control,
 Leaving earth's cares, may follow her my soul,
 That which delays me being only ill,
 Making me weary of my slow decay:—
 O! what a death there was three years this day!

VIII.

"Quand'io veggio dal ciel scendar l' Aurora."

When high in heaven I see Aurora rise,
 With golden ringlets and with rosy brow,
 Love seizes me; I sicken, and with sighs
 Turn pale, and say, where is my Laura now?
 Ah! blest Tithonus, well is known to thee
 The time when thy dear treasure shall return,
 But what can I without my Laurel-tree?—
 She sleeps in death whom I so sadly mourn!
 Your partings cannot cause such deep despair,
 For quiet eve at least brings her again,
 Who loves thee still despite thy silver hair.
 My nights are sad, my days are filled with pain,
 For she, who night and day my thoughts doth claim,
 Of her sweet self hath left me but the name!

IX.

"L'aura serena che fra verdi fronde."

The murmuring breeze that thro' the verdant grove
 Comes gently fanning o'er my fevered brow,
 Brings pleasant memories of the time when love
 Gave the first wounds so deeply felt e'en now.
 Once more I see the beautiful face revealed
 Which scorn and jealousy first held concealed,
 The golden hair, now bound in gems and pearls,
 Now loosely scattered in a thousand curls,
 Which she was wont to place with graceful skill,
 And gather with an soft and fair hand,
 The recollection makes my bosom thrill:
 And Time so firmly tied each knot and band,
 And laid so strong a spell upon my mind
 That Death alone the fetters can unbind!

THE MIND, ITS POWERS AND RESULTS.

Man, as is well known, is a compound being, consisting of soul and body, of mind and matter, a material and immaterial principle. The body, we are told, was formed of the dust of the earth—to dust it shall return, but the mind, the immortal principle within us, is uncreated—it was breathed into this mechanism of clay by the Great First Cause—a celestial spark struck off from the Divinity itself. This immaterial and eternal principle it is which gives to man all his dignity and importance in the scale of creation. This is the proposition we set out with and will endeavor to maintain. What is the body? It may indeed be more comely, more erect, more graceful than any other portion of God's creation, but it is feeble, frail, exposed to disease and death; even the greater part of its dignity and beauty is borrowed from the intellect or soul which flashes from the eye, and the benignity and intelligence which beam from the countenance. But the mind! who can fathom its immeasurable depths? who can measure the height and length and breadth of its mighty powers? Who can unfold the hidden mysteries of this immortal principle? There lies the unconscious infant—his form is perfect, the body and limb present evidences of future strength and power, but what indications do we observe of future mental development and intellectual greatness? Is it not a well-known fact that even the young of the brute creation manifest more evidences of mind than the infant human being? But the child grows up apace, the mental powers, by degrees, are developed—images and ideas are formed from the impression of external and material objects upon the senses. These ideas are expressed by words. The names of letters are soon acquired,—letters are combined into syllables and words,—sentences are formed, and thus new and successive floods of light and knowledge are poured into the mind, the history of past events and by-gone ages become familiar things;—an onward progress is made from science to science, from discovery to discovery, until that infant being, once even unconscious of existence, becomes a Bacon who can unfold and simplify the complicated principles of the most abstruse sciences, or a Newton who can measure the height of the sun and the planets, trace the comet in its wandering flight, and explain the laws by which the whole planetary system is regulated.

May it not, indeed, be said, with truth, that the contemplation of the human intellect, with all its vast, mysterious and complicated powers, presents a subject more replete with grandeur and sublimity, than can be afforded by all the material curiosities both of nature and of art, which the universe can afford. Think for a moment upon its wonderful and divine powers. By a single effort of the mind we can travel back, in a moment, to the creation of this world, when "God said let there be light, and there was light;" by another flash of thought we behold this great orb enveloped by a flood, and all its inhabitants buried in one common ruin; trace we then by another act of thought, the rise and fall of the great and powerful nations of the earth; we stand where once stood Carthage and Palmyra and Memphis and other splendid cities of ancient time, whose mournful relics scarcely remain to tell the story of their departed greatness; in imagination we can visit ancient Rome in all her imperial greatness and splendor, we can look upon her mighty armies and illustrious generals,—we enter the Roman Senate and gaze with admiration upon the venerable and dignified faces of those noble fathers of whom we delighted to read in our school, boy time—we recognize the bold and ambitious features of a Cæsar, the stern and inflexible countenance of a Cato,—we listen to the powerful and indignant eloquence of a Cicero driving Cataline from the Senate Chamber; and then ascending to the lofty height of some towering citadel, we can behold, in one magnificent view, this immense city, with its millions of inhabitants—the mistress of the world. More rapid than the lightning's flash, the mind transports itself to the classic shores of ancient Greece. We visit the beautiful and refined city of Athens; we gaze with delight and admiration upon the splendid temples, whose chaste and elegant architecture has served as a model for all future time—we look with rapture upon those beautiful specimens of statuary, which have distinguished Greece above all other nations; we enter her halls of learning and science, and hold converse with Socrates and Plato—we hang upon the lips of her illustrious orators, and listen with breathless attention to the bold and energetic eloquence of Demosthenes thundering forth his Philippics and urging on his countrymen to the defence of their rights and liberties. Quicker than light the mind again travels down the long track of intervening time, and we enter the portals of the great and interesting city of Jerusalem, in all its former splendor and magnificence—we behold Deity himself preaching in her temples and walking in her streets, healing the sick, giving sight to the blind, and hearing to the deaf, making the dumb to speak and bringing the dead to life. But the mind, in its still more adventurous course, leaves the earth and reaches to heaven; it traces the motions of unknown worlds—travels with the moon around the earth, the earth around the sun, and reaches to those innumerable fixed stars whose immeasurable distance has baffled all human computation; and still renewing its mysterious flight, it soars to the kingdom of the Great Omnipotent One, and beholds the Sovereign of the Universe seated upon his pure white throne, surrounded by angelic spirits who live forever in his presence and give unceasing praise and adoration to his name. Who can contemplate such a wonderful and mysterious principle in our nature without wonder, awe and admiration!

"Call now to mind what high, capacious powers
Lie folded up in man, how far beyond
The praise of mortals may the eternal growth
Of nature to perfection half divine
Expand the blooming soul. What pity then Should sloth's unkindly fogs depress to earth
Her tender blossom? Choke the streams of life
And blast her springs: far otherwise designed Almighty wisdom."

One of the most striking evidences of the power and influence of mind may be derived from the fact that, by the exertion of this principle alone, unaided by any foreign or extrinsic circumstances, individuals have, in all ages of the world, risen from the deepest obscurity to the highest elevation of fame, rank and usefulness among men. No difficulty, or embarrassment, no adversity or misfortune can keep down the energies of the powerful and elastic intellect. Every impediment, like a barrier thrown across the current of a strong and rapid stream, serves only to obstruct its progress for a moment,—it rushes forward in its subsequent course, with accumulated momentum and impetuosity. Let us direct our attention for a moment to the distinguished men of our own country. Is it from a long-descended line of noble ancestry that they have derived their greatness? Is it from the possession of extraordinary wealth and dignified titles that they have become so useful and distinguished in their career? Has not almost every distinguished character in this and every other country been the builder up of his own name, the architect of his own greatness? Had we ever heard of an illustrious Washington, a Jefferson, a Madison, a Marshall, a Calhoun, a Wirt, a Clay, or a Webster, until these men distinguished themselves by their intellectual greatness and usefulness, and built up for themselves a reputation and a name? It is all the result of mind—of intellectual power, indomitable mental energy. Does it not appear then reasonable to conclude that our proposition is correct, that it is the mind, the spark of Divinity stirring within us, which gives to man all his dignity and importance in the scale of creation? Thus far, we have alluded briefly to the powers and capacities of the human intellect, let us now turn our attention to some of the great practical results arising from these immense powers and capacities.

The time would fail even to enumerate the various and wonderful improvements and discoveries that have been made in the last few centuries by the powers of the human mind. Instead of creeping cautiously and timidly along the shore, fearing to leave the sight of land, the mariner can trace his path with certainty and precision in the wide and unknown ocean by the lights derived from mathematical and astronomical science; and how shall we begin to compute the vast and incalculable influence which has been exerted by one single power—a discovery resulting from the capacious and scientific intellect of a Fulton, whom every one that loves his country is proud to claim as an American. Let us reflect for a moment upon the wonderful and stupendous effects that must forever accrue from that one act of thought which evolved the important principle that steam could be converted into a power which would convey palaces down our noble streams—stem the impetuous currents of the most rapid rivers,—propel the largest ships across the widest oceans, and almost annihilate space by conveying us from town to town, from city to city, from almost one extremity of our country to the other. Is it not from this one cause chiefly that the whole condition of the great valley of the Mississippi has been changed in the last few years? towns and cities have sprung up as if by enchantment, so that this immense valley is rapidly becoming the most productive and populous portion of the globe. The following remarks of Mr. Alexander Everett will be read with interest by every one. They are peculiarly appropriate in illustrating this portion of our subject. Delivering his lecture while in view of the great father of rivers he says—"The scene that so often presents itself when we turn the eye from the place where we are now assembled to the celebrated stream which flows by our side, affords a more striking demonstration of the recent triumphs of physical science than could be given by volumes of description. Forty years ago there was nothing to be seen in the way of navigation on the Mississippi river but a few clumsy rafts, which, after bringing down the produce of the interior, were broken up at New Orleans, and never attempted to return, and a few small vessels struggling painfully with sails, against the current, and employing three or four months to ascend to the head of navigation. Now there is scarcely an hour in which majestic moving palaces are not seen to pass on their upward and downward progress, following or stemming the current with nearly equal facility, and performing their voyages to and from Louisville in from five to seven days; at the same time others are performing their outward and homeward voyages from Boston to New-York, across the Atlantic, in an average time from twelve to fifteen days. But in the application of steam to locomotion on railroads, the results have been, if possible, still more brilliant. Dr. Franklin, who was postmaster-general of the colonies, before the Revolution, remarked that he did not himself despair of seeing the time, when the mail should be conveyed in a fortnight from Philadelphia to Boston. Now, the mail leaves Boston at 4 o'clock in the afternoon and reaches Washington, a hundred and fifty miles beyond Philadelphia, on the evening of the following day. From New Orleans the mail is regularly carried to Boston in nine days. New Orleans is of course, for practical purposes, nearer to Boston than Philadelphia was before the Revolution. Between New Orleans, the extreme point of civilized America, and St. Petersburg, the extreme point of civilized Europe, intelligence regularly passes in five weeks." What immense results from one master effort of the human mind. The effects of this one discovery alone—the discovery and application of steam power, is sufficient to evince the paramount importance and the great superiority of knowledge over every other attainment, and that knowledge and mental cultivation, when properly and usefully applied, confer upon man his greatest honor and glory, and exert the greatest practical influence upon the condition of the world.

Let us turn our attention for a moment to another grand result of intellectual effort—a result which has changed the whole condition of mankind, and which constitutes one of the chief distinctions between savage and civilized life. I allude to the invention of that art by which thoughts and ideas are recorded and handed down to all succeeding generations. The splendid and glorious results of this art are so beautifully and eloquently described by the learned Dr. Good, and the language and sentiments are so much better than I can use myself, that I hope to be excused for quoting his words. After giving a most interesting history of this sublime art, the writer thus concludes his remarks: "Such is the history of the noblest art that has ever been invented by the unassisted efforts of the human understanding—an art that gives stability to thought, forms a cabinet for our ideas, and presents, in imperishable colors, a speaking portraiture of the soul. Without this, hard indeed would be the separation of friends, and the traveller would become an exile from his native home, vainly languishing for the consolatory information that his wife, his children, his kinsmen, his country were in a state of health and prosperity, and himself embalmed in their affections. Without this, what to us would be the wisdom of past ages, or the history of former times! The chain of nature would be broken up in all its links, and every generation become an isolated and individual world, equally cut off, as by an irremediable abyss, from its ancestors and from posterity. While the language of the lips is as fleeting as the breath itself, and confined to a single spot, as well as to a single moment, the language of the pen enjoys, in many instances, an adamant existence, and will only perish amid the ruins of the globe. Before its mighty touch, time and space become annihilated; it joins epoch to epoch and pole to pole, it gives unity to the works of creation and providence and enables us to trace from the beginning of things to the end. It is the great sun of the moral world that warms and stimulates and irradiates and develops and matures the best virtues of the heart, and the best faculties of the intellect. But for this, every thing would be darkness and doubt and death-shade; all knowledge would be traditionary and all experience local; civilized life would relapse into barbarian, and man would have to run through his comparatively little and insignificant round of existence—the perpetual sport of ignorance and error, uninstructed by science, unregulated by laws, unconsolated by revelation."

But the mind, still pressing forward in the career of improvement and sublime results, strikes out, in the 15th century, another discovery, or rather invention, still more important in its consequences than the art of writing. I allude to the art of printing. When the first book appeared from the press of the well-known Aldo Manutius, in 1497, a new era dawned upon the world, an era which will be memorable as long as time and even eternity itself shall last. The most vivid and fertile imagination, the most prophetic and far-reaching intellect cannot begin to conceive of the immense influence which this one master effort of the human mind must exert upon all succeeding generations. The time was, when a few manuscripts were considered a large library, and without the invention of the art of printing, those nations which are now highly distinguished for literature and science must have been still enveloped in ignorance and barbarism. What more than the art of printing contributed to the revival of learning which had been buried in midnight darkness for more than ten centuries! By this art, books upon books on every useful subject have been multiplied without number, and a respectable library can now be obtained for a few hundred dollars, an amount which, previous to this time, might not have purchased more than one valuable manuscript. Reflect for a moment upon the influence of the press. By this means news and information on all subjects are distributed in a short time to every portion of the civilized world, and an inconceivable influence is exerted upon its social, religious and political condition. To the Christian and philanthropist, this subject presents a view which is particularly interesting and gratifying. He delights to look abroad over the world and observe the unbounded influence, which this art has exerted in diffusing the Gospel of sacred truth through almost every country and nation of the earth, and shedding the divine light of sacred truth upon millions who otherwise must have remained forever in ignorance and gross superstition—an art which must ever be regarded as one of the most efficient means or instruments in bringing about that happy period, when the glories of divine truth shall shine as the noonday in the darkest corners of the earth and illuminate the benighted mind of every idolatrous and superstitious nation on the globe. Is it necessary to adduce other instances of the wondrous results of the mind—the thinking principle of our natures! We might allude to the numerous improvements in the arts and sciences—in chemistry, medicine, geology, botany, natural philosophy, astronomy—in music and painting and a host of others, but the time would fail us. But there is one sublime and all-memorable result of the bold and majestic powers of the human mind with which I shall conclude this portion of our subject. I allude to the unrivalled and collective wisdom of those distinguished patriots and philosophers who devised and put in order the articles of that free and glorious constitution which they have bequeathed to us, and under which we enjoy a liberty and prosperity unrivalled in the annals of history. And may I not here digress a moment, and remark that every citizen of our country should bear in mind that this free constitution, the result of so much wisdom and thought, can only be sustained in all its vigor and purity, by a continuation of that wisdom and enlightened intellect which first put it into operation. And is it not the duty of each one of us, to exert all his influence, however limited or extensive it may be, to diffuse just and enlightened principles throughout our country; as far as he is able, to encourage education and the distribution of general knowledge, so that this rich inheritance may be preserved pure and unsullied, and be handed down to posterity as a legacy more precious than gold or silver or lands? Thus I have attempted, in a brief and cursory manner, to describe some of the wonderful powers of that mysterious and immortal principle of our nature denominated mind, and have likewise endeavored to trace out some of the grand and sublime results accruing to society and to the world from the operation of this divine principle. And if my arguments have been correct, we are necessarily led to the conclusion, or to the truth of the principle with which I set out, that the mind and the application of its powers to high and useful purposes, confer upon man his greatest dignity and honor. I hope I may not be understood as arguing for the cultivation of the intellectual faculties alone, to the exclusion of the culture of the moral powers. The moral faculties as essentially constitute a part of the mind as the intellectual, and the individual who cultivates the latter to the neglect of the former is only cultivating a part of his mind, and the culture must therefore be very imperfect. There is a close and intimate connexion between the moral and intellectual faculties, and it would require a distinct essay to trace out the relations which they bear to each other. There is one remark which we wish to make in this connexion, and that is, that the culture and development of the moral powers seem to throw a light and vigor into the intellectual faculties which are sometimes astonishing and almost supernatural. We have a passage in the Scripture which says, "The entrance of God's words giveth light, it giveth understanding to the simple;" and from this text the Rev. H. Melville has preached one of the most able and interesting sermons I have ever read, demonstrating the influence which the culture of the moral feelings exerts in enlarging and developing the intellectual faculties. On this subject, the celebrated Dr. Channing has the following eloquent and impressive sentiment which ought to sink deeply into every mind. He says, "The exaltation of talent as it is called, is the curse of the age;—Education is now chiefly a stimulus to learning and thus acquires power without the principles which alone make it good. Talent is worshipped, but if divorced from rectitude will prove more a demon than a God." From these remarks, it may be seen, that though in this essay so much importance is attached to the powers of the intellect, yet it is far from the object of the writer to divorce that connexion which should always subsist between the intellectual and moral powers. On the other hand, we believe that they should be united by an indissoluble tie, and that all our intellectual operations should be impelled and stimulated by moral and religious feelings, so that high and holy results may ensue—results useful to man's condition in this world and conducive to his eternal interests in another and better state of existence.

Having endeavored to point out some of the most prominent and important results which have been produced in the world by the operations of mind, and traced out briefly the influences of these results upon the condition of the world, if our premises and reasonings are sound, we are compelled to infer that it is the duty of every member of society to use all the influence, he can exert in every possible way, in the promotion of education and the diffusion of useful knowledge. There is no possible excuse which any individual can make for the neglect of this duty. Every man has his influence, and every man is bound to exert it for the welfare of his fellow-men. We might mention various modes by which men should exert their influence in the promotion of education and useful knowledge, but our limits will only permit us to allude to one, and this we believe to be one of the most important in its character and most universal in its operation. I mean the establishment of Lyceums in every town and village of our country—institutions which might appropriately be called the people's university, where men of all ranks and grades, from the highest to the lowest, may attend gratuitously and learn lessons of practical wisdom and truths of infinite value. We believe it is the dawning of a better and happier era in our country, that these institutions are so rapidly increasing in number in every portion of our union, and that the lectures which are delivered by able individuals, are attracting more attention in our cities than theatres and balls and other places of vain and trifling amusements. I cannot understand the consistency of that man who believes that the permanency of our republican institutions depends upon the enlightenment of the people, and yet refuses to give his aid and encouragement to those very means which are best calculated to instruct and enlighten. Let us describe in a few words the manner in which these institutions are calculated to be so useful. A number of gentlemen meet together and form an association, and denominate it a Lyceum, or give it any other name which they deem appropriate. They meet weekly or semi-monthly as may be considered most convenient. At each meeting, one of the members, previously appointed, is expected to deliver an address on some useful, interesting subject. Out of a large number of members, there would be no difficulty in selecting an individual who might have sufficient leisure to prepare an address. Very little expense attends the formation of an association of this kind. It is a source of improvement to members by affording an opportunity of devoting leisure time to some useful and interesting theme which is to be the subject of discourse at some future period. The audience is interested and benefitted by obtaining, in a short period, all the ideas and information which the lecturer may have been collecting for weeks. The ladies delight to honor such meetings with the light of their countenances. With minds inquisitive for knowledge, and pleased to encourage every institution which has for its object the promotion of useful knowledge and sound morality, they gladly give the influence of their presence in its encouragement. If the number of members will justify it, with a small expense to each one, a good, useful library can be obtained, the ablest and most interesting literary journals and papers are added, and thus every means afforded for the attainment of sound, useful practical knowledge, which are found in the best colleges and universities of our country. Thousands of such institutions have already sprung up, but we believe that they ought to be much more numerous; there are many towns and villages which have no institutions of this kind, where nothing prevails but a sordid lust for lucre, and where, by the exertion of a few enterprising young men, a flourishing Lyceum could soon be established. And even in some of the largest and finest cities in our country, there is not more than one institution of this kind, where there ought to be a dozen. But I fear I am becoming tedious, and must forbear further remarks upon this interesting topic. I have insisted the more upon this method of diffusing useful knowledge, because I believe there is no other plan half so effectual in enlightening the minds of the grown-up portion of every community, besides the great moral benefits derived by drawing their attention to subjects of utility and importance, instead of frequenting the haunts of dissipation and vice.

In concluding this humble attempt to illustrate the high honor and dignity which mental cultivation and learning confer upon man, and their great utility and importance to the world, I beg leave to conclude in the beautiful and eloquent language of one of the ablest and most elegant writers of our country.* "It has been my lot, gentlemen, to travel farther and to see mankind under a greater number of phases than you have, and I can confidently say that every where, talent and learning command the admiration and respect of the world; every where do these accomplishments call forth the homage of mankind, either voluntary or involuntary. It is this homage which makes the man of learning the citizen of the world, and gives him the hospitality and patronage of nations. The man of learning is justly regarded as the benefactor of the human race, and the wars and strifes of nations are suspended as to him. Even States that have fallen into iniquity, and have shed the blood of the innocent, have been known to pause in their career, whilst they paid a tribute of respect to the man of science. At that period when the dreadful guillotine was shedding torrents of blood in Revolutionary France, when the moral elements of our nature seemed, in that devoted country, to have risen in rebellion against their God, and the conscience of man appeared forever silenced; when every demon of discord and violence seemed for the time to be let loose to plague the nations of the world, even in such a period did the national assembly stop in its mad career, to pay a tribute of homage and respect to science by decreeing three days mourning for the death of Benjamin Franklin. What a trophy was this to be won by science amid the raging elements of discord and faction."

TO THE PRESIDENT'S BRIDE.

BY OWEN G. WARREN.

The flowers and stars were equal in their birth—
Beauty and purity to both were given—
The flowers became the poetry of earth,
And the bright stars the poetry of heaven.

The star of evening, for the reigning star,
From sea-foam bed the humbler planets chose;
And earth's sweet blossoms gathered from afar,
And paid their grateful homage to the rose.

In thee, the queenly rose and star of even Blend all their brightness, fragrantcy and power.
Thou, in thy varied gifts from earth and heaven,
Hast all the beauty of the star and flower.

And thus thou wert created, radiant one!
Thy soul, God's masterpiece—the Powers above
Made thee in form more glorious than the sun,
And Nature gave the kindling spark of love.

Upon thy brow the snow-flake found a home
Pure as itself, and even more chastely fair;
Morn came and looked upon thy cheek's rich bloom,
Melting to white, and died of envy there.

His pearls old Ocean brought to form thy teeth;
His coral for thy lips; and Earth bestowed
Her south wind from the spice isles for thy breath,
That forth in tones of melting sweetness flowed.

The star-queen, seeking an immortal home,
More beautiful than aught above the skies,
In orbs where intellect of angels shone,
Seated her living glory in thine eyes.

All this and more, divinest one, art thou—
Thy silken tresses float upon the air,
And wanton o'er the marble of thy brow,
As 'twere Elysium to be prisoners there.

Thy neck is white as thine own purity;
Thy queenly figure, faultless in its grace;
Nought but thyself can be compared to thee,
To tell the heavenly wonders of thy face.

Long live thy beauty—and when time must be,
That from yon skies thy starry soul shall beam,
May still the living memory of thee
O'er every generous spirit reign supreme.

THE PLEA OF INSANITY IN CRIMINAL CASES.

BY FORBES WINSLOW, Esq.

MEMBER OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS, LONDON.

The above is the title of a work, which was sent forth, in December last, by the enterprising publisher of the Law Library. It is one of the few books of real merit to be found among the numberless trashy publications which now deluge our land like another Egyptian plague of locusts.

The plea of insanity in criminal cases has become so common in our courts of law, that its bare mention excites a smile. This does not arise from an impression that the plea is an altogether groundless one, for the fact of its universality proves that there is in behalf of the unfortunate class a general sympathy, to which counsel have found it convenient to appeal. But this universality shows also that, in any case which will admit the shadow of a presumption of insanity, the plea may be offered with some chance of success. Unless we suppose, then, the great body of criminals to be insane, there must be a fault somewhere. It would be a most unjust and uncharitable imputation to charge a want of integrity, or a neglect of duty, upon our judges or jurymen; it follows therefore, that this fault must be in the mode of trial.

It is a well settled and judicious rule, which throws the burden of proof upon the objector to an established institution. Before pronouncing faulty a mode of trial, which has come down from the highest antiquity, and which has furnished a subject of eulogy for some of the wisest men who have ever lived, it is becoming to examine the question with candor and deliberation. Let us look a little then at the usual course of proceeding in the trial of a criminal case, where the subject of insanity is involved. The prisoner at the bar is charged with murder. Evidence has been adduced sufficient to show that it was his hand which gave the fatal blow. Unless the contrary can be proved, the malice necessary to make him guilty of the crime will be presumed. The plea of insanity is put in, and witnesses are examined to establish the fact. The jury is composed of honest and respectable men, who are actuated by the most praiseworthy desire of performing their duty. They are men of good, plain, common sense; are industrious, and in every way qualified to fill their several stations in society. They could answer, without the slightest hesitation, any question relating to the every day business of life. But now they are placed in new and trying circumstances. The life of a fellow being is at stake. It is in their power either to restore him to his family, or to consign him to the hands of the executioner. Of their decision they must give account in the day of final retribution. They are called upon to pierce through the outward acts into the hidden recesses of the heart, to note the thoughts and feelings of the prisoner, to take into account his eccentricities and caprices, to estimate the probable effects of a certain hallucination or delusion, and after the consideration of all these circumstances, to pronounce upon his moral responsibility. They perceive the difficulties of the case, and also the necessity of coming to some conclusion. They are perplexed, they hesitate, they feel incompetent to the task. Medical gentlemen are called into court, and are examined as to the nature of insanity in general, and their opinion of this case in particular. They are questioned and cross questioned, by gentlemen of the bar, who have, perhaps, just enough acquaintance with medical jurisprudence, to enable them to ask questions which no man can answer. The medical men will probably decline giving a positive opinion upon many points. The judge then delivers his charge, which is made up of the sometimes contradictory opinions of all the distinguished lawyers who have preceded him. The case then rests with the jury. The jurymen put together the legal tests which have been given them by the judge, the arguments of the lawyers, the opinions of the physicians, and their own confused ideas of the case, and are more at a loss than before. They are afraid to pronounce the prisoner innocent, and they are not sure he is guilty. The judge told them, that if, after mature deliberation, they had a reasonable doubt, they must throw it in favor of the prisoner. They have doubts, they cannot know that the prisoner was of sound mind at the time of the commission of the act, they do not know that he committed the act with malicious intent; they must, therefore, either bring in no verdict at all, or else one of not guilty.

If this be a fair statement, it is not difficult to understand, without impugning the motives of judge or jury, how so many infamous characters are turned loose upon society, whom public opinion has almost unanimously pronounced worthy of death. Nor is it surprising, that the plea of insanity should rank, in vulgar estimation, on a par with an alibi. It is, I acknowledge, much easier to point out defects in an established system, than to devise a better. And even supposing a substitute to be proposed, which promises to be free from some of these defects, it is still a serious question, whether these improvements be sufficiently great to counterbalance the loss of that veneration for old and time-honored institutions, which seems an inherent principle of human nature. It is certainly a matter of no little consequence, in a country, so new as ours, and among a people so prone to innovation, in a land where the most important revolutions may be effected by the popular will, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye, to cherish this feeling of reverence for the institutions of our forefathers and thus to oppose some barrier to the spirit of perpetual change. But there are a few facts connected with this subject which must not be left out of view.

1. The people can at any time they may deem proper make any change in the present system of jurisprudence.

2. Public opinion seems to be, that there are defects in the mode of trial in criminal cases, which call for remedy.

3. Some change may then be expected before the lapse of many years.

4. In order, that when the time shall come, legislators may act in an intelligent manner, and in accordance with the wishes of their constituents, it is expedient that different schemes be laid before the public, and their merits fully discussed.

With regard to the plan suggested by Dr. Winslow, for the establishment of a separate jurisdiction, presided over by persons whose attention has been specially directed to the study of mental aberration, it would be impossible to form an opinion, without a more particular account of the whole system. It is much to be regretted, that the author has not entered more into detail upon this point. Whatever may be thought of the practicability of his scheme, there can be no doubt of the propriety of having judges as thoroughly acquainted as may be with the subject upon which they are to adjudicate.

"No man," says Dr. Winslow, "is considered competent to give an opinion on a complicated question of mechanics, who has not paid some attention to the science; neither would the evidence of the first physician or surgeon in Europe be of any value on an intricate point of law. If an attempt were made to bring forward such evidence, in support of any case requiring for its elucidation a knowledge of either mechanics or law, the counsel would expose himself to the laughter of the court; yet medical knowledge is thought to come by intuition; the jury, not one of whom may have seen a case of insanity, or have given the subject a moment's consideration, are called upon to decide whether the mind, in a particular case, is sufficiently well balanced to enable its possessor to form an accurate judgment between right and wrong; or, in other words, whether a person alleged to be insane ought to be viewed as a responsible agent." But the main object of the work is not to find fault with the present mode of trial, or to propose a better, but simply, taking matters as they stand, to furnish, in as small a compass as possible, to those who are called upon to adjudicate in criminal cases, a correct notion of the law in relation to the plea of insanity, and to enable them to form an accurate judgment of the presence of insanity in any case in which it is said to exist.

Mental insanity is either partial, or total. With regard to the irresponsibility of persons totally insane, there has never been a question. With regard to partial insanity, there are almost as many different opinions as there are individuals. Lord Coke held that nothing but a total absence of understanding and memory can excuse a person, while some of the medical writers of the present day, think the infliction of punishment cannot be justified in any case, where insanity is established in the slightest degree. Dr. Winslow takes a medium ground.

"I am not prepared," he says, "to give an unqualified adherence to the doctrine, that the presence of a disordered mind ought invariably to shield a person from responsibility; for there are many cases of insanity, in which the patient appears to be perfectly competent to form a correct process of reasoning, is aware of his legal irresponsibility, and knows the distinctions between right and wrong."

"An intriguing, unruly, vicious madman, was detected with a piece of iron which he had contrived to shape like a dagger; into this iron he fixed a handle. The weapon was firmly taken away from him. He immediately became excessively abusive, and he was placed under restraint. After this he was more violent, and uttered the most revolting imprecations. In a fit of fury he exclaimed to the keeper, 'I'll murder you yet! I am a madman and they cannot hang me for it.'"

"When Martin set fire to York-Minster, a conversation took place among the inmates of a neighboring mad-house relating to the circumstance. The question discussed was, whether Martin would suffer the extreme penalty of the law for the crime. Various were the opinions expressed. In the midst of the conversation, one patient, apparently as mad as the rest, exclaimed—"He (Martin) will not be hanged—of course he will escape." "For what reason?" asked several voices. "They cannot hang him," replied the lunatic, "because he is mad, he is one of ourselves."

"I would not, however, pronounce a hasty or inconsiderate judgment in cases of this character. We know so little of the workings of the human mind, either in its healthy or morbid states, that it is a point of great difficulty; in fact, almost an impossibility to detect the line of demarkation between responsibility and irresponsibility, or where one commences and the other terminates. This is a subject, however, which requires more consideration than medical jurists have hitherto given to it."

It has long been attempted to fix upon some accurate test, to which all cases of alleged insanity may be brought, and the question of responsibility determined. Dr. Winslow doubts the propriety of such attempts.

"The judges of the land," he remarks, "appear to have no settled or clear views on the subject of insanity. This may in a great measure arise from their attempting to define insanity. The disease does not admit of being defined. It is not in the power of any human being to embody within the limits of a definition all the peculiar and characteristic symptoms of mental derangement. The malady assumes so many forms, and exhibits itself in such Protean shapes, that it is out of our power to give any thing bearing the semblance of a correct or safe definition of the disorder—a definition that could be referred to as a standard in doubtful cases of deranged mind. If it be difficult to embrace within the bounds of one sentence any thing like a true description of the symptoms of general mental aberration, a fortiori, how abortive must be the attempt to lay down any rule by which we are to test in any particular case the presence or absence of moral responsibility."

The general principle upon which courts of justice seem to have acted in this country and in England, is, that a person who is capable of distinguishing right from wrong—of knowing that the crime of which he may stand accused is an offence against the laws of God and nature, is a responsible agent. It must be admitted that these are not perfect tests in all cases of alleged insanity. Take for example the hypothetical case proposed by Lord Erskine in his speech on the trial of Hadfield, for firing upon George the Third.

"Let us suppose," says his Lordship, "the character of an insane delusion consists in the belief that some given person was any brute animal or an inanimate being, (and such cases have existed,) and that upon the trial of such a lunatic for murder, you being upon your oaths convinced, upon the uncontradicted evidence of one hundred persons, that he believed the man he had destroyed to be a potter's vessel: that it was quite impossible to doubt that fact, although to all other intents and purposes he was sane; answering, reasoning, and acting as men, not in any manner tainted with insanity, converse and reason, and conduct themselves; suppose further, that he believed the man whom he destroyed, but whom he destroyed as a potter's vessel, to be the property of another; and that he had malice against such supposed person, and that he meant to injure him, knowing the act he was committing to be malicious and injurious; and that, in short, he had full knowledge of all principles of good and evil; yet, would it be possible to convict such a person of murder, if, from the influence of his disease, he was ignorant of the relation in which he stood to the man he had destroyed, and was utterly unconscious that he had struck at the life of a human being?"

So long as the present method of trial continues, it must be important that judicial decisions be regulated by some general rules, in order that the administration of justice be uniform, and not forever subject to change according to the views of individuals. The proposed tests seem to be coming more and more complete; may it not be hoped then, notwithstanding the skepticism of Dr. Winslow and others, that some general principles will be fixed upon, which may be applied to all cases?

There are many subjects of interest suggested by the perusal of this part of our author's treatise, upon which it would be pleasant and profitable to dwell, but the limits of this article prevent. There is another species of insanity, to which Dr. Winslow invites the particular attention of the reader, and which is well worthy of such attention. I mean moral insanity.

The term, moral insanity, is used to express a disease, which has, for a few years past, engaged the attention of writers upon medical jurisprudence. The peculiar features which distinguish this from other forms of mania, have never been very accurately determined. Some persons are altogether skeptical with regard to the existence of such a disease and contend that it differs, in no wise, from mere moral depravity. It has received some countenance in the courts of France, but has not, that I am aware, been recognized in those of England or America. Dr. Winslow speaks of it as "a disordered condition of the moral affections and propensities, unaccompanied by any delusion of the intellectual powers. In these cases," he continues, "the person manifests no mental delusion; is not monomaniacal; has no hallucination; does not confound fancies with realities; but simply labors under a morbid state of the feelings and affections, or, in other words, a diseased volition. The intellectual faculties are apparently sound; the person often exhibits superior mental capacity, reasons ably, is conscious of his moral relationship, performs all the duties of life with praiseworthy and scrupulous exactness, and yet may be morally insane."

It is rather difficult to conceive of the nature of that insanity, which "exhibits superior mental capacity, reasons ably, is conscious of moral relationships, and performs all the duties of life with praiseworthy and scrupulous exactness." Nor is it easy to reconcile this agreeable description with the histories of some of the individuals who are referred to as examples of this kind of insanity. The names of Tiberius and of Frederick William of Prussia are associated in our minds with qualities and dispositions of a very opposite character. Many of the alleged cases of this disease which are brought forward by Dr. Winslow have nothing in them palliating, or calculated to awaken our sympathies. Neither do they contain any wonderful particulars, which are not easily to be accounted for, without resorting to the supposition of a disease, that is, of any other disease than that which is inherent in the nature of every individual of our fallen race. Who can discover in the story of the spoiled child any thing which may not be found in the story of a thousand other spoiled children. Each circumstance in his history grows naturally out of a preceding one.

"An only son of a weak and indulgent mother was encouraged in the gratification of every caprice and passion of which an untutored and violent temper was susceptible. The impetuosity of his disposition increased with his years. The money with which he was lavishly supplied removed every obstacle to the indulgence of his wild desires. Every instance of opposition or resistance roused him to acts of fury. He assailed his adversaries with the ferocity of a savage; sought to reign by force; and was perpetually embroiled in quarrels. If a dog, a horse, or any other animal offended him, it was instantly put to death. If he ever went to a fete, or any other public meeting, he was sure to excite such tumults and quarrels as terminated in a bloody nose. This wayward youth, however, when unmoved by passions, possessed a perfectly sound judgment. When he became of age he succeeded to the possession of an extensive domain. He proved himself fully competent to the management of his estate, as well as to the discharge of his relative duties, and he even distinguished himself by acts of beneficence and compassion. Wounds, law suits and pecuniary compensations were generally the consequences of his unhappy propensity to quarrel. But an act of notoriety put an end to his career of violence. Enraged with a woman who had used offensive language to him, he precipitated her into a well. A prosecution was commenced against him; on the deposition of several witnesses, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the Bicetre."

There is no mystery in this young man's career. The same train of circumstances, the same indulgence of every passion, and the same gratification of every desire, would transform the loveliest disposition into the image of a beast. There is nothing which can shield such a person from the arm of the law, that might not apply as well to any criminal case. Nor can there be found any thing more excusable in the account of the "intelligent and plausible man, who is represented as having been a scourge to his family in childhood, having been turned out of the army as an incorrigible villain, having attempted the life of a soldier, and subsequently endeavoring to murder his father." Nor in the long list of crimes which were committed by the monster Tiberius, nor in the cruelty of the tyrannical Frederick William. It is a false humanity, a morbid sympathy that would rescue such deeds from ignominy and their authors from disgrace. If cases like these are to come within the limits of moral insanity, and the plea be recognized in courts of justice, vice may stalk abroad with impunity, and innocence will have lost her protection. The cowardly wretch who has yet some fragments of conscience left, and halts in the career of transgression, who dares only venture upon some petty offence, must suffer the penalty of the law; while he who imbrues his hand in a father's blood may escape. The youthful offender, whose heart is not yet seared to the stings of remorse, is held responsible, while the Judases and Caligulas go free.

In cases like the following, the circumstances are very different and the question of responsibility becomes an intricate one.

"Dr. Zimmerman relates the case of a peasant, born at Krumbach, in Suabia, who was often attacked with an irresistible inclination to commit murder. He felt the approach of the fit many hours, and sometimes a whole day before its invasion, and from the commencement of this presentiment he begged to be secured and chained, that he might not commit some dreadful crime. 'When the fit comes on,' he says, 'I feel under the necessity to kill, even were it a child.' His parent, whom he tenderly loved, he declared would be the first victim of this murderous propensity. 'My mother,' he cried out, with a frightful voice, 'save yourself, or I must kill you.' Before the fit he complains of being exceedingly sleepy; without being able to sleep he feels depressed, and experiences slight twitchings in the limbs. During the fit he preserves his consciousness, and knows perfectly well that, in committing a murder, he would be guilty of an atrocious crime. When he is disabled from doing injury he makes the most frightful contortions and grimaces, singing or talking in rhyme. The fits last from one to two days. When they are over he cries out, 'Now unbind me. Alas! I have suffered cruelly, but I rejoice that I have killed nobody.'"

"Dr. Marechal relates the case of a lady unhappily married. She had a child, whom she nursed for the period of three months, at which time she became melancholy, and was often seen in tears. One day, when sitting near the fire, she exclaimed with eagerness and agony, 'snatch the child from me or I will throw it in the flames.' She then confessed that for a long time she had been struggling against an almost irresistible impulse to destroy the child, and that on approaching a window or fire the desire always revived. The infant was taken from her; she became melancholy; and lamenting her unhappy propensity, attempted suicide. She recovered, but three days afterwards had a relapse; and in the second month of nursing was seized with the same unnatural propensity, and after resisting its force for some time again parted with the child, and horrified at her own condition, repeatedly tried to commit self-destruction."

There is much to excite our sympathies in the condition of the man struggling with the desire of committing an act which is revolting to his sensibilities; in his maternal love, his agony and sufferings, and above all in his tender solicitude lest any one should be injured. And still more in the miserable condition of the mother tempted to destroy the infant of her bosom. To one who is inclined to believe that the day of demoniacal possession has not gone by, such instances would afford strong confirmation of his opinion. The desire which impels these unhappy persons to homicide and suicide appears so inconsistent with their general dispositions, it is difficult to conceive it to be a part of the same nature. Consciousness is not lost and there is no perceptible delusion; yet the mind appears to be in a most unnatural state. Dr. Winslow thinks, "that if the mental condition of these patients were carefully inquired into, we should generally discover the presence of some hallucination, or perversion of the mental faculties, conjoined with the horrible destructive impulses which appear to be the only indications of the presence of insanity." If this point could be established, it would greatly facilitate the determination of the question of responsibility. The slightest mental derangement would be sufficient to mark the difference between the moral mania and a vicious disposition. It is true, that the acts in the cases related by Drs. Marechal and Zimmerman, appear to be committed by involuntary agents, and if so, one essential would be wanting to constitute moral responsibility. But there is a difficulty in predicating a want of volition in such cases. Either the act is committed without any mental operation, and the man is a mere machine, or else it must be a voluntary act. But, although the will is not dethroned, yet it seems to occupy a subordinate station. No motive can be discovered which will account for the crime; on the contrary, the act is committed in opposition to the criminal's ideas of right and wrong, and the best feelings of his nature. There is no assignable cause for the act, except the irresistible propensity to kill. But a desire, or propensity, cannot govern a man's actions immediately. There must be the interposition of some executive power and this power is usually called the will—still if the desire be absolutely irresistible, the will becomes enslaved, and although an act under such circumstances is in some sense a voluntary one, yet it cannot be called a free act. Whether we suppose, then, the ruling power to be an unnatural propensity, the result of a diseased condition of the body, or one of the emissaries of the Prince of Darkness, it seems hard to hold the afflicted person responsible. This whole subject is a new one, and lays open a wide field for philosophical inquiry. It is impossible, at this stage of the investigation, to lay down any general principle to be applied to alleged cases of the disease. It is hoped, however, that the sympathy which is now so universal in behalf of the insane, and the interest which is exhibited by medical jurists, will lead to the establishment of some fixed rules, which may serve at least as useful a purpose, in guiding the decisions of our courts of judicature, as those now employed in ordinary cases of mental insanity.

Dr. Winslow treats briefly of several other states of the mind, as to drunkenness and somnambulism; the sleeping and the sleep-waking state. There are many interesting questions concerning the phenomena of these states, which must be passed over for the present. In conclusion, I cannot too strongly recommend the perusal of Dr. Winslow's little treatise to all who feel interested in the cause of humanity. Sympathy for the afflicted is most honorable and praiseworthy, but the protection of society, and the punishment of the guilty, demand that this sympathy should be an enlightened one. Let not the individual who has no control over his actions suffer the extreme penalty of the law, nor yet the real criminal escape, merely because of the enormity of his crime, and the depravity of his heart.

THE IRON STEED.

From a Poem.

BY PAYNE KENYON KILBOURN.

VI.

'Twas a glorious union when Nature and Science,
By the goddess of Art, to the altar were led!
The Iron Steed sprang from the hallowed alliance,
And forth on his errand of glory he sped.
All hail! to the Iron Steed, now and forever!
On land and on ocean the truest and best;
He will browse on the forest, and drink from the river,
And work night and day without stopping to rest!

VII.

Who so faithful and fearless in battle as he!—
His harness is ringing—he pants for the fight!

Woe ! woe ! to the warrior on shore or on sea,
When th' invincible war-horse goes forth in his might !
Unblenching, and true to his terrible trust,
He tramples alike on the living and slain !
He grindeth the face of the foe in the dust,
And the dying man pleadeth for mercy in vain.

VIII.

With the breathings of flame and the roar of the thunder,
He is winding his way o'er prairie and mountain ;
The gaunt wolf looks out from his covert with wonder,
And the red man awakes from his dream by the fountain.
The steed of the desert, which ever before
Unrivalled had roamed o'er his wilderness-track,
Sees his glory eclipsed,—he shall lord it no more,
For the fearful invader hath beckoned him back !

IX.

Ever on—ever on—like the sun in his course—
O'er the sands of the line, and the snows of the pole,
Unwasted, unwearied, the huge Iron Horse
Speedeth on, as the racer speeds on to the goal !
His footstep is heard in the Russian domains,
By the lords of the Kremlin, the serfs of the Czar ;
How swiftly he sweeps o'er the ice-covered plains,
Where the rein-deer once trode his lone journey afar !

X.

What a clatter of hoofs !—what a rattling and din !—
What a whirling of chariot-wheels follow his track !—
He reaches the sea, and he plunges in,
And receding shores echo his winnowings back,
And away o'er the waters exulting he speeds,
With his rivetted lungs and his sinews of steel ;
In swiftmess outstripping the fleetest of steeds,
And tossing the foam in the wake of his keel !

XI.

The Islanders bailed his approach from afar,
As the mightiest monster they ever set eyes on ;
'Twas a presage of wrath, or an omen of war,
And they watched it, and prayed, till it met the horizon :
Still nearer, still brighter the lurid light shines !
There's a sound on the air, and a wake on the wave !
Old Neptune, affrighted, his sceptre resigns,
And dives down the deep to his nethermost cave.

XII.

What a shudder of gloom—what a fearful commotion—
O'ertakes the poor hind in his birchen canoe,
When the dimness of night settles down on the ocean,
And the terrible torch blazes red on his view !
He watches its light as he sees it advancing—
He lists, and a hoarse breathing breaks on his ear ;
And a sound as of armies of war-horses prancing,
And a plunging and roar marked the monsters career.

XIII.

The mermaids were singing a dirge o'er the wreck
Of a gaily-rigged schooner, whose crew were all drowned ;
But they threw down their lyres, and deserted the deck,
As they heard in the distance the horrible sound.
The sea-serpent paused on his cruise to Nahant,
As he heard the huge fellow away in his rear ;

With a shake of his head, and his eyes all aslant,
He whispered, " What doeth the land-lubber here ? "

XIV.

The weather-worn tar, who had buffeted long
The wrath of the seas and the frowns of the world ;
Yet ever had welcomed them all with a song,
And drank to his love when the canvass was furled ;—
Even he looked perplexed, and grew pale in his turn,
As he took down his glass for a closer inspection,
And eyed the " strange craft " from its stem to its stern,
His judgment vibrating from fear to reflection.

XV.

He had danced on the deep to the music of storms,
And laughed till the darkness and tempest were o'er ;
He had looked upon Death in its fearfullest forms,
But he never had met such a monster before !
At the stranger's approach his ambition was stirred,
And he sang, as the shrouds to the zephyrs were cast,—
" Bear away ! bear away ! Spread the sails to the gales,
The " true Yankee " sailor was never yet past ! "

XVI.

There are fancies and facts which the muse may not mention,
All recorded and vouched for again and again,
How the tribes of the deep met in solemn convention,
And humbly implored him to leave their domain,
And tradition yet tells of the hosts that assembled,
In order of battle, from regions afar ;
And the water-nymphs wept, and the ocean-gods trembled,
As the Triton-trumps sounded the summons to war !

XVII.

Make way for the Iron Steed !—hither he comes,
With the freight of all kingdoms and climes richly laden,
He beareth the exiled away from their homes—
He bringeth the lost lover back to his maiden.
He cometh—he goeth !—how widely apart
We are torn, ere the tears of departure are dry !—
The herald of gladness to many a heart—
How many will hail his approach with a sigh !

XVIII.

Unscathed by the tempest, unharmed by the flood,
He must speed on his way till his mission shall cease ;
In Battle, the fiercest avenger of blood,
Yet swiftest to carry the message of Peace !
He must haste—he must haste—to the nations benighted,
And scatter the darkness that broods in their skies,
Till the lamps of the Cross on their altars are lighted,
And DEATH, the pale Steed of the battle-field, dies !

XIX.

The Chains of Attraction hath hitherto bound him,—
How glorious his flight, from his trammels set free !
Though a giant when viewed by the mites that surround him,
He's an infant to what he hereafter may be !
He must grope on his way 'mid these perishing things,
And tread with rude steps o'er his kindred that were,
Till the Angel of Science shall give to him wings,
And mark out his path through the regions of air !

PRESENT CONDITION OF LETTERS.

LETTER III.

TO WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS, Esq.

My Dear Sir.—You may have supposed from the tone and tenor of certain passages in my last letter, that I was more inclined to laugh whimsically over the fantasies and follies of the time, than to analyse seriously the significance of its phenomena. Yet it was very far from being altogether so. All action presupposes two parties, an agent and a patient—a thing acting and a thing acted upon. In all change there must consequently be two ingredients,—the causes that effect the change, and the thing upon which it is operated. There are, therefore, two elements invariably, which require to be recognized and appreciated in the examination of any revolutionary movement, whether this be political, religious, or literary—namely, the agents of the reform, and the material upon which it is superinduced. In the first instance, undoubtedly, we ought to restrict the former to those long latent but fermenting humors in the bosom of society, which in time necessitate the change, and consider the latter as the reformers themselves. But as these so soon become identified with the causes by which they are actuated, and which they represent; and discharge all the main functions of agents with respect to the mass of society, we may so far pass over the earlier progress of mutation as to consider them the originators with reference. And, accordingly, I should place them in the former of these two categories, as general truth is more consonant with the purposes of my investigations than a minute and unnecessary accuracy, and I should regard the latter as representing society at large. In estimating any intellectual or literary reform, we must, therefore, consider no less diligently the society to be reformed, and the phases which it assumes during the progress of the revolution, than the bold thinkers, be they authors, orators, or actors, who extend, and in some measure produce it. In Literature, indeed, where the author and the public reciprocally act and react without intermission upon each other, in so intimate and so intricate a manner, it becomes of especial importance that we should examine the peculiarities of the reader, with the same care with which we determine the characteristics of the writer. With the former of these subjects I was partially engaged in my last communication, and though I wrote with some levity of expression, this did not prevent my veiling an earnest meaning under it. I have yet to learn that Heraclitus was a better philosopher than Democritus. And since any reform, which may now be in progress, or may shortly be commenced, will have very great obstacles to encounter, and necessarily travel with a slow and unsteady pace, as long as Literature has to contend against the present absence or laxity of reflection which prevails in the reading community,—the description of the features of the times in terms of good-humored ridicule may possibly subserve a better purpose than any more serious delineation. Moreover, an effective caricature is often the truest of portraits. The lineaments of the picture may not correspond trait for trait with the original for which it is designed, but the very exaggeration, which constitutes the caricature, makes prominent that general expression and significance, which might be passed by unnoticed in any more correct presentment. I think, therefore, that I had a sufficient excuse for the license in which I indulged.

When I commenced these letters I indicated pretty broadly my design of not suffering myself to be trammelled by the strict rules of methodical composition. The thoughts, which rise at random, I present in the order in which they visit me, without paying much regard to a nice, logical sequence of ideas, or caring for artistic finish and elaborate development. If, therefore, you should have reason to complain of any want of connection in my rambling reflections, you must deem it a natural incident to the style and form which I have adopted for the expression of my views. At present, I am disposed to linger over the subject touched upon in my last, and to dwell for a little while longer on the literary food of general readers, and those points of inquiry which may grow out of its examination, or be connected with it.

The food of the whale is said to be the smaller kinds of fish, whereof it devours whole shoals at once, and the floating weeds which cover "full many a rood" of the Northern seas. It is one of the curiosities of natural history, that this greatest of beasts should condescend to live upon such diminutive articles of diet. But in the psychological world it cannot be deemed a less singular fact, that the mighty monster of the land—facetiously and courteously termed "the public,"—but more justly named Leviathan—should browse upon such priceless and unsubstantial garbage, as that with which of late years it has been gorging itself. It has thrown away the wheat and has been living upon the chaff. It has renounced solid food and has invented for its own indulgence a new kind of literary pap. The trash and lighter productions of Literature are beaten up together and compounded into a weak but saccharine solution, on the label of which is written "haustus sæpe in die capiendus," while the additional advice of the Newcastle doctor is given to the patient

When taken
To be well shaken.

This is emphatically the age of Magazines—we have them in all shapes, sizes, varieties, and times of periodic revolution, from the Semi-Monthly up to the Annual, from the duodecimo to the quarto. This observation is neither original nor new, but, like Jack Sylvester's reply to Ben Jonson, it has a decided merit in its truth. Yet these Magazines are, with a few rare and note-worthy exceptions, wishy-washy, vapid, and valueless—they contain a scanty infusion of thought in a very copious menstruum of words. Notwithstanding this, they are popular, as their extensive circulation evinces, and the ablest authors of the country contribute to their pages. Whence then is their popularity—and how happens it that really good writers can be induced to compose for them—or having been induced to do so are unable to elevate their character to the dignity of a solid Literature! Here are three facts apparently anomalous, requiring to be accounted for. The explanation of the first will furnish in a great measure the explanation of the others; and I think that the popularity of the feeble Magazines may be in no slight degree attributed to the present condition of the reading public.

I once asked a friend of mine, whose appetite for apples was most remarkable, why, out of a large basket full, he never selected his fruit. "Oh," said he, "it were nonsense to be picking and choosing when I design eating all—the only result would be to ensure for the best a priority of consumption, and in making my choice, I should waste time more profitably employed in eating—they will all have to be digested, or left undigested together." Now our very worthy friend, the public, is pretty much in the same condition, with respect to the golden apples of Literature, as this gentleman with respect to the fruit of the trees of earth. The table of the general reader of this day is abundantly strewed with Newspapers, Magazines, Reviews, Serials, &c., &c. He reads them all—a scrap here and a scrap there—not with the design of gratifying any very fastidious appetite, or indulging any very critical taste—not to enjoy the more evanescent savor and more delicate juices of the fruit, nor in the hope of deriving any solid nutriment, but to satisfy the cravings of a gullet become morbidly voracious, and to fill a stomach hungering after quantity rather than the epicurean delights of quality. The frequency of his meals—that is the superabundance of new books and new numbers of periodicals—has taught him to swallow without any attempt at mastication. He is at a feast of letters, what, according to Abernethy, the American Secretary of Legation was over a dinner table. His palate is never cultivated—he swallows so often, and bolts his morsels so hurriedly, that the stomach is loaded and a wholesome digestion precluded. He soon is suffering all the evils of an intellectual dyspepsia. He reads merely for the momentary excitement, and to stay the cravings of a stomach, which, like Oliver Twist, is continually asking for more. He has lost all his ruminating capacity—he reads again and again, and with each fresh bait crushes down what he had imbibed before, making himself a veritable hellos librorum; and if for him there be any resurrection of thoughts, they come up in dreams, crude, unconnected, distorted and anamorphosed, like the fantastic shapes of the night-mare. Thus he goes on day after day, destroying more and more the tone and healthy action of his alimentary organs. The morbid appetite, which commenced as a disease, has, in this way, with time and indulgence, matured into a habit—and as long as a sufficiency of the matériel littéraire is supplied, he takes but scant heed of its form, its substance, or its essence, provided only that it act as a stimulant, and be not so strong or solid as to operate like a narcotic on his enfeebled system. When such is the character of the generality of readers—the large class of purchasers, whose coin is the talisman, which, in a high degree, encourages, excites, and rewards the manifestation of literary excellence, we can easily account for the popularity of any Magazines, however worthless they may be. But under these circumstances what must we expect the Literature of the day to be? Its present condition affords the natural and easily comprehended answer—so far, at least, as its obvious defects are concerned, for the seeds of promise which we may recognize in the vast garden of cultivated weeds, are largely attributable to other causes.

We have now surmounted the difficulty of discovering how weak Magazines, containing nothing but silly love tales, insipid poetry, and dropsical essays, without any artistic excellence or critical sagacity, have succeeded in obtaining for themselves such an extensive popularity, as to have rendered them for a time the solitary substitute for all true Literature. The object of a Review is to form and guide public opinion—to direct public taste—to lead public judgment. In this country Reviews have scarcely ever done this, and of late years they have but seldom effected it in England. But a Magazine or an Annual lays claim to no such high pretensions as these—it designedly caters to tastes already formed: If these be good, it strives to rise to their requirements, or to compete with others for enlightened favor; if bad, it panders to them, it helps to degrade them, vitiated though they already be. As ordinarily the Newspaper rather follows in the wake of political feelings and indicates their current than directs them, so the Magazine almost invariably and perhaps inevitably, lowers itself to the tone and literary habits of the hour. And in this country, this natural but injurious tendency has been materially heightened by the conversion of a large proportion of our Newspapers into Weekly Magazines. A thing so ephemeral in its nature, so transient in its effects as a Weekly, would not receive a perusal, unless in matters deeply touching the interests or feelings of the people, without it accommodated itself to all their shifting moods, and to every changing hue in the sky. Moreover, the materials of which it is composed are, of necessity, so hurriedly written, that their sole inspiration is derived from the fleeting excitements of the outer world, from which they take their complexion. There is no preconceived design, diligently matured, artistically arranged, carefully elaborated, or delicately finished. The profit to be derived from the poem, tale, or essay, would not repay the writer for the time, the talent, and the labor which these excellences require. And as for the reputation—but no man of sense would care a fig for reputation in the present day, conscious as he must be how madly, how foolishly, how ridiculously praise has latterly been meted out with no sparing hand to every fool who had the impudent fool-hardiness to cry aloud for fame. And all the while it may be, that wisdom standeth at the corners of the streets and in the market places but no man heareth her. The readers of the Paper, (to return from my momentary digression)—the readers of the Paper do not require the higher excellences of conception and execution—they do not anticipate them, they would have but slight appreciation for them, and might even fail to recognize them if such should be pointed out for their consideration. Hence, very little pains are bestowed upon any thing designed for publication in the columns of a Newspaper—and the frequent literary effusions crowded into the anomalous sheet, present little but a grotesque assemblage of dry bones and unconnected limbs, stolen from some forgotten arsenal of death, and galvanized with a fit of momentary and unearthly life; while side by side with them appear a strange medley of uncouth forms, with vitality enough it is true, but presenting the spasmodic dance of quaint figures, such as might be supposed to have peopled some archetypal chaos, invented by Puck and his companions, for their peculiar delectation.

If the consequences, pernicious in the extreme, which have flowed from these Literary Newspapers had never been extended beyond the limits of their own plethoric columns, the effect would have been bad enough and truly lamentable. But the actual state of the case is infinitely worse than this. When the profits of the pedler—among whose wares there is something to suit every body, though nothing worth the purchase—exceed those of the regular tradesman, the latter will be discouraged in the pursuit of his ordinary routine, and will either become an Autolycus himself, or will endeavor to unite the operations of the pedler with his usual avocations. And this effect have these Newspapers—high Family—acted upon the Monthly Magazines—they have brought them down to their own level, by usurping their functions, and retailing to every clown inferior goods at a lower price, than the other dispensers of periodical literature could afford. By provoking competition they have compelled works of a higher order to descend from their elevated grounds, in order that they might fight with more equal chances of success in the common plain. And thus, while they have contributed so largely to the deterioration of literary taste among the people, and to the debasement of Literature itself, they have impregnated those Magazines, from which some antidote might have been anticipated, with their own virus—a poison which saps all the fountains of vigor, engenders imbecility or actual paralysis, and corrodes the very bone and framework of Literature.

Thus, the necessity of courting popularity in a new form has caused Magazines to forswear the excellence they might otherwise have attained, and to stoop to that standard—if such a chaotic abyss can with any propriety be denominated a standard—to which the public taste had either been reduced, or was rapidly tending. But they have secured their reward—they have obtained that popularity which by these arts they wooed—and with it that more solid profit, for which alone such popularity was desirable—for to them the music of dollars is much more welcome than the more intangible and ethereal rewards of a well-deserved and intelligent encomium. And as the golden shower has fallen into their lap, in proportion as they have lowered themselves to the degraded tastes of that mighty multitude, which is most incapable of judging, though best qualified to remunerate, they have been corrupted, like Danae, without reluctance by the pleasant rain-drops of their welcome seducer.

To show still more strongly the state to which Literature has thus been reduced, and the perilous straits into which rival publishers have been wafted by the breezes which competition has excited, I would remind you that most of the more popular Magazines, and certainly all of the most feeble, rest their principal claim to public favor on the engravings with which their numbers are adorned. These engravings are for the most part well executed and must have been costly, however low be their excellences as specimens of art in other respects. The perfection of design, the beauty of arrangement, the harmony of proportions, and the more delicate touches of the accomplished painter may safely be neglected, for those into whose hands they are likely to come, are seldom blessed with a cultivated acquaintance in the arts. But in every thing that attracts the undisciplined eye, they possess every merit which would be sought. And it is on these engravings, more than on the table of contents, that the more popular Magazines trust for success. This strongly indicates the low estimate which they and their readers must previously have set upon the claims of Literature. We have witnessed a state of things analogous to this in the decline of the theatre. As the spirit of the drama waned away, and the true dramatic taste became extinct in the audience even more than in the play-writer, the beautiful and gorgeous scenes of Stanfield and Beverley divided the honors of Covent-Garden and the provincial theatres of England with the charms of Astley's Menagerie, and the licentious fascinations of Elslar and Taglioni. The same things have occurred in this country, and one of the celebrated danseuses has displayed her influence in this country. If the experience of the past were necessary to add greater force to these inferences, I might refer you to that temporary failure of the theatres in the time of Shakspeare, with which you are probably acquainted, and might cite to you the pathetic lamentations of my favorite Terence over the damnation of his Hecyra, because the good people of Rome—(a flattering translation of populus studio stupidus)—were more entranced by dancing girls, than by the representation of genuine comedy. But I need not say more. I have no doubt you will fully agree with me in regarding the present careful illustration of nearly all the more popular Magazines, as evincing a thoroughly depraved literary taste.

While speaking thus of the Magazines of the day, I am happy to be able to except from the sweeping generality of my censure the Southern Literary Messenger itself. From its first commencement under Mr. White to the present hour, it has always aimed at solid instruction, and the elevation of literary taste, and has steadily exerted itself to give to its readers substantial fare. If it has failed fully to attain that ideal perfection which it has kept before its eye, it has only fallen under that general law of humanity which has inevitably rendered the accomplishment of all human undertakings inferior to their conception. Certainly there has never been any lack of exertion for the attainment of excellence on its part. That it is still capable of improvement no one would more frankly admit than my old acquaintance, its Editor. I would fain have included your former protégé in this exception, but as that unfortunate bantling is now at rest with the things that have been and are not, I will pass over its grave in silence.

While on the subject of Magazines I would delay your intention a little while by inquiring into their tendency. From the practice, though not from the experience of late years, it would appear that this must be decidedly good; but, for my part, I must think their influence injurious, except under certain very favorable circumstances. When I tell you that I regard even the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews as the cause of much irreparable injury to the interests of Literature, you may be surprised, and perhaps after all I can say may continue to doubt. But such is my opinion, and the question is, at least, worthy of examination.

The man of one book—homo unus libri—has passed into an adage. And, though many proverbs are truly nothing more than popularized and accredited lies, yet this one I deem to be only an exaggeration of the truth. That an intimate and profound familiarity with one good book will fit us for the more ready and thorough appreciation of all others I take to be just as sound a dogma as that a diligent and untiring study of one department of science or letters is the best preparative for more general intellectual pursuits. Old Burton has many quaint and sensible remarks on my text, and the practice of some of the most learned men has been in accordance with it; and may be assured as a partial confirmation of its accuracy. I will only cite one instance. Sir William Jones, confessedly in a reliance on this proverb, made it a point to read over the whole works of Cicero once every year—this was his one book, and from the encyclopædic character of his selected author, there can be no doubt that, whether this adage be true or untrue, he must have derived very great assistance in his multifarious labors. But we rest upon his practice without inquiring into its consequences. But the advantage to be derived from this devotion to one book is not so much the mere information directly acquired, as the minute attention, the accurate recollection, the critical appreciation, the collateral reflection and consequent expansion of thought, all of which result from that tension of mind which has in this way been produced. The tendency of Magazine Literature is to produce effects exactly the reverse of these—the lightness, the tenuity, the diversity, the contrariety of the numerous articles introduce confusion and sometimes stupor into the mind; while the habit of reading every thing over only once, and then, for the most part, in the most rapid and heedless manner, destroys the faculty of attention, deadens the memory, cashiers the judgment, and paralyses the thinking powers. Moreover, when a reader has accustomed himself to this negligent mode of perusal, and has trained his palate to a high relish for these highly seasoned trifles, he is not merely indifferent to more solid food, but he has lost the capacity for digesting it or even for swallowing it. Hence a healthy literary taste is too apt to be destroyed by an immoderate devotion to Magazine reading.

I might point out the injurious effects which periodicals have upon the frame and substance of Literature, but to this I shall shortly return. I think it may be admitted that only to a very limited extent can any benefit be derived from the wide circulation of periodicals. There can be no doubt that nothing is nearly so well adapted as they are to the diffusion of some literary cultivation among all classes—and to the introduction of the idle, the uneducated, or the overtaken, to some acquaintance with intellectual pleasures. The stimulating nature of their contents—the novelty, even the extravagance which they aim after—the frequency of their issue, their cheapness, and even their engravings contribute to render them welcome companions to those who would not otherwise read at all. And if they did not immediately chill the taste which they excite—restricting the majority of their readers to the narrow curriculum into which they were thrown at their first waking, they would be very desirable and serviceable ministers in the Temple of the Muses—they would not only chant to the proselytes of the outer gate some faint echo of the melodies within, but would introduce by gradual steps the aspiring acolytes to the glories of the inner courts. But I much fear that their functions are seldom extended beyond the execution of the first of these duties, at least in our country. In England, where the universities, the learned professions, and many other influences keep constantly active and alive a really literary and scientific class, accustomed to drink of the original fountains, and not easily lured off by every sparkling rivulet that meanders in its eccentric course through fragrant and flowery meads, the injurious effects are by no means so extensive. There is always a higher elevation presented, and all the substantial honors of letters are denied to those who do not attain to some one of its many pinnacles. But we have no such load-star to draw us upwards—if we are pulled down forcibly towards the earth, we must ourselves “imp feathers to our broken wings” before we can hope to rise again. No assistance—no coöperation is offered to us in this effort, whether we succeed or fail, it must be by our own exertion or neglect. But there is very little to suggest, or to tempt to this self-improvement. And hence, while few readers, comparatively, rise above Magazine reading, very few authors rise above Magazine writing.

The causes which have conduced to the popularity of Magazines—to their defects—and those of their contributors may be gathered from what has been now said and thus a reply may be considered as having been given to the questions with which I started. But justice requires that I should add a few of those concomitant influences which have effected the present condition of Magazine Literature; for if what I have said were the sole explanation of causes that could be given, we might indeed recognize their abundant efficacy, but there would be scarcely any room left for the indulgence of that hope of future and speedy amelioration, which I profess to entertain, and of which I fancy that indubitable traces may already be discerned.

Had not your late articles in the Southern Literary Messenger treated in such a satisfactory manner the general bearings of the great question of International Copyright, I might dwell upon it for a little while and illustrate the mode in which the want of a liberal and far-seeing legislation on the subject has operated to force the growth of the Magazines while it has completely stifled the seeds or stunted the plants of a more solid and healthy Literature. Even though you have yourself so thoroughly considered this question of the most vital importance to American Literature, I have no doubt that your interest in the subject would secure your indulgence, were I to rest upon it, yet I have already detained you so long, that I must leave others to draw their own inferences from the suggestion loosely thrown out. The hint is in itself sufficient, especially after the general attention which has been devoted latterly to the doctrine of International Copyright, owing in a great measure to the labors of yourself and Mr. Cornelius Mathews.

But among other causes operating to produce the feebleness and popularity of the Magazines must undoubtedly be considered the desultory habits and undisciplined minds even of the educated men of the country, resulting, partly, from their early, zealous, and continual engagement in the practical pursuits of life; and partly from the diffuseness and necessary laxity of a hurried and incomplete training at school and college. We may add also that, while in other countries the reading public is emphatically the educated public, here, on the contrary, a vast majority of the readers have scarcely gone beyond the rudiments of instruction. Elsewhere too, those who read are men of some habitual leisure, who can rely with confidence upon having their two or three hours a day, undisturbed by the intrusion of business, unoccupied by the cares of the world. But here, no hour is peculiarly sacred to relaxation and mental pleasures—all hours are alike consecrated to the world, and only those are devoted to the pleasant walks of Literature which accident, the want of society, or laziness may have given. We may readily conclude that under such circumstances the amusement required will be sought not from the ponderous tomes of Locke and Bacon, but from lighter and more tractable works, which may gratify for the moment, without leaving any unwelcome incentive to reflection behind them.

I have already remarked, in substance, if not in words, that the character of the supply will always correspond with the nature of the demand. But in the present state of Literature the demand first heard will not be the request of those who ask for excellence, but that of those who are more clamorous from their number, and less fastidious about the sop that may be thrown to Cerberus. This majority have their own peculiar habits of reading—if the want of any fixed habit can be designated a habit—to which we have more than once alluded: they take up a book by fits and starts, read occasionally at odd times, here a little and there a little, now in this book and then in that, and throw them all aside one after the other after a desultory glance over their pages. They read often—they read much—they read all things, but we might parody the sole remaining line of the Margites for their benefit, if we were at all in a satirical mood.

Now let it be remembered that an author is not a being above, distinct and isolated from the crowd—he is no strange monster dropped from the moon to astonish the gaze of the ignorant and excite the gaping of the fool, he is not sent into the world with novel instruments of power or strange incarnations for the direction of human actions and the moulding of human thought; but he is a man as other men, subjected to the same influences with them, equally susceptible to the tone of society and the spirit of the age, and consequently bearing more or less the same general characteristics which unite and assimilate the rest of the community to each other. The habitudes, accordingly, which he has formed as a man amongst men; the same he will reveal to a greater or less extent when he assumes his pen and speaks to them from the cathedra of the Author. And hence the desultory pursuit of Literature, which we note among readers, finds its counterpart in the fragmentary and fugitive nature of the productions of writers. I remember, once before in a private conversation calling your attention to this peculiarity in the Literature of our day, though I do not think that I then attempted any explanation of its cause. No life-time is devoted to the execution of one great work, no years consumed in the laborious collection of the materials, no youth wasted in the mental preparation necessary for the task prescribed, no matured conception of an artistic and finished design carefully elaborated into excellence, fulness and perfection. But now-a-days no sooner has the solitary thought, most unwonted visitant, flitted into the dark nooks and crevices of pericranium, than the gray goose quill is put in requisition, and its developed expression is rattled off with a hopeless rapidity, which reminds us that we live in the era of steam.

You will observe that sundry pernicious consequences result from this fugitive mode of composition and the equally fugitive mode of publication by which modern lucubrations are ushered into light. One of these is that fragmentary character of modern Literature which requires a closer consideration than my paper will now permit me to bestow upon it. I will therefore defer the examination of these consequences till my next Letter, and break off here abruptly, by subscribing myself,

With the highest esteem and regard,

My dear sir,

Your obliged and obdt. servt.

THE TIME TO DIE.

BY E. B. HALE.

The man with soul in sorrow tried,
Where doubt and darkness hid;
Of many a thrill of joy denied,
Has still a time to die:
And he turns away from that far-off clime,
In the witching hours of the summer-time.

Death in the summer-time! oh! no;
Nor in the glorious spring,
When the soft South wind begins to blow,
And the trees are blossoming!
And the earth puts on her beauteous dress,
Jewell'd with flowers of loveliness.

Let me not perish then—not then.
O let me draw my breath,
'Till the funeral time comes round again,
At nature's annual death.
When the voice of joy has ceas'd to flow,
Then, let the weary prisoner go.

When the summer's lightsome days are o'er,
When the streams rush by with glee no more,
When the glow is faint in the evening sky,
Then, let me die.

When I hear no more the rippling rill,
When the dancing boughs are bare and still,
And the cheerless winds in the branches sigh,
Then, let me die.

When the birds their dulcet music chime,
In the fragrant groves of a softer clime,
And I hear no more their joyful cry,
Then, let me die.

And the beautiful moon, when it waxeth dim,
And the sun looks down with a cheerless glim,
And time, in his wintry car drags by,
Then, let me die.

THE TWO MOTHERS.

BY MRS. ELIZABETH J. KAMES.

One lovely eve, in the soft time of June,
I wander'd where a cottage stood embower'd
Amid green trees, through which the clear full moon
Touches of silver light all trembling shower'd,
On the low roof, o'er which the locust flower'd.
It was a luxury—the scented air I breath'd
By that sweet-briar hedge, near which the myrtle wreath'd;
But just within the vine-hung cottage door,
A lovelier sight I saw. A fair young mother
Flinging her long, and silky ringlets o'er
Her beauteous babe, there playing with each other;
(Strange woke the feeling that I could not smother.)
While oft she kiss'd the blooming cherub's face,
Whose red lip mimic'd hers with such unconscious grace.
Ere long she trill'd the silliest nursery song,
That ever mother to her baby chanted;
Yet with soft links it drew my heart along
And like a spell my homeward footstep haunted.
O whose sweet presence was it then I wanted?
Sore grief it made thy empty crib to see,
My idol-boy—could I have died for thee!

Now never more in the long twilight dim
 To taste thy "breath of flowers" shall I lean o'er thee,
 While lull'd to slumber by the low-voic'd hymn.
 So proudly fond thy father stood before thee,
 Nor dream'd of death when we did so adore thee.
 But he hath won thee;—on thy soft seal'd eyes
 The shadow of the grave all dim, and darkly lies!
 Lies—and forever! Yet for thee, my flower,
 No selfish thought is 'mid my deep grief nourish'd;
 Though thou hast faded in thy spring-time hour,
 Though many a high hope that thy parents cherish'd,
 Beside thy early burial coldly perish'd—
 Still 'twas a blessed lot for thee, my boy,
 So soon to pass to that fair land of joy.
 A blessed lot—for thy young soul hath flown
 Fresh, and unstained on the wings of morning;
 The mantle of the skies is o'er thee thrown,
 And Angel-bands have fashion'd thy adoring—
 Joy, joy, for thee! and I shall soon cease mourning—
 Thou never canst return Below'd to me,
 But yet a little while, and I shall go to thee.

"THE BLIND PREACHER" AND "THE BRITISH SPY."

Many of our readers recollect the rapturous tribute paid by the late William Wirt, in one of the letters of his "British Spy," to the fervid eloquence of the "Blind Preacher," the Rev. James Waddell. One is almost led to believe the upwrought eulogy of the gifted author extravagant; but he who so excelled in the graces and power of eloquence must be deemed a competent judge. From his description there must have been in the oratory of the Blind Herald of the Cross, a charm and efficiency most unusual, which his blindness served only to enhance.

Mr. Wirt dwells particularly upon the matchless manner in which the Preacher quoted the celebrated passage of Rousseau, "Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ died like a God!" He tried a thousand times, as he rode along, to imitate it, but in vain. Ever since he wrote his glowing description, there has been the deepest interest felt in the "Blind Preacher." A memoir of him is now in preparation by Mr. Alexander of Princeton, which will appear in one of the journals of this city. The following touching account of his restoration to sight will be read with pleasure by every one.—[Ed. Mess.

To the Editor of the Sou. Lit. Messenger.

SIR:—The following paper was lately brought to my notice in the possession of the author, a descendant of the "Blind Preacher." It was written, as it imports, during the life of Mr. Wirt and designed for a private communication to him. The amiable modesty of the writer, which led him to withhold it from its original destination, would have detained it still on his files, limited to the reading of his own family. At my earnest solicitation, however, he has submitted it to my disposal, and I hasten to communicate it to your columns, confident that you will agree with me in the opinion that the touching scene it so graphically records, deserves to be read and transmitted as a part of the well authenticated history of the "Blind Preacher."

Respectfully yours,

R. W. BAILEY.

Stamton, July 16, 1844.

TO THE AUTHOR OF THE BRITISH SPY.

The distinguished notice you have taken of the Rev. James Waddell of Virginia, in the character of the "Blind Preacher," has induced me to give you some account of an event unnoticed by you, and which forms an era in his life—I refer to the restoration of his sight. I do this with less reserve, since it is generally understood that the British Spy had been long a warm friend of the subject of his notice; and that his removal from the vicinity of the Blind Preacher, in whose hospitable mansion he had received many and warm greetings, had left him uninformed of the event to which I have alluded, and of the circumstances which I propose to detail. You have described him blind, and while occupying the rude enclosure of a forest pulpit, addressing an unseen multitude in strains of eloquence which might captivate cities and win the admiration of grave senates. The incidents to which I refer were more private—in his own house and in the midst of his family. For eight years he had been blind, a stranger equally to the cheerful light of day, and the cheering faces of kindred and friends. It will readily be supposed, that in this lapse of time great changes had taken place. The infant had left the knee to rove amidst the fields—the youth had started into manhood, and bidding adieu to the haunts of his childhood, had gone forth to act for himself upon the theatre of life, with the hope indeed of again and again looking upon his venerable father, but without hope of that father's ever looking upon him. A calm and patient resignation had settled over the mind of this man of God, as a summer's cloud settles over the horizon of evening, peaceful, hopeful and reclining upon the bosom of Heaven. Every painful solicitude about himself had fled away. This personal peace and Christian submission were calculated, however, to concentrate his reflections and solitudes upon the destinies of his family, here and hereafter. His eye could not now see for them; but he had a heart to invoke the watchfulness of an eye that neither slumbers nor sleeps, that neither grows dim with age nor any infirmity. His palsied hand could guide them no longer, but patriarchal counsel was freely given and enforced by the tremendous realities of a future existence. The thread to be followed through the labyrinth of life, it was taught, had its fastenings in eternity; the responses of the heart to the bid-dings of conscience would be echoed in eternity—the strings connected with human responsibility must vibrate in eternity—time and all subterfuge things should be viewed in the light of eternity. But although the mental vision was acute and widely circumspect, the dark curtain still hung over the organs of sight, and seemed destined to rise no more.

And what if it should be otherwise!—that hope of sight should take the place of resignation to blindness—and more than this, that hope should be turned into fruition—that after the darkness of eight years he should be presented with a broad daylight view of every thing around him! And this I assure you was almost the fact; for after an operation for cataract, which, in the progress of some years, had rendered light sensible, and then, objects faintly visible,—a strong and well constructed convex lens, procured by the kindness of a distant friend,* enabled him in a moment to see with considerable distinctness. At this juncture, I happened at his residence, called by himself long before Hopewell—and now fulfilling in happy reality, the import of a soft and cheerful name. The scene, without dispute, was the most moving I had ever witnessed. The father could again see his children who rivetted his attention and absorbed his soul. Among these, emotions of intense interest and varied suggestion were visible in the eye, the countenance and hurried movements. The bursts of laughter—the running to and fro—the clapping of hands—the sending for absent friends—and then the silent tear bedewing the cheek in touching interlude—the eager gazes of old servants, and the unmeaning wonder of young ones—in short, the happy confusion from the agitation of joy—all taken together, was a scene better adapted to the pencil than the pen, and which a master's hand might have been proud to sketch. How I regretted that the mantle of some Raphael or Michael Angelo had not fallen upon me; then had my fame and my feelings, each been identified with the scene, and others should have been permitted to view upon the canvass what I must fail to describe upon paper.

The paroxysm produced by the arrival of the glasses having passed away, and a partial experiment having satisfied all of their adaptation to the diseased eye; behold! the Patriarch seated upon his large arm-chair, with his children around him, and scanning with affectionate curiosity the bashful group. There was a visible shyness among the lesser members of the family community while undergoing this fatherly scrutiny, not unlike that produced by a long absence. The fondness of a father in contemplating those most dear to him was never more rationally exemplified, or exquisitely enjoyed than on this occasion.

And now, the venerable man, arising from his seat and grasping a long staff which lay convenient to him, had proceeded but a short distance, when the staff itself seemed powerfully, but momentarily, to engage his attention—it had been the companion of his darkest days, the pioneer of his domestic travels, and the supporter of a weak and tottering frame.

He next proceeded to the front door to take a view of the mountains, the beautiful south-west range stretching out in lovely prospect at the distance of about three miles. All followed, myself among the rest; and the mountain scene, though viewed a thousand times before, was now gazed upon with deeper interest, and presented a greater variety of beauties than ever. Indeed this mountain scenery ever after continued to delight my unsatisfied vision; whether my attention had not before this been carefully drawn to its beauties, or that the suggestive faculty, linking the prospect with the sympathetic pleasures previously enjoyed, had thrown around me a pleasing delusion, I am unable to decide. Delusion apart, however, this sunny base of the S. W. mountains is a delightful region, distinguished not only by the natural advantages of fertile soil salubrious climate and beautiful scenery, but by a race noted for the social virtues and for a high order of intellect.

But to return to the individual whom I had left exercising a new born vision upon the external world. The book-case interviews I had looked for with solicitude, and presently had the pleasure of witnessing. Watts, and Dodridge, and Locke, and Reid, with a host of worthies, had been the companions of his best days: there had been a long night of separation. The meeting and communion was that of kindred souls, and complimentary alike to his piety, scholarship and taste. The sight of his own hand-writing upon the blank leaves of his books, was in itself a small circumstance, but seemed to affect him not a little, associated no doubt with varied reminiscences of past days.

I left the house full of reflections. I had been always awed by the solemn sanctity and personal dignity of the Blind Preacher. The yearning solicitude which I had just witnessed of such a father over his children, seen now for the first time after the dreary blindness of years, had melted my feelings. My imagination took flight, and passing rapidly through time was conducted by the incidents of this day to the resurrection day; when the saint of God, throwing off the trammels of the tomb, with quickened vision and more than mortal solicitude, casts around for the children of his pilgrimage.

THE CICISBEO, OR CUSTOMS OF SICILY.

BY LIEUT. WM. D. PORTER, U. S. N.

CHAPTER VI.

The week of dissipation which usually attends a wedding in Messina being over, the Count and family retired to their country seat, which was situated near the little town of Sera, at the foot of the mountains. An arm of the sea indented the island and swept along the foot of the village. A small stream of water passed along the Count's gardens, over which hung the verandah of his mansion. It was here in this quiet spot Ada proposed to spend the remainder of the honey-moon, or as the Sicilians term it "Dolce Luna." The business of Johnston could not be neglected; cargoes were daily arriving consigned to his care, and it was necessary that he should have the papers arranged with the Government. He could only snatch a few moments in several days to visit the Count's quiet country seat; but not so with Gerald, he was the constant companion of Ada. If any aquatic excursion was proposed, Gerald plied the oar; a ride, Gerald accompanied his cousin; a "pic nic," Gerald arranged and appointed the place; fresh bouquets of flowers were constantly supplied by Gerald; if music was heard, it was Gerald's guitar; if the poor were relieved, Gerald was the bearer of the good tidings; in short, Gerald was the "Cicisbeo."

Johnston's jealousy was first aroused by the following circumstance. It was a calm evening, and Gerald had been on a visit to some poor in the neighborhood. He had to cross the little stream which passed under the window of his cousin; he stopped and fastened his boat at the foot of an old cypress, tuned his guitar and commenced a duette, composed by himself when quite a boy. Ada had often sang it with him; it was also a signal in former days to walk in the garden, or meet him at the foot of the old "cypress." The quick ear of Ada at once detected the minstrel. Gerald in a full, rich and melodious voice commenced the following:

Oh maiden wilt thou go with me,
O'er the wide, wide perilous sea—
Wilt leave thy calm blue skies, and roam
Far from thine own bright land and home?
Sicily's daughter, say wilt thou go,
And smile as now, through weal or woe?

He finished the verse, when Ada throwing open the window, took up the lay, Gerald accompanying her with his guitar:

With thee! ah yes! when thou art near,
Thine arm to guard, I nothing fear.
Ah! could I ask a happier home
Than the broad world, with thee to roam
Far away o'er land, o'er sea?
Lord of my soul, I'll follow thee.

Gerald.

And wilt thou then forsake for me,
Thy land of song and poesy,
Where earth, and air and sky unite
To make this chosen spot more bright
Than aught, save thine own lucid eye,
Whose hue alone can match the sky?

Ada.

Aye, as the dancing sunbeams play
Upon the light and sparkling spray,
Like summer air, as light as free
As thine own bounding step shall be,
And should dark billows swell the sea,
Naught I'll fear while I cling to thee.

Gerald.

Then haste with me: sun, dews and showers
Have formed thee like gay birds and flowers,
Or like a graceful Jessamine
Whose tendrils round my heart do twine;
And I the oak whose stately form
Shall guard thee, loved one, from the storm.

The duette finished, Ada threw a ring from the window for her cousin, which falling in the grass, was not perceived by Gerald, who, the moment he finished, stepped into his light gondola and pulled to an old cottage near to offer charity in the name of his cousin.

Johnston, who had arrived late in the evening from Messina, had determined to surprise his bride by an unexpected visit. He had fastened his horse some distance from the house, sprang over the garden fence and approached the mansion through the garden at the very moment Gerald and Ada were singing the duette. His jealousy was at once aroused; drawing a dagger from his bosom, he advanced softly towards Gerald, raised his weapon to strike. A moment more and the object of his hatred would have been in eternity; but the English habits and education of Johnston caused him to pause and reflect a moment ere he committed the deed. He now concealed himself behind the shrubbery until Gerald departed. His first thought was to return to Messina, but in passing under the window a ray of light fell upon the diamond ring, making it glitter. Picking it up he at once recognized it to be the one he had given his wife on the night of their wedding. Looking at it for some time, his veins swelling with passion, he exclaimed in a low smothered voice, "I am glad I did not murder him. My blood runs cold at the thought; he shall have a chance for his life. I'll demand satisfaction for the injury. Constantine has left the Island to join the army, the contract Ada still holds sealed, then I'll let the punishment fall on her."

He advanced towards the house, stopped suddenly as another thought appeared to seize him; then, starting quickly, walked away with rapid strides, mounted his horse and galloped for Messina, where he arrived about daylight. Dismounting and passing along the quay, he stopped at the foot of the "Statue of Hercules." While absorbed in deep thought, his dagger drawn and his heart almost bursting from the rush of blood through it, at this moment his friend Weston, returning from a midnight orgie, passed and discovered him. Tapping him on the shoulder, he exclaimed in a tone of some surprise, "Ah, Johnston, my fine fellow, turned Sicilian, and wearing a stiletto! or have you become reconciled to citron groves, jessamine bowers, love songs and Ciciiseo's?" Johnston was at this time in any other frame of mind than a pleasant one; he turned from his friend in evident disgust. Weston at once noticed the feeling and continued his sarcasm. Touching his breast with his finger, he asked Johnston if he had hurt his feelings. "Is there a tender place here? does Ada still prove faithful? or has some dark haired cousin supplanted you in her affections, while you are counting over debtor and creditor? Is Ada smiling upon a favored Ciciiseo, eh! Johnston?"

Johnston turned upon his friend the eye of a tiger and told him to leave him.

Weston for a moment felt abashed, but recovering himself, he turned to go, saying in a low voice, "Beware the Ciciiseo," and with a peculiar laugh left him. Johnston now sought his counting-room and endeavored over his books to drive the suspicions from his mind, but without effect. About two in the afternoon, he again mounted his horse and left for Sera, his mind agitated by a thousand feelings. He arrived late in the evening and again entered the garden. The sound of a guitar as before struck his ear; the words of his friend flashed across his mind, "Beware the Ciciiseo." He heard also the light splashing of an oar; he concealed himself among the shrubbery near the house, where he could watch unobserved the person who approached in the boat. A moment after he heard the well known voice of Gerald say, "Fraola remain here a few minutes, we will have another passenger. Gerald walked up the avenue, tuned his guitar, and in a low voice sang the following lay:

"Oh beauty's daughter, maiden, thou
Of jetty locks and moonlight brow;
And eyes so like the heavens above,
As brightly blue, where art thou, love?
Thou'rt wont to gather wild flowers here,
To deck thy soft and glossy hair,
Far away o'er the silv'ry tide
Thy 'Ciciiseo' comes to bear the bride.

"Come, love, come to the cypress tree,
Thy Gerald's bark but waits for thee,
Gaily, merrily shall we glide,
Now o'er the blue waves lightly ride,
Or we'll hie by the moon's soft light,

And thine eyes' starry beams so bright.

Thy free and boundless home shall be
On the bright wave, the deep blue sea.

Then come, love, come to the cypress tree,
Thy Gerald's bark still waits for thee.

"The moonbeams o'er the waters play,
Why ling'rst thou, oh, Ada, say?
She comes not yet, kind heaven but throw
Her shadow on the tide below.
I've wov'n thee, love, a coronal;
The flowers will fade, the dew drops fall.
Each sunny clime, each coral cave,
Shall yield thee treasures on the wave.
She comes! farewell dark cypress tree,
My lark, sweet love, but waits for thee."

The song finished, Ada opened a secret door of the building, and a moment after was in the arms of Gerald. "Ah my little cousin," said he, "how happy you make me! I thought my simple lay would call you forth. Let us proceed to the boat, Fraola waits for us." Ada sighed, but ere she could repeat it was smothered by Gerald's kiss. They entered the boat, and Johnston with feelings indescribable listened until the splash of the oars had died in the distance. Turning from the river he sought his horse, and mounting slowly rode towards Messina.

CHAPTER VII.

The estates of Count De Cheveta embraced not only the little town of Sera, but a large portion of the surrounding country. They were laid out in vineyards, and orange, olive and lemon groves, and contained, besides a manufactory of lemon oil, a cocoonery for silk. But over this estate hung a mortgage, which was raised by the husband of Ada, previous to her marriage, it being a portion of the marriage contract. The tenantry of the Count were poor, and were principally employed as gatherers and packers of fruit, wine pressers, oil strainers and olive gatherers; but few of them were, in point of comfort, raised above the Lazzaroni of Messina. Their hovels were generally situated near the sea, or on the margin of the little river, which meandered through and variegated the Count's estates. The pecuniary difficulties which continually harassed the Count, compelled him to drain his estates of every available means to enable him to meet demands, but the marriage of Ada with a wealthy foreigner at once relieved his embarrassment. His indolent habits prevented his making any enquiries into the situation of his tenantry; consequently, their extreme poverty was unknown to him, and their wants unrelieved. Not so with Ada; her heart was pained to know that poverty was constantly staring her in the face, and that it was not in her power to relieve it.

On the evening in which Johnston discovered Gerald and Ada, leaving the Count's chateau, she was about to make visits to several of the tenantry whom Gerald had brought to her notice. We will follow them into the domicils of the peasantry. "Push off, my good Fraola, to your mother," said Gerald. "Ada, my dear cousin, I could not alone administer charity; it requires the peculiar tact of a woman, who is the only being that can administer consolation to the mind, as well as food to the body. I have, therefore, solicited your company on this occasion, and I hope you are well provided, as the objects to whom I will introduce you are really worthy, and require all the consolation you can offer them.

"Here is my purse, dear Gerald; you see it is full."

"No, Ada, it is not so much your purse that will be required this evening as the oil of consolation poured into the wounds of the heart."

At this moment Fraola gave the light gondola a sudden turn, and shot it upon a clear sandy beach, at a few yards from which stood a low miserable cottage concealed among fig trees. Entering through a door so low that they were compelled to stoop, they found themselves in the interior of the hovel. Taking a basket from the boatman with a steel and flint in it, Gerald soon obtained a light. The miserable appearance of the cottage covered with filth, and the walls hanging with cobwebs, created a sensation of fear in the breast of Ada. Her first impulse was to fly from the place, but in turning to do so, she was met by the boatman, who stood in the door-way. The light of a dim taper gave to his sun-burnt countenance a ferocious and assassin-like appearance. She staggered back and seated herself on a miserable bed occupied by an old woman, whose appearance was any thing but prepossessing. Gerald saw the agitation of his cousin and soon allayed her fears. Ada's feet had never pressed even the earth, without a green velvet carpet of nature's most beautiful growth; and in her father's halls the soft yielding manufactures of Eastern looms prevented the cold marble from touching her delicate shoe; and she had never seen poverty, except in passing rapidly in her father's carriage. She was at once shocked and alarmed to have been compelled to witness it for the first time in its most loathsome and abject state. The person to whose hovel she had been conveyed, was one of those many fortune tellers which meet you at every turn of the road in Sicily. She was in appearance sixty-five, bent and haggard. She wore a cap fitting the head tight, and turning under the chin. A few gray hairs stuck out from under it. Her skin was about the color of half tanned leather, and appeared as if it only covered the bones of the face. She wore a short red night gown made of flannel, but so ragged, soiled and discolored, that the original hue could not well be ascertained. The bed on which she half sat and half reclined, was equally dirty, and composed of common grass dried in the sun; but even this had become damp, and sent forth a disgusting effluvia. A few old cooking utensils made of earthenware lay in the corner of the room, some broken, others covered with dirt and grease. The hut was built of dry stone, and thatched with grass. It contained neither chimney nor corridor, and all the light which could be admitted came through the door. The old woman's history was soon told. She was called "the witch of Ætna," and a few days previous the superstitions of one of the council, Senior Cosmo, who thought some evil had come on him from her machinations, had issued a summons for her to appear before the council, where she was condemned. Before the punishment was inflicted, a well known individual, "Guiseppe Muerto," rescued her from the officers. In the conflict she had been injured, and now required not only to be concealed for some time, but to have her wounds dressed. The boatman was her son. Ada recommended quiet and repose, and promised next day to send other assistance. Leaving a small sum in the hands of the witch to supply her present necessary wants, the two cousins left the cottage and in a few moments were speeding rapidly over the stream to visit another tenant of the Count's.

A few moments brought them to another small cot, but in this there was a light. On entering, Ada was particularly struck with the extreme youth of the occupant, a girl of not more than fourteen, yet at this age she was a mother. Her tale was simple. The yearly conscript for soldiers was required, and the lot fell to her dear Pedro to leave. The fruit season was over. An English philanthropist had established himself in Messina to reform the baser of her sex; he had a large establishment for winding silk; it had thrown out of employment many of those who had not yet by poverty become abandoned, and employed those who had fallen into vice. Her child had become sick, and the attention of the mother was required to watch over it. She had no employment, her little earnings had been expended, and the child was no better. This simple tale was told by the young mother with such a sweet and plaintive voice, that the sympathies of Ada's heart were at once drawn towards the sufferings of the poor girl. She, with a heavy heart and a tear trickling down her cheek, emptied her purse in the lap of the young mother. Tears of gratitude started into the eyes of the poor girl, who was astonished at so much liberality. She threw herself upon her knees and kissed the hand of Ada; her heart was too full to express her thoughts. Ada's heart beat; she mingled her tears with those of the afflicted girl, and sobbing she left the hut with Gerald. They entered the gondola and returned to the Count's.

"Ada, my dear cousin, you must not allow your feelings to overcome you so. If you do your husband's fortune will soon find its way into every hovel on the Island."

"Why not, my cousin, if it relieves the poor and afflicted?"

"Certainly, my dear Ada, but the half contained in your purse would have relieved the girl, and you have been prevented by its hasty discharge from bestowing charity upon another, to whom I would have drawn your attention. But never mind, you will be more judicious another time, and Fraola will conduct you to her hut in the morning."

"But why not you, dear Gerald?"

"Business of importance calls me to Messina, dear coz, and you know I am your Ciccisbeo only when you contemplate a visit in the quiet evening to your papa's tenants, and it will not do for you to create jealousy in the mind of your English husband."

"Yes, Gerald, but what shall I do in your absence for flowers?"

"Fraola will, by my order, replenish your vase, ere the morning light bids you rise." The boat touched the foot of the "old cypress," the two cousins parted. Ada watched the light boat until the sound of the oars died away in the distance.

CHAPTER VIII.

Gerald proceeded by water to Messina where he arrived about daylight. Discharging the boatman he entered the city and proceeded to the office of Johnston. Knocking at the door, and being informed Johnston was absent, he left a card with the information that "Ada was well."

When Gerald left the note at Johnston's office the latter was within, but the fires of jealousy had seized him, and his detestation was so great that he could not bear the thought of seeing and conversing with him. The moment Gerald left his door he rang his bell, and the servant appeared. Handing him a note, he enquired of him if he knew Guiseppe Muerto. The servant replied "yes."

"Take then this note to him." The servant departed, and Johnston double-locked the office, threw himself upon a sofa and gave way to immoderate grief.

The note written to Guiseppe Muerto contained but these few words: "Statue of Hercules twelve o'clock." At this hour a man wrapped in a large cloak was seen by the Sereno of the beat, pacing to and fro near the statue of Hercules. A few moments after a person joined him. The former was Guiseppe Muerto, a well known assassin, the other was Johnston, who in his hurried walk ran against the Bravo.

"Ha! who is this?" asked Johnston.

"It is Guiseppe Muerto," was the reply.

"Guiseppe Muerto, I esteem it fortunate that you have been prompt to my summons. You, I have been informed, are a professed assassin, I have a little business on hand that will bring you a good price, the customs of your country permit it; but in mine we look upon such deeds with horror. You, who have sent, as I have been told, twenty souls to the shades, must feel quite at home in matters of this kind, eh, Senior Guiseppe."

"Sir, Englishman," replied Guiseppe, "or more properly speaking, my lord, my stileto has long become rusty, the Council looks coldly upon the secret murderer, and now-a-days it is but a short step from the council-chamber to the execution. It is not now like the good old days of yore, when the victim was only exposed to the public gaze to be recognized, while the good Bravo walked about unmolested; but now there is the "Sereno" to be bribed, the council to be paid. Ah, my lord, it requires money now-a-days to escape justice; but, my lord, what is it you wish with old Guiseppe, he is at your bidding." Johnston requested Guiseppe to look for the Sereno and see the coast clear before he made known to him the object of his appointment. The Sereno hearing the request concealed himself. Guiseppe remarked he thought he heard the slow and measured step of the Sereno, as this position of the quay was his beat.

"I do not think he is about, you can converse freely," was his reply.

"You know, Guiseppe," commenced Johnston, "I married the daughter of the Count De Cheveta, the beautiful Ada, who differs so much from Sicilians generally, by having blue eyes, methought she differed from them in all other particulars, and that she would forego the customs of her country by not having a—a—" here the words appeared to choke him. Guiseppe finished the speech by laughingly remarking, "Senior, a Ciccisbeo." "Hell!" exclaimed Johnston: "Yes, good Guiseppe, it was not mentioned in the contract. But to the point;—on the day of her wedding a minstrel arrived, he sang her an old song which was familiar to her during her childhood; this song she had taught to a cousin, who had promised not to sing or teach it to any one. She recognized in this minstrel her cousin, and on the very night I married her he became her ——" Here again he stopped, and the word "Ciccisbeo" was repeated by Guiseppe.

"Yes," replied Johnston, "and I wish to punish him."

"His name?" asked Guiseppe.

"Gerald De Cheveta," replied Johnston.

"Ha! Gerald De Cheveta! little Gerald!" exclaimed Guiseppe. "I have often danced him upon my knee. Ah! he was a beautiful child, but Gerald never liked my name." Turning to Johnston, he asked him, "My lord, what would you have me do with Gerald?"

Johnston replied, "I would have your stileto in his heart." The assassin for a moment remained silent, his breast appeared to swell with indignation, his eyes flashed, and in a determined voice he replied, "Away, away, Senior Englishman, though twenty murders harass my soul, I would not harm a hair of his head. What! murder in cold blood the child who has so often played around me and clasped me about the neck, calling me good Guiseppe, when all else looked upon me with horror? Spare me, my lord, this child—for child I must still think him, was the only thing on earth that ever loved me Bravo as I am."

Johnston saw at once he would have to touch some strong chord to induce Guiseppe to assassinate Gerald, and that chord was his poverty. "They tell me, Guiseppe, you are very poor, living in a mere hovel, near Sera, on the borders of the Count De Cheveta's estates. Why then don't this Gerald, this little Gerald seek you out and relieve your necessities? he has forgotten his 'good Guiseppe': one more soul added to the long list of those you have sent to purgatory will not disturb your peace of mind, and that one soul will make you rich, and as Gerald has not sought out his friend, I will relieve you. Take this purse, it will warm your cottage, and you can once more hold up your head."

The Bravo received the purse, and after a moment's silence remarked, "My lord, I must here mention to you that the customs of this country may induce the Council to look with an indulgent eye at the revenge of a Sicilian, but the national antipathy entertained against your countrymen would probably induce the Council for once to mete out justice, and the Count De Cheveta, though poor, is influential. To accomplish your object you must be present at the murder, for murder it is. For myself, I require sufficient to enable me to live comfortably the remainder of my days, and a hasty departure from the Island."

"This you shall have. I have written an anonymous note to Gerald, requesting him to meet a person at this place at half past twelve to night; it is now near the time, name your price."

"One thousand doubloons and a hasty departure from Sicily," replied Guiseppe.

"One thousand doubloons," repeated Johnston, "enormous, I have been told you assassinated the Count Neapole for only thirty."

"True," replied Guiseppe. "That was several years ago; times are changed, and you are an Englishman. I was employed by his brother, a member of the Council. You must bear in mind, the Count De Cheveta has a brother in the Council, the father of Gerald. I cannot commit this murder for less than the sum I have specified."

"Well, here is my hand to the bargain. Gerald De Cheveta must soon pass this way, let us conceal ourselves, I think I hear footsteps." In a few moments after the two had concealed themselves, Gerald arrived at the foot of the fatal statue. Looking around and not perceiving any one, he leaned against the base of the statue. A dim street-light shone upon his face. Johnston touched Guiseppe upon the arm, and whispered him to commit the deed. The Bravo stepped forward; the movement was heard by Gerald. Turning round, he faced Johnston and recognized him. At this moment the assassin threw himself upon Gerald and buried his stiletto in his body. Johnston hastily fled, and in his flight left his cloak. The first stab was not fatal, and in the struggle Gerald cried for help. The noise was heard by the Sereno, who, upon hearing the conversation between Johnston and Guiseppe, had sought other watchmen and the military guard, who, arriving at the moment the murder was committed, seized Guiseppe and conveyed him to prison. Searching the ground the stiletto of Guiseppe and cloak of Johnston were both found. The body of Gerald was placed in the public square for recognition, and in the morning watch, two guards were placed over the body to bring to the Council any person who should recognize the corpse. Johnston arrived at his office, locked and double locked the door, and endeavored to compose his mind, where for the present we will leave him already a prey to remorse.

Loroto, one of the night guard, was placed to watch the body of Gerald. Pacing to and fro at a respectable distance from the corpse, he looked anxiously around, as if expecting some one to keep him company. He dared not leave his position, yet his fears prevented him from examining the body. He had not long been on his guard, before another of the watch joined him.

"Good morning, Francisco, I almost feared you would not be here in time, as you are so confoundedly afraid of dead people."

"Now you see, Loroto. I do not fear the dead so much as the living. Here is this youth—the first assassination that has occurred among the nobility of Messina for years. I think the last was the young Count De Palermo, since which time the Council has not been called in session. I have looked at the body and methinks I have seen that face before. Old Guiseppe never fails in his work to send a soul to purgatory, and to escape the Council. What do you think of it, Loroto?"

"I think he won't escape the Council this time. The last murder committed by Guiseppe was that of the brother of the present Count De Palermo, a member of the Council, who, it was whispered at the time, not only paid the fee, but has since bestowed on Guiseppe a small pension on condition that he will never appear in his sight. Whenever he passes the Count, it is said that he muffles his face in a cloak. But, friend Francisco, Guiseppe has drawn his last stiletto, and will soon follow the youth he last assassinated to the shades. It is now near day. I see the grey twilight rising above the hills, I wish it was light. Like yourself, I always had a dread of dead people: let us step back here and wait; if any one recognizes the corpse it will be our duty to bring him before the Council."

The day gradually dawned, and as it grew light a few country people passing to market stopped for a moment to examine the face of the corpse, but not recognizing it resumed their journey. In the meantime the two friends lit their cigars, and whiled away the time discussing the probability of discovering the instigator of the foul deed, and in relating adventures of Guisseppo Muerto.

CHAPTER IX.

The vessel in which Constantine had embarked, encountering adverse winds, put into a small seaport, but a day's ride from Messina. Wishing again to see his parents, and as the captain of the Xebec was, for a small consideration, willing to delay his departure for a few days, Constantine returned to Messina. It was about the twilight of morning when he entered the city. The sun had tinged the horizon with a purple hue, and the blue outlines of Mount Ætna were distinctly visible against the heavens. Slacking the reins of his mule, he for a moment gazed in admiration on the scene. The animal, relieved from the tightness of the rein, dropped its head and resumed its usual gait, and ere Constantine had time to finish his meditations he was in front of his father's palace. "Ah! here is my father's house," he mentally exclaimed. "How surprised he will be to see me so soon returned, and Gerald by this time will have some sentimental tale of love to relate, and while away a pleasant hour." Dismounting and knocking at the gate, he called to the inmates to open the door. "Father, Ada, Gerald, are you all dead? it is Constantine that calls, open the gate, or I'll break it down." Turning, he saw the corpse. "Bah!" he exclaimed, "when will Sicily abolish the vile custom of exposing under the very nose of the nobility every vagabond who gets assassinated in a street brawl; but custom compels me to look at the corpse." Advancing towards it, he saw on a near approach that it was his cousin Gerald. For a moment he was paralysed, the next, rushing towards the house and knocking still louder than before, he called first upon his father, then Ada. "Open the door, father, here's a murder most foul, Ada! Ada! father; Gerald is most foully murdered."

The Count was the first to hear the cry of murder. Opening the gate he enquired, "who was that crying murder?"

"It is your son, look for the love of the virgin, here is a most brutal murder, horrible! horrible! Gerald, dear Gerald is murdered." The Count at this announcement fainted, and the watchmen hearing the cries of Constantine came forward and demanded if he knew the person exposed.

"Yes, good watchmen, I do," was the reply.

"Then we must lead you to the Council."

"Not yet, good watchmen, but haste and bring some water, the Count, my father, has fainted."

"I have no water, Senior, but here is a little wine left in this flagon, which you are most welcome to."

The Count in a few moments revived, and asked his son if he had not cried murder!

"Yes, my father, there lies the body of our dear Gerald, exposed to the gaze and remarks of every passer by; he has been most foully murdered, and justice for once shall predominate in the council." Turning to the watchmen he directed them to convey the body to the council-chamber.

"And you, dear father, must hie to the counselors and have them at once assembled, while I shall pursue a course that will not fail to bring the assassin to punishment." The request of Constantine was immediately obeyed, wending his course towards the office of Johnston, and knocking on his arrival at the door, he made him acquainted with the fact of the murder. During the recital Constantine did not fail to notice Johnston's pale and haggard appearance. He summoned him to appear at the council chamber at the usual time of its opening. "Nor do you dare, Sir Englishman, to absent yourself," was Constantine's last remark.

Returning to his father's and selecting a fleet horse he was soon on his way to Sera. On his arrival, he communicated the melancholy news of Gerald's death to his mother and directed her to obtain from Ada the marriage contract, as it would probably be important to have it during the examination before the Council, but not to mention to her the death of her cousin. Constantine returned to Messina, he found Johnston still at his office and went with him to the council-chamber.

The chamber in which the members of the council meet in Messina is a dreary looking arched hall; the hour of assembling is midnight, and the lights are so arranged that the Council can see the slightest alteration in the countenance of the prisoner, while the faces of the former are concealed by a dark shade from the latter. The Council was assembled and the prisoner stood before them. The body of the assassinated youth lay on a richly covered bier immediately opposite Guisseppo. The Senior De Cheveta, clothed in deep mourning, hung for a moment over the corpse, and then took his seat as one of the Council. Count De Palermo, the eldest of the members of the Council, arose from his seat and addressed the prisoner:

"Guisseppo Muerto, your numerous crimes darken the records of this Council. The purest blood of Messina has stained your stiletto. Speak, Guisseppo, the Council will hear you."

Guisseppo for a moment was silent; he appeared to be endeavoring to scan, by the faint light of the lamps, the countenances of the different members of the Council. Turning towards the Count De Palermo, he addressed him solely :

"Senior Count De Palermo, I am not the murderer of this youth, to you I appeal for mercy. In by-gone days you found Guisseppo true and faithful. I served you once, serve me now." For a moment the Count remained silent; it was only for a moment; his thin and almost attenuated frame appeared to be convulsed, his deep black eyes flashed with anger. With one hand grasping convulsively the back of his chair, his other extended, he slowly replied to Guisseppo: "The warm blood of the Sicilian nobles whom you have murdered, rises from the cold earth against you. 'Tis time to check the midnight assassin. You have in several instances incensed this Council, by your bold and open assassinations; nor do you seek the low and vulgar to glut your thirst for blood, but your stiletto reeks with the gore of the nobles only. What say the Council?"

The members of the Council replied simultaneously, "The country needs reform."

The Count continued, "Guisseppo, you have appealed to me as one of the Council to protect you. Base and miserable wretch, murderer, fiend, your stiletto still reeks with the heart's blood of my dearest and nearest kinsman, a brother." The passion and feelings of the Count overcame him, and he fell back exhausted into his chair.

Guisseppo appeared but little moved by this speech. Turning to the Council he addressed them as follows: "Most noble Seniors, Neapole, Cosmo, Penaro, let me implore you. Here, on my bended knees supplicating mercy, I appeal to your justice. Do not condemn me upon the uncertain testimony of a bare suspicion. To the charge of murder I plead not guilty."

For a moment the members of the Council were silent, apparently awaiting Guisseppo's further remark. The Count De Palermo was the first to break silence with the simple remark, "We will award you 'Justice'" which was repeated by all the Council.

The Count De Palermo then directed the watchman to step forth and produce the evidence in his possession. The latter held up a stiletto with the blood of young Gerald still upon it. The Count De Palermo looked steadily for a moment at Guisseppo, who returned his gaze with a steady eye. "Whose stiletto is that, Guisseppo?" enquired the Count.

Guisseppo looked at it for a moment and carelessly remarked, "Senior, I know not."

At this reply the countenance of the Count assumed an appearance of anger, but at once subduing it, he again turned to the Sereno. "Sereno, where, and under what circumstances did that stiletto come into your possession?"

"Most noble Senior," commenced the Sereno, "about the hour of eleven, when the shades of night had crept over the quiet of the city, methought I heard footsteps within the circle of my beat, and as they drew near I concealed myself behind the angle of a projecting wall. I had scarcely concealed myself when I saw, by the dim light of a flickering lamp which hung near the 'statue of Hercules' the prisoner walking slowly. A few minutes elapsed and he was joined by another. A low and short consultation passed between them; they retired near to my place of concealment. A few minutes after, the youth on the bier passed; the two assassins rushed out, and ere I could give the alarm murder had already been done. One of the assassins escaped; the other who now stands before you was secured by me with the assistance of the guard. This stiletto I found near the body, and on the handle is carved Guisseppo Muerto."

For a moment the cool self-possession of Muerto disappeared, but it was only for a moment. He looked at the knife and a contemptuous sneer took the place of confusion in his countenance. He turned towards the Count Palermo and looked him steadily in the face. The Count rose slowly from his seat and pointed towards the corpse, looking steadily at Guisseppo, he addressed him in the following manner: "Guisseppo Muerto, to the accusation of murder you plead 'not guilty,' and ask the mercy of this court. You know the usual requirements of this court in cases of this kind; lay your hand upon the body and curse the murderer."

Guisseppo advanced towards the bier where the body of Gerald lay and gazed intently upon his face. For the first time he showed feeling. A tear was seen to drop from his eye. At this moment Constantine and Johnston entered the council-chamber; in an instant all Guisseppo's former ferocity appeared to be aroused; he placed his hand upon the breast of the corpse and pointing towards Johnston with the other, he slowly and emphatically fulfilled the Count's directions in the following manner: "May curses fall heavily on the murderer, may he be childless and have sleepless nights; in old age be a lone and miserable wanderer on the earth, may the curse of Cain follow and overtake him." Still pointing to Johnston, he exclaimed at the pitch of his voice, "I proclaim him to be the murderer."

Muerto, dropping his hand, retired to his former position. He looked attentively at Johnston, who immediately advanced to the middle of the council-chamber and denied the charge, setting forth that he was an Englishman, and painting in glowing colors his abhorrence of the crime of murder,—repelling the accusation in a strong and vehement manner. The Count Palermo listened attentively until he had finished and then beckoning to the guards directed them to secure the Englishman, at the same time remarking, "Sir Englishman, you have been accused of murder before this court, it will be necessary to plead to the charge, and although the Council may not yet take evidence against you; your person must be secured." Turning to Guisseppo, he continued: "The Council will hear your defence."

Guisseppo scanned, (as well as the dim light of the council-chamber would permit,) the countenances of the different members of the court. He saw at once he was doomed, and he determined to leave on their memories a lasting impression of himself. Stepping into the centre of the council-chamber, facing the Count De Palermo, with a firm voice he thus addressed him:

Most noble Count De Palermo, to you I have appealed for mercy. When you, with fawning flattery and sweet words, tempted me to crime and caused these hands to be bathed in the heart's blood of your brother, I was not backward in fulfilling your desires. Ah! Senior Count, methinks the same demon smile that shone over the dying body of your kinsman is now a forerunner of my sentence. You struck not the blow it is true, but your gold gave it force, ha! ha! ha! Senior Cosmo grant that favor to me now, which you promised over the dying body of your most beautiful and angel wife. Shake not your head, Senior Cosmo, I to be sure opened the passage for her pure soul to depart and leave your loathed embraces, but the tempting promises of your deceitful tongue and gold strengthened the arm which gave the death blow. Ah! methinks I see your hands grasping your wife's delicate throat to prevent her spirit passing out the right channel. Senior Penaro! do you look coldly on me too! Where is the affectionate embrace given to your "dear Guisseppo," when your father had lived too long and his money bags haunted your heated imagination! Are you all bent upon my destruction! Is this hand no longer serviceable! Or do you fear that a brother, wife, or son, may use me in the same kindly office! Seniors, I am not guilty of this murder; (pointing to Johnston) there stands the assassin. 'Twas his promises, his gold that did it. Ah! my lord Englishman, do you shudder! Guisseppo Muerto will not die alone, most noble Palermo. I appeal to the War Council."

This rough defence, delivered with all the vehemence and gesticulation of an excited Sicilian, appeared to have a very serious effect with the Council. The Count Palermo was for some moments silent, and appeared to be glued to his seat: he made several efforts to rise from his chair. At last, livid with passion, he turned to Johnston and informed him that the appeal of the wretch, Guisseppo, must be complied with, and both would be brought before the War Council. "But, sir Englishman, this Council will hear and record any defence you may wish to make."

Johnston, agitated and pale, his lips quite livid, addressed the Council. "Most noble Seniors! can this Council admit the evidence of so vile a wretch as this assassin! One who has already confessed to crimes of so great a magnitude that they will sink his soul to the utmost depths of perdition! One who has endeavored to cast on this noble Council of Sicily's best blood, crimes which, if true, would cry aloud to heaven for vengeance! Where, Seniors, is your proof! Only this criminal, already in your minds condemned; for, most noble Seniors, you have produced no other."

Johnston was silent, the Count De Palermo made a sign to the Sereno, who stepped in front of Johnston and held up a cloak. The act of the watchman completely confused the Englishman, who became at once alarmed and agitated. He exclaimed, "Seniors, the marriage contract forbids a 'Ciciiseo.' I call for the marriage contract." Turning to Constantine, he demanded of him the marriage contract. The Count De Palermo informed Johnston his plea would be accepted, but continued by observing that the time-honored customs of Sicily would not be forgotten. "This custom," continued the Count, "of having a Ciciiseo, originated with the crusaders, a holy love, cemented by purity and the cross. If then this custom has been for once violated, you, sir Englishman, will have the benefit of the circumstance. Senior Constantine produce the contract, that we may examine it." The Count slowly opened the contract and read it. He was silent some time after perusing it. Then turning to Constantine, at the same time handing him the paper, remarked: "This contract forbids a Ciciiseo." Johnston's face once more brightened, but Constantine seizing the paper, and now becoming agitated in his turn, exclaimed, "Ha! Senior, I saw this contract previous to its being sealed, and it allowed a Ciciiseo. May it not have been altered! Seniors, I will relate an ancient legend, which caused all contracts to be printed under the authority of the Government. A young and jealous nobleman altered a marriage contract and was detected; since which time, they have been printed by authority of the Government only: the letters by a chemical process are dyed into the parchment, and cannot be wholly erased. If any erasures are attempted, a sponge moistened with vinegar and wiped over the parchment will immediately restore the original writing. I request the contract may be tested."

The Count received the parchment from Constantine and tested it according to his suggestion. "Here it is. The word appears, 'Ciciiseo,' exclaimed the Count. Senior Englishman, you are ordered to appear with Guisseppo Muerto, as an accomplice in the murder he stands charged with, to be tried by the laws of Messina, and if guilty, to be executed, according to our customs, in secret." The Count left his seat, and the remainder of the Council followed him. At the moment of leaving the council-chamber he turned to the guard and told them to take the prisoners hence.

Guiseppe knew the force of these remarks. Turning to Johnston and making a most profound bow, he said, "We are likely to visit the shades together, my lord Englishman."

Johnston turning to the guards begged them not to allow the assassin to kill him by his taunts before his time. Guisseppo laughed, and turning to leave the apartment with the guards, sarcastically replied, "Let the gentleman follow."

CHAPTER X.

The cell in which Guisseppo was placed communicated with the council-chamber, through which any of the members could pass, each having a secret key. Guisseppo, on arriving at his cell, threw himself carelessly on the floor and was in a few moments asleep; nor did he awake until the morning light shone into the narrow window of his cell. Slowly rising from his hard bed, and surveying the room, he mentally soliloquized, "These are pleasant apartments forsooth, but I gave the Council a hard thrust, which they will not be likely to place among their records. I am to be arraigned before the War Council, some secrets will then be disclosed by old Guisseppo, which will make my judges and former employers blush. Let me see; there is the Count De Neapole, the devil take him, he is as savage as a tiger and as brave as a lion, and has no more conscience than Ercola, the witch of Ætna, who told me I would die a natural death. Then there is Senior Cosmo, a precious villain with a chicken-heart, who would send me from this chamber a much shorter way to purgatory than by the Council." Guisseppo had progressed this far in his soliloquy, when he heard a slight noise near him, and turning, he discovered a person close by, muffled in a cloak. Believing it to be one of the Council, he drew himself up to his full height and stood ready to defend himself. "Who are you? one of the Council I suppose, speak."

"I am," replied the person, "in the eyes of the world a fiend."

"Friend, enemy, or devil, what is your business?" demanded Guisseppo.

"I am Ercola, the witch of Ætna." At this announcement Guisseppo for a moment appeared to be overcome with rage. At the top of his voice he exclaimed, "Out, vile sorceress, you are a false prophetess. Where is your 'easy death bed'? Do these cold floors resemble downy feathers? are these clanking chains the soothing words of friends? Out upon thee!"

"Guiseppe," replied Ercola, "your old enemy, the Senior Cosmo, employed my son to assassinate you in this prison; he gave him his signet ring and this stiletto; but I have undertaken to do the deed for him." Guisseppo sprang towards her and wrenching the stiletto from her hand, threw her upon her knees, exclaiming, "Now, vile wretch, prepare to make your journey to the shades, screech forth your last 'ave,' treacherous hell-cat, and die." Every nerve and muscle of Guisseppo appeared affected and convulsed; he lifted the stiletto, and only awaited the fulfilment of his last command, before he plunged it into her heart. But the latter coolly replied, "How brave old Guisseppo is! my death is your death; release me one moment and I promise to set you at liberty." Guisseppo appeared astonished, not only at her coolness, but at her remarks also. He at once released her. On rising to her feet she said, "Listen, Guisseppo, you once did me a service, you saved me from this Cosmo; he would have executed me for a sorceress; take this cloak and signet ring; you then can pass the sentry in safety; leave me your old cloak; now haste, haste."

"Thanks, thanks, good Ercola; but stop, will you not be endangered?"

"No, no; I have provided for that. Haste to my hut, where you will find my son Fraola." Guisseppo wrapped himself in the cloak, took the ring, and handing the stiletto to Ercola, he left the prison. "Ah! exclaimed Ercola, Senior Cosmo is to be here soon to make all sure. Beware Senior; you have a woman's wits to encounter." A slight noise here arrested her attention. She quickly concealed herself behind one of the pillows which answered the double purpose of supporting the roof, and having prisoners chained to it. Senior Cosmo entered the cell cautiously muffled in his cloak; he called in a low voice for Fraola, and was answered by Ercola, who assumed the voice of her son. "Fraola, is it done?" enquired the Count. "If so come this way, I have something else to communicate to you." Ercola advanced a step, and perceiving Cosmo feeling in his bosom, stopped a moment and replied, "I am here, Senior Cosmo, come near Senior, I will whisper something to you." Ercola advanced, and ere Cosmo could accomplish his object she buried her stiletto between his shoulders. Cosmo drew his stiletto and stabbed at random, exclaiming, "I am murdered, there is dimness in my sight, good heaven forgive me," and he fell back without a groan. Ercola took from his finger a ring and passed by the secret passage out of the prison, leaving Cosmo wrapped in the cloak of Guisseppo.

CHAPTER XI.

We must now convey the reader to the cell in which Johnston was confined. The two prisoners had been confined about two in the morning. The excitement and fatigues of the trial had so completely overcome Johnston that he fell asleep almost instantly on taking possession of his miserable cell. Nor did he awake until the hand of his friend Weeton was placed upon his shoulder to arouse him. He started in alarm, exclaiming "Hah! the demons are here," but on becoming fully aroused, his astonishment was doubly increased by discovering his friend. His first expression was, "Good heaven what do I see! my friend! Weston, oh! that you should see me, thus manacled, a criminal." Weston enquired if he was prepared to die? "Death, Weston! death! the grave! Oh horrible, to die in a foreign land, a criminal, side by side with a base assassin, one who during his whole life has been an eternal drinker of blood! oh! my friend, a few short hours and the sun of my life sets! nor have I prepared myself for an eternity of darkness and annihilation, neither have I had time to reflect whether the opening of the secret door of eternity will be as we are taught to believe, an entrance into torments everlasting—beginning without end, the spirit writhing and sinking in torments far beyond the extension of thought, forever seeking repose, yet finding naught but accumulating despair." Here he clenched his hands and sank on his knees. His friend touched him on his shoulder and told him he could save him.

"Me," he exclaimed, "oh! save me! Weston. My heart quails at death, I am not prepared to meet an offended Supreme Being. I cannot bear the thought of being so suddenly thrust into eternity. Oh! save me, if you can! How can you do it! Look at the solidity of these prison walls, and these massive chains."

"Johnston, my dear friend, be composed, I have several swift horses between here and the village of Sera. At the quay you will see a boat waiting with a streamer flying, having on it my family's coat-of-arms. Say to the boatman, St. George; he will understand you; take that boat, go to Palermo, the packet for Malta will by that time be ready to sail, she is now in port. Once in Malta under the English flag; the devil take the Sicilians. Here are the tools to take off the irons. Your trial before the Council would not have taken place before to-morrow; by that time you will be coasting it. I have arranged my liberation with our Consul, and will be in Palermo in time to see you safe on board. Now farewell, and haste, recollect the watchword, 'St George.'"

The witch, Ercola, lived near the foot of Mount Ætna, but having been compelled to reside on the estate of the Count De Cheveta, her son Fraola had, through the kindness of Gerald, procured a boat and become a fisherman. It was this boat Weston had engaged for Johnston. Guisseppo immediately on his release, fled to Ercola's temporary rendezvous, and there learned from Fraola, that his boat had been engaged to take an English lord, escaping from Messina, to Palermo. Guisseppo at once suspected it to be Johnston and easily persuaded his friend to let him assume his dress, and take charge of the boat. At the time appointed Johnston arrived in Sera; he looked along the quay and recognized his friend's boat by the streamer. Looking around, he saw by the faint light of the moon a solitary boatman. Addressing him in Italian, he said, "Ah, good boatman, 'St. George' attend you, is the wind fair, and your saint propitious?"

Guisseppo, smothering his feelings, replied, "Yes, my lord, the wind is fair, and my saint propitious."

"Well, I am glad to hear it, then haste, good boatman, time is precious."

Johnston was struck with the constant repetition of his words, and testily remarked, "Come friend, cast loose your boat, then ply your oar, gain the offing, spread your sails to the propitious breeze, and have a quick trip to Palermo."

Guisseppo could no longer control his passion, but suddenly seizing Johnston by the throat he threw him upon the ground, drew his stiletto, held it a moment suspended over his head, and asked him through his teeth, "My lord, do you recognize my face? Prepare to follow Gerald De Cheveta."

The Englishman had merely time to exclaim, "villain," before the stiletto of Guisseppo was buried in his breast. Guisseppo immediately arose, and Johnston in his dying agony drew a pistol and fired at random. The ball lodged in the side of Guisseppo, who staggered and fell across the gunwale of the boat, along side of the quay, dragging Johnston with him who sank into the bay. The report of the pistol drew the attention of Fraola, who immediately sprang to his feet, and finding Guisseppo wounded and dying conveyed him to his mother's hovel.

The Count De Cheveta and family immediately after the death of Gerald, returned to their country seat, and upon the conviction of Johnston, communicated the circumstance to Ada. The assassination of her cousin by her husband, and the incarceration of the latter deprived her of her reason. She remained a few days in a state of stupor, nor could the skill of the best physicians, and the kind and constant attentions of her father, mother and brother arouse her. Heart broken and emaciated she breathed her last, singing the favorite song taught by her to her cousin when a child. A simple white marble cross only marks the spot of her interment, and near it stands the plain tombstone of Gerald De Cheveta, with the following inscription. "Gerald De Cheveta assassinated." Constantine took the place of his father at the Council, while the latter retired to the village of Sera, to spend, as he justly remarked, "The remains of a disappointed old age."

THE COLONIAL HISTORY OF VIRGINIA.

B. B. Minor
TO THE LEGISLATURE OF VIRGINIA:

In the last number of the Southern Literary Messenger, the proposition was made to your honorable body, to send an agent to England to procure such materials as her archives might afford for the History of our State. In resuming this important subject at this time, we must ask your indulgent attention, since it will be entirely out of our power to devote much time to the arrangement of our remarks. We are forced to write currente calamo; but it is a source of great encouragement to reflect, that the subject is one which so strongly commends itself, as scarcely to require any studied exposition.

No claim is preferred for originality in the plan proposed. It has often been suggested, and has met the approbation of nearly every one to whom it has been mentioned. Indeed it lies upon the very surface of utility, and, as already shewn, has been profitably embraced by other States. If the present effort, however, to induce your honorable body to imitate such laudable examples, be crowned with success, it will be a cause of no little pride and rejoicing to us to share in the credit of effecting so desirable an object. It has been truly said,

"That man is not the discoverer of any art who first says the thing; but he who says it so long and so loud and so clearly, that he compels mankind to hear him. * * * * Other persons had noticed the effect of coal-gas in producing light; but Winsor worried the town with bad English for three winters, before he could attract any serious attention to his views. Many persons broke stone before Macadam, but Macadam felt the discovery more strongly, stated it more clearly, persevered in it with greater tenacity, wielded his hammer, in short, with greater force than other men, and finally succeeded in bringing his plan into general use."

Whether the present application shall be successful depends upon your sense of its value and importance. We pledge ourselves to persevere in it, but hope to be relieved from the necessity of "worrying you with bad English, for three winters." We know that this is a period of taxation and indebtedness, but the appropriation requisite for the object herein proposed will neither increase the taxes nor the debt of the State, whilst it so nearly concerns the honor and lofty character of Virginia, as to demand immediate action. Her early heroes are without a monument, long periods of her government without a record, and her annals imperfect and unknown. Whilst this condition of things is so eloquently appealing to her rulers, her Literary Fund, after supplying all the demand for primary Education and for other accustomed purposes, is annually overflowing. After every ordinary draft has been made upon it, a yearly excess from its income of some $13,000 returns to become a part of its permanent capital. Hence it was that the Legislature, during its last session, were enabled to perform such an act of justice, as to lend fifteen thousand dollars to the Medical College of Richmond, at a time, too, when they were raising the taxes of the people. Hence arose the application of the Colleges of the State for Legislative aid. With their application, the present proposition is not intended to interfere; but they can wait if necessary until this paramount object is first accomplished. The Literary Fund, then, not only furnishes the requisite means; but its very nature and objects seem to point to the attainment of the first work of Literary interest, a full and suitable history of the State. The children of the State are taught to read in the primary schools. This is a provision made by their liberal parent, whom they soon learn to love and revere. They are inspired with a thirst for knowledge; they learn with avidity the chronicles of other times and other lands; but when, alas! they turn to enquire for the history of her, who has provided for them all this enjoyment and all this mental improvement, they find with astonishment and regret, that there is none to give them. They can only be told of a few incomplete and for the most part inaccessible books, or pointed to the mutilated records, which it were a life-labor to explore. How it chills the affections to be thus denied what is often so eagerly sought! Nothing can so elevate patriotism as to have the mind filled with the history of one's native State. A common school history of Virginia should be put into the hands of every child who is educated at the public expense. Scholars and citizens more liberally educated would require a work more elaborate and extended. But neither has as yet been written, nor can it ever be until the documents are procured from the mother country. The want of them has already deterred many who would have undertaken the task and has entirely defeated the efforts of those who have attempted it; whilst States as young as Kentucky, the daughter of Virginia, Illinois, Tennessee and others have already their complete histories.

Having pointed out the means of defraying the expense of the plan proposed, and presented the foregoing general remarks in support of it, we will proceed to a more definite view of the subject, by enforcing the following propositions:

1. Every independent State should have a complete set of its public records, and a history fairly and impartially embodying them.

This might be taken for granted. It results from the nature of public transactions, from the plain necessities of society and the demands of its members; from the known wishes, wants and practice of every civilized community. Fame demands a perpetuity; virtue and heroism their monuments; and ambition the stimulus, which the Hope of transmission to future ages alone can impart. The progress of society and the mere sequence of events must, in every land blessed with letters, necessarily require a record.

2. Virginia has no history worthy of the name, and there are many and great breaches in her public records.

The Colonial History of Virginia extends through a period of one hundred and sixty-nine years, from 1607 to 1776. The gallant Capt. Smith, whose literary seems little less conspicuous than his military spirit, was the earliest historian of Virginia; but his work comes down only to the year 1624. It was written in pursuance of a resolution offered by himself, in the council, that some one be appointed to prepare a memorial of what had transpired in the Colony. Whereupon he was requested to undertake the task.

If such a history was needful then, in the beginning of events, how much more so now, when so much is past that needs to be perpetuated. Mr. Jefferson says of Smith, "he was honest, sensible and well informed; but his style is barbarous and uncouth. His history, however, is almost the only source from which we derive any knowledge of the infancy of our State." Burk says, "Smith's is a sort of Epic History or romance, where the author, like Ossian, recounts his achievements in the spirit which he fought. His narrative, however, occasionally discovers much good sense and raises no inconsiderable interest. It is moreover the ground work of succeeding histories, and is valuable as a piece of rare and curious antiquity." But this history, rare, curious and truly valuable as it is, comprises the incidents of only seventeen years. A gentleman of this state, of indefatigable research, has lately discovered in a Northern Library another work of Capt. Smith, published in 1608, which of course contains the events of only one year.

The Rev. William Stith, a native of Virginia, and President of William and Mary College, has also written the history of the colony for the space of about twenty years. Of him Mr. Jefferson says, "he was a man of classical learning and very exact, but of no taste in style. He is inelegant, therefore, and his details often too minute to be tolerable."

Beverly, also a native, has written the history of Virginia from the first propositions of Sir Walter Raleigh to the year 1706. He errs on the opposite extreme from Stith, comprising ninety-nine years in a fraction of the space which Stith devotes to twenty. Burk says, "Beverly is a mere annalist of petty incidents, put together without method, and unenlivened by any of the graces of style. He is moreover the apologist for power, in which respect also, he differs essentially from Stith, who on all occasions displays a manly contempt and defiance of injustice and tyranny."

Sir William Keith, a Governor of Pennsylvania, and the same, we think, who proposed a most arbitrary and insidious scheme of oppression over the colonies to the king of England, has also written a history of Virginia, from the settlement to the year 1725.

Mr. Jefferson says, "he is agreeable enough in style and passes over events of little importance;" and Burk says, that "although more diffuse than Beverly and more graceful and correct, he has little more of detail." There are also extant a brief history by Hamer, and a few pamphlets. These, with one exception are the only printed histories of the ancient Colony; and they have long since disappeared from the shelf of the bookseller, and are to be found in comparatively few libraries. Besides covering so little space, all do not contain an adequate memorial of the periods through which they extend.

The only remaining History of Virginia is that of Burk, Jones & Girardin, in 4 vols. 8 vo—published in Petersburg, 1805–16. Of these, we shall venture to speak freely our own opinion; and surely no work of the same extent, that aspires to the dignity of history is liable to so many and so great objections. Mr. John Burk, a native of Ireland, is the author of the first three volumes, which contain a treatise on navigation and maritime discovery in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, a long disquisition about the Indians, which was intended for a history of the United States and which he could not forbear to stick in, and a general history of the Colonies, besides the History of Virginia, many portions of which are meagre in the extreme. A striking instance of this occurs in the third volume, where he devotes only eleven pages to the events of nineteen years, from 1723 to 1742. This meagreness was produced partly by the impossibility of procuring better materials and partly by inactivity in research and in availing himself of the records within his power. He seems even to delight in the opportunity of abandoning his subject and expatiating at large in some wider field. He has fully carried out the idea expressed by himself:

"A correct History of Virginia," says he in the Preface to his first volume, "would be the history of North America itself, a portion of the globe, which enjoying the invaluable privilege of self-government, promises to eclipse the glory of Rome and Athens." One of these rhetorical flourishes, for which he is not a little notable, appears to please him more than a historical fact. His style is very defective and entirely unsuited to historical writing. He abounds with errors, and enjoys a singular facility of leaping over difficulties and solving doubts. Then, almost entire provinces of history are neglected, or only alluded to, and you may peruse his whole writings and have no conception of the growth and progress of the colony and of its most important internal regulations.

The fourth volume is a continuation by Skelton Jones, a Virginian, and Louis Hue Girardin, a Frenchman. Jones' portion is very short and hardy furnishes any criterion of his qualifications for the task. Most of the foregoing objections apply to Girardin. He is more correct than Burke, but is also too fond of discoursing de rebus omnibus. He has written the histories of North and South Carolina and the other colonies nearly as much as of Virginia. Indeed, it would hardly be too much to say that the portions of the four volumes under review, that refer properly to this State, can, with the aid of a pair of scissors only, be reduced into one volume. The rest is an imperfect history of the separate, or united Colonies, with a dash of French and Dutch affairs, and a sprinkling of philosophy. In short, if we wished conclusively to prove to any one that Virginia has no worthy history, we would induce him to read Burk's which is the only one that pretends to such a character. But the scantiness of his materials and the great obstacles which beset a pioneer in historical research should not be forgotten.

In the case before us, many of these obstacles were insuperable to the most patient and laborious search; and this will bring us to the breaches in our public records.

Down to the year 1624, when the charter was taken from the London Company, the materials for our history are quite complete even in this country. But doubtless a great deal additional of deep interest might be procured in England. During this period, the Colonists were in constant correspondence with their friends and the company in England, and many memoirs respecting the Colonies were written and published in the mother country, to impart information of its prospects and condition, and to induce adventurers to embark their fortunes in it. Many of these productions, besides the papers and documents transmitted to the Home Government, might be obtained by an active agent. Some of them are extant in this country and are known to possess very great value to the Historian of Virginia. It will be remembered that the above remarks as to memoirs and letters, apply also to other periods of the Colony. But from the commencement of the Royal Government, darkness and obscurity begin to settle upon the history of the Colony. The royal prerogative then so overshadowed it, that now it is impossible for any lights here to dispel the gloom. We find Mr. Burk himself bewailing it.

"But soon as the proprietary government sank beneath the arm of prerogative, the chain of facts is broken, and a black and melancholy chasm supplies the place of method and arrangement. During the existence of the proprietary government, historians could scarcely differ in the relation of facts: After its dissolution, there was hardly any chance of their agreement, or any means of reconciling or detecting their inconsistencies. The well grounded apprehensions excited among the colonists by the recall of their charter, and the character of the king, prevented them from immediately repairing the breaches made in their records by the hand of power. The letters of the governor and council in Virginia to the privy council, are marked by a coldness, a jealousy, and distance, but ill calculated to supply by conjecture or analogy, the want of more genuine matter; and the members of the British council, in the true spirit of courtiers, haughty, insincere, and incommunicative, confirmed the disgust and jealousy of the colony, by their cold and stunted communications; so that the man who should endeavor to depict the state of art and manners, the military and civil events within the colony, by the help of this correspondence, will be infallibly disappointed."

The reign of James I. is by no means a blank in English history, and as the colony then began to assume more importance in the eyes of the Royal Government, we might expect to learn something concerning it in the English historians. But this is not the case: the greatest of them, Hume, has not a word upon the subject. The only hope of supplying the deficiencies of this period is from the documents in the State paper office of England and from any contemporary letters or publications that may possibly be found across the Atlantic. The Colony of Virginia was not unmindful of her records; but a singular fatality seems to have attended them. Neglect, fire, and devastation, particularly during the revolution, made their combined ravages upon them, and destroyed many inestimable portions, which can be restored, if at all, only from the archives of England. One signal instance will exhibit the neglect to which they were exposed. Speaking of Sir Edmund Andross, Governor of Virginia in 1692, Burk says:

"He was likewise a great lover of method, and despatch in all sorts of business, which made him find fault with the management of the Secretary's office. And, indeed, with very good reason; for, from the time of Bacon's rebellion, till then, there never was any office in the world more negligently kept. Several patents of land were entered blank upon record; many original patents, records, and deeds of land, with other matters of great consequence, were thrown loose about the office, and suffered to be dirtied, torn and eaten by the moths and other insects. But upon this gentleman's accession to the government, he immediately gave directions to reform all these irregularities; he caused the loose and torn records of value to be transcribed into new books; and ordered conveniences to be built within the office, for preserving the records from being lost and confounded as before. He prescribed methods to keep the papers dry and clean, and to reduce them into such order as that any thing might be turned to immediately. But all these conveniences were burnt soon after they were finished, in October, 1698, together with the office itself, and the whole state house. But his diligence was so great in that affair, that though his stay afterward in the country was very short, yet he caused all the records and papers which had been saved from the fire, to be sorted again and registered in order, and indeed in much better order than ever they had been before. In this condition he left 'em, at his quitting the government."*

* Burk. Hist. Va., vol. II. 316-17. Beverly 90-91.

In the above extract we see how conflagration came in to the aid of the former neglect and to the overthrow of the order that had been so lately established. But this is by no means the only instance. The State House had been previously destroyed by fire in 1676, and was again burnt during the administration of Gooch, in 1746. If Burk be correct there must have been two fires before any of these, for he says that as early as 1667, "At the instance of Secretary Ludwell, it was enacted that the existing titles of lands, the records of which were lost, or to which titles were annexed in records, should be considered valid, the defects having been found to have happened by the neglect of the clerks of those times, and the casualty of two several fires."*

During the war of the Revolution, many barbarous and unpardonable ravages were made upon our public documents. Even in this respect the Historian may justly inveigh as he does against the "vandalic inroads" of the British. In the year 1781, when the archives of state were removed from Richmond on account of the British invasion, the proceedings of the Council were accidentally exposed, taken and destroyed by the enemy. These losses can never be repaired by any thing in England; and are the more deeply to be lamented.

3. There is no doubt, however, that many of the distressing chasms, which we have pointed out, can be completely filled by materials from England; and they are fully worth the trouble and expense of procuring them.

The intercourse between the colony and the mother country was always intimate, sometimes submissive. Frequent returns of the state of the Colony were required by law, and duplicates were made of every document relating to it, whether here or at home. These documents were all carefully preserved in the State Paper Office and in that of the Board of Trade.†

* Burk. Hist. Va., vol. II. 141.

† "It is well known that the administration of the general affairs of the British colonies in America was originally entrusted to several Lords of the Privy council, who were constituted by Royal commission a "committee for trade and plantations." Some years subsequently, the committee was discontinued, and a new and distinct board was organized, and styled 'the Lords commissioners for trade and plantations.'

"The records of the proceedings of the committee of council, and subsequently, of the board of trade and plantations, are very full and voluminous, and include likewise the records of the proprietary governments which were transferred to their custody. All these records relating to the American colonies have lately been removed from the Board of Trade to the State Paper Office, where they are hereafter to remain as a part of the archives of the empire.

"They consist principally of two general series, denominated Entries and Papers. The 'Entries' are composed, chiefly, of the commissions and instructions to the Governors, of despatches and letters to them, and their respective answers; and also, of various other important papers, copied into these books for preservation. The 'Papers'

When Georgia sent over her agent, the colonial documents were thus divided in these two depositories, and hence she failed to procure materials for some years of her early history. But in a short time the missing papers were discovered in the other office, only one having at first been examined. Since then all the colonial documents have been deposited and arranged in the State Office, whence copies are allowed to be made by the accredited agents of the States, down to the year 1775. For reasons of State all posterior to 1775 are positively interdicted. But with this limitation, the English Government are liberal in affording the States copies of whatever documents she may possess. From what Georgia and New York have obtained, we can readily infer what there is relating to Virginia. A letter from England to the Corresponding Secretary of the Georgia Historical Society, says "Mr. Brodhead, of New York, has left England with a large chest full of transcripts. His collection will make a sensation and will have the effect of stimulating others to follow such an example." There is also another guide already adverted to. In 1897, the Governor of North Carolina, in pursuance of a resolution of her Legislature, wrote to the Hon. Albert Gallatin, then our Minister at London, requesting him to have merely a catalogue made of the documents relating to her as a Colony and to transmit the said catalogue to him. Mr. Gallatin, always imbued with a love of letters, readily complied, and the list of the titles only of the documents occupies 120 printed octavo pages. In glancing over it, our eye was arrested by the title of several relating to Virginia also. We sincerely hope that the old North State will very soon avail herself of the valuable stores which she now so clearly knows to be there laid up for her. We are afraid that she too will outstrip Virginia in this laudable work; which may your honorable body prevent by your prompt, nay, your immediate action.

The pecuniary value of the treasures which the archives of England contain can best be estimated by considering the expense now daily incurred in order to preserve and perpetuate records of public transactions and events. Reflect for a moment upon the expenditures of your honorable body for this purpose alone. Estimate the salaries of the multitude of public officers, the cost of public offices, the State Guard and of every other arrangement for the preparation and care of the public consist of the originals of the several documents from time to time received from America, by the proprietaries, the committee and the board.

"In addition to these records, there is a large series of volumes belonging to the State Paper Office, properly containing the correspondence of the Secretaries of State with the Colonial and Provincial Governors, and others; and comprising, also, a large mass of original papers received from America, among which are many duplicates of documents in the Board of Trade records."—[Letter of Mr. Brodhead, Hist. agt. to Governor Seward of New York] records, and you will have some idea of the inestimable value of the documents which England is now willing to restore to us. They are equivalent to the labors of a number of public functionaries for a century and a half, and can probably all be procured for the small sum of a few thousand dollars. What would these be to such a State as Virginia for such a noble purpose; for an object identified with the honor and more enlarged interests of the Commonwealth? What though no mode may be pointed out by which she could convert them into money! What though they cannot minister to her immediate pecuniary interest! Would she traffic in the memorials of her Council Chamber? Would she sell the papers in the custody of the keeper of the rolls? Would she make profit of any of her archives? Does she value them according to their actual cost in money? Are they prepared and preserved with any view to pecuniary gain? It is the general utility to which she looks and to her honor and fame: to your regard for these, we appeal in behalf of the defective and mutilated annals of your State.

If, then, every independent State should have the materials in her possession for her full and complete history, and the histories of our state now extant are so meagre and defective, and there are no sources here whence to draw information indispensable to the historian, how surely must the conclusion follow, that it is the duty of your honorable body promptly to apply to those fruitful sources which are known to exist! The known effects of time in obliterating and destroying records of the past should stimulate you to diligence. When Mr. Henning was engaged in preparing his "Statutes at large," Mr. Jefferson, who had tendered him the use of his collection of laws, thus wrote, "Those in MS. were not sent, because not supposed to have been within your view, and because some of them will not bear removal, being so rotten that, on turning over a leaf, it sometimes falls into powder. These I preserve by wrapping and sewing them up in oiled cloth, so that neither air nor moisture can have access to them." And again, "But the unprinted laws are dispersed through many MS. volumes, several of them so decayed, that the leaf can never be opened but once without falling into powder."

The documents in England may not be in such a decayed state, but this will give some idea of the importance of speedily securing them.

It is important that Virginia should not suffer herself to be anticipated by any other States. Being the oldest, she should have been the first to move in the matter; and having lost more of her records, she has the most to expect from it. In Georgia "the last has been first;" let not "the first be the last!"

Besides, it is only through the liberal courtesy of the British Government, that the privilege of procuring copies is enjoyed. This courtesy may be wearied and exhausted by repeated applications, and some of the late comers may be denied what they will then find to have been above price.

The impartiality of history, too, requires that these foreign materials should be sought. Not only should England's archives be consulted, but her voice heard and represented in the history of the Colonies. On this head we adopt the following observations from the Southern Quarterly Review.

"The accounts we now have of the first settlement of this country, embracing the provincial and colonial era, are partial, one-sided, imperfect, and full of exaggeration. They have come to us from the hands of friends alone,—from the hands of warm, enthusiastic and ambitious friends and citizens of the New World, who sincerely loved their country, but who, at the time they wrote, were disposed, from motives of interest, as well as patriotism, to magnify both the advantages they enjoyed in their new Utopia, as well as the evils mastered by the courage and prowess of their countrymen. The Old World, as well as the New, has a voice to utter in this matter, and the archives of those European nations whose history is connected with our own, during the colonial and revolutionary eras, must be searched and examined, before the whole truth can be ascertained, or the historian be prepared, from a knowledge of opposing statements, and a fair consideration of the motives which influenced both parties, to pronounce an impartial judgment. Each of the old States should make liberal appropriations to accomplish so noble, patriotic and indispensable a design,—that is to say, each State that has a name encircled with the fame of worthy deeds, and wishes to transmit a faithful record of its acts to after times. We wish, especially, that South-Carolina might move, and move effectually in this matter. The appropriation of a few thousand dollars to such an object, would be honorable to the State, and would be money well expended. We want light especially on the Revolutionary era. In most of the histories that have been written, injustice has been done to the Southern States generally, and to South-Carolina in particular, respecting the part they took, the labors they performed, and the credit to which they are entitled, in the great struggles for our liberties. It is time that this injustice should be remedied. We want some person possessed of the competent learning, genius, industry, spirit and perseverance,—not a mere pretender,—to undertake the task, and perform it in a manner worthy of the age and the merits of those who acted well during the most eventful period of the world's history,—in a manner, too, honorable to our literature. We want such a work to be undertaken speedily, before those memorable men, who were themselves actors in the great drama, and who have much valuable information still to impart to the historian—information that will be soon lost to the world—shall all have passed off the stage of life."

You perceive our earnestness in pressing this subject upon the attention of your honorable body. As the honored legislators of your State, you must feel a desire to become acquainted with her history. History is the teacher of political wisdom. But to what sources will you go? To the public archives, defective as they are? You would then have no time for the duties devolved upon you. Hence arises the deep obligation to the faithful historian, who by his researches redeems the precious time of many thousands. Provide some competent mind with the proper resources and he will spread before you and your successors and your children, what the nature of your offices needs and what you now desire in vain, because it is inaccessible.

The history of Virginia is adorned with three illustrious names, that stand forth conspicuously in this connection. First in the order of time was Col. William Byrd of Westover, a Virginia gentleman and a scholar, of whom Burk says, "about the same time, (1743,) died William Byrd of the Council, one of the most distinguished characters which had shone out for a long time in Virginia.

* * * Extensive knowledge attained by study, improved by observation and refined by a familiar acquaintance with the illustrious characters of his time, were the qualities universally ascribed to him by the prints of the day. * * * It is the duty of History to pronounce one part of his eulogy, which, as it is justly earned, will become him better than a thousand wreaths of false and fantastic adulation. He felt a laudable and rational pride in preserving the antiquities of his country: nor can we believe that this proceeded merely from the cold spirit of an antiquarian. The antiquities he preserved contained materials for an history of his country."^{*} The other two were cotemporaries, leaders of the Assembly and the first Governors of the State; one spoken of as her Dictator, "in times that tried men's souls;" the other subsequently the leader of the whole Union. Of Patrick Henry it is expressly recorded, "his favorite studies were the history and antiquities of his native State; and so strong was the determination of his mind to objects at this time little known or attended to, that at an early age he was minutely acquainted with the various grants and charters, which compose the foundation and edifice of the rights and pretensions of Virginia.

"Owing to the security arising from long and uninterrupted possession, and the apprehensions excited by foreign hostility, these rights were but imperfectly understood, and to his superior knowledge in topics gradually becoming more interesting, should be ascribed in a great measure the high and deserved reputation he afterwards acquired."[†]

What shall be said of "the philosophic ardor of Jefferson, smitten with the elegances of Literature and fired with the passion of making his country the rival of civilized Europe."[‡] His "Notes on Virginia," his correspondence, his large historical collections of books and MSS.; his aid to Henning and to the late Edmund Randolph, when he proposed to write a history of Virginia, are lasting memorials of his interest and solicitude in relation to this subject.

Can it be any disparagement to your honorable body to suppose that it were now composed altogether of such characters as this illustrious triumvirate? Think, if such a constellation were possible, of its splendor! And what would be their view of the present application? The elegant and accomplished Byrd, if his own unbounded munificence had not already supplied the deficiency, would be intent upon procuring MSS. from England. That voice once so eloquent in calling for "Liberty or death" would be calling for the cherished history and antiquities of his native State. Instead of our own feeble pen, that which drew the Declaration of Independence would be wielded in this cause. As you could not withstand their united appeal, ("though dead they yet speak,") do not disregard this humble effort. Prove yourselves worthy to be their successors as guardians of the State, and imbued with the same patriotic and elevated spirit.

A few words as to the course to be pursued. The plan that best comports with the dignity and importance of the subject and the character of a sovereign State, is to send an agent, with a very respectful application to her Majesty's government, with full power and ample means to procure materials for the history of the State, both MS. and printed. He could also pursue some collateral investigations, and might find in the families of those early connected with the colony valuable letters and other papers. The appointment of such person might be confided to the Executive and council, who should have the discretionary power to send him over immediately, or first to procure, through the kindness of Mr. Everett, a catalogue of the Documents relating to Virginia. This, however, we think useless and would of itself be quite expensive. It would be utterly impossible to order copies by the titles only, and it is known certainly that there are abundant materials in the State office relating to Virginia.

It is proper to state that copies may be obtained, as mentioned in the subjoined letter of Mr. Tefft, without the expense of sending over a special agent. But then every thing would have to be copied, or an agent appointed here to inform the agent resident there what materials our own archives still afford. The services of a very able and honorable gentleman in London might be procured, but his investigations could not extend beyond the State office and there could not be the same confidence and freedom of communication, as in the case of an agent specially delegated, whose zeal, interest and devotion would all incite him to the task. An agent in London could only superintend the copying of what was ordered; but how can specific knowledge be obtained of what should be ordered! From having once sent out a special agent, Georgia has facilities in giving orders for further copies that we can not have. Nor could a complete catalogue assist us much, since it is impossible to read the contents of a long article by a short title. Take the index of a large volume, and how often will you fail to find what you desire and know to be there, even under its most appropriate head! We speak from experience.

One other brief view of the subject and the subjoined letters will close this article. It seems highly appropriate that Congress should at once obtain all that England possesses in relation to the History of the Colonies. There can hardly be a State that would not rejoice at it; and the State Legislatures might address Congress in reference to it. It would cost no more probably than was paid for the Madison Papers; and less than is now spoken of for the purchase of Morse's Magnetic Telegraph; and it seems to come as legitimately within the scope of their authority as either of the foregoing measures, or the purchase of a library, statuary and paintings. But your honorable body may take a different view of Congressional powers; and the States who have already expended their money, together with the new States who have no immediate interest in the subject, might withhold their consent to the action of Congress. The State of Virginia ought to possess copies of these foreign records, and should not wait for Congress to perform a work so valuable and honorable, and so necessary for herself.

Washington, Oct. 2, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 23rd of September, and fully concur with you in the importance you attach to a more thorough and accurate history of Virginia than any heretofore written; and doubt not that the Archives of England would furnish important and valuable material, for such a work. Much, very much of our early history remains in doubt and obscurity; and yet nothing could be more interesting than to be able to trace with accuracy the struggles of the first settlers to meet and overcome the difficulties that surrounded them—to keep up, without faltering, the march of events, and to mark with precision the advances annually made in the occupation of the country. The account of the bloody battle fought within a few miles only of the City of Richmond by the settlers under the lead of Nathaniel Bacon, and the Indian Tribes, is more indistinct than could be desired, considering the consequences which flowed from it. It led the way to the complete mastery of the white race over the red, and assisted in no small degree to swell the mighty torrent of civilization which has overflowed this continent. The history of that remarkable man is and must be greatly defective. He is made to figure on the page of history, as governed chiefly in what he did by enmity to Sir William Berkeley, the then Governor, and actuated solely by the desire to expel him the colony. And yet this but ilily corresponds with his high and elevated character and acknowledged abilities. I have always believed, that taking advantage of the then convulsed state of England, produced by the struggles between the Commonwealth-men and the Royalists, Bacon had at that early day, (1775–6,) formed the design of giving permanent independence to Virginia, which had in fact refused to acknowledge the Commonwealth, and had regarded the bond of her allegiance as severed by the overthrow and final execution of Charles I. Certain it is that Bacon acted in all things in the absence of authority from England—changed the Seat of Government from James Town to the middle plantations, (Williamsburg,)—convoked the House of Burgesses,—passed laws, and maintained an independent sway for nearly two years, when falling a victim to disease, the former authorities, for the want of a suitable leader to conduct the Revolution successfully, were restored, and the whole fell to the ground. When we take into consideration the distracted state of the times, the comparatively limited extent of the British Navy at that early day—the difficulty of transporting large bodies of troops across so broad an Ocean as the Atlantic,—the difficulty of supporting them after their transportation was accomplished, we can well imagine that an ardent and enthusiastic mind like that of Nathaniel Bacon, might have dared to think that Virginia should be and was “of right a free, sovereign and independent State.” But, my dear Sir, the motives of the actors in those stirring scenes are as obscure as the last resting places of their mortal remains, and much that they did has been lost to the cause of truth and justice. If a competent person could be found, with zeal and sufficient energy to clear away the rubbish and to explore the dark places in our history, it would be gratifying and instructive to the present and all future generations. Who shall thread the labyrinth, or head the Argonautic expedition, it is not for me to say. I can only wish you every success in your contributions to this great task, and with my cordial salutations I tender you my best wishes for your health and happiness.

JOHN TYLER.

Savannah, 11th Sept., 1844.

MY DEAR MINOR,—You ask we what investigation our Historical Society are prosecuting abroad. You are aware no doubt, that by an act of our Legislature in 1837, an agent was appointed to proceed to Europe in search of material for a history of Georgia. The Rev. C. W. Howard was appointed that agent. He went to London in the summer of 1838, and in October of that year, three months after his arrival, he obtained permission through Lord Palmerston to inspect and make extracts from the records and papers in the State Paper Office, relating to the State of Georgia from the years 1735 to 1775 inclusive, but no later. The result of Mr. Howard's labors you will find referred to in a report of a Committee of our Society, a copy of which I sent you by the mail of yesterday.

In consequence of the expense to which, in years past, the State of Georgia has been put in the quest after the documents in Europe, exceeding I think $,6000, any further application to the Legislature for an appropriation would meet with little chance of success: nor indeed does our Historical Society deem it necessary. We have in London a very zealous corresponding member, Robert Lemon, Esq., mentioned in the report to which I have referred. He suggested to us the idea of having a confidential agent, nominated by the English Government, to whom reference for information might be made, without the intervention of the Secretary of State, and Mr. Lemon received that appointment. Mr. Lemon has free access, from his situation, to every collection in London, except his own office, and would therefore be accessible only by first obtaining the sanction of the Premier. I would therefore recommend that application should be made, through Mr. Everett, our Minister, to procure permission from Lord Aberdeen to take transcripts from the State Paper Office, where all the papers relating to the colonies are now deposited, having been I think at the instance of Mr. Lemon removed from the office of the Board of Trade, and other offices, and incorporated with his. And at the same time you should secure the services of Mr. Lemon, as agent to superintend the investigation. The expense, including Mr. Lemon's remuneration, would be less of course than would be necessary to incur in sending a special agent, and the examination, I will guaranty, will be faithfully made, so far as Mr. Lemon is concerned. In a letter from him of the 17th ultimo he says: "Mr. Brodhead of New York has left England with a large chest full of transcripts, and he is by this time I think in America. His collection will make a sensation, and will have the effect of stimulating others to follow such an example."

Having furnished Mr. Lemon with abstracts of the colonial documents obtained by Mr. Howard and now in the possession of the Society, that he might at a glance see what we still wanted, he will, by the next steamer, give me a detailed estimate of the expense of transcription, which he informs me he will be able to do with the greatest exactness after examination of my lists. Lest the paper containing the report of the Committee to which I have referred may not reach you I will send by the mail of to-day another copy.

I am,

Very sincerely, your friend,
I. K. TEFFT.

P. S. You could easily resuscitate your Historical Society, which I learn once existed, or form a new one.

Our Historical Society was founded in 1839, (see appendix to the 2nd Vol. of its collections, page 396,) and is now in a flourishing condition, with a long list of zealous and distinguished members. It has celebrated four anniversaries—to wit: on the 12th of February each year, that having been the day, 1733, on which General Oglethorpe first landed on the soil of Georgia. Four corresponding orations have been delivered before the Society: first, by Judge William Law, second, by Dr. William Bacon Stevens, third, by Hon. Mitchell King, and the last, by the Rt. Rev. Stephen Elliott, Jr., Bishop of Georgia. The next will be delivered by Ex-Governor George R. Gilmer.

Four courses of Lectures have also been delivered before the Society, by members of our own and sister States, on Historical and biographical subjects. Its library is yet small, containing only about four hundred volumes, besides pamphlets and files of newspapers. Its MSS. are valuable. Among them are the MS. Journal of the Rev. J. J. Zubly, a delegate from Georgia to the Continental Congress, extending over the whole period of the Revolutionary war; Copies of the official correspondence of Montiano, commander of the forces at St. Augustine at the time of General Oglethorpe's expedition against that post; Several MS. volumes of the late Col. Hawkins, who was appointed by General Washington the agent of the Government among the Creek Indians, and the 39 volumes of Colonial documents obtained by the Rev. Mr. Howard from the government offices in London.

Truly yours,

I. K. T.

84, Prince street, New-York, 12 Oct., 1844.

DEAR SIR,—I hasten to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 9th instant, which has just reached me, and to reply to the points you suggest, as fully as I can.

By the regulation of the State Paper Office at London, I was restricted in my examinations, to the series of books specifically designated in the order of the Secretary of State; which was obtained, only after a good deal of delay and effort. Not having had an opportunity of examining the "Virginia Papers," I can give you no specific information, either as to their number or volume. As to their probable value and importance, no one, I presume, interested in historical research, can entertain doubts. The State Paper Office in London now contains all the records relating to the American Colonies. The correspondence of the Secretaries of State has always been deposited there; and two years ago, by order of Government, the records of the Board of Trade, (comprising upwards of 2000 volumes,) were transferred to this office. No person is allowed to visit the office for the purpose of examining documents, until he has obtained an order from the Secretary of State, directed to the keeper, and stating the extent of privilege to be allowed. In my own case, the order was very precise and guarded, and was very rigidly interpreted by the keeper. I was restricted to the examination of the particular books designated in the order, and was required to examine them in an apartment separate from the great library. I examined some 400 volumes, or thereabouts, for the documents relating to New-York. Each paper I wished to have copied was noted, and afterwards examined by an officer under the direction of Lord Aberdeen. Such as were not objected to were subsequently copied by the clerks in the office, who received 4d. sterling for each folio of 72 words. The transcripts from London, which I am now arranging for binding, &c., will occupy about 50 volumes foolscap folio.

My agency extended also to Holland and France. In both these countries no difficulty was found, either in obtaining the requisite permission from the Government, or in procuring copies at reasonable rates. 16 volumes were obtained at the Hague, and 17 at Paris. Those from Paris include the whole of the correspondence relative to the operations on the Canadian frontier during the "French war."

Our Legislature at first appropriated $4,000, subsequently $3,000, and again $5,000. In all 12,000, which has been entirely exhausted in defraying the expenses of the agency.*

You are good enough to ask me for suggestions occurring to me in reference to the proposed effort on the part of Virginia to secure the same memorials of her colonial days, lying hid in the archives of England. No one can more fully appreciate than I do the importance of obtaining these papers. But I have long made up my mind that the best way to effect an object dear to every liberal minded man—above all to every antiquarian—is for our General Government to undertake the duty—once for all; and not for one particular State, but for the whole union. I will not go over all the reasons that may be urged in favor of this view of the subject. It will readily occur to you that these repeated applications on the part of the various States—applications involving oftentimes embarrassing considerations—may in time become annoying to the British Government. These examinations have, heretofore, been allowed in a spirit of liberal and expanded courtesy. Favors were granted and not rights enjoyed, in the permissions for these investigations. It would therefore seem to be proper that in subsequent steps on our part, these considerations should not be overlooked.

The example of some of our States will, no doubt, stimulate others to efforts to secure copies of papers relating to their own particular history. Some of the older, and wealthier ones may even feel disposed to appropriate monies and send out agents. The younger and less wealthy, though not less interested states, may not feel at liberty to incur an expenditure of the character; and will look on with mortification at the results of their neighbors efforts. All objections would vanish—all difficulties would be obviated—all interests would be consulted and secured—if a competent agent were sent out by the General Government, and under the commission of the President of the United States. The expenses of various separate agencies would be saved. The younger and less wealthy States would participate in the benefits of the researches—and this without any expenditure on their part. The documents when procured might be deposited in the library of Congress, or printed under the direction of the Government. The agent of the United States, coming with a full and final commission, would doubtless have more ample and extended privileges granted him than the several agents of the individual States could reasonably expect. I will add no more on this point. It seems to me that it must strike every one as the most proper and feasible mode of arriving at the grand result.

No apology was necessary for your letter. It has given me great pleasure. The subject is one in which I feel a warm interest; and I shall be happy if these hasty lines should be of any service to you.

Believe me, dear sir, very respectfully
Your obedient servant.

J. ROMEYN BRODHEAD.

* New-York had to consult the archives of three countries, England, Holland and France, and hence arose this heavy expense. Virginia need send only to England. But she should not regard an expense which she is so able to bear. Georgia has spent $6,000 in her researches.

B. B. MINOR, Esq.

Dear Sir,—I have received your letter of the 9th, as well as your valuable Journal of October—for which please accept my thanks. I am very glad to observe in your columns an earnest appeal to the Virginia Assembly, calling their attention to their much neglected Historical Records. Your State is rich in materials of the most interesting character, and I doubt not that a well directed and sustained effort would discover treasures of great value to the Historian.

You are right in claiming the support of the State Legislature. Public patronage is necessary and should be liberally conceded to such undertakings. I hope, too, that that the society to which you allude in the concluding paragraph of your article, will be revived and cherished as an essential auxiliary in the cause of Historical Literature. But I am forgetting my business with you in my ramblings, &c., &c.

I have the honor to be,
Respectfully your ob't. servant,
GEORGE H. MOORE.

DESULTORY NOTES ON DESULTORY READINGS.

NEW YORK 1844.

Fraudulent Adulteration of Alimentary Substances; Commercial Character of the French; Value of Mirrors in Shops; Adulteration of Wheat-Flour; Bread; Cakes; Dangerous Method of Protecting Vineyards from Theft; Adulteration of Wines; Color of Wine; Diseases of Wine; Brandy; Butcher's meats in Paris; Milk, its adulterations; Butter; Salt; Vinegar; Sugar; Coffee; Honey; Mustard; Pepper; Letters from under a Bridge; Dunglison's Practice of Medicine; The Encyclopædia of Practical Medicine; Joint Stock Companies in Literature.

It was once asserted in my hearing by an American traveller, that there is no city in the United States, and perhaps no city in any other country, in which a stranger is more liable to be deceived in purchasing any article whatever than in the city of New-York. He is almost sure to be overcharged in some manner, or an inferior quality is paid for at a superior price. "Sir," said the traveller, "I can give my orders to the dealers in Philadelphia, and they will be filled just as well as if I attended to them in person; but, in New York, unless I watch the packing, on reaching home, I discover that I have been cheated." I fancied at the time, the traveller was some splenetic person who had been more than once unlucky in dealing in New-York. I am now reminded of the remark, by a book, recently published in Paris, entitled

"DES FALSIFICATIONS DES SUBSTANCES ALIMENTAIRES, ET DES MOYENS CHIMIQUES DE LES RECONNAÎTRE, PAR JULES GARNIER."—An essay on the Falsifications of Alimentary Substances and the Chemical means of discovering them."

The French medical journals complain that gastric irritations, attributable to the sophistication of stimulatory substances, especially in Paris, have become so numerous as to form a kind of epidemic.

Cupidity lies at the bottom of these wicked frauds; and the character of the French nation for honesty has suffered in consequence. "Where is the honor once enjoyed amongst strangers by our commercial men? Formerly our products were received in the East without examination. But now the term French is synonymous with false, our wares are doubted as the bad faith of the Arabs is mistrusted. They admire our merchandize, but hesitate in buying it, because they fear that its charm has been given to it in the hands of our merchants."

French dealers are charged with deceiving in measure, weight, number, &c., as well as quality.

One cunning shop keeper, speculating on the vanity of woman, ornamented his shop with large mirrors, and while a woman, who comes to buy wine, presents her bottle and casts a look to admire her face, or her dress, the shopman transfers the wine from the measure into the bottle, but contrives to spill a considerable quantity on the counter, which has a reservoir placed beneath to receive it. And independent of these reservoirs, he declares the mirrors are worth a thousand a year in profit.

Among the adulterations of wheat-flour is an admixture of flour of potatoes, to the extent of from fifteen to thirty per cent. A larger proportion of potatoes in the flour prevents panification. The fecula of potatoes in flour is detected by the microscope, and by treating the suspected flour with water and then adding iodine. If fecula be present the mixture becomes blue. The quality of flour is ascertained also by treating it with pure acetic acid, which is an excellent solvent of gluten, the chief constituent of good wheat-flour. The inspectors of flour and bakeries in France make use of two instruments, principally, in their examinations; one is termed the appreciator of flour, invented by M. Robine, and the other aleurometer, invented by M. Boland.

Sophistications of wheat-flour with the flour of horse-beans, French beans, or of peas, are difficult to detect.

Flour is also adulterated with carbonate of lime (chalk) and phosphate of lime, and more recently with a kind of finely powdered flint. Powdered alabaster is also used for the same purpose, and even powdered bones.

Wheat bread is adulterated with the following articles, sulphate of copper, (blue vitriol); alum; the sub-carbonate of magnesia; the sulphate of zinc, (white vitriol); the sub-carbonate of ammonia; the carbonate and bi-carbonate of potassa; chalk; plaster of Paris, lime; and pipe-clay.

The use of sulphate of copper in bread renders inferior flour more available, accelerates panifica-tion, produces a better looking crumb and crust, and a larger quantity of water can be added, of course increasing the weight of the bread at small cost.

Alum renders bread made of inferior flour equal in appearance to that made of the best, and facilitates the introduction of flour of beans, peas, &c.

The employment of the sub-carbonate of magnesia answers a similar purpose, but is prejudicial to health because, in the process of baking, the sub-carbonate is converted into a lactate.

Sulphate of zinc, (white vitriol,) a powerful emetic, renders bread white.

The sub-carbonate of ammonia is a powerful adjuvant to the yeast or leaven employed, and also makes bread white.

The carbonates and bi-carbonates of potassa and soda increase the lightness of bread.

Similar frauds are practised by cake bakers, who make use of the poisonous articles named, in larger proportion than the bread bakers.

In the vicinity of large cities in France, to protect the grapes, the fruit is washed with lime to disgust those who plunder the vineyards. In some localities, sugar of lead, and sulphate of copper are substituted for lime, at the risk of causing the death of those who may eat them.

Wine is manufactured and adulterated in a multitude of ways, chiefly, however, with alcohol, water and various coloring ingredients.

There are wines, (so called,) manufactured without grapes, by adroitly mixing together water, sugar, inferior alcohol, vinegar and different coloring materials.

Chemistry affords us very few means of detecting these sophistications with certainty.

The most common sophistications consist in mixing together different crude wines, water, alcohol, and coloring substances.

To disguise the verdure, acidity of wine, the carbonate of potassa, or of soda, or of lime, is added. But the most pernicious fraud is the practice of softening wine by the addition of litharge, or white lead. The use of leaded wine is apt to induce a severe form of cholera. Lead is added to preserve the wine sound. The cleansing of wine bottles with shot is sometimes followed by serious consequences.

Alum and the oxides of copper are also used to improve the quality of falsified wines.

Wines are falsified by the addition of brandy, perry, and water, very much to the injury of the wines as well as of those who drink them.

The color of red wines is due to the pellicles of red grapes with which the must is fermented, of which the coloring principle, (which is crystallizable,) reddened by the free acid of the juice of the grape, dissolves in proportion as the liquor becomes alcoholic during fermentation. Besides this coloring principle, the wine derives from the pellicles considerable quantity of tannin, to which red wine is indebted for its astringent taste, as well as the property of changing its red color to a brownish black when a solution of a salt of iron is added to it.

To imitate this natural coloring matter, various dye woods are employed, as well as red poppies, myrtle berries, elder berries, &c. In England, bitter almonds, wild cherry, alum, tincture of grape seeds, oak saw-dust, filbert shells, and various spices are used in the manufacture of wines.

Wines are also subject to diseases from various causes, which render them bitter, acid, viscid, flat, &c.

The value of spirituous liquids depends upon the quantity of absolute alcohol they may contain. The manner of ascertaining this, as well as the quantity of tartar in wine is given in the work.

Brandy often contains copper, lead, &c.

In Paris the flesh of horses, dogs, cats, &c., is consumed to a considerable extent. Horse meat is sometimes used to manufacture a sort of jelly, sold by pork butchers. Meat pies are frequently receptacles of various kinds of half putrid meats, disguised by high seasoning.

Milk is considerably modified by the influences to which the animal is subjected by diet, state of health, fatigue, situation or locality, &c.

Food modifies the milk both as respects quantity and quality. Badly fed animals yield less milk, and the milk itself is more watery.

Fatigue modifies the secretion of milk, rendering it watery, weaker and less abundant.

Many substances find their way into milk through the functions of absorption and nutrition, giving to it medicinal qualities different from those which would be produced by a direct mixture of the same substances.

In the various modifications which the milk of animals undergoes, the proportion of butter seems to be augmented relatively to its other constituents.

Milk is an almost universal article of food amongst all people. The reindeer in Lapland, the ass in Tartary, the camel and dromedary in Egypt and Syria, the buffalo in India, the llama and vicuña, the cow, sheep, goat and ass in America, furnish a simple and wholesome article of diet. In Paris, only cows' milk is used.

Good milk is the best of food, but bad milk is the very worst.

The first is that which is provided by nature for young animals, whose organs, too feeble to elaborate nourishment from more stimulating food, gradually acquire by its use the necessary vigor and development.

When the body is exhausted by suffering or advanced age, the old man and the convalescent again recur to milk to recuperate new powers.

It is well known that infants cannot be "brought up by the bottle" in Paris. It is more than probable that the bad quality of the milk is one of the most frequent causes of the death of infants. The dairymen, who keep their cows constantly in badly ventilated and hot stables to increase the quantity of milk, render them phthisical, (consumptive.) We find tubercles in the lungs in almost all the cows of the dairymen in Paris and its environs.

Perhaps the fact that one fifth of the deaths in Paris are owing to tubercular phthisis, (consumption,) arises from the bad quality of the milk furnished to its inhabitants.

While we are especially careful not to confide an infant to the care of a wet nurse suffering from consumption, we feed ourselves and our infants on the milk of cows whose lungs are filled with tubercles.

The greater part of the milk sold in Paris is collected from a circuit of from ten to fifteen leagues by wholesale dealers, who purchase it from farmers and bring it into the city and dispose of it to be resold by retailers, milkmen, &c. The milk is first bought for from 25 to 30 centimes the two litres, (a litre is about a pint and three quarters); the collector sells it at from 30 to 40 centimes to the retailers in Paris, who dispose of it to the consumers at from 50 to 60, or even 80 centimes, more or less according to the quality of the milk, and the quarter where it may be sold.

The trade in milk is very great in Paris; we are assured that certain wholesale dealers sell from 4 to 5000 litres daily. Another portion of the milk consumed in Paris is derived from the cows stabled in the city, or its suburbs; this milk should be, in a degree, richer and more substantial than that from the farms, while it is furnished from better nourished cows that never go out, whose lacteal secretion is stimulated as much as possible; it is, it may be said, therefore, the choicest milk, which is dearest; and it may be had warm on application at the dairy. It is less aromatic than that produced by cows living in the open air, on pasture; still, it may be regarded as of good quality, provided the cows are healthy and well kept, and the milk is neither watered nor otherwise sophisticated.

Milk is adulterated for sale with water, starch, flour, the white and yolks of eggs, gum arabic, gum tragacanth, sugar, to allow a larger proportion of water, emulsions of various seeds, almonds, brains of calves, sheep and horses, chalk, plaster, &c. In 1842, R. M. Hastley of New York published a valuable essay on the quality of milk consumed by the inhabitants of New York, which is not superior to that furnished in Paris.

To detect the sophistications in milk, several instruments have been invented called lactometers, and lactoscopes.

Butter is sophisticated with the secula of potatoes, flour, milk curd, tallow, &c.; and alkanet and other substances are employed to give proper color.

Common table salt is mixed with plaster, salt-petre, glauber's salts, alum, dirt, and is moistened to add to its weight.

Vinegar, from white and from red wine; from wood, cider and beer, is often adulterated by the addition of sulphuric, or hydrochloric, or nitric, or tartaric, or oxalic acids.

Sugars are variously adulterated; sand, lime, plaster, &c. Potatoe starch, and a substance called glucose, sugar of fecula, are used for this purpose.

Under the name of sweet or olive oil for the table, we have olive oil, poppy seed oil, and nut oil. Olive oil is sophisticated with lard, honey, &c.

Coffee is torrifed and ground for the market. In this condition it is adulterated with chicory, beet-roots, carrots, peas, beans, rye, &c., &c.

Sugar plums and confectionary are colored by metallic salts, and are often very dangerous on this account.

Fecula of potatoes is mixed with cheese.

Honey is adulterated with bean-flour to make it white and weighty.

Beer and yeast are also adulterated in France, as well as cider and perry.

A large portion of the arrow root and tapioca sold consists of starch.

Mustard is adulterated with turnip seed and turmeric.

Chocolate is mixed with potatoe starch, and the tallow which is unfit to make candles, or rancid grease.

Even pepper and ginger are adulterated. In a word, there is scarcely an article of diet which is not subject to fraud of some kind in Paris, the great centre of civilization. We have not reached the same degree of refinement, although it is very probable we are advancing as fast as can be desirable in the arts of sophistication.

The authors of this book, Jules Garnier and Ch. Harel, point out the mode of detecting the frauds practised in the various articles mentioned.

We are thankful to Mr. Willis for his "Letters from under a Bridge." They amused us, and may perform a like service to others.

Among various things which have fallen in our way is Dr. Dunglison's Practice of Medicine, a second edition. We take leave to say, all other opinions to the contrary, that this is a most excellent book, and well worth the attention of professional men. The present edition is very much improved in many respects, and leaves little or any thing desirable to it as an elementary book, or one for consultation.

Dr. Dunglison seems to be a sort of giant in medical literature, and seems to possess that peculiar tact which makes him perhaps the best compiler of the age, and it is no small labor to make a good compilation. As an evidence of his ability to produce, we may mention a new edition of his Medical Dictionary, unquestionably the best in the language; a new edition of his "Human Physiology;" his "New Remedies;" his "Therapeutics," and besides these, he is editing the "Cyclopedia of Practical Medicine," which promises to be a most valuable addition to our stock of medical literature. From his extensive acquaintance with medical books and authors, he is doing what scarcely any other man in the country could do, bring the work up to the knowledge of the day at the time of publication. This work is the result of the labors of a joint company of the distinguished medical men of England, all working at the same period. If one man should attempt to write such a book, so rapidly is medical science advancing, that by the time the last part were ready for press, the first would be in a great measure old, if not obsolete. Dr. Copeland undertook this Herculean task and succeeded admirably well, although the last page was written some dozen years after the first, and that last page concludes not more than two thirds of the work, which will require, perhaps, years to complete it. This shows how much is done in literature, as well as in other things, in saving time, by the joint labor of companies of men. For by combination, "The Encyclopedia of Practical Medicine" will be complete this year, and up to the day in knowledge.

HOLGAZAR.

Dr. Ruschenberger

Notices of New Works.

In the "desultory notes" of "Holgarzar," our readers will find notices of many new and interesting works, published here and abroad. We hope that our readers will appreciate his contributions as highly as we do. They embrace a great variety and are adapted to the tastes and pursuits of all classes. The Literary, the Scientific, the Professional man, and the amateur can all find something interesting. Since our last number, we have received the following new publications.

HARPER & BROTHERS. NEW-YORK, 1844.

MEDICINES, THEIR USES AND MODE OF ADMINISTRATION; including a complete conspectus of the three British Pharmacopœias, an account of all the new remedies, and an appendix of formulæ. By J. MOORE NELIGAN, M. D. Physician to the Jervis Street hospital, and lecturer on materia medica and therapeutics in the Dublin school of medicine. With notes and additions, conforming it to the Pharmacopœia of the United States, and including all that is new or important in recent improvements. By DAVID MEREDITH REESE, A. M., M. D. Late professor in the Washington University of Baltimore, &c.

NO CHURCH WITHOUT A BISHOP; or the Controversy between the REV. DES. POTTS and WAINWRIGHT. With a preface by the latter and an introduction and notes by an anti-sectarian. "Semper, Ubique et ab omnibus."

Religious literature is too important and extensive to be neglected or omitted by a miscellaneous journal. Our own sense, too, of its importance will always impel us to give it a place in our columns, and we would rejoice to see it substituted for the demoralising trash that has been inundating the country under the name of "cheap literature"— often the dearest, even in a pecuniary view, that ever was presented to a purchaser.

These remarks are offered partly in reference to some useful and pleasing works which will presently be introduced to our readers. But whilst we will always notice and commend Religious Literature, the character of our journal will require us to be general and neutral in our expressions. We can not indulge in controversy, nor promulge our own particular views.

The late controversy between Drs. Potts and Wainwright has already elicited considerable attention and doubtless, many who, like ourselves, were unable to peruse the articles as they appeared, will rejoice to have them preserved for their leisure moments in their present form. The origin of the controversy was not a little singular. At the celebration of the New-England Society in New-York city, on the 22nd of December 1843, the orator of the day, the Hon. Mr. Choate, U. S. Senator from Mass., spoke of certain "who had discovered a Government without a King and a Church without a Bishop," which sentiment was received with applause. At the New-England dinner on the same day, the Rev. Dr. Wainwright of the Episcopal Church, in responding to a sentiment, alluded to this remark of Mr. Choate and declared that there could be "no Church without a Bishop." The Rev. Dr. Potts espoused the opposite side and a controversy ensued in the columns of a newspaper, the Commercial. In a short time, it being supposed that due courtesy was not observed, Dr. Wainwright published his views in the paper, without reference to Dr. Potts, who animadverted upon them in the same. The whole series of articles on both sides is now presented in the volume before us.

THE PICTORIAL BIBLE. We have received the Xth No. of this work, which has already exhausted our appellations.

McCULLOCH'S UNIVERSAL GAZETTEER, No. 18 and 19. So that this valuable work is now near its conclusion. Drinker and Morris have all the above for sale.

WILEY & PUTNAM. NEW-YORK, 1844.

ELEMENTS OF LOGIC, together with an introductory view of Philosophy in general, and a preliminary view of the reason. BY HENRY P. TAPPAN.

The oratory and compositions of our country would not be injured by greater attention than is now paid to the study of Logic. The design of the present work is thus clearly explained by the author. "The deductive method comprehends merely the laws which govern inferences or conclusions from premises previously established. These premises may, in their turn, be inferences from other premises and so on, to a certain extent; and just so far this method is all sufficient. But it is evident that the evolution of premises and conclusions, and conclusions and premises, must have a limit. There must be premises which are not conclusions from other premises, but which arise in some other way. Now, a complete and adequate Logic ought to exhibit this other way, likewise: it ought to inform us how the most original premises arise, and upon what basis they rest."

"The present attempt, therefore, is to make out the system of Logic under its several departments; and to present it not merely as a method of obtaining inferences from truths, but also as a method of establishing those first truths and general principles, which must precede all deduction." The work is handsomely gotten up and is for sale by Drinker and Morris.

ANNUALS.

Leaflets of Memory and Friendship's Offering. The two brilliant Annuals noticed at length in our September No. have been received for sale, by J. W. Randolph & Co.

D. APPLETON & CO. NEW-YORK, 1844.

GEORGE S. APPLETON. PHILADELPHIA.

INCIDENTS OF SOCIAL LIFE, AMID THE EUROPEAN ALPS. Translated from the German of J. Heinrich Zschokke. BY LOUIS STRACK.

This celebrated and popular German author has already been brought before our readers in several of his tales, which have been translated for the Messenger. "Floretta, or the first love of Henry IV." and "Leaves from the Diary of a poor Vicar of Wiltshire" will be remembered. We can not better introduce the present volume than by extracting from it the following notice of its author.

"ZSCHOKKE is a native of Magdeburg, in Prussia, and is now, at seventy-three years of age, a citizen of Switzerland—having passed through a very eventful period, and a changeful life; which has enabled him to depict the social characteristics, principles and actions of those around him, with a novelty and interest equally rare and instructive. His parents died when he was young, and he was thus bereft of their guidance and instructions. He was educated in the Gymnasium of Magdeburg, which he was enticed to abandon suddenly, by a company of theatrical strollers, for whom he prepared pieces for their exhibition. But he separated from those associates in disgust; and entered the University of Frankfort, where he studied the belles-lettres, with history, philosophy and theology; and at twenty years of age entered upon active life, as an instructor of youth. Notwithstanding his admitted qualifications, and his solicitude, he could not obtain a permanent public appointment as a teacher, and his application also for a professorship in the University of Frankfort, in 1795, was unsuccessful, as it was supposed, through the interference of the Prussian government, whom he had offended. WOLLNER, the Minister of State, entirely controlled Frederic William II., then monarch of Prussia, by facilitating his profligate life, encouraging his superstitious infatuation, and intimidating him with pretended supernatural appearances. Through Wollner's instigations, the half-idiot king issued his infamous "RELIGIOUS EDICT," which enjoined a persecuting intolerance and a dogmatic mysticism, altogether incompatible both with the spirit of the age, and the fundamental establishment of the Prussian monarchy. Zschokke wrote and published a powerful philippic against that pernicious measure; and the narrow-minded, implacable Rosicrucian minister obstructed the advancement of his eloquent literary adversary. In consequence of that disappointment, Zschokke determined to make a journey into Italy; but on his way, being invited to superintend the seminary at Reichenau, he began his residence in Switzerland; and through the whole of the agitations of the Swiss Cantons, connected with the changes of the French Revolution, Zschokke was a prominent, indefatigable citizen, and was called by the people to perform official duties of the most important character during that stormy period.

"Amid his numerous engagements, he published within about twenty years, several valuable works, among which his Histories of the Grisons, of Bavaria, and of Switzerland, and his Pictures of Switzerland are very popular and highly esteemed. A collection of his works in forty volumes appeared some years ago, including his Tales and Biographical and Descriptive Sketches—and from those delineations of Alpine life, the narratives comprised in this volume have been selected."

NARRATIVE OF A VISIT TO THE SYRIAN CHURCH OF MESOPOTAMIA; with statements and reflections upon the Present State of Christianity in Turkey, and the Character and Prospects of the Eastern Churches. By the Rev. Horatio Southgate, M. A.

So far as we have been able to read, this is a highly interesting work. Mr. Southgate's route lay, in part, along that over which Xenophon led "the ten thousand," in their immortal retreat. He strikingly exhibits the tide of civilization that is now setting to the East from the Western world. His views as to the importance of purifying and christianizing these streams of knowledge, that they may bear blessings with them, demand the serious attention of all philanthropists. The debt which the new world owes the old should not only be paid, but be paid in the purest coin of philosophy and religion.

FOSTER'S MISCELLANIES, and

CHRISTIAN MORALS; EXPERIMENTAL AND PRACTICAL. Originally delivered as lectures in the Broadmead Chapel, Bristol, England. By John Foster, Author of the Essays on "Decision of Character" and "Popular Ignorance."

These two neat volumes are from the pen of the same well known author. The Miscellanies comprise twenty Biographical, Literary and Philosophical Essays, among which is one upon the correspondence of Benjamin Franklin. They were originally contributed to "the Eclectic Review," which was established "in January 1805, to provide an antidote to the irreligious spirit, which then pervaded the periodical press of the country." Mr. Foster's connection with it commenced in 1806, and from that time to 1818 he was a frequent contributor. After that time he also wrote many articles for it. Some fifty of these productions, of which the volume before us contains a part, have been issued in England in two volumes, under the Editorship of Mr. Price, the Editor of the Eclectic Review. No one can peruse the works of Mr. Foster without being improved. He wrote with deep thought and with ease, and aimed at a high purpose in his efforts.

Chalmers, Horne, Tpoke, Coleridge, Fox, the Edgeworths, Lord Kames, Hume, Southey, Blair, Beattie, &c. are noticed in the present volume.

RURAL TALES PORTRAYING SOCIAL LIFE; and DOMESTIC TALES AND ALLEGORIES ILLUSTRATING REAL LIFE.

These handsome gift books for children need no further commendation, than that they are from the pen of Hannah Moore.

THE COURSE OF TIME. By Robert Pollock. With a memoir of the author, and an ample index, compiled expressly for this Edition.

THE COMPLAINT, OR NIGHT THOUGHTS. By Edward Young, D. D. Very handsome Editions of these two standard poems. Messrs. Drinker and Morris have all these works for sale.

NATURE'S GEMS. BY EMMA C. EMBURY.

We had the pleasure of examining this native production, in its unfinished state, a short time since, at the publishers. From our inspection we feel confident that it will meet every expectation that is raised by the subjoined advertisement. The native haunts in which the flowers appear are not mere pictures of fancy, but in many instances accurate views of lovely and picturesque scenes in America, where Nature has been so lavish in displaying her charms.

"A purely American work will be published in a few days—Nature's Gems; or, American Flowers in their Native Haunts, by Emma C. Embury, with Twenty Plates of Plants, carefully colored after nature, and Landscape Views of their localities, from drawings taken on the spot, by E. W. Whittlefield, forming one elegant quarto volume, printed on the finest paper, and richly bound.

"This beautiful work will undoubtedly form a 'Gift Book' for all seasons of the year. It will be illustrated with twenty colored engravings of indigenous flowers, taken from flowers made, and in most cases colored on the spot where they were found, while each flower is accompanied by a view of some striking feature of American scenery. The literary plan of the book differs entirely from that of any other work on a similar subject which has yet appeared. Each plate will have its botanical and local description, though the chief part of the volume will be composed of original prose tales and poetry, illustrative of the sentiment of the flowers, or associated with the landscape, thus giving the work all the variety of an Annual with something more than the transient interest which generally attaches to such publications.

D. APPLETON & Co., Publishers."

LEA & BLANCHARD.

After the notices for the month had been closed the following works were sent us by Drinker & Morris.

Rankin's History of the Popes, 1 vol., in cloth; Diet Turpin, the Highwayman, or Rookwood: A Romance by W. Harrison Ainsworth; with illustrations: The American Journal of Medical Sciences, Quarterly, for October, and the Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine, part XLX.

REVIEWS, &c.

The Westminster Review. Mr. J. Gill, agent for this city, has laid upon our table the September No. of this work, just completing its XLl volume. The Editions of these Reviews from the press of Leonard Scott & Co. are remarkable for their neatness and cheapness, and the publishers have often surprised us by their expeditious advert. thus giving proof of unrivalled energy and enterprise. The present No. contains many important articles; among which is a long and severe critique upon Charles James, Bishop of London. Coningsby, that singular union of literature and politics, is also handled. Its philosophy disparaged, but the merits of D'Israeli acknowledged. We also learn from this No. that a French Review is to be published in New-York, by G. F. Berteau. Subscription, $3 a year.

We have received the Democratic Review for October. Henry G. Langley, New-York. It contains nineteen articles on a great variety of subjects, grave and gay, literary and political, and a very good likeness of the Senior Editor of the Richmond Enquirer.

Also the Democratic Monthly Magazine and Western Review. B. B. Taylor, Editor. Columbus, Ohio. Terms $5 a year. From a late prospectus, we perceive that the Whigs are also about to start a monthly journal in New-York, to be conducted by Geo. H. Colton. Having no connection with politics, we can only announce these several works.

North American Review.—Graham's History of the United States. In addition to the regular contents of the North American, we would invite attention to the proposals of Messrs. Quincy, Story, Sparks and Prescott, for an American Edition of Graham's History of the United States. Mr. Graham was a Scotchman, friendly to this country, and spent much time and money in procuring the materials for his History, which he has prepared with great care and diligence. Owing to his peculiar views on some subjects, views unsuited to the institutions of Great Britain, the circulation of the work has been greatly restricted; and he died before he received any reward for his extensive labors. His son has now presented a copy of the work and the original MS. to the Library of Harvard University. As some return for this liberality and in order to introduce the work to our public, the distinguished gentlemen above propose to edit an American Edition, the profits of which, if any, are to be invested in some way for the promotion of American Historical research. Though we expect to find a strong bias in the Historian, yet as a general history of the United States, by an able writer, we desire to see it patronized and we cordially recommend it. It will be published by Messrs. Little and Brown of Boston, in 4 vols. $2 each, as soon as two hundred and fifty subscribers are obtained.

Address Delivered at the Meeting of the Association of American Geologists and naturalists, held in Washington, May. 1844. By Henry D. Rogers, Professor of Geology in the University of Pennsylvania; F. G. S., &c.

We return our thanks for this production. Geology is one of those Departments in which American has had something like a fair start with European Science; and amongst American Geologists, Professor Henry Rogers and his brother Wm. B. Rogers, of the University of Virginia, stand preëminent. Not only has an extensive Home reputation rewarded and stimulated their efforts, but transatlantic honors have been awarded them. "The progress of geological Research in the United States" is here sketched by a master hand.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

DECEMBER, 1844.

GERTRUDE; A NOVEL.

CHAPTER VI.

Judge Tucker

The young ladies met at breakfast the next morning with all the warmth which characterizes newborn and violent friendships. This is a sort of hot-house growth which requires forcing. Hence its early fervor, and hence too the frailty which exposes it to destruction from the first breath of the harsh atmosphere of every day life. They soon withdrew from the breakfast room to a snug little back parlor. There Gertrude was soon deep in the confidence of Miss Bernard, and, in return for this, having little else to communicate, gave the history of the few hours she had spent in Washington.

In this nothing seemed so much to interest Miss Bernard as the attentions of Colonel Harlston, and the description of his equipage.

"What a brilliant turn out," said she. "But the gentleman? That is the main point. Handsome? Agreeable? Intelligent? Genteel?"

"Handsome certainly," said Gertrude. "To me quite agreeable. As to the other points, Ignorance and Awkwardness are incompetent to judge of them."

"How humble we are!" said Miss Bernard. "But you will soon learn to have more confidence in your judgment."

"I hope not, unless I become better qualified to judge."

"That you will, of course; and I venture to predict, that, when that time comes, all the judgments you now form in secret will be ratified. To test this, tell me what you think now, that we may compare it with what you will think a month hence."

"Well then: I have seen men whose conversation was more original and interesting than Colonel Harlston's; but not more free from folly or absurdity. I have seen men whose manners were more engaging, and better calculated to please; but not more proper and decorous, or more sure to give no pain."

"A beautiful picture of a negative character!" exclaimed Miss Bernard. "But an outline indeed; but, in such a case, the outline is all that can be expected. Doubtless true to the life, as we always feel assured; when we see the hand of a master in the execution. Well! Ladies do not fall in love with negatives; and you must see him with other eyes, before your heart is in any danger."

"Some terrible infatuation must indeed come over me, before I could permit myself to think at all of one who only thinks of me as the protégée of a lady, whose hospitality and high-breeding entitle even casual inmates of her family to the attention of her guests. I am sure I have received none from Colonel Harlston which would not have been paid, were I the very opposite of the image, which I see in that flattering mirror you hold up to me. When I receive attentions on my own account, it will be time enough to scan the merits of him who pays them."

"You are certainly right," said Miss Bernard. "But it is not always that we can even act rightly, and to think and feel as we ought, is often exceedingly difficult. I am not sure how I might be affected, under any circumstances, by the attentions of a handsome, well-bred, clever man, with high birth, high station and a large fortune to back him. But I need not pray to be kept from such temptation. I am in no danger of it."

"And why not? My life upon it, that as soon as Colonel Harlston is introduced to you as the friend and guest of my aunt, he will pay you just the same sort of attention with which he has honored me."

"If that be so," said Miss Bernard, in that peculiar tone which had already struck the ear of Gertrude so forcibly, "I shall have to school myself in the duties which a woman owes to her sex. The first is, never to give her hand without her heart; the second, never to give her heart unsought. If, acting thus, her lot should prove unhappy, she may reproach her fate, but not herself."

The beautiful eyes of Gertrude were lifted with a glance of approbation, which plainly showed how exactly the speaker had expressed her thoughts. At the moment she said nothing; but her mind presently recurred to her mother, and was soon engaged in devising some palliatives for the very different doctrines taught by her.

"Is there no allowance," she said, uttering the ideas as they rose in her mind, "to be made for the peculiar circumstances in which a poor girl is sometimes placed? Without property, dependent perhaps on those who are too rich to feel for her, or on those too poor to bear the burthen; sometimes alone in the world; sometimes connected with others helpless and destitute as herself, whose only hope of escape from penury is in the chance of her making an advantageous match! In such a case, the world ought to be merciful in its judgments, nor add to the pangs which self-reproach, perhaps disappointed love, might inflict on their victim."

"The suffering of the victim," said Miss Bernard gravely, "is the punishment of her crime. The world has no need to enhance its severity, but should not dissemble its condemnation."

"But, in the last case, there is nothing to condemn but the sacrifice of her own happiness to a sense of duty. Suppose it mistaken! Is selfishness so rare that we can afford to censure disinterestedness? May we not rather trust to self-love to secure the world from the frequent commission of any crimes which imply self-abandonment?"

"You may be right; but having never had occasion to think of such a case as one in which I might be called on to decide for myself how to act, I have perhaps never considered it as I ought. I am not rich; but I am not dependent; and no one has any claims upon me. We do not know ourselves. Differently circumstanced I might think differently."

"Oh no! You would not; nor did I myself mean more than to offer a plea for mercy on behalf of those, who, if they sin, must suffer for their sin."

The ingenuous simplicity of Gertrude's manner made it impossible to doubt the sincerity of this assurance. Whether Miss Bernard was equally sincere in her professions, or no, she at least ascertained, to her entire satisfaction, the true sentiments of Gertrude on this point. She had indeed made no profession, and much that she had said, in a spirit of charity to others who might think differently, was susceptible of being quoted against her in proof that she did not think very unfavorably of mercenary matches.

Miss Bernard, though not quite so young as she had been, was still a beautiful woman. She was precisely at that time of life, when a lady's desire to get married begins to be stimulated by the fear of failure, and a consciousness that the fleeting charms, which the hand of time has not yet impaired, may vanish before another season. But if her beauty was not so fresh as it had been, it was more mature and mellow. If her manner had lost the artless grace of extreme youth, its place was well supplied by address and tact. She still retained at command the wild and playful notes and gleeful laugh, which give a charm to all the pretty nothings that fall from the lips of "bread and butter misses;" and these she changed, in a moment, and as if unconsciously, to a deep and tender tone, which, coming in the close of a sentence, seemed to indicate that whatever of folly, frivolity or vanity she might have just uttered, had not come from the heart. Such as did not think it foolish, frivolous or vain, might not perceive the disclaimer: and hence it was quite possible that two persons of different ways of thinking might each be led by the same sentence to impute to her sentiments exactly in accordance with his own. Time too had enlarged her experience, extended her acquaintance with books, and increased her powers of conversation, while the accomplishments of music, dancing, drawing, &c., in all of which she excelled, remained a fixed quantity.

Miss Bernard was, upon the whole, not less attractive than at her first appearance in society; and, as it was certainly her fault that she was not long since well married, and as she was now fully determined that it should be her fault no longer, she came to Washington with a fair prospect of leaving it, as the wife of some wealthy Southern planter, or Northern merchant. It is remarkable, by the way, how little importance ladies seem to attach to the difference between the two. Man is said to be an animal of all climates, and this is most especially true of the female of the species. The condor of the Andes does not more readily exchange the frigid atmosphere, in which he floats above the clouds, for the burning soil of the Pampas, than a lady will pass from the bleak rocks of New Hampshire to the sands and swamps of Florida. The man and the fortune are the essentials. Climate, friends, manners, habits, tone of society, pestilence of the physical or moral atmosphere—all these are but accidents. But this is a digression.

I have said it was Miss Bernard's fault that she was not already well married. How so? She had rated her pretensions too high. It was true, as she had said, that, though not rich, she was not dependent. She lived on her own income, which, being sufficient to supply the expenses of a fashionable young lady, was, of course, enough for the essential comfort of a plain family. She was not driven by the scowl or sneer of reluctant charity to throw herself into the arms of the first man that might offer. Her celibacy wronged no one. But she erred in not perceiving that, though her little fortune made marriage not necessary as a means of independence, yet it added little or nothing to her value in the estimation of the sort of man she wished to marry. To a poor man it might be a great inducement. To one as rich as herself it might be a matter of importance to double his income with his expenses. To the affluent lord of thousands it was of no consequence at all. But she was not yet fully sensible of this; and it was with no small interest that she heard of Colonel Harlston, whose character, station and wealth, came exactly up to the idea of the man she proposed to secure to herself. Unluckily Gertrude had two days the start of her, and hence the purposes and character of that young lady became an interesting study to her. One point was ascertained. She was not a woman to marry without love, and in this it was important to confirm her. In the second place, she had no design upon Colonel Harlston, for he had manifestly made no impression on her heart. But she might take a fancy to him, and this was, if possible, to be prevented. But should she do so, there would be no harm done, unless he, in turn, should take a fancy to her. Against this Miss Bernard determined to take the best security, by outshining her on every occasion. Gertrude danced with simple grace, and sang over her work, but not in company. She played on no instrument, and the utmost of her achievements with the pencil was to sketch the features of a friend. She had read some books and good books too; but she never talked out of them, and one might converse with her for hours without suspecting that she was familiar with all the beauties of our best poets, or even finding out that she had read a line of their works. Now Miss Bernard was the opposite of all this. She was highly and thoroughly accomplished: in every company her powers of entertainment were relied on to make the hours pass pleasantly away; and opportunities of showing to the best advantage those charms and graces, in which Gertrude would bear no comparison, were sure to come unsought. On the score of beauty she had some misgivings. It is by no means sure that a lady sees in the glass the same face she carries into company. The expression of admiring love is a beautiful thing, especially to him to whom it is directed. When a lady looks admiringly into her glass, she sees an image that looks admiringly at her. I know no other way to account for the fact that women who must be conscious of beauty are very apt to overrate their charms; while one who knows herself to be homely turns from the mirror with a feeling of disgust, aggravated by the offensive expression of disgust thrown back at her. But whatever may be thought of this theory, it is certain that the superiority of Gertrude's beauty to that of Miss Bernard was much more manifest to others than to Miss Bernard herself. Indeed it is by no means sure that she was aware of any thing more than a difference of style, kindly designed by Providence to accommodate different tastes with objects best suited to each.

CHAPTER VII.

The conversation I have detailed was interrupted by a summons to the drawing-room, where the young ladies found several gentlemen who had dropped in to make a morning call. Among these was Colonel Harlston, come to pay his respects to Miss Courtney, and express a hope that she had experienced no inconvenience from the fatigue of her drive the day before. The formal commonplace of this enquiry afforded Miss Bernard an opportunity of scanning the person and air of the gentleman; and the result of her observation was so decidedly favorable as to determine her to win him if possible. For the present his attention was occupied by Gertrude, and the studied decorum, and somewhat formal propriety of his manner, and the hackneyed strain of the little that passed between them gave no reason to expect that the conversation would take such a turn as to engage others to join in it. But conversation was Miss Bernard's forte: and, seated by the side of Gertrude, she could hardly fail to find an opportunity to make Colonel Harlston aware of her existence.

"You have only visited the environs of Washington as yet, Miss Courtney," said the Colonel. "You have seen little of the city I believe."

"I declare I do not know," said Gertrude smiling, "for it is hard to say where the city ends and the environs begin."

"Say rather," said Miss Bernard, in a playful undertone, "that it is hard to say where the environs end and the city begins."

"It may be then," said Gertrude, "that I have not yet entered the city. If so, Colonel Harlston must be right in supposing that I have seen nothing of it."

"Pardon me, Miss Courtney," said a young lawyer. "The question, 'city or no city,' is a question not of fact but of law; and whatever you may think, and whatever your senses may testify, in the city you are, and in the city you must be for many a weary mile: so that, unless you have taken a very long drive, it may be questioned whether, except in coming to Washington, you have seen any thing of the environs. It is matter of law too, that that dirty puddle is the Tiber, that that marsh is an avenue, that that hill is the Capitoline, and that within the walls of that building the wisdom of the nation is assembled."

"That, Ludwell," said Colonel Harlston, "is certainly the most violent fiction of them all, seeing that you are not there."

"Thank you, Colonel. That is a fair hit, provoked, I suppose, by a reflection on the sapient body of which you are a member. But I did not mean to be personal, for I beg you to recollect that it is only by fiction that you yourself are there. If you were there in fact, then the other might be no fiction. So you see my remark touches you not. You bachelor members have no great cause to take offence at any censures which may be cast on Congress. I assure you, ladies, it would be rendering essential service to the country if you would frown him back to his duty."

"Might we not render your clients a similar service?" asked Miss Bernard.

"My dear lady, do but tell me who they are, and I will engage to make amends for all my remissness. The only speeches I can get leave to make are to the ladies, and their smiles the only fee I can hope to win."

"You briefless lawyers are much wronged, if you do not seek to be rewarded, even for such speeches, with something more valuable than smiles."

"What, kisses! How can you think us so presumptuous?"

"You shocking creature! No. Your conscience tells you what I mean."

"Indeed it does. Guineas! The sweet yellow darlings! 'O gie me the lass that has acres of charms.' You are right, Miss Bernard, and I calculate on your coöperation. You know you and I have been fast allies, these two winters."

"How so? I assure you I am at the first of it."

"Oh! the only sort of alliance that can be relied on—community of interest. While you use all your art to inveigle the rich bachelors, your success will leave the rich girls no choice but to take up with poor fellows like me; and so by your means I may accomplish my aim at last."

"I declare I had not thought of that. It is a capital scheme. But 'gif-gaf' you know. If I take off your rivals you must take off mine."

"Agreed. You have only to let me know whom you have a design on, and I will hold myself bound to occur forthwith to any lady he seems disposed to attend to."

"Why, you unreasonable wretch! would you have me make you my confidant. No no. You must exercise your sagacity and act accordingly."

"Must I. Well then let us begin. There Harlston, do you talk to Miss Bernard, and leave Miss Courtney to me."

As he said this Harlston turned his head mechanically toward Miss Bernard, while Ludwell, coolly drawing a chair, placed himself near Gertrude.

"Mr. Ludwell recommends me to your notice, Colonel," said Miss Bernard, "by giving me a very bad character."

"Unless I am to believe him more serious in his accusation than in his confession," said Harlston, "it can hardly prejudice you. I believe he is too truly generous to wish to involve any woman in poverty; but if he never marries till he marries for money, he will die a bachelor."

"I have always thought so," said the lady; "and hence I have a high regard for him. To my knowledge he has had good reason to believe he could have made his fortune by marriage if he would. How I do love such a character!"

"Is there then so much merit," asked Harlston, "in merely forbearing to commit a crime, without temptation?"

"Crime! Temptation!!" exclaimed the lady. "Why where have you lived! What every body does cannot be a crime. Who is there to call it so! And as to Temptation! A fine establishment, plate, furniture, entertainments, dress, jewels! O dear! Gilded misery must be so sweet!"

The tone of this last sentence falsified the words: falsified all that had gone before; and fully convinced Colonel Harlston that Miss Bernard was not less disinterested than her friend Ludwell.

Meantime young Ludwell, addressing his conversation to Gertrude, assumed a tone and manner so different from the saucy badinage in which he had just been indulging, that he seemed like a different creature. Gifted with taste, genius and wit, he could be amusing, interesting, or instructive; and his trains of thought and raciness of expression brought Henry so strongly to Gertrude's mind, that she found a pleasure in his conversation, such as she had not experienced since she left home. The interest with which she listened to him engaged the attention of Colonel Harlston in spite of the efforts of Miss Bernard to secure it to herself, and he could not forbear, at one moment, from breaking into the conversation, by answering some remark.

"Miss Bernard," said Ludwell, suddenly turning to that young lady, "Harlston is passionately fond of music, and you must play him that delightful piece I heard you play the other day in the country."

"You are very kind to Colonel Harlston," said Miss Bernard. "It might have sounded more gallant to say a word for yourself."

"You forget. That is not my cue. Do you not see how busy I am here working for you! You must do your part too! Set your shoulder to the wheel, and Hercules will help you."

"My dear Laura," said Mrs. Pendarvis, rising and leading the young lady to the piano, "don't mind that saucy chatterbox, and let us hear you play. Come: no refusal."

And she did play; and she played divinely. And she sang; and her voice had a strange charm, analogous to her spoken tones; which seemed to impart to the words a meaning never perceived before, and addressed itself to the heart, as in a sort of mystic language. Ludwell immediately turned again to Gertrude, and would have resumed his former strain of conversation. But she had not yet acquired that refinement of manners which teaches a young lady to accompany the music of another with a rattling peal of nonsense and laughter; and her taste for music, though little cultivated, made her a delighted listener to Miss Bernard's performance. Colonel Harlston, who was indeed a connoisseur, was quite enchanted, but while Miss Bernard had all his ear, his eye still wandered to Gertrude, and marked the ingenuous pleasures which her countenance displayed, and her resolute resistance to all Ludwell's attempts to keep up the conversation. Miss Bernard was not permitted to leave the piano. Tune succeeded tune, till, in looking for one, the Colonel's hand alighted on a book of drawings. This bore Miss Bernard's name, and displayed much talent and more taste. Here was a new theme for conversation, for he was an admirer of the art. He had travelled, and so had she, and they presently wandered together through the galleries of Rome and Florence, and discussed the merits of the great masters of the pictorial art till a morning call was prolonged to a most unfashionable visitation.

"Well Harlston," said Ludwell, as the gentlemen walked away from the door, "I think Miss Bernard must own me for a very efficient ally. And indeed she has been hardly less serviceable to me, for, though Miss Courtney is understood to be nearly penniless, yet may the smile of woman never cheer my poverty, if I would not rather share it with her, than accept the hand of the other with a kingdom for her dowry."

"To me," said Harlston, "Miss Bernard appears a beautiful, intelligent, highly accomplished and right-minded woman, in whose society a man might well be happy."

"So you thought of her as a pis aller, and so I knew you would think, or I should not have been so unjust as to have thrown her on your hands, at the same time that I robbed you of all the pleasure you proposed to yourself in a visit to Miss Courtney. You must own too that I am, not only a faithful ally, but a generous rival. And yet I know you do not forgive me, and you ought not, were I to leave you exposed to the machinations of the other without a warning."

"I do not think I am in any danger," said Harlston, "for though I see much to admire in Miss Bernard, I was never less sensible to the attractions of any young lady."

"Instinct is a great matter," cried Ludwell laughing. "Some people have a horror of cats, and turn pale when one enters the room unseen and unheard. Your instinctive aversion to drapery-misses and female fortune-hunters is of the same character. I have seen nothing else like it."

"It is not instinct," replied Harlston gravely, and even sadly, "except so far as the desire to be loved for one's own sake is an instinct of the whole race. It is not instinct. It is a principle, founded in deep and wretched experience; and any, the least allusion to the subject by a lady, though it be to express her indignation against mercenary matches, repels me in a moment. I had no reason to doubt what Miss Bernard said, nor was she to blame for saying it, for you made it almost necessary; and yet that idea came between me and her all the time we were conversing, and even while I was listening to her music."

"Think you I was not aware of that, my dear fellow! She has quite too much tact to volunteer professions on the subject, or even to allude to it, in the first instance. Hence I introduced it in a way that I thought would draw her out, and make her show off. She carried it off however quite moderately; but I knew you would be conscious of the presence of the cat, though she did not show herself. In short, Harlston, though I would gladly be rid of your rivalry in the other quarter, I did not wish to do it at your expense. Had I known that Miss Bernard was in the city, I would have warned you against her distinctly."

"Who and what is she?"

"All that you see and a great deal more. But to sum up all that concerns you in one word, she is a lady who will marry you if she can."

"And Miss Courtney? What of her?"

"I know nothing of her, but that she is the niece of Mrs. Pendarvis, and that her father died when she was a child, leaving little behind him but a high reputation for honor and talent. Her mother, some years after, married a country physician of great respectability, large family and moderate fortune. The figure she is making here does not accord with her circumstances, and might look auspicious, were not the generosity of her aunt so notorious. I see her hand in this outfit; though she is too honest to intend any deception, and would tell you, at a word, that Miss Courtney has neither fortune nor expectations."

"Then seriously, Ludwell, circumstanced as you are, what do you propose? For though I am much pleased with Miss Courtney, I am not such a tinder-box as you; and my friendship for you and my interest in her alike prompt the question."

"What do I propose? What does a stone propose by falling to the ground? Why, man, she is my fate. Propose! I propose nothing; but if I thought it would be of any use to propose myself—foolish as it would be—wicked as it would be, I am afraid I should do it. But just at present, my dear Harlston, I propose nothing, because I desire nothing but the dreamy, delicious pleasure I enjoy in her presence. Ask a man in the present fruition of all his soul covets 'what he proposes!!'"

"You talk," said Harlston, "like a boy in his first love."

"And am I not?" exclaimed Ludwell. "No boy indeed; and I have thought myself in love before.

But it was as if a blind man, restored to sight, should take the moon for the sun he had heard so much of. But let the sun rise! By day and night, there is no mistake this time: and to speak seriously, Harlston, I know I should propose, and decide too, what to do; and I very much fear I ought to make my escape from the brink of this ocean of bliss, where I stand and sip and sip, till I am dizzy 'with the draught. God help me!' added he, resuming his playful tone; "I expect one of these days, to be fished out like a drowned fly out of a punch-bowl."

CHAPTER VIII.

As I do not mean to give a diary of Gertrude's life in Washington I shall not enter into a detail of the occurrences of the next ten days after this conversation. The reader has been made acquainted with the dramatis personæ, their purposes and plans, and, thus initiated, may be left to fill up that interval according to the suggestions of his own imagination. I take it for granted that he needs not be told that the impression made by Gertrude on Colonel Harlston was deepened by a further acquaintance with her: that Miss Bernard's experience of the amiable and estimable qualities of that gentleman did not abate the eagerness of her designs on his person and fortune; and that Ludwell's passion, however violent, had little effect on the exuberance of his spirits, the playfulness of his manners, and his love of fun and mischief. Both he and the Colonel saw Gertrude every day, for, even before her appearance, they were both almost daily visitors at the house. Ludwell's attentions to her were almost exclusive, and yet they seemed to be paid without any purpose beyond the gratification of the moment. Such as they were it would not have been easy for her to receive much of the Colonel's without an effort on her part, which it was not in her nature to make, or an eagerness of pursuit on his, inconsistent alike with his temper, and his views. He was certainly enamored, but experience had taught him to be careful not to make any very decided demonstration until he had learned enough of the lady's character to know what sort of considerations might influence her decision on his pretensions. Hence he mastered his feelings, so far as to be little more than a looker-on: and this part Miss Bernard enabled him to act without betraying the object of his visits. The consequence was, she occupied so much of his attention that her self-love easily mistook his views. He said nothing indeed from which she could infer any decided sentiment in her favor; but as he seemed to seek her society, it was clear that he must take pleasure in it; and how can any man pass his hours in the presence of a woman whose society delights him without becoming enamored of her? So reasoned Miss Bernard, and so reasoning she soon learned to look with the complacent eye of a proprietor on the graceful outline of the Phæton, and the splendid figures of the four fine bays that drew it; and to catch with interest the hints which Ludwell sometimes mischievously dropt of the extent of the Colonel's estates, the multitude of his slaves, and the number of his cotton-bales. Of all this Colonel Harlston himself had no suspicion; for, conscious of no enthrallment of his own feelings, the cautionary hint of Ludwell was quite forgotten. Miss Bernard too had the tact to discover that the subject on which Ludwell had led her to speak with so much unction, at her first interview with the Colonel, was so very distasteful to him that the least allusion to it disgusted him. The result was, that Harlston had the fairest opportunities to observe upon the manners and character of Gertrude, and was fast arriving at the conviction, that she was entirely exempt from the influence of mercenary considerations, and as nearly free from the arts of the sex as, in the actual constitution of society, it is permitted to woman to be. Of one thing he was sure. She had no designs on his fortune. Always courteous and kind, she seemed grateful for his attentions; but he had never detected any, the least effort to engage them, or the slightest indication of impatience at the monopoly which circumstances had enabled Miss Bernard to secure. In the conversation of Ludwell she manifestly found a pleasure which seemed sufficient for the passing hour, though it was quite clear that she only valued him as an agreeable acquaintance. In short, she seemed to him a pure and single-hearted girl, whose affections were not to be bestowed unsought, nor won without merit of a high order: and he had little doubt that her hand would be given only to him who should entitle himself to the highest place in her estimation and regard.

Here then was the very woman for whom Colonel Harlston had long been seeking. That she was worthy to share his name and fortune he no longer doubted. In the possession of such a woman he felt that he might calculate on as much of happiness as falls to the lot of man. A raw youth, under the influence of this conviction, would at once have thrown himself at her feet. But he was not a raw youth. Nearly thirty years of age, he had seen much of the world, and was fully aware, that, from such a woman, an abrupt declaration, from one who had taken no pains to recommend himself to her favor, would meet a merited rejection. He determined therefore to change his deportment toward her, beginning with that small course of quiet attentions too slight to alarm, and too marked to escape observation, which a master of the secrets of woman's heart has recommended as the most successful mode of courtship.

About the time that he formed this resolution came the announcement of a splendid entertainment to be given by Mrs. Pendarvis. One such at least, it was her habit to give every winter, and as her parties, though numerous, were select, the honor of an invitation was not to be lightly prized. A lady, and the widow of a gentleman, she had all the instinct of high breeding, and, in selecting her society, did not fail to discriminate carefully without the least regard to wealth, rank, or station. There was nothing too high, according to these standards, to be excluded; nothing too low to be admitted; and royalty itself has sometimes had to brook the tacit intimation, that a man may be President of the United States, and yet not a gentleman. In what reign this was I do not say.

The evening came; and the whole house was thrown open; and parties for cards, and groupes for conversation were formed in every room but that appropriated to the dance, and loungers, arm in arm, promenaded through the whole. In the early part of the evening our young ladies were rarely separated, and Harlston, in constant attendance on them, did not permit himself to be so wholly engrossed by Miss Bernard as she might have wished. Somewhat annoyed by this she tasked her address to the utmost, but with imperfect success. She looked around for Ludwell, but he was only to be seen occasionally, and then in attendance on another lady who happened to have particular claims on him. A beck from Miss Bernard's fan at last afforded him an excuse to break away from his fair companion, and he immediately obeyed the summons.

"Lady," said he, "behold the slave of the fan, devoted to do the pleasure of her who bears it! Wherein can I serve her?"

"By giving me the pleasure of your conversation," said Miss Bernard, from whom, at the moment, the attention of Colonel Harlston was wholly withdrawn.

"Ah!" said Ludwell, glancing at the Colonel and Gertrude, "you have managed badly. You have not profited by the hint I gave you."

"What hint? I know of none."

"You know of none! But you did know; and took it, and improved it most dexterously as far as you went: but I am afraid you have since neglected it."

"I protest I do not understand you."

"You do not! What! Not the accusation I brought against you, to give you an opportunity to repel it so gracefully, and so sincerely!"

"Perhaps I guess your meaning now; though I assure you I did not understand it at the time. But why so much stress on that point?"

"Why? Because that is Harlston's infirmity. He caught it in New-Haven, and it has stuck to him ever since—a fixed idea—a sort of monomania. When he was there at College the Yankee girls almost devoured him; and now he keeps himself as close as an oyster, for fear of being swallowed for his fortune. But come," continued he, raising his voice, "I have not danced to-night. Will Miss Courtney honor me with her hand?"

She took his arm, and, as he led her away he said, "You see, Miss Bernard, I am returned to my duty. You have been doing yours gallantly, and it is time that I should do mine."

"Get along, you saucy fellow," said she, tapping him playfully with her fan. "I declare I shall hate you forever, for your impudent speech to me the other day."

"Pray do," said he. "Constancy is so rare now-a-days that an example of Constancy, even in hatred, would be quite refreshing."

"What in the world can that mad cap mean;" said Miss Bernard, turning to Harlston, "by constantly harping on that disgusting subject?"

"I am glad you think it so," was the cold reply. "With my own consent I would never hear the slightest allusion to it. The difference between my friend Ludwell and myself is, that what is to him an object of playful scorn, is to me one of unutterable disgust. He can jest about it: I cannot."

"Few men can carry their detestation of mercenary views in affairs of the heart farther than he does; though, as you remarked, the other day, there is a point at which he stops. He seems resolute never to marry for money, though he has never made up his mind to marry for love. But, judging from present appearances, I am not sure that the temptation may not at last prove too strong. But do not be alarmed, Colonel," she added playfully, as she marked the look with which Harlston followed the significant glance of her eye; "his imprudence will not be contagious."

Miss Bernard's extraordinary power over the tones of her voice gave these words a meaning not to be mistaken. She drew her breath hard, and almost gasped, under the look which Harlston unconsciously turned upon her. She felt that she had spoken critical words, and she knew that her insinuation was unjust. She remembered indeed what Gertrude had said on the morning after they first met: and she had more than once witnessed the docility, or, what she might have called the acquiescence, with which she listened to her aunt's lectures on prudence; and from these she made out a sort of apology to her own conscience, for "hinting a fault," which she did not believe to exist.

What Miss Bernard herself thought upon the subject was to Harlston a matter of perfect indifference. Forewarned by Ludwell, he had seen that there was a purpose in all she said, or did not say in relation to it. Whether she dwelt upon it, or avoided it, he had thought he could see that she had a design in doing so. A keen observer, and, as Ludwell had said, almost a monomaniac on this point, it was not easy to deceive him. He might suspect unjustly. He was in no danger of the opposite error. Much as he disliked the subject, he would even force himself to endure a discussion of it, in order to unmask a character; and on this occasion he determined to follow Miss Bernard's lead, so as to keep up the conversation till Gertrude should return to her seat. This was not difficult, and the first words that struck Ludwell's ear, as he led back his partner to her place, were in a more high flown strain than the lady had before indulged in.

"That's right," exclaimed Ludwell. "That is the way to manage the matter. Do, Miss Courtney, let us now hear something of your sentiments about that sweet romantic thing, Love in a Cottage."

"As I never lived in a Cottage, and have had no experience of Love, I am not prepared to pronounce a very decided opinion on the subject."

"But you have sometimes thought of it."

"Of course I have; for nothing is more talked about. I have observed that all the old ladies deliver lectures on one side, and all the young ladies make speeches on the other, so I suppose I must take the side that seems most appropriate to my time of life."

"And change it, of course, as you grow older."

"I suppose so. People grow wiser as they grow older, and they tell me that this is a subject on which young people are particularly foolish."

"Miss Courtney can hardly be hearty," said Harlston, "in an opinion which she has candor enough to suspect may be foolish."

"I am certainly not hearty in any opinion on the subject," said Gertrude; "for I have formed none. I only know that the history of my own family affords proof that imprudent marriages are very imprudent things."

"But the question recurs," said Miss Bernard, "what is an imprudent match? You would hardly call a happy match an imprudent one; and surely there can be no happiness without love. We are told, you know, that love constitutes the bliss of Heaven itself."

"But in Heaven," said Gertrude, "there is neither cold nor hunger nor crying children. If there were, why then, the more the parents loved them, the less happy they would be. I have heard my mother say, that she was very happy with my father, but then when she was left a widow, with poor me upon her hands, and very limited means of support, she found she had been very imprudent."

This case seemed so exactly in point to poor Ludwell that his countenance fell; while Harlston, in manifest disquietude, walked away and left the conversation to go on as it might. In another part of the room he established himself in a position to watch the countenances of the party. In doing this he at once saw that the keen eye of Miss Bernard had followed him and occasionally glanced toward him; while Gertrude, all unconscious of his whereabouts, continued to converse, with an air of quiet simplicity, with Ludwell; who, by degrees, recovered his spirits. Not so, Harlston. He now felt, more than at any former moment, that Miss Courtney was to him an object of absorbing interest, that his happiness depended on her; and that it was indispensable to him, that she should be entirely superior to the grovelling views imputed to her, and not disavowed by her. He was perhaps better pleased that she had not disavowed them; and yet he was vexed that she had not. He remained perplexed and gloomy in his seclusion, until he again saw her taken out to dance. Soon after, in one of the pauses of the dance he approached her, spoke a few low words and fell back to his place. As soon as the set ended, he again advanced, claimed the hand he had just engaged, and detained her on the floor. He went through the dance mechanically, and with an air of abstraction, and, as soon as it ended, offered his arm to Gertrude, and proposed to seek fresher air in another room.

"Miss Courtney;" said he, as soon as he could speak without danger of being overheard, "I beg pardon for the abruptness of what I am about to say. The shortness of our acquaintance must make me seem precipitate, and the time and place are not the most suitable; but I cannot sleep without telling you that I love you, and laying myself and my fortune at your feet."

I hope the reader anticipates at least the substance of Gertrude's answer; and it is needless to give the words, as young ladies are rarely eloquent on such occasions; especially when taken completely by surprise. To Gertrude it had seemed, (and she had been pleased to see it,) that Colonel Harlston was quite taken with Miss Bernard; and, giving that young lady full credit for sincerity in all her talk about Love in a Cottage, she had cherished the hope of seeing her magnanimity rewarded by the less romantic bliss of Love in a Palace. Her answer therefore was expressive of surprise, esteem, gratitude and all that sort of thing, but wound up with a very decided rejection.

Colonel Harlston heard her with great composure; though while she spoke his countenance assumed a high and animated expression; and, when she had concluded, he took her hand and addressed her in a tone of earnest calmness.

"My dear Miss Courtney," he said, "I must again entreat your forgiveness for that which may surprise you more than the unexpected declaration that I have just made. Since I first saw you I have meditated such a step, though I beg leave to assure you that I have not been vain enough to suppose that, in our short acquaintance, I could have made such an impression as would have justified your acceptance of my proposal. Indeed I have not permitted myself to cultivate your favor by those attentions which would have made it if not more acceptable, at least less startling. It has been rather my study to make myself acquainted with you, and to give you, at the same time, a fair opportunity to know me. But I have been hurried into this step by what passed a few minutes ago. I see you do not understand my allusion. I advert to what you just now said of interested matches. Nay! do not be offended," he added, as she withdrew her hand, while a flush of indignation rose to her cheek. "I did not misinterpret your words. I understood them as a playful and dexterous evasion of an ill-timed appeal, and was better pleased than I should have been at a flight of common-place declamation, which, on such a subject, seems to my mind unmaidenly. But I was taught to believe that the sentiment which you seemed rather to admit than avow was with you a settled and deliberate principle of action. I was taught to believe this, but I did not believe it; yet the idea that it could possibly be true was not to be endured. There was but one way to bring it to a prompt and decisive test. I had no reason to flatter myself that I had any hold on your affections. But I have no reason to think myself particularly disagreeable to you; and I am sure you must be aware that my circumstances, my station in society, and my standing in life are such, that a woman proposing to marry for convenience would hardly reject me. You see the risk I ran in affording you an opportunity to make us both wretched, by giving me your hand without your heart; but I beg you to believe that had I entertained any very serious apprehension of that sort, I would not have encountered it. But I was impatient to be freed from all doubt, which, on such a point, would have been intolerable, and might have marred all my efforts to please you. We now understand each other. You have but told me what I knew before: that you do not love me. But you have not told me that you never can. You have but done what I expected and wished. But you have not forbidden me to prosecute my suit, and to endeavor to show myself not unworthy of your favor. Let me now beg one indulgence at your hands. It is that you will keep my secret, at least for a season. I do not wish to be thought precipitate without having it in my power to explain my motives; and I do not wish that my endeavors to please you should be embarrassed and disconcerted by the nods and winks and all the nameless impertinences of meddling gossips. I hope my frankness merits this kindness, and that you will not think yourself bound to repulse the assiduities which my feelings will prompt, from the thought that it is your duty to discourage any farther attention from a rejected lover. I cannot consent to be considered in that light. I am sensible that a man may lose much by patting his mistress prematurely in possession of his secret. But this I have done cheerfully and I trust you so appreciate my motive that you will not suffer my openness to prejudice me any farther.

"Do you accord what I ask?" he added, significantly laying his open hand on the seat of the sofa where they sat. She placed hers within it, and lifting her glistening eyes rewarded him with a smile of gratitude.

"You are indeed most kind," he continued, "and encourage a presumption at which one less generous might take offence. Then, my dear Miss Courtney, let me go one step farther. Let me adjure you, by your hopes of happiness, and your regard for the honor and dignity of your sex, of which every woman is an appointed guardian, to cherish, while you live, the same noble sentiment on which you now act; although you would not condescend to make a vaunting profession of it. Trust me, the woman, who, loving one man, marries another, commits the greatest crime of which, as a woman, she can be guilty and incurs a penalty inevitable as it is severe. If ever the tortures of the damned are inflicted by anticipation in this world, it is on her who condemns herself to the hopeless misery of a loveless marriage. The worm that preys upon her heart is the prototype of that which never dies."

Saying this he raised her gently. She left him, to recover her composure in her own chamber, and the Colonel, after loitering about the rooms for a short time, quietly slipped away.

Suggested by a Picture of Westminster Abbey.

"Why at his lot should Godlike man repine?
Kings are but men, and man as Kings divine!
What are crowns and sceptres, courts and thrones,
But folly's playthings, made of human bones?"

Enter the portals, wide and vast,
Of yon time-honor'd pile;
Pause at ev'ry mould'ring tomb
And thread its every aisle.

Wind the steep of every height,
Stand on each time-worn tower;
Then think of Kings beneath your feet
And learn the worth of power.

There death, in its most courted form,
Beneath, around, is spread:—
Kings, poets, statesmen, all are there;
Are there, but pulseless,—dead!

Their pride and grandeur all are gone!
Gone like a vapor's breath!
The crown and crosier, both are there,
The garner'd spoils of death.

And yet, the godlike soul of man
From its high path will turn,
That when its mortal robe is rent,
Here may be rear'd an urn.

Oh ! give to me the path of peace,
Where life's calm waters roll,
That when this mortal strife shall cease,
God will inurn the soul.

Oh ! give to me the flower-deck'd grave,
A peaceful, calm repose,
O'er which the summer grass may wave,
And wreath the winter snows.

Entomb me not in sculptur'd halls,
Where no spring floweret grows,
But let me by some lillied stream
In death's long sleep repose.

Where opening flowers at early dawn
The air with odors fill,
And gentle dews from twilight's urn
Shall on my grave distil.

THE ECONOMY OF LIFE.

Regimen and Longevity, comprising Materia Alimentaria, National dietetic usages, and the influence of civilization on health and the duration of Life. By John Bell, M. D., &c., &c. Haswell and Johnson, Philadelphia, 1843.

We believe that it is deducible from experience and sound philosophy, that, if man would study and learn well all the natural laws under which he lives, and strictly follow their requirements, he would be both good and happy. Holy Writ teaches us that to make ourselves good and happy in the future state, we must obey higher laws, and act from higher motives than these. But as we have seen, the whole system of our nature, functions and relations, affords the most ample evidence, that the physical and organic laws were intended for, and adapted to our growth, vigor and welfare, physically, mentally and morally. It may be difficult to demonstrate the truth of this proposition by reference to the history of any community, or nation of men, but it would be equally hard, by the same testimony, to prove the reverse. It is said in the life of Captain Cook, "one circumstance peculiarly worthy of notice, is the perfect and uninterrupted health of the New Zealanders. In all the visits made to their towns, when old and young, male and female, crowded about our voyagers, they never observed a single person who seemed to have any bodily complaint!! Many of them, by the loss of their hair and their teeth, appeared to be very ancient, and yet none of them were decrepit. Water, as far as our voyagers could learn, was the usual and the only drink of the New Zealanders." Their diet is not specified, but it is of the "most nutritive and simple character." As natural laws admit of no exception, this happy state could not occur, unless it was within the capabilities of the human race. If we take instances of individual life, we can find evidence to confirm our proposition. Men may be congenitally, or constitutionally distempered, so that no course of regimen could give them healthful organs and healthy functions. But we allude, of course, to those who are naturally and primarily constituted healthful, when we say, that the corporeal frame of man is so constituted as to admit of his enjoying organic health and vigor, during the whole period of a long life. And a healthy, cheerful mind is the natural result of a vigorous body, healthful in all its actions.

Because the pernicious use of intoxicating drinks has been most frequently and suddenly carried to extreme excess, a very large amount of the effort directed to physical and moral reform has been bestowed on this particular species of intemperance. It has attracted most attention on account of the rapidity and terrible character of its destructive powers. But perhaps the main reason why it is so strenuously attended to, whilst other sources of evil are suffered to go unrebuked, is found in the more comprehensive character of its effects. A man given to drunkenness becomes not only useless, but often, he is an actual pest, and sometimes even an object of fear to those about him. While another may stupify, besot and even destroy himself from the character and quantity of his diet, and no one but himself being injured, no interference is offered. A principle of self-preservation prompts us to repel the one character of evil, while in the other form, we do not feel called upon to interfere.

We did not place the work of Dr. Bell at the head of these cursory remarks, with an intention of reviewing it, or even of presenting a condensed view of its valuable contents. But our object is to elicit the reader's interest in, and attention to the subject under consideration, as one of the most important that could engage general attention; and in doing so, the work before us presents itself as a volume of information, which is indispensable to a thorough acquaintance with the branch of the general economy of life, on which it particularly treats. The work is confined principally to the discussion of diet and drink, with a promise in the preface to treat hereafter on other subjects embraced in "the latitude of interpretation, not unusually given to Regimen," and first, of air and exercise.

On all subjects relating to the welfare of men, both in health and disease, we have no higher authority, in the estimation of the writer, at least, than Dr.

JOHN BELL. The facts he has here adduced, gathered from the dietetic usages of almost every nation on the globe, if closely studied in connection with the natural laws that govern organic life, are calculated to produce more healthful and durable reform in the habits and pernicious opinions of individuals, and the misguided usages of communities, than all the "temperance lectures" that the learned author could have delivered in the whole of his industrious life. We have said that our object is the awakening of attention to the general science, or art of living, which teaches us, not how we may breathe and groan away a life of misapplied toil, but which acquaints us with our own capabilities, privileges and powers in using the means of happiness so profusely given us, and at the same time warns us of the dangers that lie hidden in their abuse. In this science, the subject of diet stands conspicuous, if not paramount in importance. The human body, as an organized substance, is ever undergoing the compound process of growth and decay. It is the office of one class of organs to replenish and support, and of another class, to eliminate and throw off those portions of the substance which have served their purpose, to make room for fresh sustenance. To this latter class we address medicines, and to the former, food. Food and drink are the sources whence our ever wasting frames derive their sustenance. They are taken into every point and particle of our structure, and, in fact, it is of them, that we are made what we physically and substantially are. Viewed thus, as the material of our constitution, it would seem that the substances of our aliment should form matter of the most assiduous study and diligent care in practice. Not that we might learn how to combine, season and dress it, so as to enable us to consume the greatest quantity at a single meal, but that we might ascertain precisely how to select, prepare and gauge it, so as to contribute most to our physical health and vigor, our mental activity and energy, and our moral firmness and equanimity. For, that the kind and quantity of our physical aliment does exercise a powerful influence upon all these three attributes of our constitution, is a demonstrable fact in the experience of every one. A diet over-abundant in amount, or highly stimulating in its character, is sure to render our bodies languid and heavy, our intellect dull and oppressed, and our moral temper impatient and irritable. Lord Byron furnishes, perhaps, the most distinguished instance of a splendid mind warped and perverted by physical excesses. With all his enviable endowments of person and fortune, which most men would expect to make them happy, he declared that the most serene and delightful moments of his life were produced under the depletory effects of Epsom salts. Dr. Bell quotes his lordship's allegation, that whenever he ate meat for any length of time, he felt an increase of savageness in himself, and intimates that much of his savageness was innate. But may not that which the learned doctor calls his "innate savageness," have had its growth and perpetuity in these excesses to which we are alluding?

In asserting that the economy of life has not received its due portion of care and study, we would not be understood as saying, that "table comforts," as they are miscalled, have not absorbed a goodly share of attention. We know, on the contrary, that they form, with a large class, objects of the most anxious solicitude. To provide the table with excellent and bountiful supplies has ever been a high purpose with a great many people. But they have looked upon feeding with about the same notions that our milliners, tailors and fashion-mongers do upon clothing,—any amount of bodily comfort and freedom of action is to be sacrificed to a genteel "set" and a "tasty style." Fashion has been as changeable and extravagant in her rule over the palate, as in her laws of dress and amusement. The great art and science of cookery have been exerted to add to the long catalogue of the articles of food throughout both ancient and modern times. In ancient times, we are informed that cooks were much more perfect in their art than our modern practitioners are. Athenæus mentions numerous instances of their superior skill. But as excellence in a profession is usually attained in a ratio proportioned to the rewards it brings, this excellence was probably owing to the superior rank and emolument awarded the professors of culinary science in those days. The discovery, or invention of a new dish brought immortal honor and renown to the fortunate genius who claimed its paternity, and handed his name down to all future generations of gourmands. Philosophers discoursed and poets sang of the wonderful achievements in this delightful art. And one of them says, with exulting emphasis, that although various delicacies can only be enjoyed in their proper season, yet "we can talk about them with watering mouths all the year round." We are informed that one of the professors of this luxurious art arrived at such consummate skill, that he could serve up a pig boiled on one side and roasted on the other, and stuffed with all manner of delicacies without the incisions through which they were introduced being perceivable. Amongst the multifarious articles which go to make up the catalogue of man's edibles, from ancient down to modern times, nearly every substance that could possibly admit of it may be found. Though variable in its objects, the same thirst for novelty and the same spirit of extravagance have ever prevailed. That philosophy, which in our day teaches that no labor is to be accounted productive, but that which is directed immediately to the production of the raw material of food and clothing, is prompted by the same comprehensive spirit that enlightened Aimes to the discovery that cookery was the basis and grand object of all science. Those men who habitually light up their appetites by a torch of brandy, by way of facilitating the expansion and blunting the sensibility of their stomachs, on the approach of a meal, are but the improved disciples of Philoxenus and his "school," who accustomed themselves to drink large quantities of hot water, that they might be able to attack scalding dishes before less fire-proof guests could dare to taste them. Thus, by comparison, we may find that man has in all ages, when he had the ability, been disposed to deify his stomach and sacrifice all his higher sources of enjoyment upon its ever burning altar. We eat and drink to make us happy, and when we find happiness from any other source, we must fall to eating and drinking to enjoy it, as though we possessed no social powers but those of a sensual character. Men now-a-days acquire the greatest fame, from rearing the largest hog, or the fattest ox, as did, in olden times, one Fulvius Herpinus, who immortalized his name by fattening snails, which Horace informs us were served up and broiled upon silver gridirons to give a relish to wine. The modern fashion of lulling the pangs of an excessive meal, by a resort to the soothing powers of the "fragrant weed," is but a refinement upon the ancient practice of using on such occasions the warm bath, or an emetic.

What particular class of substances was designed by nature for the food of man is a question, we believe, which has never yet been definitely settled. Philosophers, in all times, seem to have given the subject a portion of their study, but unfortunately, they have rarely given the question such a shape, as would lead to a profitable discussion. The question has been, what have the organs of nature given him power to eat, and not, (as it should have been,) what has nature afforded best adapted to his natural wants and welfare. With a view to ascertain what kind of substances man has been qualified to devour, by means of his masticatory and digestive organs, the peculiar form of his grinders, the position relatively to each other, the peculiar motive capability of his jaws, and the anatomical structure of his stomach, have all been examined. Baron Cuvier comes to the conclusion, that "the natural food of man appears to consist of fruits, roots and other succulent parts of vegetables;" and others, as Sir Everard Home and Lawrence, concur with the Baron. How far this mode of judging of the suitableness of a thing, by the power possessed to appropriate it, may be just, is, we think, questionable. It was by this mode of reasoning, that Dr. Franklin decided that man was naturally a wine drinker. He says, "the only animals created to drink water are those who, from their conformation, are able to lap it from the surface of the earth, whereas, all those who can carry their hands to their mouth, were destined to enjoy the juice of the grape." The weight of authority is on the side of vegetables, as the chief food of man, whilst he is almost universally set down as an omnivorous animal. Dr. Millenger says, "according to the country he inhabits, its productions and the nature of its pursuits, his mode of living differs. The inhabitant of the cold and sterile regions on the borders of the ocean becomes ichthyophagous, and fish, fresh, dried, smoked, or salted, is his principal nourishment. The bold huntsman lives upon the game he pursues; while the nomadian shepherd, who tends his herds over boundless steeps, supports himself on the milk of his flock." This is all very beautiful, and however true it may be generally, and theoretically, it is perhaps most often found, that these romantic practices are more the results of necessity and circumstance, than of any natural and uniform law pertaining to the species. The great object of our search,—the grand truth to be discovered, is not, what can we subsist upon, or what kind of usages men may have been subjected to under particular circumstances in which they were placed; nor how far nature may be overcome and subdued by habit. But we should rather seek to know what are the laws by which our sustenance is governed, and how we must administer them, so as to avoid the most evil and attain the greatest good. In other words, how shall we make and keep ourselves what our Creator intended us to be,—vigorous, healthful and happy. This is the object our author had in view in the treatise before us. He has explained what the principle of nutriment is, and exhibited the various proportions of that principle contained in the different articles of diet, and also the quantity of other, (frequently indigestible,) matter with which it is combined. He also reviews "the national dietetic usages" of the different countries, and then considers the nutritive qualities and value of the different kinds of aliment. Thus setting forth such data as cannot fail to lead the reader to the most just and beneficial conclusions on this most important subject of study. The savage state is frequently pointed to as one most congenial to health and longevity. Because there are very few invalids found amongst savages, the short-hand conclusion is assumed, that this exemption is owing to the healthful tendency of the peculiar habits of the savage life. But a slight examination of the subject will show the true cause to lie in another direction. Such persons as are infirm and invalid amongst civilized people, are, in savage life, consigned to an early grave, and the old adage is remembered, "dead men tell no tales." Dr. Bell has proven, from historic facts, that pure civilization is the most favorable state to health and long life. What is meant by pure civilization, we are to understand from the following remark of our author, "Looking at civilization in its elements and combination," says he, "we are bound to reject the vicious and the absurd, as foreign to it, or at least, as fungous growths and excrescences from, but not an integral part of it. This is the high, moral and religious test by which civilization should be tried." The city of Geneva, of whose population, births and deaths, an accurate history has been kept for nearly the last three centuries, shows a striking illustration of the principle already laid down, viz: "the ameliorating influence of civilization in prolonging human life among a people." The history of other places is referred to in confirmation of the same principle. This results from the nearer adaptation of the habits of civilized life to the organic laws of our nature.

Amongst the errors that have prevailed, and still prevail, in regard to the diet of men, perhaps the most general, and one of the most pernicious is the opinion that animal food is necessary to render them robust and courageous. All persons acquainted with the history of men in this regard, must see the fallacy of the opinion. The miserable and timid inhabitants of Northern Europe and Asia, are remarkable for their debility, both physical and moral, although they live chiefly upon fish and flesh, whilst the South Sea Islanders, can vie in bodily exercises with our stoutest men. Our savage aborigines are frequently cited as living proofs of the courage, agility and vigor arising from the use of animal food. The exercises of the chase, no doubt, produce great agility of muscle, and the free use of animal food may contribute to the ferocity of their character, which is often mistaken for courage, but divest them of the imaginary qualities which romance has thrown around them, and our "red brethren" are a sullen, lazy and cowardly race. "The citizen soldiers of republican Rome, living on the simplest vegetable food and water, or water mixed with vinegar for their drink, overcame all their enemies, whereas, the degenerate slaves of the Empire, supplied with animal food and wine, were beaten by every invader, and their city plundered alike by Goth and Vandal. The greatest part of the people of the world subsist on vegetable diet alone, and a portion admit animal aliment not as a regular daily allowance, but only as an occasional addition, and in small proportion. This remark will apply to the world from the days of Abraham and the Pharaohs down to the present time. And what is most interesting, and to us meat-eating Americans most astonishing, is the fact, "that wherever the diet is mostly vegetable in its character, there the people have been found most uniformly hardy and healthful in body, and firm and complacent in mind. The effects of diet in this respect are more remarkable, perhaps, on the mental and moral constitution than on the physical frame. After examining the state of facts bearing on this particular point, Dr. Bell remarks, that "the people who eat much flesh meat, and in greater proportion than vegetable food, are less civilized, in every sense of the word, than those who derive the greater part, or all of their aliment from the vegetable kingdom." It must not be inferred, however, that our author is a "Grahamite," or an exclusive "vegetable man." It is against the disproportionately large quantity of animal food, so generally and perniciously used, that his facts and arguments are arrayed, while he agrees that animal aliment, within proper bounds, (very limited,) may be useful. As regards the effects of dietetic usage on the constitution and character of men, history affords the fullest accounts, but we have not space to introduce them here. But the early Greeks and Romans, the Spartans, the Egyptians and the Chinese may be mentioned. "A pound and a half of rice daily is the allowance on which an adult Hindoo will not only live, but labor, his drink the while being water. The palanquin bearers, four of whom carry a traveller and his baggage, and the carriage itself, weighing in all from four to five hundred pounds, are fed in this way. Dr. Olin, in his late narrative of travels, mentions the scanty fare of the Eastern laborers, and whenever, from a feeling of charity and sympathy for their privations, he would give those in his employ meats from his own larder, it invariably produced a fit of sullenness and stupidity, not unfrequently amounting to insubordination. Mr. Stephens, in his "incidents of travel," speaking of the Monks of Sinai says, "they never ate meat—no animal food of any kind is permitted to enter the convent. During all their abode in the convent not one of them had eaten a particle of animal food, and yet I never saw more healthy looking men. . . . The Monk who guided us up the mountain, and who was more than sixty years old, when he descended after a hard day's labor was less tired than either Paul or myself." Mr. Stephens also adduces his own experience in confirmation of the opinion that animal food, to do no injury, must be sparingly used. The courageous, hardy and athletic Irish might be mentioned in this connection, and every one is familiar with the history of the old time Scotch fighters,—thrifty, acute and clear thinkers, who always lived upon the simplest vegetable fare. Of them Holinshead quaintly says, "In old times these North Brittons did give themselves universally to great abstinence, and in time of war their soldiers would often feed but once or twice in two or three days, especially if they held themselves in secret, or could have no issue out of their bogs and morasses, through the presence of an enemy, and in this distress they used to eat a certain kind of confection, whereof so much as a bean would qualify their hunger above common expectation." Thus we might go on to almost any extent to prove, from demonstrative evidence, the sufficiency and the superiority of vegetable nourishment alone in supporting the most vigorous health of both mind and body. In proof of the small amount of any kind of diet, and the reduced proportion of animal matter particularly, on which health can be well maintained, Dr. Bell introduces some extracts from the report of the inspector of prisons in Scotland, which exhibit the results of experiments going to establish the superiority of vegetable food. It proved not only sufficient to sustain the laborers in the prisons, but there was an actual average fattening amongst them upon its use. Eight different diets were experimented with, but we will here introduce only two of them; the one containing the greatest amount of animal matter, and the other the simplest of the strictly vegetable kind.

Breakfast.—Eight ounces of oatmeal made into porridge with a pint of buttermilk.

Dinner.—Half a pound of meat and a pound of potatoes.

Supper.—Five ounces of oat meal made into porridge with half a pint of buttermilk.

Twenty prisoners, fifteen male and five female, were put upon this diet. There was nothing remarkable in the effects of this diet upon the health of the prisoners, and "upon the whole there was a slight loss in their average weight."

Breakfast.—Two pounds of potatoes, boiled.

Dinner.—Three pounds of potatoes, boiled.

Supper.—One pound of potatoes, boiled.

A class of ten was put upon this diet. At the beginning eight were in good health, and two were in indifferent health, and at the end of the experiment, the eight continued in good health, and the two had improved, and there was an average increase in weight of nearly three and a half pounds per prisoner. "The prisoners all expressed themselves quite satisfied with this diet and regretted the change back again to the ordinary diet," (which contained animal food.) Did space permit, we could introduce an abundance of facts, derivable from the most authentic source, all going to establish the same principle, but our object is to invite inquiry and not to enforce opinions.

Statistical comparison shows the people of the United States to be the greatest consumers of food in the world. One man in our country frequently eats "at his three meals more in nutritive amount than would constitute luxurious living for eight East India or Chinese palanquin bearers for a week." We are not only large eaters, but we are fast eaters. In addition to the quantity, the time for the consumption of food by our people is surprising, the latter being however, in its brevity, in the inverse ratio of the former. Often the great hurry to dispatch a meal seems to have no other object than to give time for rest from all labor, even that of thinking for a time. "It is common enough for men in active business habits to make an onslaught upon a well furnished table for about five or ten minutes, during which time they swallow, with fearful rapidity, parts of half a dozen of dishes, and then rush out to their posts of business, as one would suppose from their haste, and immediately seat themselves with their feet thrown up and their heads back and leisurely puff their cigar, without the least possible sign of hurry or care." We feel assured that if the economy of our lives, our health, our enjoyments and the duration of our days could receive but half the attention bestowed upon our political and pecuniary affairs, there would be a reform in our dietetic habits more thorough than the recent reformation in drinking that has marked the current history of the Irish people. And why should we not attend to this matter? It is surely of the first importance. What signifies success in our political schemes or monetary affairs, if we are ourselves acting and laboring under such ailments, disorders and oppressions as to disqualify us for individual happiness?

But we have already transcended our assigned limits. We have dwelt longer upon this particular point than we had intended. We have viewed it under a sense of its universal and vital importance to individuals and to communities, and of its general and disastrous neglect amongst our people. We are satisfied that the natural organic laws of health and life, both physical and mental, are more often and seriously violated by excesses in quantity and errors in selecting the quality and kind of diet, than by the use and abuse of all our other means and privileges of life put together. And as a matter of course, the violations bring the penalties. These we suffer in the form of languor, dullness and oppression of spirits; intellectual obtuseness, organic disorder, disease and death.

In conclusion, we must admit that we have not here done our author justice in the superficial notice which we have given his book. But the work is neither too costly nor voluminous to be read by every one disposed to study the subject, and as we have already said, our object was not to teach but to point attention to the proper source for true information on the subject. If we have said enough to enlist the reader's interest in the matter so far as to induce him to give it a careful examination and a just consideration, with the aids which Dr. Bell and other writers on the subject have furnished, we have attained our highest object.

LOVE OF COUNTRY.

BY LEWIS J. CIST.

"Wherever, oh! man! God's sun first beamed upon thee—where the stars of Heaven first shone above thee—where his lightnings first declared his omnipotence, and his storm-wind shook thy soul with pious awe—there are thy affections—there is thy Country!

"Where the first human eye bent lovingly over thy cradle—where thy mother first bore thee joyfully on her bosom—where thy father engraved the words of wisdom on thy heart—there are thy affections—there is thy Country!"—ARNDT.

I.

Where'er, O man! thou first imbibed
Thy vital, Godlike spark of life—
Where first with feelings undescribed
Thy dawning intellect was rife—
Where'er the glorious light of Heaven
Athwart thy vision first did gleam—
Where first the starry gems of even Shed o'er thy steps their gentle beam—
Wherever else those steps may roam,
That is THY COUNTRY—there THY HOME!

II.

Where first thy God his power displayed
In awful glory through the skies—
Where rolled his thunders o'er thy head,
His lightning flashed before thine eyes—
Where first he stood to thee declared
God of the whirlwind and the storm—
Where first his awful power appeared
Omnipotent to bless or harm—
Wherever else thy steps may roam,
That is THY COUNTRY—there THY HOME!

III.

Where first, to watch thy peaceful rest,
Kind eyes and loving hearts bent o'er thee—
Where first, upon a mother's breast
With joy and pride thy mother bore thee—
Where met thine opening eye and ear
Bright skies and joyous song of birds—
Where first thy father's pious care
On thy young heart graved Wisdom's words—
Wherever else thy steps may roam,
That is THY COUNTRY—there THY HOME!

IV.

And, though it were a desert—yet
Dear to thy heart that spot shall prove;
That Home thou never canst forget—
That Country never cease to love:

And wheresoe'er thy steps may turn,
Oh! restless wanderer o'er the earth,
With love thy bosom still shall burn
For that dear land that gave thee birth—
Wherever else thy steps may roam,
That is THY COUNTRY—there THY HOME!

THE LITERARY LIFE OF THINGUM BOB, ESQ.,

LATE EDITOR OF THE "GOOSETHERUMFOODLE."

BY HIMSELF.

Edgar A. Poe.
I am now growing in years, and—since I understand that Shakspeare and Mr. Emmons are deceased—it is not impossible that I may even die. It has occurred to me, therefore, that I may as well retire from the field of Letters and repose upon my laurels. But I am ambitious of signalizing my abdication of the literary sceptre by some important bequest to posterity; and, perhaps, I cannot do a better thing than just pen for it an account of my earlier career. My name, indeed, has been so long and so constantly before the public eye, that I am not only willing to admit the naturalness of the interest which it has every where excited, but ready to satisfy the extreme curiosity which it has inspired. In fact it is no more than the duty of him who achieves greatness, to leave behind him, in his ascent, such landmarks as may guide others to be great. I propose, therefore, in the present paper, (which I had some idea of calling "Memoranda to serve for the Literary History of America.") to give a detail to those important, yet feeble and tottering first steps, by which, at length, I attained the high road to the pinnacle of human renown.

Of one's very remote ancestors it is superfluous to say much. My father, Thomas Bob, Esq., stood for many years at the summit of his profession, which was that of a merchant-barber, in the city of Smug. His warehouse was the resort of all the principal people of the place, and especially of the editorial corps—a body which inspires all about it with profound veneration and awe. For my own part, I regarded them as gods, and drank in with avidity the rich wit and wisdom which continuously flowed from their august mouths during the process of what is styled "lather." My first moment of positive inspiration, however, must be dated from that ever-memorable epoch, when the brilliant conductor of the "Gad-Fly," in the intervals of the important process just mentioned, recited aloud, before a conclave of our apprentices, an inimitable poem in honor of the "Only Genuine Oil-of-Bob," (so called from its talented inventor, my father,) and for which effusion the editor of the "Fly" was remunerated with a regal liberality, by the firm of Thomas Bob and company, merchant-barbers.

The genius of the stanzas to the "Oil-of-Bob" first breathed into me, I say, the divine afflatus. I resolved at once to become a great man and to commence by becoming a great poet. That very evening I fell upon my knees at the feet of my father.

"Father," I said, "pardon me—but I have a soul above lather. It is my firm intention to cut the shop. I would be an editor—I would be a poet—I would pen stanzas to the 'Oil-of-Bob.' Pardon me and aid me to be great."

"My dear Thingum," replied my father, (I had been christened Thingum after a wealthy relative so surnamed.) "My dear Thingum," he said, raising me from my knees by the ears—"Thingum, my boy, you're a trump, and take after your father in having a soul. You have an immense head, too, and it must hold a great many brains. This I have long seen and therefore had thoughts of making you a lawyer. The business, however, has grown ungenteeled, and that of a politician don't pay. Upon the whole you judge wisely;—the trade of the editor is best;—and if you can be a poet at the same time,—as most of the editors are, by the by,—why you will kill two birds with one stone. To encourage you in the beginning of things I will allow you a garret; pen, ink and paper; a rhyming dictionary; and a copy of the 'Gad-Fly.' I suppose you would scarcely demand any more."

"I would be an ungrateful villain if I did," I replied with enthusiasm. "Your generosity is boundless. I will repay it by making you the father of a genius."

Thus ended my conference with the best of men, and, immediately upon its termination, I betook myself with zeal to my poetical labors; as upon these, chiefly, I founded my hopes of ultimate elevation to the editorial chair.

In my initial attempts at composition I found the stanzas to "The Oil-of-Bob," rather a draw back than otherwise. Their splendor more dazzled than enlightened me. The contemplation of their excellence tended, naturally, to discourage me by comparison with my own abortions; so that for a long time I labored in vain. At length there came into my head one of those exquisitely original ideas which now and then will permeate the brain of a man of genius. It was this:—or, rather, thus was it carried into execution. From the rubbish of an old book-stall, in a very remote corner of the town, I got together several antique and altogether unknown or forgotten volumes. The bookseller sold them to me for a song. From one of these, which purported to be a translation of one Dante's "Inferno," I copied, with remarkable neatness, a long passage about a man named Ugolino, who had a parcel of brats. From another which contained a good many odd plays by some person whose name I forget, I extracted in the same manner, and with the same care, a great number of lines about "angels" and "ministers saying grace," and "goblins damned," and more besides of that sort. From a third, which was the composition of some blind man or other, either a Greek or a Choctaw—I cannot be at the pains of remembering every trifle exactly—I took about fifty verses beginning with "Achilles' wrath," and "grease," and something else. From a fourth, which I recollect was also the work of a blind man, I selected a page or two all about "hail" and "holy light;" and although a blind man has no business to write about light, still the verses were sufficiently good in their way.

Having made fair copies of these poems I signed every one of them "Oppodeldoc," (a fine sonorous name,) and, doing each up nicely in a separate envelope, I despatched one to each of the four principal Magazines, with a request for speedy insertion and prompt pay. The result of this well-conceived plan, however, (the success of which would have saved me much trouble in after life,) served to convince me that some editors are not to be bamboozled, and gave the coup-de-grace, (as we say in France,) to my nascent hopes, (as they say in the city of the transcendentials.)

The fact is, that each and every one of the Magazines in question, gave Mr. "Oppodeldoc" a complete using-up, in the "Monthly Notices to Correspondents." The "Hum-Drum" gave him a dressing after this fashion:

"'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) has sent us along tirade concerning a bedlamite whom he styles 'Ugolino,' and who had a great many children who should have been all well whipped and sent to bed without their suppers. The whole affair is exceedingly tame—not to say flat. 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) is entirely devoid of imagination—and imagination, in our humble opinion, is not only the soul of true Poesy, but also its very heart, and, (if we may so express ourselves,) its very gizzard. 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) has the audacity to demand of us, for this twattle, a 'speedy insertion and prompt pay.' We neither insert nor purchase any stuff of the sort. There can be no doubt, however, that he would meet with a ready sale for all the balderdash he can scribble, at the office of either the 'Rowdy-Dow,' the 'Lollipop,' or the 'Goosetherumfoodle.'"

All this, it must be acknowledged, was very severe upon "Oppodeldoc"—but the unkindest cut was the putting the word Poesy in small caps. In those five preëminent letters what a world of bitterness is there not involved!

But "Oppodeldoc" was punished with equal severity in the "Rowdy-dow."

"We have received," said that periodical, "a most singular and insolent communication from a person, (whoever he is,) signing himself 'Oppodeldoc'—thus desecrating the greatness of the illustrious Roman Emperor so named. Accompanying the letter of 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) we had sundry lines of most disgusting and unmeaning rant about 'angels and ministers of grace'—rant such as no madman short of a Nat Lee, or an 'Oppodeldoc,' could possibly perpetrate. And for this trash of trash, we are modestly requested to 'pay promptly.' No sir—no! We pay for nothing of that sort. Apply to the 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Lollipop,' or the 'Goosetherumfoodle.' These periodicals will undoubtedly accept any literary offal you may send them—and as undoubtedly promise to pay for it."

This was bitter indeed upon poor "Oppodeldoc;" but, in this instance, the weight of the satire falls upon the "Hum-Drum," the "Lollipop," and the "Goosetherumfoodle," who are pungently styled "periodicals"—in Italics, too—a thing that must have cut them to the heart.

Scarcely less savage was the "Lollipop."

"Some individual," said that journal, "who rejoices in the appellation 'Oppodeldoc,' (to what low uses are the names of the illustrious dead too often applied!) has enclosed us some fifty or sixty verses, commencing after this fashion:

Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring
Of woes unnumbered, &c., &c., &c., &c.

'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) is respectfully informed that there is not a printer's devil in our office who is not in the daily habit of composing better lines. Those of 'Oppodeldoc' will not scan. 'Oppodeldoc' should learn to count. But why he should have conceived the idea that we, (of all others, we!) would disgrace our pages with his ineffable nonsense, is utterly beyond comprehension. Why, the absurd twattle is scarcely good enough for the 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Rowdy-Dow,' the 'Goosetherumfoodle'—things that are in the practice of publishing 'Mother Goose's Melodies' as original lyrics. And 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) has even the assurance to demand pay for his drivel. Does 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) know—is he aware that we could not be paid to insert it?"

As I perused this I felt myself growing gradually smaller and smaller, and when I came to the point at which the editor sneered at the poem as "verses," there was little more than an ounce of me left. As for "Oppodeldoc" I began to experience compassion for the poor fellow. But the "Goosetherumfoodle" showed, if possible, even less mercy than the "Lollipop."

"A wretched poetaster," said that eminent publication, "who signs himself 'Oppodeldoc,' is silly enough to fancy that we will print and pay for a medley of incoherent and ungrammatical bombast which he has transmitted to us, and which commences with the following most intelligible line:

"Hail, Holy Light! Offspring of Heaven, first born, we say 'most intelligible.' 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) will be kind enough to tell us, perhaps, how 'hail' can be 'holy light.' We always regarded it as frozen rain. Will he inform us, also, how frozen rain can be, at one and the same time, both 'holy light,' (whatever that is,) and an 'offspring?'—which latter term, (if we understand any thing about English,) is only employed with propriety, in reference to small babies of about six weeks old. But it is preposterous to descant upon such absurdity—although 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) has the unparalleled effrontery to suppose that we will not only 'insert' his ignorant ravings, but (absolutely!) pay for them!

"Now this is fine—it is rich!—and we have half a mind to punish this young scribbler for his egotism, by really publishing his effusion, verbatim et literatim, as he has written it. We could inflict upon him no punishment so severe, and we would inflict it, but for the boredom which we should cause our readers in so doing.

"Let 'Oppodeldoc,' (whoever he is,) send any future composition of like character to the 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Lollipop,' or the 'Rowdy-Dow.' They will 'insert' it. They 'insert,' every month just such stuff. Send it to them. WE are not to be insulted with impunity."

This made an end of me; and as for the "Hum-Drum," the "Rowdy-Dow" and the "Lollipop," I never could comprehend how they survived it. The putting them in the smallest possible minion, (that was the rub—thereby insinuating their lowness—their baseness,) while the WE stood looking down upon them in gigantic capitals!—oh it was too bitter!—it was wormwood—it was gall. Had I been either of these periodicals I would have spared no pains to have the "Goosetherumfoodle" prosecuted. It might have been done under the Act for the "Prevention of Cruelty to Animals." As for "Oppodeldoc," (whoever he was,) I had by this time lost all patience with the fellow, and sympathized with him no longer. He was a fool, beyond doubt, (whoever he was,) and got not a kick more than he deserved.

The result of my experiment with the old books, convinced me, in the first place, that "honesty is the best policy," and, in the second, that if I could not write better than Mr. Dante, and the two blind men, and the rest of the old set, it would, at least, be a difficult matter to write worse. I took heart, therefore, and determined to prosecute the "entirely original," (as they say on the covers of the Magazines,) at whatever cost of study and pains. I again placed before my eyes, as a model, the brilliant stanzas on "The Oil-of-Bob," by the editor of the "Gad-Fly," and resolved to construct an ode on the same sublime theme, in rivalry of what had already been done.

With my first verses I had no material difficulty. It ran thus:

To pen an Ode upon the "Oil-of-Bob."

Having carefully looked out, however, all the legitimate rhymes to "Bob," I found it impossible to proceed. In this dilemma I had recourse to paternal aid; and, after some hours of mature thought, my father and myself thus constructed the poem:

To pen an Ode upon the "Oil-of-Bob"
Is all sorts of a job.

(Signed,)

SNOB.

To be sure this composition was of no very great length—but I "have yet to learn," as they say in the Edinburgh Review, that the mere extent of a literary work has any thing to do with its merit.

As for the Quarterly cant about "sustained effort," and all that species of thing, it is impossible to see the sense of it. Upon the whole, therefore, I was satisfied with the success of my maiden attempt; and now the only question regarded the disposal I should make of it. My father suggested that I should send it to the "Gad-Fly"—but there were two reasons which operated to prevent me from so doing. I dreaded the jealousy of the editor—and I had ascertained that he did not pay for original contributions. I therefore, after due deliberation, consigned the article to the more dignified pages of the "Lollipop," and awaited the event in anxiety, but with resignation.

In the very next published number I had the proud satisfaction of seeing my poem printed at length, as the leading article, with the following significant words, prefixed in italics and between brackets:

[We call the attention of our readers to the subjoined admirable stanzas on the "Oil-of-Bob." We need say nothing of their sublimity, or of their pathos:—it is impossible to peruse them without tears. Those who have been nauseated with a sad dose on the same august topic from the goose-quill of the editor of the "Gad-Fly," will do well to compare the two compositions.]

P. S. We are consumed with anxiety to probe the mystery which envelopes the evident pseudonym "Snob." May we not hope for a personal interview?]

All this was scarcely more than justice, but it was, I confess, rather more than I had expected:—I acknowledge this, be it observed, to the everlasting disgrace of my country and of mankind. I lost no time, however, in calling upon the editor of the "Lollipop," and had the good fortune to find this gentleman at home. He saluted me with an air of profound respect, slightly blended with a fatherly and patronizing admiration, wrought in him, no doubt, by my appearance of extreme youth and inexperience. Begging me to be seated, he entered at once upon the subject of my poem;—but modesty will ever forbid me to repeat the thousand compliments which he lavished upon it. The eulogies of Mr. Crab, (such was the editor's name,) were, however, by no means fulsomely indiscriminate. He analyzed my composition with much freedom and great ability—not hesitating to point out a few trivial defects—a circumstance which elevated him highly in my esteem. The rival production of the editor of the "Gad-Fly" was, of course, brought upon the tapis, and I hope never to be subjected to a criticism so searching, or to rebukes so withering, as were bestowed by Mr. Crab upon that unhappy effusion. I had been accustomed to regard the editor of the "Gad-Fly" as something superhuman; but Mr. Crab soon disabused me of that idea. He set the literary as well as the personal character of the Fly, (so Mr. C. satirically designated the rival editor,) in its true light. He, the Fly, was very little better than he should be. He had written infamous things. He was a penny-a-liner, and a buffoon. He was a villain. He had composed a tragedy which set the whole country in a guffaw, and a farce which deluged the universe in tears. Besides all this, he had had the impudence to pen what he meant for a lampoon upon himself, (Mr. Crab,) and the temerity to style him "an ass." Should I at any time wish to express my opinion of Mr. Fly, the pages of the "Lollipop," Mr. Crab assured me, were at my unlimited disposal. In the meantime, as it was very certain that I would be attacked in the Fly for my attempt at composing a rival poem on "The Oil-of-Bob," he, (Mr. Crab,) would take it upon himself to attend, pointedly, to my private and personal interests. If I were not made a man of at once, it should not be the fault of himself, (Mr. Crab.)

Mr. Crab having now paused in his discourse, (the latter portion of which I found it impossible to comprehend,) I ventured to suggest something in reference to the remuneration which I had been taught to expect for my poem, by an announcement on the cover of the "Lollipop," declaring that it, (the "Lollipop,") "insisted upon being permitted to pay exorbitant prices for all accepted contributions;—frequently expending more money for a single brief poem than the whole annual cost of the 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Rowdy-Dow' and the 'Goose-therumfoodle' combined."

As I mentioned the word "remuneration," Mr. Crab first opened his eyes, and then his mouth, to quite a remarkable extent; causing his personal appearance to resemble that of a highly-agitated elderly duck in the act of quacking;—and in this condition he remained, (ever and anon pressing his hands tightly to his forehead, as if in a state of desperate bewilderment,) until I had fairly made an end of what I had to say.

Upon my conclusion, he sank back in his seat, as if much overcome, letting his arms fall lifelessly by his side, but keeping his mouth still rigorously open, after the fashion of the duck. While I remained in speechless astonishment at behavior so alarming, he suddenly leaped to his feet and made a rush at the bell-rope; but just as he reached this he appeared to have altered his intention, whatever it was, for he dived under a table and immediately re-appeared with a cudgel. This he was in the act of uplifting, (for what purpose I am at a loss to imagine,) when, all at once, there came a benign smile over his features, and he sank placidly back in his chair.

"Mr. Bob," he said, (for I had sent up my card before ascending myself,) "Mr. Bob, you are a young man, I presume—very?"

I assented; adding that I had not yet concluded my third lustrum.

"Ah!" he replied, "very good! I see how it is—say no more. Touching this matter of compensation, what you observe is very proper and very just: in fact it is excessively so. But—ah—ah—the first contribution—the first, I say—it is never the Magazine custom to pay for—you comprehend, eh? The truth is, we are usually the recipients in such case." [Mr. Crab smiled blandly as he emphasized the word "recipients."] "For the most part, we are paid for the insertion of a maiden attempt—especially in verse. In the second place, Mr. Bob, the Magazine rule is never to disburse what we term in France the argent comptant:—I have no doubt you understand. In a quarter or two after publication of the article—or in a year or two—we make no objection to giving our note at nine months:—provided always that we can so arrange our affairs as to be quite certain of a 'burst-up' in six. I really do hope, Mr. Bob, that you will look upon this explanation as satisfactory." Here Mr. Crab concluded, and the tears positively stood in his eyes.

Grieved to the soul at having been, however innocently, the cause of pain to so eminent and so sensitive a man, I hastened to apologize and to reassure him, by expressing my perfect coincidence with his views, as well as my entire appreciation of the delicacy of his position. Having done all this in a neat speech, I took leave.

One fine morning, very shortly afterwards, "I awoke and found myself famous." The extent of my renown will be best estimated by reference to the editorial opinions of the day. These opinions, it will be seen, were embodied in critical notices of the number of the "Lollipop" containing my poem, and are perfectly satisfactory, conclusive and clear, with the exception, perhaps, of the hieroglyphical marks, "Sep. 15—1 t." appended to each of the critiques.

The "Owl," a journal of profound sagacity, and well known for the deliberate gravity of its literary decisions—the "Owl," I say, spoke as follows:

"THE LOLLIPOP!" The October number of this delicious Magazine surpasses its predecessors, and sets competition at defiance. In the beauty of its typography and paper—in the number and excellence of its steel plates—as well as in the literary merit of its contributions—the 'Lollipop' compares with its slow-paced rivals as Hyperion with a Satyr. The 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Rowdy-Dow,' and the 'Goosetherumfoodle,' excel, it is true, in braggadocio, but, in all other points, give us the 'Lollipop.' How this celebrated journal can sustain its evidently tremendous expenses, is more than we can understand. To be sure, it has a circulation of 100,000, and its subscription-list has increased one fourth during the last month; but, on the other hand, the sums it disburses constantly for contributions are inconceivable. It is reported that Mr. Slyass received no less than thirty-seven and a half cents for his inimitable paper on 'Pigs.' With Mr. CRAB, as editor, and with such names upon the list of contributors as SNOB and Slyass, there can be no such word as 'fail' for the 'Lollipop.' Go and subscribe. Sep. 15—1 t."

I must say that I was gratified with this heightened notice from a paper so respectable as the "Owl." The placing my name—that is to say my nom de guerre—in priority of station to that of the great Slyass, was a compliment as happy as I felt it to be deserved.

My attention was next arrested by these paragraphs in the "Toad"—a print highly distinguished for its uprightness, independence—for its entire freedom from sycophancy and subservience to the givers of dinners.

"The 'Lollipop' for October is out in advance of all its contemporaries, and infinitely surpasses them, of course, in the splendor of its embellishments, as well as in the richness of its literary contents. The 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Rowdy-Dow,' and the 'Goosetherumfoodle' excel, we admit, in braggadocio, but, in all other points, give us the 'Lollipop.' How this celebrated Magazine can sustain its evidently tremendous expenses, is more than we can understand. To be sure, it has a circulation of 200,000, and its subscription list has increased one third during the last fortnight, but, on the other hand, the sums it disburses, monthly, for contributions, are fearfully great. We learn that Mr. Mumblethumb received no less than fifty cents for his late 'Monody in a Mud-Puddle.'

"Among the original contributors to the present number we notice, (besides the eminent editor, Mr. CRAB,) such men as SNOB, Slyass, and Mumblethumb. Apart from the editorial matter, the most valuable paper, nevertheless, is, we think, a poetical gem by 'Snob,' on the 'Oil-of-Bob'—but our readers must not suppose, from the title of this incomparable bijou, that it bears any similitude to some balderdash on the same subject by a certain contemptible individual whose name is unmentionable to ears polite. The present poem 'On the Oil-of-Bob' has excited universal anxiety and curiosity in respect to the owner of the evident pseudonym, 'Snob'—a curiosity which, happily, we have it in our power to satisfy. 'Snob' is the nom-de-plume of Mr. Thingum Bob, of this city,—a relative of the great Mr. Thingum, (after whom he is named,) and otherwise connected with the most illustrious families of the State. His father, Thomas Bob, Esq., is an opulent merchant in Smug. Sep. 15—1t."

This generous approbation touched me to the heart—the more especially as it emanated from a source so avowedly—so proverbially pure as the "Toad." The word "balderdash," as applied to the "Oil-of-Bob" of the Fly, I considered singularly pungent and appropriate. The words "gem" and "bijou," however, used in reference to my own composition, struck me as being, in some degree, feeble. They seemed to me to be deficient in force. They were not sufficiently prononcés, (as we have it in France.)

I had hardly finished reading the "Toad," when a friend placed in my hands a copy of the "Mole," a daily, enjoying high reputation for the keenness of its perception about matters in general, and for the open, honest, above-ground style of its editorials. The "Mole" spoke of the "Lollipop" as follows:

"We have just received the 'Lollipop' for October, and must say that never before have we perused any single number of any periodical which afforded us a felicity so supreme. We speak advisedly. The 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Rowdy-Dow' and the 'Goosetherumfuddle' must look well to their laurels. These prints, no doubt, surpass every thing in loudness of pretension, but, in all other points, give us the 'Lollipop.' How this celebrated Magazine can sustain its evidently tremendous expenses, is more than we can comprehend. To be sure, it has a circulation of 300,000; and its subscription-list has increased one half within the last week, but then the sum it disburses, monthly, for contributions, is astoundingly enormous. We have it upon good authority, that Mr. Fatquack received no less than sixty-two cents and a half for his late Domestic Nouvelette, the 'Dish-Clout.'

"The contributors to the number before us are CRAB, (the eminent editor,) SNOB, Mumblethump, Fatquack and others; but, after the inimitable compositions of the editor himself, we prefer a diamond-like effusion from the pen of the rising poet who writes over the signature 'Snob'—a nom de guerre which we predict will one day extinguish the radiance of 'Boz.' 'Snob,' we learn, is a Mr. THINGUM BOB, sole heir of a wealthy merchant of this city, Thomas Bob, Esq., and a near relative of the distinguished Mr. Thingum. The title of Mr. B.'s admirable poem is the 'Oil-of-Bob'—a somewhat unfortunate name, by the bye, as some contemptible vagabond connected with the penny press has already disgusted the town with a great deal of drivel upon the same topic. There will be no danger, however, of confounding the two compositions. Sep. 15—1t."

The generous approbation of so clear-sighted a journal as the "Mole" penetrated my soul with delight. The only objection which occurred to me was, that the terms "contemptible vagabond" might have been better written "odious and contemptible, wretch, villain and vagabond." This would have sounded more gracefully, I think. "Diamond-like," also, was scarcely, it will be admitted, of sufficient intensity to express what the "Mole" evidently thought of the brilliancy of the "Oil-of-Bob."

On the same afternoon in which I saw these notices in the "Owl," the "Toad," and the "Mole," I happened to meet with a copy of the "Daddy-Long-Legs," a periodical proverbial for the extreme extent as well as solidity of its understanding. And it was the "Daddy-Long-Legs" which spoke thus:

"The 'Lollipop'!! This gorgeous Magazine is already before the public for October. The question of preëminence is forever put to rest, and hereafter it will be excessively preposterous in the 'Hum-Drum,' the 'Rowdy-Dow,' or the 'Goosetherumfuddle,' to make any farther spasmodic attempts at competition. These journals may excel the 'Lollipop' in outcry, but, in all other points, give us the 'Lollipop.' How this celebrated Magazine can sustain its evidently tremendous expenses, is past comprehension. To be sure it has a circulation of precisely half a million, and its subscription-list has increased seventy-five per cent. within the last couple of days: but then the sum it disburses, monthly, for contributions, are scarcely credible; we are cognizant of the fact, that Mademoiselle Cribalittle received no less than eighty-seven cents and a half for her late valuable Revolutionary Tale, entitled 'The York-Town Katy-Did, and the Bunker-Hill Katy-Did'nt.'

"The most able papers in the present number, are, of course, those furnished by the editor, (the eminent Mr. CRAB,) but there are numerous magnificent contributions from such names as SNOB; Mademoiselle Cribalittle; Slyas; Mrs. Fibalittle; Mumblethump; Mrs. Squibalittle; and last, though not least, Fatquack. The world may well be challenged to produce so rich a galaxy of genius.

"The poem over the signature 'SNOB' is, we find, attracting universal commendation, and, we are constrained to say, deserves, if possible, even more applause than it has received. The 'Oil-of-Bob' is the title of this masterpiece of eloquence and art. One or two of our readers may have a very faint, although sufficiently disgusting recollection of a poem (!) similarly entitled, the perpetration of a miserable penny-a-liner mendicant and cut-throat, connected in the capacity of scullion, we believe, with one of the indecent prints about the purlieus of the city; we beg them, for God's sake, not to confound the two compositions. The author of the 'Oil-of-Bob' is, we hear, THINGUM Bob, Esq., a gentleman of high genius, and a scholar. 'Snob' is merely a nom-de-guerre. Sep. 15—1 t."

I could scarcely restrain my indignation while I perused the concluding portions of this diatribe. It was clear to me that the yea-nay manner—not to say the gentleness—the positive forbearance with which the "Daddy-Long-Legs" spoke of that pig, the editor of the "Gad-Fly"—it was evident to me, I say, that this gentleness of speech could proceed from nothing else than a partiality for the Fly—whom it was clearly the intention of the "Daddy-Long-Legs" to elevate into reputation at my expense. Any one, indeed, might perceive, with half an eye, that, had the real design of the "Daddy" been what it wished to appear, it, (the "Daddy,") might have expressed itself in terms more direct, more pungent, and altogether more to the purpose. The words "penny-a-liner," "mendicant," "scullion," and "cut-throat," were epithets so intentionally inexpressive and equivocal, as to be worse than nothing when applied to the author of the very worst stanzas ever penned by one of the human race. We all know what is meant by "damning with faint praise," and, on the other hand, who could fail seeing through the covert purpose of the "Daddy"—that of glorifying with feeble abuse?

What the "Daddy" chose to say of the Fly, however, was no business of mine. What it said of myself was. After the noble manner in which the "Owl," the "Toad," the "Mole," had expressed themselves in respect to my ability, it was rather too much to be coolly spoken of by a thing like the "Daddy-Long-Legs," as merely "a gentleman of high genius and a scholar." Gentleman indeed! I made up my mind, at once, either to get a written apology from the "Daddy-Long-Legs," or to call it out.

Full of this purpose, I looked about me to find a friend whom I could entrust with a message to his Daddyship, and, as the editor of the "Lollipop" had given me marked tokens of regard, I at length concluded to seek his assistance upon the present occasion.

I have never yet been able to account, in a manner satisfactory to my own understanding, for the very peculiar countenance and demeanor with which Mr. Crab listened to me, as I unfolded to him my design. He again went through the scene of the bell-rope and the cudgel, and did not omit the duck. At one period I thought he really intended to quack. His fit, nevertheless, finally subsided as before, and he began to act and speak in a rational way. He declined bearing the cartel, however, and in fact, dissuaded me from sending it at all; but was candid enough to admit that the "Daddy-Long-Legs" had been disgracefully in the wrong—more especially in what related to the epithets "gentleman and scholar."

Towards the end of this interview with Mr. Crabb, who really appeared to take a paternal interest in my welfare, he suggested to me that I might turn an honest penny and, at the same time, materially advance my reputation, by occasionally playing Thomas Hawk for the "Lollipop."

I begged Mr. Crab to inform me who was Mr. Thomas Hawk, and how it was expected that I should play him.

Here Mr. Crab again "made great eyes," (as we say in Germany,) but at length, recovering himself from a profound attack of astonishment, he assured me that he employed the words "Thomas Hawk" to avoid the colloquialism, Tommy, which was low—but that the true idea was Tommy Hawk—or tomahawk—and that by "playing tomahawk" he referred to scalping, brow-beating and otherwise using-up the herd of poor-devil authors.

I assured my patron that, if this was all, I was perfectly resigned to the task of playing Thomas Hawk. Hereupon, Mr. Crab desired me to use-up the editor of the "Gad-Fly" forthwith, in the fiercest style within the scope of my ability, and as a specimen of my powers. This I did, upon the spot, in a review of the original "Oil-of-Bob," occupying thirty-six pages of the "Lollipop." I found playing Thomas Hawk, indeed, a far less onerous occupation than poetizing; for I went upon system altogether, and thus it was easy to do the thing thoroughly and well. My practice was this. I bought auction-copies (cheap) of "Lord Brougham's Speeches," "Cobbett's Complete Works," the "New Slang-Syllabus," the "Whole Art of Snubbing," "Bennett's Billingsgate," (folio edition,) "Prentice's Porcupiniana," and "John Neal on Tongue." These works I cut up thoroughly with a curry-comb, and then, throwing the shreds into a sieve, sifted out carefully all that might be thought decent, (a mere trifle); reserving the hard phrases, which I threw into a large tin pepper-castor with longitudinal holes, so that an entire sentence could get through without material injury. The mixture was then ready for use. When called upon to play Thomas Hawk, I anointed a sheet of foolscap with the white of a gander's egg; then, shredding the thing to be reviewed as I had previously shredded the books,—only with more care, so as to get every word separate—I threw the latter shreds in with the former, screwed on the lid of the castor, gave it a shake, and so dusted out the mixture upon the egg'd foolscap; where it stuck. The effect was beautiful to behold. It was captivating. Indeed the reviews I brought to pass by this simple expedient have never been approached, and were the wonder of the world. At first, through bashfulness—the result of inexperience—I was a little put out by a certain inconsistency—a certain air of the bizarre, (as we say in France,) worn by the composition as a whole. All the phrases did not fit, (as we say in the Anglo-Saxon,)

Many were quite awry. Some, even, were upside-down; and there were none of them which were not, in some measure, injured, in regard to effect, by this latter species of accident, when it occurred:—with the exception of Mr. John Neal's paragraphs, which were so vigorous, and altogether stout, that they seemed not particularly disconcerted by any extreme of position, but looked equally happy and satisfactory, whether on their heads, or on their heels.

What became of the editor of the "Gad-Fly," after the publication of my criticism on his "Oil-of-Bob," it is somewhat difficult to determine. The most reasonable conclusion is, that he wept himself to death. At all events he disappeared instantaneously from the face of the earth, and no man has seen even the ghost of him since.

This matter having been properly accomplished, and the Furies appeased, I grew at once into high favor with Mr. Crab. He took me into his confidence, gave me a permanent situation as Thomas Hawk of the "Lollipop," and as, for the present, he could afford me no salary, allowed me to profit at discretion, by his advice.

"My Dear Thingum," said he to me one day after dinner, "I respect your abilities and love you as a son. You shall be my heir. When I die I will bequeath you the 'Lollipop.' In the meantime I will make a man of you—I will—provided always that you follow my counsel. The first thing to do is to get rid of the old bore."

"Boar?" said I inquiringly—"pig, eh?—aper, (as we say in Latin?)—who?—where?"

"Your father," said he.

"Precisely," I replied,—"pig."

"You have your fortune to make, Thingum," resumed Mr. Crab, "and that governor of yours is a millstone about your neck. We must cut him at once." Here I took out my knife. "We must cut him," continued Mr. Crab, "decidedly and forever. He won't do—he won't. Upon second thoughts, you had better kick him, or cane him, or something of that kind."

"What do you say," I suggested modestly, "to my kicking him in the first instance, caning him afterwards, and winding up by tweaking his nose?"

Mr. Crab looked at me musingly for some moments, and then answered:

"I think, Mr. Bob, that what you propose would answer sufficiently well—indeed remarkably well—that is to say, as far as it went—but barbers are exceedingly hard to cut, and I think, upon the whole, that, having performed upon Thomas Bob the operations you suggest, it would be advisable to blacken, with your fists, both his eyes, very carefully and thoroughly, to prevent his ever seeing you again in fashionable promenades. After doing this, I really do not perceive that you can do any more. However—it might be just as well to roll him over once or twice in the gutter, and then put him in charge of the police. Any time the next morning you can call at the watch-house and swear an assault."

I was much affected by the kindness of feeling towards me personally, which was evinced in this excellent advice of Mr. Crab, and I did not fail to profit by it forthwith. The result was, that I got rid of the old bore, and began to feel a little independent and gentleman-like. The want of money, however, was, for a few weeks, a source of some discomfort; but at length, by carefully putting to use my two eyes, and observing how matters went just in front of my nose, I perceived how the thing was to be brought about. I say "thing"—be it observed—for they tell me the Latin for it is rem. By the way, talking of Latin, can any one tell me what is the meaning of quocunque—or what is the meaning of modo?

My plan was exceedingly simple. I bought, for a song, a sixteenth of the "Snapping-Turtle:"—that was all. The thing was done, and I put money in my purse. There were some trivial arrangements afterwards, to be sure; but these formed no portion of the plan. They were a consequence—a result. For example, I bought pen, ink and paper, and put them into furious activity. Having thus completed a Magazine article, I gave it, for appellation, "FOL-LOL, by the Author of 'OIL-OF-BOB,'" and enveloped it to the "Goosetherumfoodle." That journal, however, having pronounced it "twattle" in the "Monthly Notices to Correspondents," I reheaded the paper "Hey-Diddle-Diddle" by THINGUM BOB, Esq., Author of the Ode on 'The Oil-of-Bob,' and Editor of the 'Snapping-Turtle.'" With this amendment, I re-enclosed it to the "Goosetherumfoodle," and, while I awaited a reply, published daily, in the "Turtle," six columns of what may be termed philosophical and analytical investigation of the literary merits of the "Goosetherumfoodle," as well as of the personal turpitude of the editor of the "Goosetherumfoodle." At the end of a week the "Goosetherumfoodle" discovered that it had, by some odd mistake, "confounded a stupid article, headed 'Hey-Diddle-Diddle' and composed by some unknown ignoramus, with a gem of resplendent lustre similarly entitled, the work of Thingum Bob, Esq., the celebrated author of the 'Oil-of-Bob.'" The "Goosetherumfoodle" deeply "regretted this very natural accident," and promised, moreover, as insertion of the genuine 'Hey-Diddle-Diddle' in the very next number of the Magazine.

The fact is I thought—I really thought—I thought at the time—I thought then—and have no reason for thinking otherwise now—that the "Goosetherumfoodle" did make a mistake. With the best intentions in the world, I never knew any thing that made as many singular mistakes as the "Goosetherumfoodle." From that day I took a liking to the "Goosetherumfoodle," and the result was I soon saw into the very depths of its literary merits, and did not fail to expatiate upon them, in the "Turtle," whenever a fitting opportunity occurred. And it is to be regarded as a very peculiar coincidence—as one of those positively remarkable coincidences which set a man to serious thinking—that just such a total revolution of opinion—just such entire bouleversement, (as we say in French,)—just such thorough topsiturviness, (if I may be permitted to employ a rather forcible term of the Choctaws,) as happened, pro and con, between myself on the one part, and the "Goosetherumfoodle" on the other, did actually again happen, in a brief period afterwards, and with precisely similar circumstances, in the case of myself and the "Rowdy-Dow," and in the case of myself and the "Hum-Drum."

Thus it was that, by a master-stroke of genius, I at length consummated my triumphs by "putting money in my purse;" and thus may be said really and fairly to have commenced that brilliant and eventful career which rendered me illustrious, and which now enables me to say, with Chateaubriand, "I have made history"—"J'ai fait l'histoire."

I have indeed "made history." From the bright epoch which I now record, my actions—my works—are the property of mankind. They are familiar to the world. It is, then, needless for me to detail how, soaring rapidly, I fell heir to the "Lollipop"—how I merged this journal in the "Hum-Drum"—how again I made purchase of the "Rowdy-Dow," thus combining the three periodicals—how, lastly, I effected a bargain for the sole remaining rival, and united all the literature of the country in one magnificent Magazine, known every where as the

"Rowdy-Dow, Lollipop, Hum-Drum, and

GOOSE THERUMFOODLE."

Yes; I have made history. My fame is universal. It extends to the uttermost ends of the earth. You cannot take up a common newspaper in which you shall not see some allusion to the immortal THINGUM BOB. It is Mr. Thingum Bob said so, and Mr. Thingum Bob wrote this, and Mr. Thingum Bob did that. But I am meek and expire with an humble heart. After all, what is it?—this indescribable something which men will persist in terming "genius?" I agree with Buffon—with Hogarth—it is but diligence after all.

Look at me!—how I labored—how I toiled—how I wrote! Ye Gods, did I not write? I knew not the word "ease." By day I adhered to my desk, and at night, a pale student, I consumed the midnight oil. You should have seen me—you should. I leaned to the right. I leaned to the left. I sat forward. I sat backward. I sat upon end. I sat tête baissée, (as they have it in the Kickapoo,) bowing my head close to the alabaster page. And, through all, I—wrote. Through joy and through sorrow, I—wrote. Through hunger and through thirst, I—wrote. Through good report and through ill report, I—wrote. Through sunshine and through moonshine, I—wrote. What I wrote it is unnecessary to say. The style!—that was the thing. I caught it from Fatquack—whizz!—fizz!—and I am giving you a specimen of it now.

HYMN TO JOVE.

BY CLEANTHES.

Κύδιος ἄθανάτων, κ. τ. λ.

First of immortals, ever reigning Jove,
Worshipped in many shapes, all hail to thee,
Thou great Creator, who dost govern all
With still unswerving justice! Thus I lift
My voice to thee, for thou dost graciously
To mortals bend thine ear. The power of speech
To man alone, of all that walk the earth,
Thou givest, for thou his heavenly father art.
And he can pray to thee—a priceless gift!
Then I will ever sing thy praise, and hymn
Thy power and goodness in my inmost soul.
The universe, which round the earth is rolled,
In all obeys thee, and by thee is ruled;
And in thy mighty hand the eternal bolt,
Of terror breathing flame, and doubly edged,
Becomes a willing instrument of power.
Dread minister! before whose slightest shock
All nature trembles!
But thou dost rule it with the unerring law,
Which permeates creation, in the spheres
Guiding the greater and the lesser orbs.

Naught happens upon earth save what thou wilt,
Or through old Ocean's dark abodes, or in
The starry firmament of heaven. And though
The senseless deeds of evil men might seem
To weigh against thy justice, yet thou hast
The power to balance all things, and by thee
Order from chaos springs, and good from evil.
For, in thy system, thou hast wisely linked
The good and ill, so that arises one
Law universal, from whose ceaseless bonds
The things of evil strive to make escape,
As they, whose darkened souls cannot perceive
Thy wisdom's fateful force, and see not that True glory lies in calm obedience,
Still blindly with each other they contend,—
Some seeking fame, laborious to win,
And never satisfying to the soul,
That wastes itself in the pursuit; and some
For gain debase themselves, and render up
Their very souls to Mammon; some rush on Blindly to madness; others yield themselves
To sensual pleasures and to low desires;
But they who tread, by all these various paths,

The common road to evil, hastening on,
See the long-wished-for prize elude their grasp,
And, when they think to snatch it, do they find
Their punishment contained in what they sought.

Then, Jove! all bounteous, thou who dwell'st above,

Throned upon clouds, and rulest the bright heaven,
Dismiss the dreaded ignorance which clouds
The soul of man. Give him to comprehend
The only real wisdom, with which thou
Dost rule the universe. Then, in that light,
Will he know how to render thee just honor,
And celebrate thy might eternally.
Oh! can a life be better spent by man,
Or by the Heavenly powers, than ever praising
The eternal might of wisdom, shown in thee?

MALTA, THE MALTESE,

AND A WORD OF

ENGLISH COLONIAL RULE.

On the island of Malta, which is seventeen miles and a fraction in length, and nine miles and a quarter in breadth, will now be found a population of more than one hundred thousand persons who are dwelling together in four or five towns, and twenty-five wretched casals.* Differing as these people do in a marked degree in their features, manners, customs and character from all the nations around them, the question has often been asked from whom are they descended? Are they Europeans, or are they Arabs? A difficult query and one which is only to be answered by the position which one gives to their island.

England, by a note of her parliament, and for a political purpose, voted Malta to be in Europe, while for centuries the kings of Sicily always termed it one of their African possessions. Geologists have, each in their turn, as might favor their views, stated it to have been originally joined with Sicily or Africa. From its proximity it might more naturally be said with the former, as Cape Passaro lies distant to the North only fifteen leagues, while Cape Demas, the nearest land of Africa, is in a Southerly and Westerly direction at a distance of one hundred and eighty miles. Indeed so near are Malta and Sicily to each other, that when the weather is clear the cloud-capt summit of Mount Ætna is distinctly visible from the terraces of Valetta, and a bluff cape, with the rugged coast in its vicinity, may be traced for miles along our Northern horizon. Those who call it an European Island rely on this fact as a proof of their assertion. Others who think differently have stated that though it was more distant from Africa, yet the soundings to that continent were gradual—that it was peopled in ancient times by the Carthagenians—that the Islanders have to this day the Arab features, and speak a dialect of a language by which they can make themselves easily understood by their Arab neighbors—and lastly, that the stratification of the whole Southern border of the Island exactly corresponds with that of Barbary, which runs in the line of its direction. The decision one makes on this subject is of no trifling importance to the better class of Islanders, for if Malta is in Europe, they are, in the broad sense of the word, Europeans; if in Africa, they are Arabs. "Ptolemy has placed it in Africa, while Pliny and Strabo have given it a situation between the Islands of Italy."

Curious it is, that though the Maltese, in different ages, have been tributary to the Phœnicians, Greeks, Carthagenians, Romans, Vandals, Goths, Arabs, Normans, Germans, Spaniards, Knights of St. John, French and English; yet they should at all times have kept themselves so aloof from their conquerors as to leave it at this day a matter of doubt in the Christian world, from whom they are descended. We have said the Christian world, for a learned Arab once remarked to a Capuchin friar, that notwithstanding there was such a difference in their religion, still their language told them that they were of a common origin, that their fathers were the same.

One Italian writer, who was very much puzzled how to decide as to the just title of the Maltese to an European birthright, has come to the following singular conclusion. That as the Maltese women have at all times been an immoral race, the natives might now claim a descent from all the powers who have ever ruled over their Island. Surely if this statement is correct, it would be a strange mixture from which to form a nation and, in a measure, account for its present degraded condition.

"They whom many fathers share, Seldom know a father's care."

The Maltese people are wretchedly poor. We do not think there are fifty families among them who can live from their paternal estates, and of these fifty, not five who have a thousand pounds a year, unless this sum is made up by a government salary, which, if of any amount, very few have the good fortune to enjoy. Several causes exist to produce this general misery, and if some wholesome measures are not soon adopted to counteract or remove them, the Islands of Malta and Gozo will, in the course of a few years, become only two large asylums for the poor, and all the inhabitants save the employés, their inmates.

The Island of Malta is but a rock of limestone, and were it not that veins of granite and marble have been found in the vicinity of the Benjemma Hills, it might literally be said, throughout its whole extent, to be of the same soft species. The soil has been made by the Islanders, and nothing can be more erroneous than the assertion given by Brydone, that the earth was originally brought from Sicily. In Hennen's topography we have noticed a long and interesting article on the manufacture of the soil, which we should like to quote entire as given from the pen of Dr. Tully. We must, however, content ourselves by giving it a brief notice, only stating that however curious his account may appear, yet we can vouch for its correctness, having often witnessed the process.

A countryman, wishing to make a barren, rocky surface a cultivated plat of earth, commences by breaking up the stones which lie on the surface, and for a depth of some six or eight inches. This fine powder is carefully laid aside and mixed with the calcareous earth which is invariably found under the first layer of stone—a half acre, which is the average size of a field cleared in this way, is then covered with this artificial soil. By the assistance of manure, “and by its great aptitude in its new form to the absorption of moisture from the atmosphere, its bulk very perceptibly increases and soon forms a sort of concrete texture.” Watermelons and cucumbers, requiring the least nourishment, are first raised and will flourish the succeeding season. “Corn is the usual growth of the third year.” It is by this and similar processes that by far the greater part of Malta and Gozo has been brought into a state of cultivation, and the soil been found so rich, that although of a few inches depth it will produce to the husbandman its two and three yearly crops, as a just reward for his toil and labors. Their “ever producing soil,” is a subject of common conversation here, with the countrymen, and a most happy thing it is for the Maltese, for had it not been so ordained many more instances would now be noted of the death of the poor from absolute starvation. The Maltese farmers are a brawny, hardy, hard working race, and always in their fields to cultivate and protect the little soil which nature has given them. But to support one hundred and twenty thousand persons on two rocks, having only forty-eight thousand, six hundred and fifty acres of cultivated ground, a large proportion of which is owned by the Queen and church, is impossible, and the sooner the English Government is persuaded of this fact the more fortunate it will be for them and their wretched subjects.*

Of the light, dusty soil which has been reclaimed from its rocky bed, by far too much is wasted in the growth of cotton. We have said wasted, for, although by its sale, it may give a larger revenue to the British crown, and add a few pounds more to the treasures of the church, yet it does not benefit the poor, neither will it clothe them, as owing to its superior quality it comes beyond their reach, and is sold to the merchants for export. Where cotton is now cultivated there should be two yearly crops of vegetables, fruit and grain, products which, in a larger or smaller proportion, can be bought for a penny, and sustain nature. With the small fields of needy proprietors the government cannot interfere: our remarks are made with reference to the crown lands and possessions of the church. This is one of the measures which should be tried for the relief of the people. At least its trial promises well, and should it fail can do no harm. The soil will not be injured, and cotton may be planted again, though the owners of the terreni shall be the only persons who may profit in its growth by sending it to a foreign market for sale.† Fortunate it is for the Maltese that

* From some valuable statistical returns which were ordered by Sir Henry Bouverie in 1842, a copy of which was kindly given to us by Mr. Gilio of the police department, we find that the number of landed proprietors then on the Islands of Malta and Gozo to have been one hundred and thirteen, not one in a hundred of their inhabitants. Allowing on an average two cultivated fields to an acre of private property, although, in many instances, there are four, and two owners to each field, we bring down the actual value of these estates to a trifling sum and see at a glance the general poverty of the Maltese, and of their neighbors of Gozo. We observe also by these official tables, that of the overgrown population, thirty-four thousand persons are employed as artificers and laborers, twelve thousand, five hundred and sixty-eight in agriculture, four thousand, nine hundred and ten in traffic, commerce and trade, and two thousand in various professions, among which are singularly enough classed, doctors, barbers, lawyers, police-officers and people of all sorts of vocations. Of Catholic churches, chapels, convents and oratories, there are three hundred and forty, with one thousand, four hundred and forty-four priests and friars to officiate in them. Of nunneries, five, with one hundred and twenty-six nuns. Of Protestant churches and chapels four, with the same number of clergymen. And lastly, one Greek priest with his chapel, and Jewish Rabbim with his synagogue to overlook the wants of their people.

Of vessels owned at Malta, there are one hundred and sixty-three, with 1,361 sailors and boys to navigate them. Of boats 1,963, and of boatmen, nearly three thousand.

† Several years since we were requested by the late Honorable John Forsyth, when Secretary of State, to send him a few hundred pounds of the Malta yellow cotton seed, as he was anxious to raise it in Georgia. Meeting with their beautiful climate enables them to dress in the coarser stuffs which are sent to them from England, or wander about half naked. Even in midwinter the beggarly children, while crying for bread, do not complain of the cold, and having no hovels to lodge in, make their beds on the sidewalks, where night overtakes them. At day break, disturbed by the calls of hunger, they return to their daily vocation of begging, which they pursue in an untiring manner, and much to the displeasure of all strangers, whom alone they seem to annoy. Poor as we have shown the Maltese to be, still they are laden with taxes and on articles also, which to them should always be free. Notwithstanding one third of their Island is a barren waste,* still the government have put so heavy a duty on wheat, beans, Indian corn, pulse and potatoes as to prove the chief source of their revenue. Nearly two hundred thousand dollars a year are collected from this grievous tax, a sum which is as hard to be borne by the natives, as its exaction from them is unchristian and unjust. Without any wood on the Island still there has been, until very recently, a heavy duty on charcoal. And its present removal we hear is but a temporary measure, for should the revenue, from some unforeseen cause, not reach the expenditure, this impost is again to be levied. Growing no olives, yet are the nations compelled to pay more than five thousand dollars a year for the oil which they import from Sicily—raising no cattle, yet are they annually charged nearly seven thousand dollars more for the privilege of landing the beasts which are brought to them from the different ports of Barbary, to be fattened for their consumption.

Mr. Forsyth at Washington, some time after we had sent him the seed, he told us the experiment had failed, as the cotton grown on his plantation was only slightly tinged with yellow, and the little color it had soon disappeared, when either exposed to the sun or frequently washed. Well knowing that the cotton raised in Malta was of a deep yellow, a color which it never lost, we inquired on our return of one of the chief cultivators to know why it should differ so much in America. Our query was readily answered. The cotton cloth of this Island when first manufactured is of as light a color as that which was made in Georgia, and it is only after having been exposed to the heavy dews, which fall here at all seasons and for several months, that it becomes of that deep yellow, for which it has so long been famed. We have mentioned the circumstance, that should the "Forsyth cotton" still be cultivated in the United States, this information may be valuable to those who are raising it.

* Although so large a part of the Island is in this wretched condition, still it should no longer be allowed to remain so. Much of the country which is now bearing its two yearly crops was in the same state, a few years ago, until Rohan hired some laborers to break up the stone on the surface, and make the soil in the manner which we have already described. Why does not the government give, let, or sell these rocky fields to their starving subjects, who so often apply to receive them? Is it that they wish to keep them in their present state, that no more wheat may be raised on the Island to jeopardize their annual income? We have heard as much and we think it true.

Is it right thus to tax the Maltese! Is it just! Is it necessary! To all of these queries we may give a decided negative, unless the government is determined to pay to its public servants for the future, the same exorbitant and extravagant salaries which it gives them at present. Can it be credited, that the governor of this wretched colony, the whole circuit "of which as sailed round in a boat," is only forty-four miles, has a greater salary by two thousand dollars a year than the President of the United States, who is the chief magistrate of twenty-seven independent states, and ruling over nearly eighteen millions of people; yet such is the case, and the simple statement of this fact is sufficient to show how much the Maltese are imposed upon, and their revenue squandered.* It too

* Annually, in the month of June, the Governor is directed by Her Majesty to lay a minute before his council of the probable amount of revenue which will accrue from all quarters for the year next ensuing, and also a note of the expenses of government for the same brief period. The minute left by Sir Henry Bouverie for 1844 is now before us, and from it we make the following calculations. The amount of revenue is based on an annual average of the five previous years.

IMPORT DUTIES.

On beer, cattle, olive oil, } Spirits, vinegar, and wine, }	- -	$122,560
On grain and its produce, } Pulse, seed, and potatoes, }	- -	192,215

EXPENDITURES.

	$485,119

Total revenue, $500,230
Total expenditure, 485,118

In looking over this list of expenditures the items appear without end. At the head is His Excellency, the Governor, with his salary, fixed allowances, charges, and contingences of $27,000 a year. Next comes the Chief Secretary to government with his emoluments and expenses of office, amounting to $20,294; and this is followed by several other out-lays of an equally extravagant nature. Suffice it to say, that the only item in the whole list of disbursements, of which the Maltese do not complain, is that which gives a few thousand pounds a year for the support of their poor.

often happens that those who come out as Colonial Governors, are as wretchedly poor as those whom they are sent to govern. Sometimes their condition is even worse than that of the colonists, as they are overburthened with families, which they are expected to provide for, and laden with debts which they are also expected to pay. Lord Londonderry in a late work has thus written*—"I think," says the noble lord, "an ambassador of England, at an imperial court with eleven thousand pounds per annum, should not live as a private gentleman, nor consult solely his own ease, unmindful of the greatness of the Sovereign he represents. A habit has stolen in amongst them of adopting a spare ménage to augment private fortunes when recalled. This is wrong, and when France and Russia, and even Prussia entertain constantly and very handsomely, our embassies and legations, generally speaking, are niggardly and shut up." Had the Marquis of Londonderry been writing of some Colonial Governors his remarks could not have been more correct, and stopping as his lordship did at this island when on his way to Stamboul, it is surprising he did not include them.

Lt. General Sir H. F. Bouverie, during his administration of seven years, is supposed to have amassed a fortune of twenty thousand pounds—no trifling sum, when it is considered that seven-eighths of those whom he governed are compelled to go barefoot for the want of money wherewithal to buy themselves shoes. It should be remarked that His Excellency to save this amount was obliged to live in the most economical manner, even to that of closing his residence for the most of the year, and when issuing from the palace to be always on foot. Fortunate however it was for the Maltese, that their Governor was so good a pedestrian, as to this circumstance are they indebted for many capital roads, which but for his order might have never been made. A Colonel of a regiment, living in an economical manner merely to check the extravagance of his younger officers, too many of whom on leaving this Colony are only remembered by the shopkeepers whose accounts are unsettled, is greatly to be praised, and the more so as instances of this kind in the English army, save among Scotchmen, so seldom occur. But whether such a course, when pursued by a Colonial Governor having twenty-seven thousand dollars a year, may be equally honorable is certainly a matter of doubt. General Bouverie, thinking that his economical establishment was perfectly proper, perhaps studied his expenses too closely, while some of his high-minded, honorable and princely predecessors, despising such a mean and beggarly course, lived too freely, and erred on the other extreme.

THE LIGHT OF WOMAN'S EYES.

BY THE YOUNG BARD OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Brightly the lamps of ev'ning glow,
Along yon far, unclouded skies,
But there are brighter things below,
While earth can boast her brilliant eyes.

And when the sun lights up the day,
'Tis glorious to see him rise;
But far more glorious, poets say,
To gaze on woman's beaming eyes.

How beautiful the landscape green,—
The flowers, with their unnumbered dyes;
But still more beautiful, I ween,
The lustre of a pair of eyes.

Let earth and heaven their charms display,
And bid me seek the fairest prize;
Among the gems of night and day,
I would select a pair of eyes.

My heart is pinioned to this sphere,
By many yet unbroken ties;
Yet still I would not linger here
But for the light of woman's eyes.

LOVE SKETCHES.

Our feelings frame our life, its gloom or gladness;
The outer world reveals the one within,
The fairest things reflect our mental sadness,
And thought denies the rapture hope would win.

Our happiness in our own spirits lies,
Woe for the souls that such a trust profane,
That turn its soaring from its native skies,
And bid it wander through this world in vain!

Well! it was over! The romance which, heaven be thanked! comes once to every life, had come for them, and vanished without a trace. It had past with all its magical awakening of feeling and reflection, it was now but a part of old times, a thought full of painfulness; the love that like an angel had brightened its own pathway, making the present rapturous and the future radiant to two throbbing and earnest hearts. It had gleamed athwart those hearts, a vision of truest and holiest beauty; beneath its lustrous influence sweetest hopes were dawning, and fancies went onward to tint the hereafter, fancies gay and gladsome as if they were borne by sunbeams. Lovely was the picture they painted, for what has the earth more lovely, than the new home of young and devoted hearts, where care is yet a stranger, and grief but a name; where each hour bears to heaven its unpretending record of kind acts and loving words, where youth's first wild and passionate tenderness is subdued and tranquilized; and affection, purified and exalted, kneels down, full of thankfulness and full of hope. Ah me! but it was a sorrowful thing, the severing of a tie like theirs, the fading away of imaginings like these!

Not in anger, but in the proud, repelling sorrow, which is worse than passion to those who love, Herbert read the ingenuous revealings of Bertha's letter, the letter of many prayers and countless tears. It was kind and touching, as a sister would have written to the brother she loved best, and he little knew the painful pauses over those simple sentences, the long, hesitating interval of doubt, irresolution, maidenly reserve—all that makes a woman instinctively shrink from betraying the sacred secrets of woman's nature, he little imagined that perplexing struggle which ended in the writing of those lines. Bertha was a child in knowledge of the world, and with the perfect truthfulness of her temperament she resolved to conceal nothing that could soften to the receiver the pain of so unexpected a rejection, and to her mind, with its beautiful appreciation of affection, there seemed nothing so consoling as the assurance of another tenderness, while withdrawing one, already known and valued. She told him, falteringly, and as she best could, a truth whose discovery had cost her so dear, and she spoke of Clara, as of one almost perfection. Even as she wrote, old times came back to her, sweet words and looks that had blest her when the deep shadows of sickness were over her soul, words that had reëchoed through her dreams, looks hoarded up among her memories' treasures. And now, these recollections were to be relinquished, a voluntary sacrifice, the beautiful love of her sweetest years, offered to an instinctive and long life affection. Bertha felt she could never be happy, if haunted by the consciousness of having been a barrier to Clara's hopes, and now the decision had been made, and the past, with all its bewitching delusions, was drawn aside like a curtain, and the future, like a new world, dimly tinted, but peaceful, lay quietly before her. And who may blame her, if even in the midst of her determination and resignation, there lay, far down in her thoughts, a faint hope, that for her that future might be brief, and that but a few years might intervene between her and the perfect repose awaiting the lowly in spirit. She was young, enthusiastic in suffering as well as in enjoyment, and it has been truly said, that enthusiasm in all its features is ridiculous and incomprehensible to those by whom it has never been experienced.

And to this conclusive, heart-speaking letter, what was the reply? and when will the calm, cold eye of man learn to read woman's nature aright?

"You have acted well, Bertha, in declining the continuance of an engagement no longer dear to you, and I thank you for the sincerity of your conduct. It will be a mournful pleasure to me hereafter, to recall that, and to feel that you are, in purity, truthfulness, in all but affection, the reality of my brightest ideal. But in one respect you have erred, deceived perhaps by your own wishes, though you needed not the reason alleged for your discarding. You flatter me in, for an instant, believing me the object of more than your sister's friendship. Her interest is true and sisterly; beyond that I can claim nothing. You will know that in this assertion I am not mistaken, when I confess that years ago, before you and I had ever met, I proffered my boyish love to Clara, and was unhesitatingly and decidedly rejected. No, Bertha, such happiness is not to be my portion. None loves me, since even you avail yourself of such an excuse, to sever the strongest and dearest link that has ever bound me. But I blame you not, and the remembrance of your gentleness and kindness cannot be forgotten, and it will go with me to prompt earnest wishes for your welfare, and to remind me, that though lonely and dejected now, I have been blest." What had Bertha done, to merit a reply like this, kind indeed, but wounding the more by the very quietness of its suspicion. She had doubtless acted romantically; the impulses of youth are prone to exaggeration, and hers were no exception. But it was too late for farther explanation, even had such been desirable or possible, for the next day Herbert left a formal farewell card, and shortly afterwards went abroad.

Who has not felt the deep, abiding sense of sudden desolation, which comes over us with the first separation from the being beloved, the silent yearning for the accustomed presence, the pining that shrinks from expression, and hides its sorrow, voicelessly, in the soul. Who has not felt the taunting self-reproach for some trivial deed, or word of kindness omitted; the longing to regain lost opportunities; the involuntary listening for the footstep now treading afar, and the unconscious seeking for the gaze whose light is shining upon strangers. Who has not then remarked the peculiar change which appears to have altered all things and painfully realized how much the outer, material world is colored by the world of feeling within; and turned with languid indifference from the strange dimness that seems resting like a cloud on scenes that but lately wore so rich and bright a beauty. We glance upon the earth, and it speaks a new language to our minds, sad, yet sweet, for its flowers have once been tokens, and now we welcome them as friends. They whisper to us too of the glorious summer, of the existence that springs up from the winter-sleep of gloom, of the renewal of hope, of all that heralds loveliness, and prophesies peace. We look up to the stars, but the poetry written there is mournful; we think of the heaven lying beyond them, and its fairest promise is the one which tells us, it has no farewell. Alas!

experience has many of these partings, "such as press the life from out young hearts," partings that steal the bloom from the cheek, the light from the eye, and cast on our pathway the shadows of the grave, but bring us not its stillness and its rest from weariness.

Grieved, mortified, perplexed and disappointed, Bertha's was the trouble most difficult patiently to endure, that which meets no sympathy and dares ask for none. She would not by word or look, betray the humiliating truth to Clara, for she saw that in one respect at least, she had not been mistaken, though now Herbert's absence seemed to bring her sister a feeling of relief and satisfaction. Bertha had many consolations blending with her irrepressible regrets; she returned self-approving, though saddened, to her simple home-pleasures, and the duties of her unobtrusive and trustful piety. For Clara, beautiful, gifted, but cursed with that vague, restless ambition which is wretchedness to a woman, such comforts had no existence. All that could be inflicted on a proud, resolute disposition by love in vain, aspirations betrayed, by self-respect forfeited, it was hers to endure, and yet she had never seemed happier than now, nor been more attractive. All the glowing loveliness of her fairest days, and more than their fascination was with her now, and she increased by studied, though unseen care, the charm always clinging about one naturally so beautiful.

Can it be, that having mentally suffered, from any cause, gives additional penetration to the intellect, truer divining of others emotions, and enables us to play with more skill, and touch with deeper effect, the mysterious chords of the human heart? It would indeed appear so, for those women who have claimed most influence over the feelings of men, and swayed their impulses most successfully, have usually been past the première jeunesse which is generally ignorant of grief. They have commonly attained the profounder thoughts which come with even a limited experience of life's perplexities and annoyances; they have looked into the recesses of their own hearts, and the secrets of others' spirits are unveiled to their gaze. They have felt and suffered, and thence acquired some portion of that knowledge which is but the outward reflection of hidden endurance. With Clara, it was assuredly thus, and now that Herbert's departure had removed the continual and harassing sight of his devotion to another, now that she thought less of love and more of herself, a new epoch arose in her moral being. She became less impulsive, less loving, but more self-possessed and resolute.

"It is a strange thing;" thus ran Clara's diary, "the sudden calmness that now pervades my mind, hushing its emotions, like the solemn stillness which follows the track of the storm. And has not the heart its tempests more fearful far, because more abiding, than the wildest ones which sweep in desolation over the earth—tempests that irrevocably shatter our mortal happiness, and too often wreck that which lives in immortality! O! why is it, that feebleness and briefness of resistance are blended in our being with such constant liability to temptation, and such continuing power for suffering! . . .

I have grown studious lately, not of grave and profound works, but of those heart-chronicles which record the bewildering mysteries of feeling; pages where genius has vividly portrayed its own dejection, and written in burning words its touching history and mournful moral. With such pictures I have sympathy, and they teach me too the knowledge I crave, the ability to sway, or at least to influence the minds around me. . . . I have been reading over to-day Bulwer's Memoirs of an Ambitious Student. What a graphic delineation it presents of immortal intellect, struggling unequally with human frailty; of restless, undying thought, hovering side by side with the awful stillness of death; of the gradual decay of interest in things once loved best, of the intuitive shrinking from earthly excitements and allurements, and the final centering of all emotion, all expectation, in that one terrible idea—the grave! The thrilling impression of that book on my imagination is most painful, the stern conviction it bequeaths, too full of awe. Is such ever the termination of undefined aspirations! Do the visions that soar in our youth with wild and gleaming wings, but sweep blindly onward, seeking no certain aim and finding no enduring resting place! Sad enough it is to leave the world without one living trace of all we sought and hoped and yearned for, to be carelessly forgotten where we dreamed so falsely and suffered so truly! . . . Herbert has gone, and I have wept in bitter self-abasement, to feel what a relief his departure has brought me. Am I then fallen so low, while pondering so proudly; can I in truth descend to find comfort in the knowledge that my sister is less happy! I have asked Bertha no questions as to the cause of her strange discarding; we rarely speak on such subjects, and I involuntarily recoil from such discussion. Why, I scarcely know, for her nature is too simple and unsuspecting, to penetrate the sad secrets of mine. But I never willingly confide; I am not sincere enough myself to rely implicitly on the sincerity of others. Ah! if I could but once have laid aside this worldliness and loved truly and disinterestedly; if self-elevation had but yielded to the warm impulses of earnest affection; if my fancies, that now wander idly abroad, had mingled to brighten one household hearth, to bless one peaceful life; if beauty, grace, imagination and reflection had only combined to follow the holier guidance of my softer nature, my better dictates, how enchantingly would the future now have risen on my enraptured gaze, how pure and radiant would have been the love, I profanely crushed and trampled on, and that now drags down my dejected spirit, turning to evil, all of good that my being ever claimed !”

THE TRIUMPH OF RELIGION.

BY MRS. MARIA G. BUCHANAN.

On the dark wing of night
A thrilling voice was wafted to my ear ;
Its tones were sad and low, as they were born
Of the sweet chords of woman's purer soul
Swept by the hand of sorrow, and they were
The echo of a woman's suffering heart.
These were the words they breathed :
Love was to me unknown,
Oh ! there was nought round which the clinging vine
Of warm affection in my heart might twine.
I was alone ! alone !
I gazed on Mem'ry's stream ;
No father's look of pride was imaged there,
No mother's smile of love as twilight fair,
Or youth's unbroken dream.
I heard sad Mem'ry's voice ;
Its tones brought back no sister's laugh of glee,
No sound of brother's footstep wildly free.
In life could I rejoice
Save in the hope of heaven ?
That hope which o'er my tears a rainbow threw,
Parting grief's storm-clouds with its golden hue,
While peace to me was given.
But oh ! this heavenly rest
Was far too calm for this unquiet earth :
Woman's sad destiny at length had birth
Within my lonely breast.
The fount of love which lay
For long, long years unopened, was opened at last.
On its deep wave an image bright was cast,
Fairer to me than day.
I long for love had pined,
As pines the poet for fame's garland bright—
As pines the lonely captive for the light
And sigh of summer wind,—
As pines the silken flower,
When noon has parched its rainbow-tinted leaves,
For the fresh spell of life the dew drop weaves
In night's refreshing hour.
But oh ! more dear to me
Than summer air, or light to captive lone ;
Than the high wreath of lofty Genius known,
Or night's tears gushing free
To quickly fading flower,
Was the bright time when, in my throbbing breast,

Love folded his glad wing to sunny rest,
And I joyed in his power.
No common love was mine.
His was my ev'ry feeling, hope and thought ;—
His love the only boon on earth I sought ;
He had the gems which shine
Brightest in woman's heart,—
Her first, first thoughts of love. Oh ! when the blight
Of the dark serpent's trail dims their pure light,
Earth knows no magic art,
To win the radiance back ;
And oh ! that deadly blight on my love fell.
Sin, conqu'ring sin, dissolved the glowing spell,
And henceforth sorrow's track
Must be my path to heaven.
Why must it be ? mine only is his love.
Back, tempter, back—oh, God ! enthroned above,
Let strength to me be given.
He owns not thy great name,
Oh, Infinite ;—he says the wondrous earth
And vaulted skies, where countless worlds have birth,
All, all, from nothing came ;
And that the darksome tomb
Is man's, proud man's eternal place of rest,—
That the high soul which beats within his breast
Will perish 'neath its gloom.
Oh ! tempter, thou hast come
Too truly in an angel's garb of light.
He burst on me as burst the stars on night,
To gild my lonely doom.
Oh ! with what truth I loved ;
How my heart trembled when his step drew nigh !
And when on mine was fixed his speaking eye,
My inmost soul was moved.
Alas ! I love him yet :
Though my light footstep will not, must not, glide
Through the world's dreamy pathways by his side,
I never can forget.
Tempter, from me depart ;
Veil, veil the lustre of thy sunny wile,—
'Tis sweet, but oh ! how full of darkest guile.
Be still, be still, be still my heart.
Yes, I must tear away
The clinging tendrils of this earthly love,
Must turn my thoughts alone to heaven above.
My God will be my stay.
'Tis o'er, the strife is o'er.
Safe through temptation's conflict I have passed,—
Far from my soul the glitt'ring wile I've cast,
And peace is mine once more.
Though day is turned to night,
All is not darkness : in Religion's sky
The star of Faith is beaming clear and high—
Clouds veil no more her light.

Along the clear path of the balmy air
The voice no longer stole ; and as it ceased,
I felt and owned Religion's majesty.

MOUNTAIN SCENERY OF VIRGINIA.

The Grand Tunnel in Scott County.

MR. EDITOR :—Few countries surpass Western Virginia in beauty and sublimity of natural scenery. The lofty and almost interminable ranges of mountains, which extend in all directions through this region, compose a mighty net-work, through whose mazes the traveller wanders in delighted amazement; his eye, at one moment, measuring the steep ascent of some huge mount, hoary with cliffs, or rustling with foliage; anon, resting on some broad, deep valley, robed in green and gorgeous in beauty—and again, tracing the course of some mountain river, rushing over a rocky chasm, or gliding softly through a quiet glen, its waters dashed into foam, gleaming in the sunlight, or resting, deep and still, in the shade of green and wooded banks.

Nor have nature's efforts been confined to the production of these more plainly apparent monuments of her power. Proud of her might, and capricious in her fancy, she has marked this region with many and wonderful results of her skill and labor. Out of materials, lasting as her own existence, she has constructed altars, meet for the orisons of her worshippers; shrines where love and admiration of nature, adoration and reverence of Nature's Author may be poured forth, unchecked by the intrusion of crowds, unshackled by the futile pomp of man's poor grandeur. To some of these I would fain, (so far as mere description can effect that object,) introduce the distant readers of the Messenger; and if they will accompany me, in lieu of a better guide, I will lead them to one—the Natural Bridge, as it is called, but in reality Natural Tunnel, in Scott county.

Turning Southwardly out of the Cumberland Gap Turnpike, about twelve miles North-West of Estillville, a rough and broken bridle-path leads down Stock Creek, a large branch of Chinch River, between two very high hills, or rather small mountains. Following the course of the glen nearly a mile, in a Southern direction, we find a third ridge stretching across from hill to hill, forming the valley into a vast but irregular representation of the letter H. This crossing ridge is several hundred feet in height; steep and inaccessible on each side. Against the base of this mound the water rushes in search of a passage, and it finds a channel, perhaps the most awful and sublime on earth, hollowed out by nature's own mighty hand. Standing in the brink of the chasm, the eye is raised to a vast arch, two hundred feet in height, and as much in width, composed of whitish limestone, and formed with considerable regularity. This arch gradually slopes downwards and narrows into the bosom of the mountain. Clambering over huge masses of rock, that have evidently fallen from above, and among which the waters foam and plunge along, we proceed through the gorge about a hundred yards. Here we find the chasm, thus far constantly sinking and narrowing, reduced to dimensions of about fifteen feet in height, and in width, some thirty or forty. We are now involved in deep twilight, though at the entrance the sunlight is gleaming on the walls of white rock, and glancing on the cedar boughs that fringe the water's edge. At this point, the chasm turns to the South-East, and light from the farther extremity is visible. Thirty yards onwards and the tunnel makes another angle, and the stream resumes its former course to the South-West. The arch now begins to expand again, and with more regularity, symmetry and beauty than at the Northern extremity. Strange and awful, yet wondrously beautiful, is the spectacle which we behold on emerging from the bosom of the mountain. The arch opens out of a circular wall of solid rock, which, if extended in a straight line, would be four hundred feet in length; and is fully as much in height. On coming out we experience feelings akin to the sensations we would attribute to Sinbad the Sailor, when he found himself enclosed in the rock-walled Valley of Diamonds. The vast rampart extends in an irregular circle, or rather oval; and on coming out of the tunnel we do not immediately perceive a long opening, save that from which we have just emerged. Thus we are apparently confined in an immense dungeon, walled in by rock, and ceiled by the heavens alone. The stream does not run directly across this oval area; but entering near one end, we perceive it, after turning to the right and washing the base of a segment of the wall, plunge through a narrow outlet, and rush on down the glen, between rough and wild crags.

I have stood on peaks from which the eye's farthest range was unobstructed by any obstacle; I have almost trembled on the summits of precipices, from whence a single false step would have hurled me, a shapeless mass, to feed the carrion birds which alone could have reached my shattered remains. I have stood beneath the arch of the real natural bridge, and admired its vast proportions and finished symmetry: I have seen many of nature's master pieces in a region where she works on her most magnificent scale; but I have never experienced, amidst them all, such sensations as when standing alone in this mighty amphitheatre of God's own workmanship. In such a scene what an overwhelming sense of man's weakness and insignificance seizes upon us! how strong is the feeling of the almost visible presence of Deity. An eye, accustomed from infancy to measure lofty heights and penetrate profound abysses, reeled in its socket when upturned to view that towering wall: a shuddering frame witnessed the performance of an homage due to nature, in this temple fitted for her holiest worship. Then came the thought of man : his power, his strength, his pride : his weakness, his woe, his madness. And I thought of pyramids, cathedrals, and coliseum :—aye ! here is a coliseum, prouder than Rome could boast when Cæsars were her rulers and monarchs were her citizens. Yonder jagged rocks, protruding from the wall, and those deep, shaggy crevices are seats : that overarching summit, sweeping round in ample curves, is gallery too noble for man's imitation : that dark tunnel, piercing the mountain's rugged breast, is a den whence ye might lead the wild beast and fiercer gladiator. But away with such thoughts, in such a scene. What should blood and misery, and man's crime and fearful fierceness do in this temple of nature—amidst these memorials of her skill and her grandeur.

The length of the tunnel is some two hundred, or two hundred and fifty yards : but on this point I cannot be exact, having visited it alone, without the means of measuring. In the centre it is not near so high nor so wide as at the extremities ; still a man can walk through erect. At the northern end, the arch, or precipice, is about two hundred feet high : nearly double as high at the southern opening. The oval area, which is so nearly surrounded by the precipices at the southern extremity, contains about half an acre of land. There is no view through the entire length of the tunnel, owing to the curve in the centre ; and when standing immediately in that curve, neither opening is visible, though the light finds its way from both, and renders a torch unnecessary.

The material of which this stupendous fabric is composed, is a whitish limestone, strongly impregnated with saltpetre. The saltpetre was formerly collected in large quantities for the purpose of making gunpowder. I saw large heaps of earthy matter from which the nitre had been extracted. Gathering the earth which contained the nitrous matter was an occupation almost as perilous as the "dreadful trade" of a samphire gatherer in Shakespeare's day. A tradition is current in the neighborhood, which I will give, though I cannot vouch for the exactness of the details. In order to reach a certain vein of saltpetre, it was necessary to lower a man to a small hole, one hundred and fifty feet below the top of the precipice, into which he could crawl, and thence throw the nitrous earth to the bottom of the rock. At that period, in this region, ropes were scarce and costly articles ; and their place, in the labor which I have mentioned, was supplied by green hickory wythes, lashed together, which made a very good substitute. The task of descending to the opening was, at all times, one of difficulty and danger ; for the cliff arches over at the top, and its side presents several sharp, jagged points. Upon one occasion an adventurous man had performed his task, and prepared for his ascent in the usual manner. He fastened the wythes under his arms, and having been swung off from his foothold, his companions commenced drawing him up, Conceive the poor fellow's horror and dismay when, at this moment, he perceived that just above him one of the fastenings of the wythes was untwisting. His fellow-laborers, ignorant of their comrade's situation, pulled away as if nothing was the matter ; and at each involuntary gyration his peril became more imminent. There he was, swinging above the frightful abyss with nothing between him and a horrible death, save the slender grapple of the weak bough.* Terror deprived him of utterance, though speech would have availed nothing. Slender as was his hold upon life, it proved sufficient. He was brought to the top before the wythe became wholly untwisted ; but though life was preserved, terror had produced an effect similar to that recorded in other instances. His bushy locks were blanched "white as wool," and to his dying day he bore a memento of his narrow escape from a fearful death.

This place has been often compared to the Natural Bridge ; but there is little resemblance between the two. Whilst the one is really a bridge, finished complete and symmetrical, the other is a tunnel. Born in the neighborhood of the Natural Bridge, I had been taught to consider it the master work of Nature : but this prejudice to the contrary notwithstanding, I know not if the bridge can claim the palm from its rival of the South-West. The bridge is certainly the more beautiful, the more curious, the more artistical : but it sinks almost into insignificance when compared in magnitude, in massiveness, in sublimity to the tunnel. Nature finished off the bridge with the more elegant touches of her skilful hand ; but she piled up, in yon mountain archway, rock enough to make half a dozen Natural Bridges.

A tolerably good road leads over the ridge, at a right angle with the course of the tunnel. From this road the valley on the upper or northern side is visible ; but the precipice on the southern side, rising above the level of the road, shuts out the view in that direction ; and I cared but little about creeping to the edge and throwing my eyes down the profound abyss below. Even now the thought of it makes me shudder. My eye never before faltered when gazing from the loftiest pinnacles—but it is, in truth, at least doubtful if the firmest nerves would not quail on that wild arch.

I cannot imagine why this place has attracted so little attention from the travelling public. It is but little known beyond the distance of a day's journey from its location. This is most likely owing to its remote situation in the midst of a rough and broken country. Now, however, this obstacle to its proper examination is partially removed. A capital road has been lately constructed, passing within less than a mile of the spot ; and I understand that the people of the neighborhood are about to make a passable road down the creek immediately to the arch. Hereafter I hope that the many travellers who resort annually to our mountains, will behold the "Giant's Archway," among the many other natural wonders of Western Virginia.

AUTUMN.

BY THE STRANGER.

Autumn's yellow leaves are falling
Withered and sear,
And a solemn shroud is palling
The fading year.

Like a stricken mourner crying
Over the bier,
Mournfully the winds are sighing
Lonely and drear.

Clouds above their watch are keeping,
Hovering near,
Like sad spirits sorely weeping
For one that's dear.

Meekly the last primrose paleth,
Yielding its bloom;
Zephyr plaintively bewaileth
Its sad'ning doom.

Autumn! thy brown foliage shadeth
A burial stone,
Where a much loved flower fadeth
In dust alone.

As thy troubled spirit sigheth
O'er falling leaf,
So o'er him that shrouded lieth
I pour my grief.

I can feel for thee in giving
To death thy store;
But they return—fresh and living—
The winter o'er.

Yes 'tis sad to see thy cherished
Beauties decay,
Mingling with the host that perished
Ere thou hadst sway;

But wail not, O thou childless weeper!
Spring draweth near:
Her breath will wake each floral sleeper:—
They'll re-appear,

Clothed in beauty sweetly smiling
O'er hills of green,
With their witchery beguiling
Earth's every scene.

Oh! autumn, thy deep voice speaketh
To us of death,
Saying—Time, the reaper, seeketh
For mortal breath.

And thy falling foliage teacheth
Lessons of light
That beyond this dark vale reacheth,
Wrapt in dim night,

Whispering of the spring that keepeth
Her sun-light hall;
That shall come when winter sleepeth,
And wake them all.

Thus the flowers we love are falling
Blasted by death;
But a voice from heaven is calling
From dust their breath.

O, autumn! when thou comest never,
Earth's spring time o'er—
Our grave-cold flowers shall bloom forever
And fade no more.

"YOUNG ENGLAND." "CONINGSBY."

Coningsby, or The New Generation; a Novel. By B. D'Israeli, Esq. M. P. Philadelphia, Carey & Hart. 1844.

The term "Young England" is one, which it has not been the fortune of every one to understand exactly in the sense in which it is evidently understood by those, who are entitled to the honor of having invented it, and by whom it is most frequently employed. When the expression "Old England" is used, no man is at a loss to understand what is meant. The imagination, at once, is carried to the fast-anchored isle, with its thousand years of battle and of glory—its adamantine institutions, which seem formed, almost, for eternity—its long line of heroes and sages—of statesmen and poets. It is the same England of which, in our childhood, we have gathered our first impressions, from the fascinating, but worse than apocryphal, writings of David Hume, who has related in language, such as was never employed by any other historian of his country, occurrences that never took place—facts which never existed, and both vouched for by records, which when examined by his more careful successors, have been found to prove directly the reverse of that position for the establishment of which he had pressed them into service. It is the England of our boyish imagination, rising like "a sea Cybele fresh from ocean"—its name is connected with some of the most agreeable passages of our childhood, and invariably carries us back to the day when we first gave our attention to the enchanting pages of Hume.

What a magnificent vision is conjured up by those two magical words "Old England." Such an one, Eastern Dervish never dreamt of in the gayest season of his fancy—such an one could never have entered the imagination of the most enthusiastic theorist, were it not placed actually before the eyes. In the history of the whole world there is to be found nothing bearing the remotest resemblance to the glory of "Old England." The annals of every other country which constitutes, or has constituted a portion of the civilized world, from the days of Cyrus to those of Wellington, may be searched in vain for a catalogue of warriors, statesmen, poets and philosophers, capable of bearing a comparison with those which shed a halo of glory around the "mistress of the seas." Enough of her; every one knows who she is. As long as law and religion, poetry and philosophy retain any claims upon the affections of mankind; as long as Shakespeare and Milton, Bacon and Lock, Halley and Newton, shall be classed among those immortal minds which, in different ages and at long intervals, have arisen to delight and instruct mankind, so long will "Old England" retain the highest rank in the scale of nations, past or existing. It is "Old England" of whom it was said by one of her own bards,

"Her march is o'er the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep!"

Whose soldiers, in the Peninsular War, never attacked a position which they did not carry—never defended a fortress from which they did not repulse the foe. It is she, whose shadow is at this moment overcasting the world, exhibiting a degree of combined strength, activity and energy, directed by the most consummate wisdom, which excites the admiration, at the same time that it awakens the fears, of all other nations on the face of the globe.

And how, it will be asked, has "Old England" arrived at her present degree of power and glory, so far transcending those of all other nations, of which we have any record? How has she contrived to render the assistance of her subjects necessary to the march of every army, the equipment of every fleet, the success of every expedition, set on foot by the continental powers of Europe? By what process of government has she accumulated two thirds of the wealth of the world in the hands of her own subjects, and thus rendered all the nations of the earth her tributaries? The answer is plain; it has arisen from the wisdom and steadiness of her policy, springing from the solidity of her institutions, that she has been able to accomplish so much. From generation to generation, from reign to reign, from age to age, from century to century, she has steadily pursued, through all her political convulsions, one grand object, and that object is the glory and the welfare of "Old England." No matter which party may be in the ascendant, whether whig or tory, with that party, this is always a paramount object. There is no vacillation—no weakness—no shifting of policy, in those essential points which contribute to the welfare of the country.

When we reflect that this general system of policy was thoroughly tried before it was rendered in a manner perpetual, and that it was found, by experience, to be built upon principles of wisdom and of truth, it will at once be apparent, that its long continuance was of itself sufficient to ensure national greatness. The prosperity of "Old England," like the conquests of Rome, has been the gradual accumulation of ages—the result of a wise and fixed policy—adhered to in all mutations of parties—in all changes of rulers—in the very convulsion which for ten years altered the very form of the government itself. Whenever this established system has been departed from, the effect has always been injurious; and the minister of the day, be he whig or tory, has never failed to return with all due speed to the old and well-tried rule. The present tory ministry of England was elected in consequence of certain promises relative to the Corn-Laws; but no sooner was it firmly established, than it was discovered that compliance with those promises was impossible, and it was compelled to pursue, (in effect,) the policy of its whig predecessor. It is this steady pursuit of certain fixed principles that has imparted to "Old England" the reality not less than the appearance of a stability altogether without example. She is indeed the very model of solidity—the very type of substantiality—lifting her head haughtily to the sky, like the pyramid of Cheops, yet like that wonderful monument of human art, retaining a foothold upon the earth, which may defy alike the fury of the whirlwind and the convulsions of the earthquake.

But what is meant by "Young England?" The expression itself seems to imply a paradox, for how can you speak of England and not of "Old England?"

To explain, however, what is meant by "Young England," the reader must take into consideration all we have said of "Old England," and then imagine the very reverse. In the antipode of "Old England" he will find that of which he is in search. "Old England" is proverbial for her prudence and discretion. "Young England" for her rashness and want of foresight. "Old England" was engaged for centuries in the consolidation of that immense power, which is the admiration, the terror and the envy of the world, and she will inform you that such acquisitions, to be durable, must be slowly made. "Young England" will tell you, on the contrary, that if not done at once, it is not worth the doing at all. "Old England" is a model of solid strength. "Young England" the very incarnation of weakness and mobility. "Old England" is a pyramid; "Young England" a rushing stream. To one it may be said, "Persevere to the end and thou shalt be saved!" To the other, "unstable as water, thou shalt not prevail." It took "Old England" centuries to produce her great statesmen, warriors, poets and philosophers. "Young England" can send forth, any day, a half dozen Shakspeare's, as many Milton's, with Bacon's, Newton's, Marlborough's and Wellington's enough to stock the market. "Old England" was governed by precedent; she had great confidence in the experience of her fathers; "Young England" is convinced of that important fact, which few young folks fail to discover very early in life; viz. that old people are invariably fools, and that the young and inexperienced alone have any understanding among the children of men. This last is the grand principle of action with "Young England," and, as we shall presently see, she is not without authors to sustain her views and to advance them as far as practicable.

Every opinion which has been held sacred by her ancestors is repudiated as the effect of dotage by "Young England;" every name which has become sacred from its association, great deeds, or great suffering in a good cause, is visited with her most undisguised contempt. Had "Young England" only been in existence in the dark days of "Old England," how easy it would have been for her to dispel the cloud that lowered above her. But the men of "Old England" were not possessed either of that energy, or that ability by which the young gentlemen of the bed-chamber, who constitute what is called "Young England," are distinguished. The men of "Old England" held Napoleon in great terror, and, with the Duke of Wellington at their head, acknowledged him to be the greatest military genius the world had ever seen. The young gentlemen of "Young England" smile at such preposterous folly; they regard the emperor of the French as a mere humbug, whom they, the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, could have routed without any sort of difficulty, if they were only led by Col. Mitchel, who has written a book in which the said emperor is proved to be the most consummate ass that ever "set a squadron in the field." What laurels have they lost by being born some twenty-five or thirty years too late! They might have shared with the Cossacs the glory of having "nailed a horse shoe" to the gate of Thuilleries.

The principal characteristics of "Young England" are arrogance, vanity, inexperience and a thorough contempt for their fathers, whose wisdom is, to them, the consummation of folly. Her sons are aspiring to the last degree, and would fain convince all the world, that they alone are capable of conducting the affairs of the nation, alleging in support of their claims their very ignorance and inexperience. He must be a hardened unbeliever indeed, who would refuse to lend an ear to claims so well founded, and urged with a modesty so becoming! They are withal Tories of the most ultra description, who would fain unhorse Peel and Wellington, because they are not Tory enough, but more especially because they labor under the great disadvantage of having had some experience in the affairs of government. They have made the important discovery, that the world has been going on wrong for the last six thousand years, and their advent is the signal for a general reformation. That great event is only wanting to produce an entire change in the system of government, to eradicate ancient and time-honored errors, and to produce a grand political millennium in the course of which "the lions and the lambs," of all parties, shall "lie down" in the utmost harmony "together." A new set of ideas will be introduced along with this tremendous social revolution, and mankind will open their eyes in astonishment at the ignorance in which they have been so long enveloped.

We have often thought, that had fortune cast his lot within the precincts of Great Britain, a late divine, of some reputation in the literary world, would have made a very proper Representative of "Young England." He, like them, was accustomed to broach opinions, whose novelty was startling at least, if the arguments, by which they were enforced, were far from convincing. He, like "Young England," discovered that men had been in the habit of thinking wrong upon a variety of subjects, from the very foundation of the world, and he most kindly undertook to put it right. The complacency with which he describes Nelson as "a vulgar hero of the cock pit," Wellington, when taken from the command of the army, as a complete ignoramus, Napoleon himself as by no means equal in the grand essential of mind to the most indifferent Unitarian preacher, and intimates that though it required some genius to arrange and combine the movements of four hundred thousand troops, the mental operation, requisite to effect it, would bear no comparison with that which enabled a divine of the persuasion above alluded to, to furnish the world with a hebdomadal discourse upon the beauties of the Arian system, is worthy of all admiration. His ideas were so novel—his opinions were so startling—his views of relative difficulties, and the mental effort which it requires to overcome them, were so utterly at war with all pre-conceived opinions, (prejudices it may be,) that the charmed circle of "Young England" must have opened for him at once.

In the absence, however, of a champion who would, undoubtedly, have done so much honor to the cause, "Young England" has found an advocate in the person of Mr. B. D'Israeli, "the wonderful boy that wrote Alroy," who has given his lucubrations to the world in a work, half novel and half political pamphlet, which he styles "Coningsby." It is to some of the maxims of this work that we would particularly direct the attention of the reader, for our space does not allow us for a moment to contemplate any thing like a regular review.

Coningsby is a young scion of nobility; the grandson of the Marquis of Monmouth, a nobleman whose whole life has been spent in State intrigues, the grand object of which seems to have been the acquisition of a ducal coronet. With this object in view, he has truckled and fawned to all the administrations which have been in power from his youth up to the opening of this story, which finds him considerably past the meridian of life. He is a cold-hearted, cold-blooded Peer, and his treatment of Coningsby's father, his son and heir, who had had the impudence to marry a poor and pretty woman, had occasioned his premature death. At the opening of the tale Coningsby is a neglected orphan, whose existence is a matter of the least possible moment to the redoubtable Peer. The boy however goes to Eton and afterwards to Cambridge, in both which seminaries he wins renown, which has the effect of softening the heart of his grand-papa. He becomes proud of him, intends to leave him all his fortune, but in the meantime marries again, and the second wife, in conjunction with a toady of his lordship, one Mr. Rigby, undermines the heir and causes the Peer to leave his whole estate, (not to themselves, for he had smelt the rat,) but to a natural daughter. This daughter afterwards dies and leaves the whole, of course, to Coningsby. The novel leaves Mr. Coningsby, just as he is about to take his seat in the House of Commons, after an election, in which Rigby was his opponent.

A love story is of course introduced. Coningsby had saved the life of young Milbank, the son of a great manufacturer. Milbank had a beautiful sister, who was as much bound to fall in love with him, as he was to be enamored of her; and the diligent novel reader will perceive, at once, that both these things were matters of course. Old Milbank is violently opposed because Coningsby's father had cut him out of his sweet-heart—the Marquis is equally opposed for some other reason—and the young lovers are thus left in full enjoyment of the usual amount of distress. When Coningsby is found to have been disinherited however, Old Milbank, through the intercession of Oswald, consents to the match, and all parties are thus left as happy as novels ever allow their heroes and heroines to be.

So much for the tale which is but a flimsy contrivance, designed to convey the political sentiments of Mr. D'Israeli to the world. It is with them that our business lies.

In page 14, (of Carey and Hart's edition,) the author discourses as follows: (he is speaking of the conduct of the Duke of Wellington in May, 1832, when after having held the premiership for five days he threw it up in despair, at not being able to resist the progress of reform.)

"The Duke of Wellington has ever been the votary of circumstances. He cares little for causes. He watches events rather than seeks to produce them. It is a characteristic of the military mind. Rapid combinations, the result of a quick, vigilant and comprehensive glance, are generally triumphant in the field; but in civil affairs, where results are not immediate; in diplomacy, and in the management of deliberative assemblies, where there is much intervening time, and many counteracting causes, this velocity of decision, this fitful and precipitate action, is often productive of considerable embarrassment, and sometimes of terrible discomfiture. It is remarkable that men, celebrated for military prudence, are often found to be headstrong statesmen. A great General, in civil life, is frequently and strangely the creature of impulse,—influenced in his political movements by the last snatch of information; and often the creature of the last aid-de-camp who has his ear."

Such is the character of Wellington as drawn by the Carpet Knight whose work is now under consideration, and who, as yet, has never served his country, save as a silent member of the House of Commons, in any capacity, civil or military; and he speaks in the very spirit of "Young England."

It is not our purpose to enter into a defence of the Duke of Wellington; we will merely express the opinion, that the publication of Col. Gurwood must have been, to the author of the above sentiments, a sealed book. In that publication, consisting entirely of Wellington's dispatches, he would have found ample material to doubt the soundness of the opinions here expressed. While in India, the Duke not only conducted war upon a large scale, but absolutely conquered and governed, with an ability that would have done credit to Alexander the Great, provinces larger and more populous than the united kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland. He was frequently employed, in that most delicate of all species of diplomacy, negotiation with half-civilized princes, jealous of their prerogative, jealous of the over-shadowing influence of the English, and to the last degree, unsteady and perfidious. Yet in no one instance did he fail to accomplish the object which he had in view. His position in the Peninsula was one of even more difficulty. Commanding an army of heretics, he was obliged to reconcile the religious scruples of a proud and bigotted nation, who regarded the presence of that army, in some degree, as a stain upon the national honor. In the midst of a people, notoriously jealous of strangers, he contrived by an effort of diplomatic skill, not confined to a single stroke, but continued for five long years, to render the two worst governments in the world, effective instruments in the success of his plans. Thwarted in his purposes by a feeble administration at home, but meagrely supplied by the ruinous economy of those who could not, or would not, understand the delicacy of his position, by the exertion of his almost unrivalled diplomatic skill, not less than by his great military talents, he upheld the feeble governments of Spain and Portugal, healed breaches, reconciled differences, and united and directed the energies of both governments to the accomplishment of his purposes. The success with which his efforts were crowned is matter of history. Surely the man who could accomplish tasks of such magnitude deserves, if any body does, the title of a great statesman.

Yet these diplomatic exploits, remarkable as they are, are by no means the greatest that the Duke of Wellington has performed. At different times, and under every variety of circumstances, he has baffled the cunning of Fouché, rendered nugatory the "tact" of Talleyrand, overreached Metternich, and proved himself, singly, more than a match for the craft of the whole Russian corps diplomatique combined. His name is terrible to the oldest and best Generals of Europe. It is not less so to the oldest and craftiest of her diplomats. With all of them, has he at different times been engaged, and not one of them has, hitherto, had any reason to triumph from the encounter. At home it is well known that he has been distasteful to the late and the present Sovereign, and it must be a source of infinite pride to him, to know that never, save in exigences of the most pressing nature, have they called him to the head of affairs. In fair weather, and on a smooth sea, a sailor of little nautical skill can stand at the helm and keep the vessel on her way. It is only when the storm comes, that the true pilot is called to his post.

No man is more opposed to the use of force, upon ordinary occasions, than Wellington; yet no man has employed it more skilfully, nor at a more seasonable time, whenever it has become necessary. If he ever sheds one drop of blood, it is done with the intention of preventing rivers of it from flowing. "A great victory," said he upon one occasion, "is the most melancholy of all events, save a great defeat."

Such is the man whom Mr. D'Israeli would represent as a person utterly disqualified for the duties of a statesman; and that too, because he has served his country in a great and perilous conflict, where the arts of diplomacy were to the full as necessary as skill in the conduct of a campaign. This is the first step which the author has taken in that process of reasoning by which he attempts to prove that youth and inexperience are alone adapted to the conduct of Government. The object at which he aims becomes more apparent as we advance.

Coningsby has been invited to spend a vacation at Beaumanoir, the seat of the Duke of ———, the father of one of his young associates. On his way, he meets with a stranger who rides a mare called "the Daughter of the Star," a pure Arab, as we are particularly informed, and who contrives to impress our hero with a vast opinion of his abilities. How far that opinion coincided with his deserts, we must leave to the imagination of the reader, after having furnished him with a few scraps of the conversation which took place between them, after dinner, if indeed it be not rather a lecture than a conversation.

Coningsby, in reply to some remarks of the stranger, ventures to say,

"When men are young they want experience."

"Great men NEVER WANT EXPERIENCE," said the stranger.

"But every body says that experience"—

"Is the best thing in the world—a treasure for me, for you, for millions. But for a creative mind less than nothing. Almost every thing that is great has been done by youth!"

"It is a creed at least flattering to our years," said Coningsby with a smile.

"Nay," said the stranger; "for life in general there is but one decree. Youth is a blunder; manhood a struggle; old age a regret. Do not suppose," he added smiling, "that I hold that youth is genius; all that I say is, that genius, when young, is divine. Why, the greatest captains of ancient and modern times, both conquered Italy at five at twenty. Youth, extreme youth, overthrew the Persian Empire. Don John of Austria won Lepanto at twenty-five—the greatest battle of modern times; had it not been for the jealousy of Philip, the next year he would have been Emperor of Mauritania. Gaston de Foix was only twenty-two when he stood a victor on the plain of Ravenna. Every one remembers Condé and Rocroi at the same age. Gustavus Adolphus died at thirty-eight. Look at his captains; that wonderful Duke of Weimar only thirty-six when he died. Banner himself, after all his miracles, died at forty-five. Cortez was little more than thirty, when he gazed on the golden cupolas of Mexico. When Maurice of Saxony died at thirty-two, all Europe acknowledged the loss of the greatest captain and the profoundest statesman of the age. Then there is Nelson, Clive—but these are warriors, and perhaps you may think there are greater things than war. I do not: I worship the Lord of Hosts. But take the illustrious achievements of civil prudence. Innocent III., the greatest of the popes, was the despot of Christendom at thirty-seven. John de Medici was a Cardinal at fifteen, and Guiccardini tells us baffled with his state craft Ferdinand of Arragon himself. He was pope as Leo X., at thirty-seven. Luther robbed even him of his richest province at thirty-five. Take Ignatius Loyola and John Wesley, they worked with young brains. Ignatius was only thirty when he made his pilgrimage and wrote the "Spiritual Exercises." Pascal wrote a great work at sixteen, and died at thirty-seven, the greatest of Frenchmen!

"Ah! that fatal age, thirty-seven, which reminds me of Byron, greater even as a man than as a poet. Was it experience that guided the pencil of Raphael when he painted the palaces of Rome? He died too at thirty-seven. Richelieu was Secretary of State at thirty-one. Well, then there are Bolingbroke and Pitt, both Ministers of State before other men leave off cricket. Grotius was in great practice at seventeen, and Attorney General at twenty-four. And Acquaviva—Acquaviva was General of the Jesuits, ruled every cabinet in Europe, and colonized America before he was thirty-seven. What a career," exclaimed the stranger rising from his chair, and walking up and down the room, "the secret sway of Europe! That was indeed a position! But it is needless to multiply instances. The history of heroes is the history of youth." (pp. 41-42.)

We doubt whether, in the whole range of modern literature, replete as it is with a peculiar species of eloquence, which the "sons of Ocean" are wont to denominate "slack-jaw," there can be found a more genuine specimen of the mock heroic, than the author has thought proper to give us in the passages quoted above. "Youth," says he, "is a blunder; manhood a struggle; old age a regret;" a wretched and most abortive parody upon that sublime passage in the 14th chapter of the Book of Job, which has been adopted in its burial service by the Church of England, "Man that is born of woman is of few days and full of trouble."

"But," continues this wonderful stranger, "do not suppose that I hold that youth is genius." Of course not, for Master Coningsby has just been told that it is a blunder; "All that I mean to say is, that genius when young is divine." And is it any less divine when old? Was the genius of Homer any less divine than that of Chatterton? Was that of Milton less divine than that of Henry Kirke White? Nay! to test the matter still more closely, did the genius of Milton partake more of the divinity, when he wrote the mask of Comus, than when he composed Paradise Lost?

But to go back a little. "Great men," says this stranger, who was certainly "the wonderful boy, or else Alroy," "never want experience." So then, as "great men never want experience," and as "genius when young is divine," Alexander would have done much more, had he commenced his career when he first mounted Bucephalus; Hannibal when his father swore him upon the altar, and Bonaparte when he left the school of Brienne. If "genius when young is divine," it follows as a matter of course, that the younger it is, the greater the portion of celestial fire it is entitled to. This however may look like hypercriticism.

Did it not strike Mr. D'Israeli, when he was gravely telling the world that every thing which was great had been accomplished by youth and inexperience, that Cæsar was forty-three before he commenced his career of conquest, that Cromwell was forty before he "set a squadron in the field, that Turenne, in the full possession of all his vigor and all his intellect, was killed at sixty-five, that Marlborough was fifty-four at the time of his first victory, (Blenheim,) that Prince Eugene defeated the Turks when upwards of eighty, that Frederick the Great was past his prime when the seven years war broke out, that Rodney was more than sixty when he gained all his laurels, and that Wellington did not command in the Peninsula until he was forty? These examples, and a thousand others equally as pertinent, prove any thing rather than the position he has thought fit to assume.

But the examples he has adduced, in support of the astounding theory, that "great men have no need of experience," are the most unfortunate for his cause, upon which he could possibly have fallen. If mighty deeds can be accomplished, by raw and inexperienced youth, the lives of Alexander, Hannibal and Bonaparte, at least furnish no proof of the fact. Let us try them by the test of history, commencing with Alexander the Great, who was the first in point of time.

That the Macedonian king was one of the most extraordinary specimens of human genius that the world has ever beheld, is a fact as incontrovertible, as that he has been more misunderstood and misrepresented by pretended historians, than any other man who possesses the least claim to immortality. Two thousand years ago, while commerce was yet in its infancy, he seems to have understood the importance of securing to his country the boundless wealth of "Ormus and of Ind" with as much clearness as the East India Company does at the present day. No statesman, even of these latter days, appears to have understood more thoroughly the great principles of political economy. He very early perceived that hoarded wealth was of no value to the community and that money is alone performing its proper functions, when it is in full and free circulation. The whole object of his government seems to have been to stimulate the industry of his subjects, and to open every channel by which capital could flow in upon them. It was for great political purposes, and not to gratify an insane lust of conquest, that he undertook the subjugation of the East. He knew very well that he should thereby open new fields of enterprise to his subjects, and drain into Greece the entire wealth of the Oriental World. It was the method, of all others, to place his native Macedon above Tyre and Sidon; and to make her at once the wonder and the envy of the world. All his invasions were conducted upon this principle. Every battle was a great political stroke, the ultimate object of which was the advancement in wealth of the people over whom he presided, or, at least, the means of widening the field of their enterprise. Posterity is astounded when informed, that Alexander, wielding despotic power, within the space of thirteen years built no less than thirty cities, which were named after him Alexandria, and extended all the way from the Mediterranean Sea—that those cities have been admired by travellers for their majestic appearance even when in ruins, not less than for the admirable foresight of their projector, who always selected situations the best adapted to securing his object, with an eye which belongs to genius alone. Napoleon could not restrain his admiration at the footprints of his mighty predecessor while in Egypt, and while on board the frigate which bore him back to France made a number of comments upon his actions, which probably impress the reader with a higher idea of Alexander's achievements than any other work that is to be found on the subject. They are to be found in De Bourrienne's memoirs.

Yet, though Alexander worked all his wonders and died at thirty-three, it is not to be inferred that he entered upon his career without the light of personal experience to guide him. His father, Philip, was the most warlike chieftain of the age—his whole life had been spent in arms. Had he lived, he would have left Alexander nothing to do. The latter was trained by Aristotle from the beginning for a great monarch—was deeply initiated by him into the art of government, and took, from the first, peculiar pleasure in the study of that art by which alone, in those days, it could be maintained; namely, the art of war. Accustomed to the society of his father's old Generals, who had dared death in a thousand shapes in the field, his warm imagination was, as a necessary consequence, filled with visions of adventures, escapes, war, battle and glory. He was carried at an early age by his father to the wars, and himself made two campaigns as a commander-in-chief, before he set out upon the grand object of his life; the conquest of the East. In these campaigns, made against a description of force very different from the gaudy legions of Persia, he acquired that experience, which is necessary to finish the education even of the greatest military genius.

In all the actions of this remarkable man, we see a wonderful adaptation of means to the end. When he met the effeminate and glittering troops of Darius upon the banks of the Granicus, deeming it most effectual in acting against troops of that description to strike terror into them by a single daring achievement, he plunged into the stream, followed only by a few horsemen, and having reached the opposite shore assaulted them sword in hand. This has been stigmatised by his detractors as the act of a madman; to us it bears the appearance of deep wisdom. It was evidently based upon mature calculation and a perfect knowledge of his enemies' character. He knew that they were effeminate and undisciplined—he knew that they would disperse at the first discomfiture—and it was true policy to strike them at once with astonishment and dismay, and to make them believe that he was invincible. How well he succeeded, the history of his subsequent campaigns amply proves.

But would Alexander have attempted the same thing, had Porus and his legions defended the pass of the Granicus? Had he done so, his triumphs would have had an early termination. It is indeed to be doubted whether, if he had met that great man, under even favorable circumstances, in Asia Minor, his career would not have been cut prematurely short. But before he came in contact with him, the only adversary he ever met worthy of his sword, he had by long experience grown to be a consummate commander. The campaign against him was of a nature altogether different from the several which he had made against Darius and his Persians. The latter were distinguished for a boldness and hardihood, verging upon rashness. Caution, circumspection, and the most skilful combinations, were the chief characteristics of the former. In both instances and by the pursuit of systems the most opposite, his triumph was signal. He thus proved himself alike master of the art of war in all its phases, and perfectly acquainted with the description of force with which he was called to contend. In both he acted upon the most profound calculation; his daring in the one, and his circumspection in the other, being alike the result of deep policy. Great and continued experience, combined with uncommon military talent, assisted by the most experienced officers of the age, enabled him to foil the veteran Porus, when genius alone, without experience, would have signally failed. That genius, and that experience would have produced the same results, had their subject been forty-five when he commenced his career, instead of twenty, as he actually was.

All mankind must admire, however reluctantly, the genius and the fortunes of Alexander the Great; but not for the reason assigned by Mr. D'Israeli, "that genius when young is divine." Does any man the less admire the immortal Roman, that object of almost stupid wonder to succeeding generations, because he entered upon his wonderful career at a mature age, when his mind was stored with wisdom, and his path lit by the lamps of experience?

The second example which our author has chosen is still more unfortunate for his theory than the first. It is that of the great Carthaginian General. Has Mr. D'Israeli never read that most spirited of all historians, Livy? And if he has, is it possible that he can have forgotten the inimitable pomp with which, in his twenty-first book, Hannibal, the true hero of this most epic of all histories, is introduced to the reader? Does he not recollect that sublime act of devotion recorded of Hamilcar, who is said to have led his son, when only nine years old, to the altar, and made him swear undying hostility to the Roman name? Can he have forgotten that the boy, when only fourteen years of age, his imagination no doubt even then teeming with visions of glory, entreated his father to carry him along with him to the army in Spain? Does he not recollect that this request, simple as it may appear to us, was made the subject of grave debate in the Carthaginian Senate, and that Hanno, the constant enemy of the Barcinian name, exclaimed in a voice, which afterwards proved prophetic, "take care, lest out of this small spark, a great conflagration may be kindled!" Can the conduct of the future hero, during the lives of his father Hamilcar, and his successor Mago—the eagerness with which he sought employment in every enterprise of difficulty and danger—the dauntless courage and consummate skill, with which he conducted them to a successful issue—the admiration of the troops, who recognized in him the genuine son of their great commander—his contempt of ease—his disregard of dress—his untiring perseverance in the pursuit of professional knowledge—his temperance—his patience of hunger and of cold—the readiness with which he threw himself on the ground when he wished to sleep, without even the covering of a cloak—the various means which he took to harden his body preparatory to undertaking the great task which he always seemed to think would devolve upon him—can all these things have escaped the memory of Mr. D'Israeli? Not to remember them is to forget the most striking passage, in the most spirited, the most exciting and the most picturesque narrative that was ever produced by a human pen.

At fifteen, Hannibal entered the army of Spain. At twenty-five, on the death of Mago, he was called to the supreme command by those veteran troops whom his father had so often led to victory. In all that vast and disciplined multitude, among whom he had so long lived, and to whom he was so well known, there was not, as far as is known, one dissenting voice. Had he been without experience, nay, had his experience not been at least equal to that of any other within the range of selection, is it fair to presume that the choice would have been so unanimous?

But he was destined, even then, to obtain much experience before he came down upon the provinces of Rome, and the fruit of that experience appears in all his Italian campaigns. By the most skilful manœuvring, with an inferior army, he crossed the Tagus, in the face of 100,000 men—fierce warriors—belonging to a nation renowned for their bravery, and put the greater part of them to the sword! The experience thus gained was of lasting benefit. From the peculiar nature of the countries through which he passed to Italy, he was compelled to cross more rivers in the face of an enemy than any other General of antiquity, and none other has displayed so many resources and so much skill in that peculiar species of service. On the other hand, he was taught by the siege of Saguntum, which lasted nine months, and cost him a vast number of men, that the troops which he commanded were not adapted to that species of warfare, and accordingly we find that no General ever engaged so seldom in enterprises of that nature. Thus, before he entered Italy, was he taught, by experience, two valuable lessons, the want of which might have caused him infinite vexation and much loss, and the possession of which contributed in no small degree to the formation of the high reputation he still sustains among military men.

When Hannibal actually descended upon Italy, he was already, though only twenty-seven, the most experienced General in the world. He had fought two or three great battles in Spain, in which he was uniformly victorious—had conducted one of the most memorable sieges recorded in history to a successful termination—had made a march of fifteen hundred miles through the bosom of warlike and hostile nations, had defeated Scipio on the Rhone, and had scaled the Alps in spite of the resistance of their rude and warlike inhabitants. He had an army inured to victory—placing the highest confidence in his conduct—and ready to follow him to the end of the world. Surely it cannot be said that Hannibal performed his great deeds before he had gained any experience.

With regard to Napoleon, it is true, that he had gained less experience, in the field, before his first campaign, than either of those last mentioned. But he was bred to arms from childhood—had studied the campaigns of the masters with the greatest assiduity—and had passed through all the grades from a cadet to the lieutenant general. He had moreover commanded an expedition to Ajaccio—had directed the operations of the Artillery at Toulon—and made one campaign as a general of brigade, in the army of the Alps, afterwards called the army of Italy, being in fact that very army with which he made his first campaigns. He had thus formed an acquaintance with the men and officers of the army he was afterwards destined to command—perfectly understood their character and capabilities,—had an accurate acquaintance with the ground on which he was to operate and knew the enemy's mode of fighting. These, to a genius like that of Napoleon, were advantages, the value of which it is impossible to estimate, and doubtless contributed largely to the success of his celebrated campaign in Italy. That this campaign was the most extraordinary first campaign of which there is any record, we believe is conceded by all military men. But it has been made a question by a profound military writer* whether at that time he would have been capable of performing those extraordinary combinations which distinguished the campaign of 1807.

These three extraordinary men, were instances of what genius guided by experience was able to effect. The latter has declared, in his review of the Baron De Jomini's work, that experience is superior to all theory, and so far from being the creature of fortune as described by Sir Walter Scott, he ascended the ladder of promotion slowly and painfully at first, not missing a single round, until he reached the top. True his accession toward the last was uncommonly rapid; but it was all earned by hard service.

* Col. Napier.

But though genius without experience has never yet been able to sustain itself for any long period, it has occasionally performed brilliant achievements, as we see in the case of Gaston de Foix. Singular, isolated acts, however, do not constitute the great General. The conduct of campaigns can alone give a title to that designation.

The battle of Rocroi was a brilliant achievement, it is true; but Condé was never the great Condé until he had been taught by Turenne, that something more than brilliant valor was necessary to constitute a finished commander. No man was more cautious and circumspect than he, when in presence of his redoubtable rival, and we hear no more of brilliant victories gained, as it were, by a coup de main, and armies routed by a single charge of the fiery young chivalry of France.

Mr. D'Israeli informs us that Cortes saw the cupolas of Mexico at thirty. He does not tell us that he had been engaged in war against the Moors from his boyhood to that period.

With regard to the poets and painters whom he has placed in array, in support of his theory, it may be sufficient to say, that few could detect in the Hours of Idleness the future author of Manfred, or the last canto of Childe Harold; nor, we imagine, could any but the eye of prophecy itself discover in the first rude efforts of Raphael, the pencil which has rendered its possessor immortal. The poet and the painter obtained immortality by the only process, by which it is attainable; by long practice, hard study, and the continual self-rivalry which can alone lead to fame. Of the statesmen whom he has mentioned, it may be barely necessary to say that Bolingbroke and Pitt were trained for Parliament from their earliest youth. Though they came to the head of government in early youth, they had already acquired a vast fund of experience. Of Cardinal Richelieu the same thing may be said. But we have been speaking all this time of men of great and overshadowing genius. Some of them it takes a thousand years to produce; few of them appear more than once in an age. If the sternest experience has been found necessary to mature their great powers, how many years will take to render "Young England," with all her crudities, fit for the conduct of the Government! How long before Mr. D'Israeli, and those whose opinions, as a class, he represents, will be able to fill the shoes of Peel and Wellington? He has conceded that some experience is necessary for all but great men. Would he have the Government placed in the hands of persons devoid of it, merely that they may have an opportunity to prove themselves great men! For our own parts, we should conceive the experiment extremely delicate, if not imminently hazardous.

Experience then is the great guide of man. It is a lamp hung up behind him, which casts its rays far before on the path he is pursuing. It is of little moment at what age it be acquired. Whether at twenty-five, which was the age at which William Pitt became premier, or at forty-eight, which was the age of his father when he reached the same eminence. To maintain that youth, even when blessed with experience, is the only or even most common season of great deeds, is wilfully to shut the eyes to the lights of history. But to hold that youth, merely because it is youth, without the smallest ray of experience, should be entrusted with matters of the gravest importance, and requiring the maturest wisdom, is a deadly sin against the dictates of common sense.

It is natural, however, that men should endeavor to show their strongest points to the greatest advantage. Mr. D'Israeli and his "Young England" politicians can alone hope to compass their end by unseating older and more experienced statesmen. It is therefore, perhaps, the true policy to decry those points in their personal history, which the majority of the world is inclined to regard as a recommendation. If they can prove that years and experience form a disqualification, it follows as a matter of course, that youth and inexperience are the best cards of introduction to public service. How the establishment of this rule is to operate in favor of the author, who is no longer a "wonderful boy," it passes our ability to see.

So much for the political opinions set forth in this work. In other respects, this novel abounds even more than is usual with productions from the same source, with that most distressing of all species of composition, usually denominated "fine writing." Rarely does the author let himself down to the level of an ordinary capacity—frequently is his style so mystical, that we can account for it in no other way than by supposing that he is in a state of "clairvoyance." The Scotchman's definition of Metaphysics, "a thing which the writer does not understand himself and which he can make no one else comprehend," occurs to us on every page. This mysticism is so complete that we are sometimes almost tempted to believe that the author is not always in possession of his own meaning. What, for instance, can the reader make out of the following mysterious paragraph?

"There are some books when we close them—one or two in the course of our life—difficult as it may be to analyze or ascertain the cause, our minds appear to have made a great leap. A thousand obscure things receive light; a multitude of indefinite feelings are determined. Our intellect grasps and grapples with all subjects, with a capacity, a flexibility and a vigor, before unknown to us. It masters questions hitherto perplexing, which are not even touched or referred to in the volume just closed. What is this magic! It is the spirit of the supreme author that, by a magnetic influence, blends with our sympathizing intelligence, directs and inspires it. By that mysterious sensibility, we extend to questions, which he has not treated, the same intellectual force which he has exercised over those which he has expounded. His genius for a time remains in us. 'Tis the same with human beings as with books. All of us encounter, at least once in our lives, some individual who utters words that make us think forever. There are men whose phrases are oracles; who condense in a sentence the secrets of life; who blurt out an aphorism that forms a character, or illustrates an existence. A great thing is a great book; but greater than all is the talk of a great man!"

We confess we have never met with books of the rare and miraculous character here described; nor should we have been aware of their existence but for this voluntary revelation of Mr. D'Israeli. The Novum Organum is, beyond doubt, the wisest of uninspired productions, and if any book could work the marvellous effects alluded to by the author, this, of all others, would be it. Yet the majority of minds, nay, any mind except one like that of Mr. D'Israeli, revelling in all the luxuries of clairvoyance, might read the Novum Organum for months without receiving any definite ideas upon the binomial theorem, and might even commit it to memory, without being enlightened upon the four cardinal rules of arithmetic. Those must be rare books of which the author speaks, which professing to treat, and actually treating of one subject only, yet shed a flood of light upon all. It is said, indeed, that persons in a state of clairvoyance, become omniscient—that they dive into the human frame, and discover the seat and the causes of disease—that they penetrate the secrets of the human heart, which were before scrutable to eternal wisdom alone—that they ascend to the sun, the moon and the planets, and hold familiar converse with the denizens of the entire solar system—that the gates of the most abstruse sciences are open to them, and that all knowledge lies perfectly level to their comprehension. But we had never imagined that there were any volumes in existence, which could produce the same magical effect. It is due to science, that Mr. D'Israeli should disclose the names of these rare and valuable works. The process by which this singular effect is produced, is described with a clearness, which would have entitled the author, beyond all doubt, to a seat upon the tripod had he lived in the days of heathen Rome or Greece. "A magnetic influence blends with our sympathizing intelligence, directs, and inspires it." If this is not downright mesmerism, what is it? The same influence is ascribed to certain men. Those "whose phrases are oracles!" The author is one of them, so far at least as mysticism is an element of prophecy. "Who condense in a sentence the secrets of life;" we should very much like to know what is meant by "the secrets of life;" "who blurt out an aphorism that forms a character, or illustrates an existence." We acknowledge ourselves indebted to Mr. D'Israeli for a new idea. We had thought before that character was to be formed by education, experience and robbing against the world. In our ignorance we had supposed that it was the work of years, and never dreamed that it could be effected by the utterance of a proverb. What a pity it is, that Sancho Panza, instead of following the Knight of La Mancha about as his squire, had not assumed the chair pedagogic, and applied himself to the task of "forming character." He would have been altogether without a rival; for no man ever had such a number of proverbs at command.

Jesting aside, however, we believe we understand the kind of books to which the author alludes. They are the revelations of the German Illuminati, vague and mystical, producing infinite confusion in the mind of the reader, and leaving him with the impression that he has mastered all learning, whereas in effect they have taught him nothing. Of all others in the world, we hold them to be least calculated to bestow any lasting benefit on the student. On the contrary, they produce a confusion of ideas, and leave him "dark and puzzled" for the rest of his life. To the political aspirant, whose vocation requires method and clearness above all others, we should judge them particularly fatal. Our readers doubtless recollect the interview between Mephistopheles and the young German student, when the fiend assumed the gown of the doctor, and made answer to the various interrogatories propounded by the eager votary of knowledge. It was his object to puzzle and confound the raw youth—to give a vagueness and indistinctness to all of his perceptions—to confuse his ideas of right and wrong—and thus leave him a victim ready for the sacrifice, when he thought proper to enslave his soul after the barriers of truth had been broken down.

As a matter of curiosity we cannot refrain from giving Mr. D'Israeli's definition of "a great man." It is found in the paragraph next to that last quoted, (p. 43.)

"And what is a great man? Is it a victorious General! A gentleman in the Windsor uniform! A field marshal covered with stars? Is it a prelate or a Prince? A King or an Emperor? It may be all these; yet these, as we must daily feel, are not necessarily great men. A GREAT MAN IS ONE WHO AFFECTS THE MIND OF HIS GENERATION; whether he be a monk in his cloister agitating Christendom, or a monarch crossing the Granicus, and giving law to the Pagan world."

This definition of "a great man" is utterly at war with all experience. The greatest genius the world ever saw, was neglected during the life of its possessor—he passed long years of misery, unnoticed, unknown, or known only to be despised. It was only after he had filled the grave of a beggar, that his immortal works began to be estimated at their true value, and that seven famous cities of Greece contended for the honor of having given him birth. The very record of his labors and his trials has been swept from the face of the earth, and modern criticism, unwilling to accord so much genius to a single individual, has endeavored to part his works among a number of obscure and insignificant names. If it be contended, that this was a consequence of the remote age in which he lived, an age long anterior to the first dawn of literature, how then are we to account for the exile and death of Dante, whose immortal poems produced so little impression upon his contemporaries, that they could not preserve their author from the persecutions of a miserable faction? It is evident that his generation saw in him, not the author of the "Divina Commedia," but the adherent of the Ghibbine faction—not the mighty poet, whose work was to live through all time, and to survive the ruin of the language in which it is written, but the party-man, whose adherence to a falling junto was a sufficient warrant for exile, confiscation and every ill attendant upon the want of success in politics—not the immortal genius whose works and whose sufferings were destined to render his native Florence infamously illustrious through all succeeding time, but the stern and inflexible advocate of principles considered dangerous by the party in power. Never did any man fail more signally to "affect the mind of his generation." He was cast forth from his native city, to become immortal in a foreign land. He "sleeps afar," and the cheek of the Florentine is tinged with shame, when he is asked for the tomb of his mighty countryman. All the cities of Italy contend for the honor of having been each the particular spot at which his great poem was composed, though few during his life were willing to allow him to rest the sole of his weary foot within their precincts.

When Copernicus revived the theory of Pythagoras, that the sun was the centre of the system, and that all the planets, of which the earth was reckoned one, revolved around it, in order to avoid the persecution of the clergy, he dedicated his work to the pope; and in his dedication, after declaring most solemnly, that there was nothing in it to contradict the Mosaic account of the creation, he took care to say, that his theory was a mere speculation, designed to awaken investigation, and was not to be taken as asserting undeniable facts. He escaped persecution from the quarter in which it was apprehended; but if we are to put any faith in the declaration of Kepler, he did not escape the derision of an age which was unable to appreciate either the merits of the man, or the importance of his discovery.

Who can contemplate Gallileo languishing in prison, for expressing his belief in what no one at this time of day would dream of denying, without concluding that he at least had failed to "affect the mind of his generation."

Has Mr. D'Israeli forgotten through how many courts Columbus was forced to travel before he found a patron who could understand him, in the person of Isabella, Queen of Castile?

When Bacon gave the Novum Organum to the world, he perfectly well knew that the generation in which it was written could never comprehend him. He expressly declares that he writes for posterity, and with that consciousness of power, which is ever the inmate of great minds, expresses a confident belief that posterity will do him justice. During his life he was distinguished as the brilliant courtier—the enemy and rival of Essex—the bitter foe of Lord Coke—the bribed judge—and the unwavering supporter of the royal prerogative. It was generations after his death, before he began to be considered what he really was,

"The wisest—brightest—meanest of mankind."

How long was it before England and the world began to understand the deep wisdom of Raleigh's views, in the settlement of the Northern portion of South America? His "generation" regarded him as a mere pirate—a desperate adventurer—a man bent only upon the advancement of his own fortunes. But had the besotted prince, under whose reign he perished, or the age to which he belonged, understood his views, as they are understood by posterity, he would have stood forth among them a miracle of wisdom, instead of a speculating fool—a statesman of the most gigantic proportions, instead of a wild and desperate adventurer. But the greatest genius to which England has given birth—the man who in this particular can alone compete with the "blind old man of Scio's rocky isle," failed as signally to "affect the mind of his generation," as did either of his contemporaries, Bacon or Raleigh. We take it for granted, that he did so fail, because every generation is apt to contain memorials of those who deeply affect it. But what memorial have we of Shakspeare? The very prints of him, which are prefixed to every edition of his works, are taken from a portrait, which may as well be the portrait of any one else. There is not one anecdote related of him, which is known to be authentic; there is not one, which has not in turn been asserted and denied by the thousand and one commentators, who have attempted to go down to posterity by fastening themselves to the skirts of his coat! It is known that he was born at Stratford upon Avon, in April, 1564, and that he died on his birthday in the same town in 1616. The parish register tells us so much, and this is all we know with any degree of certainty; the rest is all wild, vague, unsatisfactory conjecture. The very works which conveyed his name to posterity were not published until fourteen years after his death, and this too, in an age distinguished above all others for its great men; an age in which Sydney and Essex, Cecil and Walsingham, Raleigh and Bacon successively rose and disappeared, like brilliant stars in a firmament peculiarly adapted to set off their lustre to the best advantage. Does the reader want any better proof, that the humble player was wanting in Mr. D'Israeli's main essential to true greatness? In other words, that he had failed to "affect the mind of his generation?"

The last, but by no means the least, example remains behind. When we see Milton in the depth of poverty, at an age when most men are apt to think their task in life already accomplished, encompassed with darkness and surrounded by foes, from year to year steadily pursuing the great work which places his name first on the roll of English poets, we are apt to enquire what was the reward of so much toil! When we reflect, that the work, produced amid so many disadvantages, was "Paradise Lost," we are lost in amazement to find that it brought the author the EXACT SUM OF FOURTEEN POUNDS, neither more nor less; that it fell almost still-born from the press—and that two generations passed, before it began, slowly enough, to be estimated at its proper value! But the great bard was by no means disappointed at his apparent failure. With a sublime confidence in his own powers, he waited for the judgment of posterity, and well has his patience been repaid. "One Milton, a blind man," says Lord Chancellor Whitelock, "wrote the answer to Salmasius—that celebrated 'Defensio Populi Anglicani,' which in despite of the hypercriticism of Johnson, will always maintain the very highest place among the specimens of modern Latinity."

Such in all ages has been the lot of genius. The age in which it exists is never able to comprehend it, for the simple reason that it is always in advance of it. The mind of the present generation is fixed upon the events that are continually occurring around it, while genius marches in front, and pitches its standard far in the dark and unexplored region of futurity. It is only when mankind slowly march up to it, that the value of the pioneer begins to be estimated! The far-sighted statesman, who sees the permanent interest of his country at a glance, and lays his plans with a view to the future, is almost sure to be despised by the generation of which he is a member; while the mere politician, who governs by expedients of a temporary nature, is usually the idol of the rabble. A Newcastle, or a North, would elicit the applause of the same multitude, which would execrate a Godolphin, or a Chatham. If any thing were wanting to confirm the truth of the view here presented, let the reader call to mind the fate of Barneveldt and the two Dewitts, who perished merely because their genius ran ahead of the age in which they lived.

But the most remarkable instance of contemporary injustice upon record, is to be found in the person of Niccolo Machiavelli, the profound statesman, the elegant historian, the man of universal acquirements. Notwithstanding a life of singular purity, passed in an age of corruption, when it was some merit to be honest, he has been handed down to posterity as the most execrable wretch that ever lived to libel mankind, and his great work, "Il Principe," which, if properly understood, is one of the most exquisite satires upon the craft, cruelty, and ambition, that distinguished the Princes of his day, has been, by a strange perversity of intellect, understood in a literal sense by succeeding generations, and its author branded as a monster of iniquity. Yet there was no man whose heart swelled higher with every sentiment that would do honor to the man and the patriot—none who recurred with fonder reverence to the day when his country was free, or who more ardently wished to see every human being in the enjoyment of as much freedom as was consistent with obedience to the laws, and as much happiness as is compatible with the imperfect nature of man. His whole life was a continued struggle with poverty, in an age and a country, when pliancy of principle was a certain road to wealth, and when virtue was a quality always in the market. But he is at length reaping the sure reward of genius and of virtue; posterity begins at length to understand his great work in the sense in which he intended it; and men will now recognize in him the most profound of politicians—the most subtle of reasoners—the most finished of satirists, and what is better than all, the warmest of patriots, and truest of philanthropists.

"Saul, Saul," said the Roman pro-consul, when the great Apostle of the Gentiles first laid open to his inspection the sublime truths of that creed, which was destined to overthrow the mighty system of fraud and imposture, which formed the Religion of ancient Rome, "much learning hath made thee mad." As the heathen Governor of India thought with regard to the precepts of Christianity, so do the mass invariably judge of the inspirations of genius, and it is vain to say "I am not mad, but speak the words of truth and soberness." Who does not sympathise with Fulton, upon reading his celebrated letter to a friend, in which he gives an account of his first experiment upon the waters of the Hudson? The fear of ridicule, which induced some to withhold their countenance, the certainty that he would fail, which kept others from contributing their support, the sneers of the cynical, and the compassion of the friendly! Who does not feel his respect for the projector increase, when he sees him without support, without encouragement, abandoned by friends as a man who was worthy of bedlam, sneered at by the super-sapient as one whom the gods had driven mad, and were now in the very act of destroying, steadily pursuing his object in the full confidence of ultimate and complete success. Yet Fulton was gathered to his fathers before his prophetic visions had assumed the substantial form of history.

All history proves this definition of a "great man" to be utterly without foundation. It is time and time alone, that can ascertain the just claims of any human being to be considered great. Time alone can mellow and sanctify the deeds which aspire to the merit of greatness. It is this species of immortality, the thirst for which has been called the "last infirmity of a great mind," that can alone put the seal upon every thing that is really and intrinsically great! And of those who have been preserved by the judgment of posterity, how few are there who have "affected the mind of their generation!" In opposition to Mr. D'Israeli, we find Sir Walter Scott expressing an apprehension that his novels would not go down to posterity, for the very reason that they had been so well received by the age in which they were written; in other words because he had so powerfully "affected the mind of his generation."

Those men who have been found most to "affect the mind of their generation" have, in general, been such as have flattered its foibles, or been foremost in prosecuting the ephemeral objects of the day. They have occupied themselves with the topics which occupy the minds of their contemporaries. They have followed where the multitude lead the way. They have been popular, because they are on a level with the crowd. They have not, like the man of genius, to fear that they will be misunderstood by their generation. They take their tone from the crowd, and do not seek to impress the image of their mind upon the age. The flashy orator, who understands how to heighten an excitement already existing, the ready paragraph-writer of a daily newspaper, who dexterously wields, to his own purpose, the passions and the prejudices of the mob, the skilful demagogue, who understands perfectly the materials upon which he is to operate, knows the weak points of the populace, and plays upon them with success, these are the men who most "affect the mind of their generation." Of such there are hundreds in this country; and each of them, according to the theory of Mr. D'Israeli, is a greater man than Bacon, Raleigh, Locke, or Godolphin!!

We have been carried much farther in our remarks upon this subject, than we had supposed possible, when we first commenced. We have no doubt our readers will agree with us in considering it time but indifferently spent. There is just as little probability, that the English nation will become converted to the peculiar faith of "Young England," as there is, that the silly and mischievous book upon which we have commented, will be popular with any but the more sublimated portion of the transcendentalists. To both at once, to "Young England" and to Coningsby we bid a "long good night," reserving for the author the usual monumental inscription, requiescat in pace.

WOODWORTH.

Did'st know him friend! 'tis said his mind,
Mild, gentle, radiant and refined,
Was like Heaven's own ethereal blue,
When bright and pure 'tis beaming through
The gentle genial summer showers,
Smiling to cheer the young sweet flowers.
The thrilling joy, the wild delight,
That wraps the poet's vision'd sight,
With playful ease, his powers control,
And back the waves of darkness roll
From nature's bower, while fancy's dreams
Wake into life like morning beams.
Gifted and guileless naught knew he
Of worldly cold economy:
Patient endured from youth to age,
The poet's earthly heritage,
Fortune's dark frowns. She ever shuns
Nature's deserving virtuous sons:
While artful flatterers fill her train,
Must honest merit sup on fame.
What marvel that the radiant mind,
By heaven's eternal truth design'd
To attest the unknown reality

Of man's bright immortality,
Stoops not to mingle in the throng
Where passion's votaries whirl along?
He touch'd the harp, and sweetly 'round
The soul-inspiring notes resound.
The silver chords so gaily prest,
Woke symphony in every breast;
Now, as the lightning's beams intense,
In thunder-pealing eloquence,—
All plaintive as the mourning dove,
And gently whispered thoughts of love.
Sorrow forgot the bitter tear,
Towering ambition paused to hear,
Avarice on tiptoe glided near,
Hoarding sweet sounds with greedy ear.
Dost doubt me, friend? Go ask the brave
Whose manly tears adorn his grave:
Ask of the great who toil for fame,
And they will bid thee read his name
Inscribed upon Columbia's dome,
And proudly claim him all her own.

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

Braxton Bragg.
NO. VI.

"An army is a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man."—Locke.

TO THE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON:

In contrasting the cost of our military establishment with that of England, and showing the great disparity existing between the expense of maintaining the soldier in their service and in ours, it has been stated, that "our Staff is enormously large and expensive, compared with the line of our Army."* This expression may be made to bear an interpretation not intended, and one which would not be sustained by facts and sound reasoning: but so far as it will apply and is intended to be used, it strengthens the positions assumed and gains force by being qualified. It was never intended to apply to every branch taken separately, but to the Staff of the Army as a whole; some corps of which, it is readily admitted, are by no means larger or more expensive than they should be. But when this is acknowledged to be the case, how disproportionately large, unwieldy and expensive must other branches be to produce the disparity proved to exist by the comparisons just referred to.

CORPS OF TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.

In reference to this corps serious doubts are entertained, and a variety of opinions expressed on the propriety of registering and paying, as a part of the military establishment, a set of officers with military rank, but who have no connection, even the most remote, with the Army. They have no feeling in common with it, except in so far as it gives them rank and title, with the privilege of exercising their taste in bedecking themselves with gorgeous uniforms and displaying at their sides a sword which they well know was never intended for use.

Our service is now honored with two corps of Engineers. One of them, the Military Engineers, as they are usually termed, (in contradistinction, I suppose, to the others, which are certainly not military,) a legitimate portion of every Army, and without which it is imperfect and unsuited for military operations upon proper scientific principles. The other is termed "Topographical Engineers," and in their nature are neither civil, naval nor military. Shortly after the organization of this corps in 1838, for up to that time it had no organization, a serious controversy ensued between it and the Engineer corps proper, for the ascendancy. The province of the Military Engineers had never before this been invaded; but the success attending the endeavors of our "Topographical Engineers" to secure a great addition to their numbers, and the promotion consequent to that success were so exhilarating as to inspire them with a belief that, with due diligence and attention, they might supplant the Military Engineers, or, at least, be associated with them in their high and important duties. But in this, fortunately for the reputation and character of our "Engineer corps," they were unsuccessful; and those works which have been planned and commenced by our able and diligent Military Engineers are left to be finished and perfected by their scientific projectors. This just but unexpected decision left the "Topographical Engineers" no alternative, but to fall back and seek such employment as might be offered by any other branch of the government; not a foothold being left for them on the military platform. It now hangs like the Indian department, on the skirts of the Army, with an additional and very objectionable feature—the military rank conferred upon its officers—to which they have no stronger claim than Indian agents, if we except that of possession.

The original right in the one case to be considered a part of our military establishment is about as great as it is in the other. The only advantage accruing to the Army is a privilege, graciously granted, to father their expenditures: a repudiation of which would now be considered as treason. That the duties of this corps are independent of and distinct from those of the Army, or any branch of it, will fully appear by reference to the estimates of its chief.

For the fiscal year, ending the 30th of June, 1845, he estimates for the gross sum of $1,341,716. By a minute examination of the detailed items which make up that sum, it is seen that but two of them can by any possibility be made to refer to the Army or the military defences of the country. These two amount to the inconsiderable sum of $30,000. For the fiscal year preceding this, the sum of $1,181,500 was asked for by this department; about the same proportion of which was applicable to the military defences of the country. And for this insignificant service rendered our military defences—the application of $30,000 a year—the Army is made to bear an annual burden of $70,000 for the support of this corps of officers. It would seem to be more appropriate that the whole establishment, officers, appropriations and expenditures should be attached to and accounted for by the Treasury or Navy Department, or divided between the two. The "erection of light-houses and improvement of rivers and harbors," for which nearly the whole of their appropriations are asked, are certainly more intimately connected with those departments than with the military. That, however, would be a sad blow, as it would relieve them from the burden of "our sword," and with that would fall all "pomp and circumstance of glorious war."

* Sou. Lit. Mess., May, 1844.

The annual cost for the payment of this corps of officers is about $53,000. If we add to this the commutation which they receive for allowances not drawn in kind, and the expenses attending their periodical changes from North to South, and from South to North again, we shall find a sum exceeding that which has been assumed as the annual expense incurred for their support. Whether these periodical journeys, which have secured to their performers the appellation of "birds of passage," and which occur about the time of the vernal and autumnal equinoxes, are to be attributed to the affinity existing between this astronomical era and these devotees of science, or whether they result from the faithful discharge of some unknown and mysterious duty, has not yet been made known with sufficient certainty to admit of comment.

It is entirely unnecessary to go into a detailed account of the duties done by the officers of this corps, and the time occupied therein, since it is contended they have no legitimate connection with the Army; and are merely joined to it for convenience sake, if not for deception. As this position is denied, however, and military rank, privileges and prerogatives are claimed, a reference to the origin, progress and present condition of the corps, as compared with the Army, will show it has never been regulated by the latter nor associated with it in the discharge of any but the most trivial services. In the year 1814, when the aggregate strength of our Army was over 60,000, and it was engaged on active service, there were attached to it nine officers called "Topographical Engineers" and their assistants. By an act of the 3rd of March, 1815, which reduced the strength of the Army to 10,000, these officers were unprovided for. In 1816, three "Topographical Engineers" were added to this Army of 10,000 men. In 1821, again, when the aggregate strength of the Army was reduced to 6,000, the number of these officers was increased to ten. When that memorable Staff act of the 5th of July, 1838, became a law, the strength of the Army advanced to 12,500 from about 7,500. Not so slow, however, with these "birds of passage," they made a leap at once from ten to thirty-six, including just double the number of field officers allowed a regiment of troops. When the Army was again reduced in 1842 to near about 8,000, not a single reduction occurred in this corps. Where now is the relation to be found between this "corps of Topographical Engineers," and the Army? Since 1838, additions have been made to the thirty-six officers of this corps, by the appointment annually of Brevet Second Lieutenants from the graduates of the Military Academy, until their number has increased to forty, sometimes more. This latter circumstance has, to a great extent, contributed to that violent opposition shown to the Academy within a few years past, which is now on the increase and will continue until the custom of por-verting the intentions of the institution is reformed. Unless it is reformed, the injurious effect must prove serious, and when that noble institution falls, as I fear it is destined to do, from an accumulation of ills, the days of honor and pride in the Army are over.

The officers of this corps of "Topographical Engineers" are mostly distributed to the large and pleasant cities of the country, principally on the sea-board, and in numbers varying from one to six, engaged probably one third of their time whilst the appropriations last, which is not more than half the year on an average. It is frequently a cause of merriment to hear the juniors at these places "define their positions"—gravely asserting that they are assistants to Captain —, and in the next breath most innocently admitting the Captain has nothing to do, but expects to have when Congress makes another appropriation. This they all most ardently desire, as they suffer excessively from ennui, especially during the dull seasons.

It is a matter scarcely within my scope, but I cannot refrain from remarking to those of our statesmen who are opposed to the splendid schemes of "internal improvement, by the general government," which have been frequently started in our country and as frequently put down, that, in sustaining this corps of officers, they are merely paving the way to a vast expenditure of public money on river and harbor improvements, which many of them believe to be unconstitutional.

The detailed estimates of this department, annually submitted to Congress, show that nineteen twentieths of the money expended by this corps of officers, is upon schemes of "internal improvement;" the most violent opponents of which—Southern members of Congress—are the very men who afford the most generous support to the Army, including this disavowed and uncongenial member; unconscious they are fostering a system against which they entertain a most inveterate and uncompromising hostility.

A very strong reason why this corps of officers should not be considered a part of the military establishment, and its members clothed with military rank, is the fact that such rank renders them eligible to seats on Courts-Martial, for which they are entirely unsuited. Their positions and duties are not such as to induce them to study military law, or to regard it even as coming within the scope of their duties. And, besides, they are from necessity utterly ignorant of the "customs of service," by which we are as much bound as the civilian is by the common law of the land. Indeed, the members of our courts are sworn to be governed by "the custom of war in like cases," when any point shall arise not fully explained by law. Many of the officers of this corps, it is known, were at one time in the line of the Army, and were then probably conversant with the laws and customs of service: but others there are who never have been, and since their appointment to this corps have had no opportunity of learning what they are sworn to abide by when placed on Courts-Martial. Yet from these men, no doubt very able, competent and efficient in their proper sphere—over a drawing-board with a lead-pencil, india-ink and a goose-quill—we frequently see selected members of a Court-Martial who are to set as judges in cases involving the commission of an officer, or the life of a soldier.

The remark of a committee at the last session of Congress, in their report on the system of compensation, &c., in the Army, applies with equal, if not greater force to its organization. "The evils and abuses * * * appear to have been the results of piece-meal legislation—legislation made upon the spur of the occasion, for a particular purpose, and afterwards permitted to remain for general uses." The Army is at length made up of "shreds and patches," having been alternately increased and diminished until it is necessary for one to read a moderate size volume, in order to arrive at its organization. Which, by a peculiar facility of interpretation, possessed only at head quarters, can be so read as to mean any thing, or nothing, according to the whim or caprice of the moment. Light Artillery seems to be the prevailing mania at present, and to that the law has made its bow with becoming submission. Viewed in all its parts, our organization now bears a strong resemblance to the Irishman's blanket, which he had lengthened by cutting off from one end and sewing on to the other until the whole fabric was destroyed, and though his time and labor were gone, he was mortified to find a complete failure in attaining his object. It will before long become necessary to pass another law with the strange but significant title of, "An act to ascertain and fix the military establishment of the United States." To accomplish the first part of the requirement in such an act would require "a special committee with authority to send for persons and papers." Our present organization and the laws applicable thereto, can by no possible contortion be made to harmonize. Some of the variations from law are probably improvements, but because the end is a good one, the means, being in violation of law, are not justifiable. One of these violations is to be found in the appointment of Brevet Second Lieutenants in the corps of Topographical Engineers.

THE CORPS OF ENGINEERS.

This corps, usually called "Military Engineers" in contradistinction to the others, which are civil if any thing, was considerably increased with the other Staff corps in 1838; and although it is large beyond all proportion in comparison with the strength of the Army, yet few doubt the expediency of the increase, when the present condition of our military defences is considered, in addition to the vast extent of sea-board we have entirely unfortified. Were our country in a perfect state of defence, so far as military works could make it, we did even an approximation to it exist, it would be inexpedient to maintain a corps of Engineers large enough for an army of 100,000 men. But there is no probability, that within the next half century sound policy will admit of the reduction of our present corps, so ably and efficiently officered. It is a source of great annoyance to these officers, and one of no little loss to the government, that appropriations have been dealt out with such parsimonious hand. Works have to be suspended, materials laid-up, implements disposed of and hands discharged, because appropriations are not regularly made and in sufficient quantities—for make they must be, sooner or later. The officers of this corps, when the necessity exists, will perform all the duties of a military nature now assigned to Topographical Engineers, in much less time and with far more ability.

* Act approved 30th May, 1796.

THE MEDICAL STAFF.

In this branch of our Staff is to be found another instance of the necessity of regulating the number of officers by the peculiar circumstances under which their services are to be rendered. If our little Army were concentrated for operations in the field, as a body, we should have medical officers enough for ten times the duties to be performed. But scattered over a vast extent of country in small detachments, remote in many instances from all intercourse with the world, it becomes absolutely necessary that our corps of medical officers should be proportioned to the number of positions to be supplied. Having had most favorable opportunities of judging, both as patient and observer, I should be doing violence to my own feelings, were I making any mention of this department, to withhold my most cordial and sincere acknowledgments to its officers for their devotion to duty, and the ability with which they perform it. This subject has been sometimes referred to by the Surgeon General, in his annual reports. In 1839, speaking of the services rendered by these officers in the pestilential climate of Florida, where they frequently had to ride from post to post through the enemy's country to attend the sick, he says: "For this very severe and perilous duty—this extraordinary devotion to their country's cause, (this extra service being peculiar to themselves, and not absolutely to be required of them,) these officers are entitled to a full measure of praise; and I do not hesitate thus to express the high sense that I entertain of their public services and of their public worth." In this just tribute it is believed the Army has united with unusual unanimity.

COMMISSARIY DEPARTMENT.

The Commissariat is an important branch of every military service, and deserves some notice whilst on the subject of organization. As it at present exists in our Army, the approximation to perfection is so near that I forbear a single suggestion, except to repeat the objection made to clothing Quarter-masters with military rank, even beyond that they hold in the line of the Army. It is an anomaly to confer rank on an individual for performing duties done every day by merchants and grocers—the purchase and distribution of supplies. The admirable success attending the duties of this department, the perfect quiet and want of ostentation with which they are performed, and the universal satisfaction manifested by all having the slightest connection or intercourse with it, must be attributed in a great measure, if not entirely, to the able, yet mild, affable and gentlemanly veteran who presides over its duties; aided as he is and has been by that talent which such men may readily command.

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

This is the only one remaining to be noticed, and in importance is secondary to none, unless the Engineers. From 1821 to 1838 one officer with the rank of Colonel sufficed for the duties of this department. He was always at general head quarters. In 1838, it was discovered that an addition of six officers—two Majors and four Captains—was necessary. This necessity it was presumed arose from an increase of the Army from near 8000 to 12,500. But it appears not to have been the case, or the reduction of 1842 would have rendered them useless. Like some other branches of the Staff, it now requires in this department five times the number of officers, with greatly increased rank and pay to accomplish the same duties as formerly. In its chief, however, the line of the Army has a firm and stanch friend, to whom they in gratitude acknowledge their indebtedness, and appreciate it the more since it is perfectly disinterested.

An Adjutant General at the head quarters of the Army, and an assistant in each of the military geographical divisions, would be ample for all duties in their department. The other offices should be abolished as useless excrescences.

The Pay Department has so little connection with the Army, that it is deemed unnecessary to notice it further than to express surprise that its officers should ever have been decorated with epaulettes, and armed with "our sword."

In concluding this subject, it seems to be an appropriate occasion for remarking, that, if any thing which has been said by the writer heretofore, is deemed to be harsh and personal in its application, he fully disclaims such an intention, and atones for what he admits to have been a transgression, if the inference of personality is just and natural. In making this admission, however, the right to examine into and comment on the official acts of all public servants is not yielded, the acts of individuals in their official capacity, being as open to comment and scrutiny as those of masses. Not claiming to be infallible, or even more free from errors of judgment than others, nothing will be more gratifying than to consult their views when an opportunity is afforded. But under no circumstances will the slightest notice be taken of any personal reflections, or sly and covert insinuations.

A SUBALTERN.

"WOMAN, THY PLACE IS BEHIND THE THRONE."

In the October Messenger appeared some lines upon the foregoing sentiment, which have called forth the following appropriate answer. We found it in the Evening Mirror, lately established by Morris & Willis.—[Ed. Mess.

LINES,

SUGGESTED ON SEEING THE STANZAS UPON THE WORDS,

"Woman, thy Place is Behind the Throne."

Go to the humble peasant's cot, go at the close of day,
And odors from a thousand flow'rs shall round your pathway stray ;

But sweeter than those odors are the joyous notes they raise,

Who innocently offer up their hymn of grateful praise.

Whose whisper prompts their song and pray'r ?

Woman ! thy gentle voice is there.

Go where the taper dimly burns, go to the humble bed,
And watch when fitfully is turn'd the restless fever'd head :
Whose eye is that which gazes on the form that suffers there ?
Whose thoughts anticipate each wish, with never-ceasing care ?

Whose voice breathes love in every tone ?

Woman ! the praise be all thine own.

But if the page of hist'ry must speak of deeds gone by,
One far more fair than Briton's boast fails not to meet the eye ;

Behold Columbia's flag, as its stars and stripes unfold ;
Not half the deeds beneath it done have ever yet been told.

Search 'midst the annals of its fame ;

There oft is written woman's name.

Hark ! what a voice is that we hear, breath'd by the lapse of time ?

What infant shrieks are those we hear, which tell the reign of crime ?

Mary ! it is thy wicked reign, which Britons blush to name !
When woman's tears, and infant's cries, commingled with the flame.

Those annals England's 'scutcheon stain,
Deeper than all her foes can name.

But few behold thy sex's form enclose a heart so cold ;
And Russia's hist'ry woman's heart more truthfully has told.
Elizabeth ! thy gentle hand ne'er sign'd the writ of death—
Thou could'st not give, and would not take thy subjects' fleeting breath.

We love to dwell upon thy name,
And write the record of thy fame.

Go to the Hill of Calvary, and woman's form is there,
Where Roman banners proudly wave, and float upon the air :

Look on the dying Saviour, where all save one had fled,
Who oft with him hath journey'd—oft with him broke bread.
A faithful and a female band,
These then around him closer stand.

And still we bid thee seek not "the cloud-cap'd tower of fame ;"

Ye need no herald there, to sound the praises of thy name.
Within our heart of hearts is plac'd affection's sacred throne,
'Tis there that thy dominion is, we fully, frankly own !

Thy gentle sceptre there we bless,
And feel what fame can ne'er express.

DESULTORY NOTES ON DESULTORY READINGS.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE NAVAL COURT-MARTIAL IN THE CASE OF ALEXANDER SLIDELL MACKENZIE, A COMMANDER IN THE NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES, &c., &c., to which is annexed an elaborate review by JAMES FENNIMORE COOPER. 8 vo., pages 344. Henry G. Langley : New-York, 1844.

Of this large octavo, 255 pages are taken up with the trial, and 81 with the Review.

According to the "advertisement" these "pages comprise an authentic account of the official proceedings of the Naval Court-Martial, convened in the case of Alexander Slidell Mackenzie," &c.

By what means, or through what channel the author of the "elaborate Review" obtained "the official proceedings" is not stated, although it is asserted that this volume is an authentic account.
Was it obtained from the archives of the government by permission ? There is some doubt as to the authenticity of this copy of the proceedings. We read, page 309, "We have turned to this boy's testimony, as given in the Tribune's report of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, &c." "One objection to the statement of the boy as given in the newspaper," &c. Again—page 344. "At pages 288 and 283, the names of Anderson and Browning are confounded together in a way that may mislead the reader. This has arisen from the fact that a portion of the record had not reached us, and we followed newspaper reports—always unsafe guides—for a small portion of the testimony." How can any account of "official proceedings" of any court be authentic when a portion of it is derived from "newspaper reports—always unsafe guides ?"

Connected with the question of authenticity of this account of this very important case, we call attention to the following sentences, page 339, which give some indication of the manner of making this book, as well as the quo animo of its author :

"We owe it to ourselves to say, that the record has reached us so irregularly, while the publishers pressed so fast for copy, as to render our examination of this mutiny less compact and lucid than we could wish. The case was not wholly before us when we began to write, and we confess that the testimony, as it has become more fully developed, has wrought some modifications of our views, which will possibly be apparent to the reader. As the changes have been adverse to the case of Captain Mackenzie, however, we have not thought them of sufficient importance to rewrite the earlier portion of our article."

After hearing a judge declare that he began to write his opinion before he heard all the testimony, and that what he had heard before he began to write reached him irregularly, and that he was obliged to give it a hasty or hurried examination, who will regard the opinion, or place any confidence in his decision, no matter whether it be for or against the prisoner ! The inference is, that the judge, (or reviewer,) has prejudged the case of the prisoner, and that he sat himself deliberately down for the purpose of "proving more clearly his guilt."
The reviewer condemns the whole course of Capt.
Mackenzie in the mutiny of the Somers, and labors to prove the propriety of his opinion, and in doing so, implies that the mind of the captain is not capable of perceiving logical deductions. "We have had some occasions for understanding the mind of Captain Mackenzie, and we ascribe more to its peculiarities, perhaps, than total strangers and severe judges might be disposed to yield." Here the reviewer appears somewhat in the aspect of a witness against the prisoner, while he presides on the judgment seat. There seems to be a strongly hostile and personal feeling against Captain Mackenzie, on the part of the reviewer, which occasionally displays itself ungenerously. "The ambition of the author has let us into the secrets of the commander, in more than one instance," page 336.
Again—"many imagine that Captain Mackenzie's report betrays the evidence to glean personal renown, from the manner in which it is pretended he saved his own life and those of his associates.
The feebleness of this extraordinary document renders its writer obnoxious to very injurious suspicions certainly, and this among the number ; but the mental obliquity, so very obvious throughout the whole affair, renders any ordinary analysis of human motives exceedingly precarious. God alone can say how far any selfish feeling was mixed up with the mistakes of this terrible transaction."

It strikes us that the work of writing an elaborate and just review of the Mackenzie case yet remains to be done. In the present instance there seems to be a still lingering resentment of Mackenzie's Review of Cooper's Naval History, and all the leaven of the stale tale of the Battle of Lake Erie has not yet worked itself off. Under this impression it is our notion that Mr. Cooper, under the circumstances, would have acted more in accordance with good taste and generosity by leaving the subject of the Somers' mutiny entirely to other hands.

We do not think the volume can be safely referred to as a perfectly accurate and entirely authentic report of Mackenzie's trial. It is to be hoped that both the proceedings of the Court-Martial and the Court of Inquiry will be some day published under legal authority without the commentaries of either friend or foe.

The review is alone valuable in showing us what are the opinions of Mr. Cooper, as to the value of which it is probable many persons will differ.

PANCOAST'S OPERATIVE SURGERY.—Here is a quarto volume, containing eighty beautiful lithographs illustrating every operation in surgery, so clearly and elegantly described in the text, that no man can fail to comprehend them. Messrs. Carey and Hart have reason to be proud of publishing such a book, and the profession of medicine or surgery will be gratified that such a work has emanated from an American author. One medical journal declares that, "of its kind, it has no superior," and we do not hazard much in venturing our opinion that this declaration will meet with universal approbation.

The New York Journal of Medicine holds on and promises to be worthy of patronage, which ought to increase to reward the editor and the distinguished contributors to its pages. Its tone, however, is not precisely to our taste; it deals a little too much in mere personal and local jealousies, and, in this respect, too closely resembles the London Lancet. It may get rid of this when it gets to be older.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF VENTILATION, with remarks on warming, exclusive lighting, and the communication of sound. By David Boswell Reid, M. D., F. R. S. E., &c., &c. London 1844. 8 vo. p.p. 451.

Intimately connected with the subject of warming is that of properly ventilating dwellings and public buildings of all kinds. British scientific travellers, and especially Mr. Combe, the phrenologist, complain of the little attention given to this subject by architects and builders in the United States. A perusal of Dr. Reid's book, however, satisfies us that of all people on earth we are not alone censurable on this account. In England and Scotland there is room for improvement, and there is quite as much necessity perhaps on the continent as in other situations for attention to this very important subject. As a striking illustration of the beneficial effects of proper ventilation we extract the following from the work mentioned, in hopes that it may attract attention and lead to the increase of health, comfort and longevity in our country.

"It appears to be universally admitted, that a low diet diminishes the necessity for much air, and that, on the other hand, where there is little air, there cannot be a great appetite for food. There are no periods accordingly, if we except a period of severe bodily exercise, where the constitution demands such a variety of supply as immediately before and after dinner; and, in the present state of society, a large share of the evil not unfrequently attendant upon a dinner party, does not always arise so much from individuals having taken more than their constitution requires, but rather from the vitiated air with which the system is usually surrounded at such periods. Some years ago, about fifty members of the Royal Society club, at Edinburgh, dined in an apartment I had constructed, where, though illuminated by gas, the products of its combustion were essentially excluded, as they were all removed by a ventilating tube connected with, but concealed in, the crop of the gothic pendant in which the central lights were placed. Large quantities of mild atmosphere were constantly supplied and passed in quick succession through the apartment throughout the whole evening, the effect being varied from time to time by infusing odoriferous materials, so that the air should imitate successively that of a lavender field, of an orange grove, &c. Nothing very special was noticed, during the time of dinner by the members; but Mr. Barry, of the British Hotel, who provided the dinner, and who from the members of the club being frequently in the habit of dining in his rooms, was familiar with their constitutions, showed the committee that three times the amount of wines had been taken that was usually consumed by the same party in a room lighted by gas, but not ventilated—that he had been surprised to observe that gentlemen whose usual allowance was two glasses, took, without hesitation, as much as a half a bottle—that those who were in the habit of taking a half a bottle took a bottle and a half, and that, in short, he had been compelled twice to send hackney coaches for additional supplies during dinner, though he had provided a larger supply than usual, considering the circumstances under which the members met.

"Minute inquiries afterwards assured me that no headache nor other injurious consequences had followed this meeting, nor were any of the members aware at the moment that they had partaken more heartily than usual, till Mr. Barry showed them what had taken place. The meeting included individuals of all ages and of extreme variety of occupations, among whom there were judges and members of Parliament, medical men and members of the bar, naval and military officers, whose different ages varied as much as their various professional occupations." Page 180-1.

The work of Dr. Reid refers more particularly to the mechanical contrivances for securing proper ventilation, and only touches incidentally on its effects upon health. The mechanical or rather the dynamic phenomena connected with moving currents of air under various influences, and explanations of the principles of his subject, are accompanied by 330 wood cut illustrations. The style of writing may be understood by the above extract.

The various modes of heating by steam, by high and low temperature hot water apparatus, high and low temperature stoves and furnaces, and by open fires are touched upon; and the laws of heat and the constitution of the atmosphere, as well as the gases with which it is contaminated in various situations and under various circumstances, are briefly noticed.

This work is worthy the special study of seafaring men, and to officers in the navy and naval architects we particularly recommend it, for we have no where met with clearer views on the subject of ventilating ships, or stronger instances of the baleful consequences of want of ventilation in ships of war and other vessels.

We recommend an American edition of this work, which is calculated to produce as much interest and benefit among the people as any of the popular books of Liebig. Let the Publisher do it justice and give us all the illustrations.

ON THE NATURE AND MANAGEMENT OF THE HORSE IN HEALTH AND DISEASE.—By William Roper, Surgeon, T. C. D. 12 mo. p. 117. London, 1844. A neat and excellent little book well worthy of an American dress.

A GENERAL OUTLINE OF THE ANIMAL KINGDOM AND MANUAL OF COMPARATIVE ANATOMY. By THOMAS RYMER JONES, F. Z. S., &c., &c. 336 Engravings. 8 vo., pp. 732. London, 1841.

We scarcely expect to see any lignographic engravings more exquisitely beautiful than those which illustrate the volume whose title is written above; which gives a very satisfactory view of the general structure of the animal kingdom. To the great majority of the readers of the Messenger, we presume this volume is unknown, and being an expensive one, and treating of matters which interest comparatively few persons in the United States, will, in all probability, not be reprinted. Nevertheless, as some copies have found their way across the Atlantic, it may serve a good purpose to call attention to the work. To physiologists and students of physiology, naturalists and physicians, it ought to be interesting to trace animal organization through the great series, from the seemingly lifeless sponge to man, the crowning glory of the animal creation. But to read this work profitably, some little elementary knowledge of physiology should be previously possessed, and also some knowledge of Natural History, a subject of more importance and of wider bearing on the future condition of our country than is commonly believed. It is not necessary that every man should be a profound naturalist, but every man in a new country like ours might advantageously know enough of the subject to appreciate wisely the various phenomena which daily occur and pass unnoticed for want of elementary knowledge of this subject.

We may remark, in passing, that we do not agree with Dr. Dunglison, who, in his most admirable little book entitled the "Medical Student," conveys the idea, that Natural History is of no use to the physician, because such knowledge rarely is called into requisition by the practitioner, to select the drugs and medicines he may use in practice. To druggists and dealers in drugs he does not seem to think it of consequence; nevertheless, in another work of great value, his "Human Physiology," he draws largely on Natural History to elucidate the subject.

By the term Natural History we mean that science which embraces a knowledge of the structure of all bodies, living or brute, inorganic, which are on the whole face of the earth, or united together to constitute its mass; a knowledge of the phenomena observable in these bodies, the characteristics by which they may be distinguished from each other, and the parts they play in the great total of the creation. Its domain is immense, and its importance does not yield to its extent. Some men, possessing little acquaintance with science, perceive in it a mere collection of anecdotes more fitted to gratify idle curiosity than to exercise the mind, or they regard it as a dry study of technical names and arbitrary classifications; but such an opinion has its source in ignorance, for no one possessing the most elementary notions of Natural History can fail to recognize its great utility. The spectacle of nature, so grand and so harmonious as it is, showing how vastly superior the beautiful reality of the creation is to the beau ideal of human inventions, elevates and disposes the mind to high and salutary thoughts. The knowledge of ourselves and of the objects which surround us is not only to satisfy our craving for information which is developed in proportion to the increase of intelligence; it is a necessary basis to many other studies, and is eminently calculated to give that rectitude of judgment, without which the most brilliant qualities lose their value, and, in the course of life, rather lead from than conduct us to useful ends. The importance of the natural sciences should be too evident to require demonstration. But let us look round us a moment: think of the wealth buried in the bowels of the earth, and the services daily rendered to industry by Geology and Mineralogy; behold the plants, so varied and so beautiful, which supply our wants in magnificent prodigality, and think how important a guide Natural History may be made to agriculture; enumerate those animals which produce wool, silk and honey and those that assist our toils with their strength, or those which, instead of being useful to us, destroy our crops; remember too the long list of diseases by which the human machine is afflicted, and bear in mind the fact that medicine acts blindly when it does not rest upon scientific knowledge of the nature of man. The practical importance of the study of Natural History, we repeat, requires no proof, and must be felt, no matter what may be our career; but its utility does not stop here; the influence it can be made to exert over our faculties themselves is worthy of the most serious attention. In fact the natural sciences, by reason of the routine system peculiar to them, accustom the mind to go back from effects to causes, and at the same time, invariably, to submit results deduced from preceding observations to the test of new facts; their study leads to speculations of the most elevated character, but never leads the imagination astray, because it always places material proof along side of theory. And beyond any other pursuit, Natural History exercises the mind in habits of method, a part of logic without which every investigation is laborious and every exposition obscure.

Natural History ought to constitute one of the elements of every system of liberal education; but it is not necessary that every young man should be a naturalist. In a science so vast in its scope, to become a proficient would require more time than can be spared from other classical studies, and it comprises a host of details, useful only to those who are desirous of devoting themselves especially to it. What every well educated young man ought to know, is not the characteristics which distinguish this or that genus of plants or animals from another genus, nor the exact course of every nerve, or every artery in the human body. To charge his memory with such details would subject him to labor which would be neither useful nor durable in its results; but what he ought to possess are sound views on all the great questions that it is the province of the natural sciences to solve; on the constitution of the earth, and the physical revolutions that have taken place on its surface; on the manner in which the functions of all creatures are performed, and the principal modifications observed in their structure, according to the kind of life for which they have been destined. Such information, once acquired, would not be soon forgotten, and such information must be specially sought by all who would become naturalists, and still it is enough for those whose occupations are not closely connected with these sciences.

Such are the opinions of an eminent naturalist in France, and I am sure, the propagation of these opinions in our country will advance its interests. Not many months ago the agricultural society of New-York discussed plans of schools of agriculture and plans of agricultural education; most of these plans were confined to the dissemination of a knowledge of agricultural chemistry, and of the improvement and management of soils, and only one member suggested that a work on insects ought to form a part of the school libraries. Now, it may be properly asked, what advantage is any book on insects or any class of animals, in a school, if the students or pupils are ignorant of the language, of the meaning of the systematic and technical language in which it must be written. To read Harris' or Say's book on insects advantageously, the pupil must first be acquainted somewhat with the structure and functions of insects as taught in elementary works on Natural History. Let us take a short extract from Say's "American Entomology."

"Above sanguineous; five spots on the thorax, four on each elytrum, and scutel black; head and all beneath black." This is a specific description of an insect, perfectly intelligible to any one acquainted with the elements, but which can convey no useful information to one ignorant of them. The pupil is at once arrested by the technical names of parts, namely, thorax, elytrum, scutel, &c., and for want of understanding them, the description is Greek to him.

To the science of agriculture, Natural History, properly taught, is of great importance, because it teaches us the structure of animals, the mode of their existence, and what is essential to their life. Knowing this, we are better able to treat their diseases, and to destroy those which are injurious to our interests.

But enough has been said to show, that in our opinion, the elements of Natural History should constitute an important branch of agricultural education especially, even at the expense of Latin and Greek, or of other languages.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

AN ADIEU TO OUR PATRONS AND FRIENDS.

Once more, kind patrons, we have to bid you farewell—an affectionate, grateful farewell! The Autumn is past, our annual fruits are gathered, and, may we not hope, garnered by you. It has been our aim to make them fit for preservation and to remove all impurity that might lead to corruption. How far we have succeeded is left to your liberal judgment. Of our desires and aspirations alone will we boast. They have been elevated—far beyond present attainment; perhaps beyond ultimate realization. But with your encouraging smiles and support, we will struggle on, only remembering "the things that are behind" so far as to derive incitement towards those that are before us. The way of improvement is open and known. Your aid only is required to enable us to pursue it. In offering you, then, our parting thanks, we would solicit a continuance, yea an increase of your patronage. Few caterers for the Literary taste are on the road to opulence; and hence they need and, it is generally admitted, deserve a richer reward than that which they receive.

Though the wheels of Time have brought us, as it were, to a fork in the road, we trust that we shall not be separated; but will soon resume our journey together under brighter skies and over smoother, fairer ways. But whether this be our fortune or not, may you enjoy overflowing prosperity and a peace calm as that which fills the breast of early innocence.

All our contributors will please accept our cordial thanks; and we return our acknowledgments to the various enterprising publishers who have kindly furnished us with their publications; and to the conductors of the Press for their courtesy and friendly notices, which if undeserved, were unso- licited.

To all our colaborers in the fields of Literature, we offer the right hand of fellowship and good feeling. We are proudly conscious that no narrow jealousy, nor vindictive bitterness, nor even uncourteous disparagement has marked our course. We can never be an Ishmaelite in Letters; and hope to flourish along with our cotemporaries, not upon their ruin, or demerits, but upon the Literary Spirit of our countrymen and of the South, where we feel that we have a special claim.

To every friend and well-wisher we tender our adieu and wish them a "merry Christmas" and a "happy New-Year."

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE,

EARL OF ORFORD,

TO SIR HORACE MANN, HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S RESIDENT AT THE COURT OF FLORENCE, FROM 1760 TO 1785. Now first published from the original MSS. Concluding series, in 2 vols. 8 vo. pp., 420, 553. Lea & Blanchard, 1844.

In the Letters of Horace Walpole there is one of the greatest treats that the Literary world has enjoyed for many a day. For variety, for attraction, for useful information, and for style they have never been surpassed. The son of an Eminent Statesman and favorite minister, he enjoyed from infancy the highest advantages of education and association, which his rare endowments enabled him fully to improve. Hence, the position he has always held has been such as to give him the best opportunities of observing the transactions of his times, upon which he looked with an attentive eye and with ability to understand and judge of them. The materials with which he constantly stored his capacious mind, were continually wrought out and reproduced, and his thoughts and reflections put forth with a wit and eloquence rarely equalled. During the three generations through which he lived, nothing escaped his observation, and the momentous events of a most stirring era and the gossip and dissipation of fashionable life, with all between, above and below them, occupied his fascinating pen. Writing from Strawberry Hill, 16th May, 1781, he says:

"The House of Lords, who never fatigued themselves, are become as antiquated as their college, the Heralds' Office, and as idle. In the other House there are not many debates, and the unshaken majority renders those of little consequence. The disunion of the leaders increases this supineness. For smaller events, I go so little into the world, that many escape me, and fewer interest me. Can one take much part in the occupations of the grand-children of one's first acquaintance! I might, no doubt, collect paragraphs if I took pains; for certainly no reformation has taken place. Dissipation is at high-water mark; but it is either without variety, novelty, and imagination, or the moroseness of age makes me see no taste in their pleasures. Lateness of hours is the principal feature of the times, and certainly demands no stress of invention. Every fashionable place is still crowded: no instance of selection neither. Gaming is yet general; though money, the principal ingredient, does not abound. My old favorite game, Faro, is lately revived. I have played but thrice, and not all night, as I used to do; it is not decent to end where one began, nor to sit up with a generation by two deacents my juniors. Mr. Fox is the first figure in all the places I have mentioned; the hero in Parliament, at the gaming-table, at Newmarket. Last week he passed four-and-twenty hours without interruption at all three, or on the road from one to the other; and ill the whole time, for he has a bad constitution, and treats it as if he had been dipped in the immortal river: but I doubt his heel at least will be vulnerable."

This gives some idea of his versatility—but is only a poor specimen of that, or of his wit and humor.

As a philosopher and deep observer of human affairs his letters alone place him in no ordinary rank. As a literateur, his attainments were of a very high order. He carried on a correspondence with many of the most distinguished authors of his day and wrote with ability and beauty upon a great variety of subjects, and had many sharp Literary controversies to encounter. He looked upon the Arts with the eye of a patron and a connoisseur; upon the political events of his time, with the eye of impartiality and wisdom, and often foresaw consequences of which those more actively engaged in those events never dreamed. Hence his letters, so conspicuous for their brilliancy and epistolary excellence, are also one of the best epitomes of political history that any country possesses. In this respect they are particularly valuable to the American reader, and should engage the eager attention of every mind that loves to dwell upon the history of his country. These United States can never expect to have a very impartial historian in England. The conduct of king, ministers and people there, in our great struggle for Independence, can hardly ever be fairly portrayed by any of England's historical authors. But here we have their history written, by a man of eminence, a patriot and a scholar; who yet can do justice to America and impartially condemn the folly and injustice of his nation. We recur to these volumes of Letters now principally for the purpose of giving some extracts from Walpole's running commentary upon the events of the American revolution, in which he will appear a prophet and the friend of Liberty. The volumes so abound in interest, that we are tempted to open a wider field; but even with the restriction proposed, ample space will be occupied, and our readers will be able to judge from one subject, how he has treated others. To begin with the year 1774: Oct., 6. He thus writes,

"It would be unlike my attention and punctuality, to see so large an event as an irregular dissolution of Parliament, without taking any notice of it to you. It happened last Saturday, six months before its natural death, and without the design being known but the Tuesday before, and that by very few persons. The chief motive is supposed to be the ugly state of North America, and the effects that a cross winter might have on the next elections. Whatever were the causes, the first consequences, as you may guess, were such a ferment in London as is seldom seen at this dead season of the year. Couriers, despatches, post-chaises, post-horses, hurrying every way! Sixty messengers passed through one single turnpike on Friday. The whole island is by this time in equal agitation; but less wine and money will be shed than have been at any such period for these fifty years." * * *

"America, I doubt, is still more unpromising. There are whispers of their having assembled an armed force, and of earnest supplications arrived for succours of men and ships. A civil war is no trifle; and how we are to suppress or pursue it in such a vast region, with a handful of men, I am not an Alexander to guess; and for the fleet, can we put it upon castors and wheel it from Hudson's Bay to Florida! But I am an ignorant soul, and neither pretend to knowledge nor foreknowledge. All I perceive already is, that our Parliaments are subjected to America and India, and must be influenced by their politics; yet I do not believe our senators are more universal than formerly."

How much political wisdom and forethought are in the following, of January 25th, 1775.

"The times are indeed very serious. Pacification with America is not the measure adopted. More regiments are ordered thither, and to-morrow a plan, I fear equivalent to a declaration of war, is to be laid before both Houses. They are bold Ministers, methinks, who do not hesitate on a civil war, in which victory may bring ruin, and disappointment endanger their heads. Lord Chatham has already spoken out: and though his outset, [a motion in the Lords last Friday.] was neither wise nor successful, he will certainly be popular again with the clamorous side, which no doubt will become the popular side too, for all wars are costly, and consequently grievous. Acquisition alone can make those burdens palatable: and in a war with our own colonies we must afflict instead of acquiring them, and cannot recover them without having undone them. I am still to learn wisdom and experience, if these things are not so."

On the 15th of February, he writes,

"The war with our colonies, which is now declared, is a proof how much influence jargon has on human actions. A war on our own trade is popular! Both houses are as eager for it as they were for conquering the Indies—which acquits them a little of rapine, when they are as glad of what will impoverish them as of what they fancied was to enrich them—so like are the great vulgar, and the small. Are not you foreigners amazed? We are raising soldiers and seamen—so are the Americans; and, unluckily, can find a troop as easily as we a trooper. But we are above descending to calculation: one would think the whole legislature were of the club at Almack's, and imagined, like Charles Fox, that our fame was to rise in proportion to our losses. It is more extraordinary that Charles does not adopt their system, as they have copied his, but opposes them, and proposes to make his fortune when they are bankrupt. In the mean time bad news pours in from America. I do not believe all I hear—but fear I shall believe a great deal in spite of my teeth."

Something of his wit and caustic satire may be seen in the following,—April, 17th.

"It is more equitable to suppose that my conception is worn out, than that the world wants events. I tell you of a nation of madmen, and yet want instances. It is certain, both that we do not grow sage, and that I have nothing to say. The town is divided into two great classes, the politicians and the pleaserists. The first are occupied with that vast fœtus, the American contest; and wars at that distance do not go on expeditiously. Wilkes has arrived at his ne plus ultra; he has presented a remonstrance in form to the Throne; and, with the magnanimity of an Alexander, used his triumph with moderation—in modern language, with good breeding. The younger generation game, dress, dance, go to Newmarket. Some of them, not juniors all, learn to sing. Cortez was victorious in our last opera, Montezuma. I doubt the Americans will not be vanquished in recitative."

In July of this year, 1775, referring to the American troubles, he says that he had always augured ill of the quarrel and wiped his hands of it; and that it made him resume the thought of making another journey to Paris. He did go, but before he started, wrote again on the third of August.

"In spite of all my modesty, I cannot help thinking I have a little something of the prophet about me. At least, we have not conquered America yet. I did not send you immediate word of our victory at Boston, because the success not only seemed very equivocal, but because the conquerors lost three to one more than the vanquished. The last do not pique themselves upon modern good-breeding, but level only at the officers, of whom they have slain a vast number. We are a little disappointed, indeed, at their fighting at all, which was not in our calculation. We knew we could conquer America in Germany, and I doubt had better have gone thither now for that purpose, as it does not appear hitherto to be quite so feasible in America itself. However, we are determined to know the worst, and are sending away all the men and ammunition we can muster. The Congress, not asleep neither, have appointed a Generalissimo, Washington, allowed a very able officer, who distinguished himself in the last war. Well! we had better have gone on robbing the Indies; it was a more lucrative trade."

From Paris, he wrote, Sept. 7th and 11th.

"You will on your side not be surprised that I am what I always was, a zealot for liberty in every part of the Globe, and consequently that I most heartily wish success to the Americans. They have hitherto not made one blunder; and the Administration have made a thousand, besides the two capital ones, of first provoking, and then of uniting the colonies. The latter seem to have as good heads as hearts, as we want both. The campaign seems languishing. The Ministers will make all their efforts against the spring. So no doubt will the Americans too. Probably the war will be long. On the side of England, it must be attended with ruin. If England prevails, English and American liberty is at an end! If the colonies prevail, our commerce is gone—and if, at last, we negotiate, they will neither forgive nor give us our former advantages.” • • • • •

“I had made up my letter; but those I received from England last night bring such important intelligence, I must add a paragraph. That miracle of gratitude, the Czarina, has consented to lend England twenty thousand Russians, to be transported to America. The Parliament is to meet on the 20th of next month, and vote twenty-six thousand seamen! What a paragraph of blood is there! With what torrents must liberty be preserved in America! In England what can save it! Oh! mad, mad England! What frenzy, to throw away its treasures, lay waste its empire of wealth, and sacrifice its freedom, that its prince may be the arbitrary lord of boundless deserts in America, and of an impoverished, depopulated, and thence insignificant, island in Europe! and what prospect of comfort has a true Englishman! Why, that Philip the Second miscarried against the boors of Holland, and that Louis the Fourteenth could not replace James the Second on the throne!”

And again, Oct. 10, he says,

“I am still here; though on the wing. Your answer to mine from hence was sent back to me from England; as I have loitered here beyond my intention; in truth, from an indisposition of mind. I am not impatient to be in a frantic country, that is stabbing itself in every vein. The delirium still lasts, though, I believe, kept up by the quacks that caused it. Is it credible that five or six of the great trading towns have presented addresses against the Americans? I have no doubt but those addresses are procured by those boobies the country gentlemen, their members, and bought of the Alderman; but, is it not amazing that the merchants and manufacturers do not duck such tools in a horse-pond? When the storm will recoil I do not know, but it will be terrible in all probability, though too late. Never shall we be again what we have been! Other powers, who sit still and wisely suffer us to plunge over head and ears, will perhaps be alarmed at what they write from England, that we are to buy twenty thousand Russian assassins, at the price of Georgia: how deep must be our game, when we pursue it at the expense of establishing a new maritime power, and aggrandize that engrossing throne, which threatens half Europe, for the satisfaction of enslaving our own brethren! Horrible policy! If the Americans, as our papers say, are on the point of seizing Canada, I should think that France would not long remain neutre, when she may regain her fur-trade with the Canadians, or obtain Canada from the Americans; but it is endless to calculate what we may lose. Our Court has staked every thing against despotism; and the nation, which must be a loser, which ever side prevails, takes part against the Americans, who fight for the nation as well as for themselves! what Egyptian darkness!”

But these references are so frequent, that we must skip many interesting passages. The views of Walpole are herein clearly expressed, and have been fully verified by subsequent events. On August 11th, 1776, he thus notices the Declaration of Independence.

“The Congress has declared all the provinces independent, has condemned the Mayor of New-York to be hanged for corresponding with their enemies, and have seized Franklin, not the famous doctor, but one of the King's governors. I hope this savage kind of war will not proceed; but they seem to be very determined, and that makes the prospect very melancholy.”

Particular mention is made by him of the arrival of “the famous doctor” in Paris, as one of the commissioners sent over by Congress to procure a treaty of alliance with France. There seem to have been various conjectures about the object of the great philosopher's visit; and possibly some rumors of his having deserted the cause of his country. Mr. Burke in a letter of the 6th of January, to the Marquis of Rockingham, throws out the following conjectures as to the object of Franklin's visit.

“I persuade myself he is come to Paris to draw from that Court a definite and satisfactory answer concerning the support of the Colonies. If he cannot get such an answer (and I am of the opinion that, at present, he cannot,) then it is to be presumed he is authorized to negotiate with Lord Stormont on the basis of dependence on the Crown. This I take to be his errand; for I never can believe that he has come thither as a fugitive from his cause in the hour of its distress, or that he is going to conclude a long life, which has brightened every hour it has continued, with so foul and dishonorable a flight.”

The idea of Franklin's “foul and dishonorable flight!” Mr. Burke did him the commonest justice; but was entirely mistaken as to the supposition of our dependence upon the crown of France.

April 3rd, 1777, Walpole pays the following just tribute to the immortal Washington. We are afraid that some of our own fellow citizens will ere long have to apply to such writers as Walpole for a proper appreciation of the father of their Liberties. He says,

“I have nothing very new to tell you on public affairs, especially as I can know nothing more than you see in the papers. It is my opinion that the King's affairs are in a very bad position in America. I do not say that his armies may not gain advantages again; though I believe there has been as much design as cowardice in the behavior of the provincials, who seem to have been apprized that protraction of the war would be more certainly advantageous to them than heroism. Washington, the dictator, has shown himself both a Fabius and a Camillus. His march through our lines is allowed to have been a prodigy of generalship. In one word, I look upon great part of America as lost to this country! It is not less deplorable, that between art and contention, such an inveteracy has been sown between the two countries as will probably outlast even the war. Supposing this unnatural enmity should not soon involve us in other wars, which would be extraordinary indeed, what a difference, in a future war with France and Spain, to have the Colonies in the opposite scale, instead of being in ours! What politicians are those who have preferred the empty name of sovereignty to that of alliance, and forced subsidies to the golden ocean of commerce!"

Here we will give the whole of the following letter :

"Arlington Street, Feb. 18, 1778.

"I do not know how to word the following letter; how to gain credit with you! How shall I intimate to you, that you must lower your topsails, waive your imperial dignity, and strike to the colors of the thirteen United Provinces of America? Do not tremble, and imagine that Washington has defeated General Howe, and driven him out of Philadelphia; or that Gates has taken another army; or that Portsmouth is invested by an American fleet. No: no military new event has occasioned this revolution. The sacrifice has been made on the altar of Peace. Stop again: peace is not made, it is only implored,—and, I fear, only on this side of the Atlantic. In short, yesterday, February 17th, a most memorable era, Lord North opened his Conciliatory Plan,—no partial, no collusive one. In as few words as I can use, it solicits peace with the States of America: it haggles on no terms; it acknowledges the Congress, or any body that pleases to treat; it confesses errors, misinformation, ill-success, and impossibility of conquest; it disclaims taxation, desires commerce, hopes for assistance, allows the independence of America, not verbally, yet virtually, and suspends hostilities till June, 1779. It does a little more: not verbally, but virtually it confesses that the Opposition have been in the right from the beginning to the end.

"The warmest American cannot deny but these gracious condescensions are ample enough to content that whole continent; and yet, my friend, such accommodating facility had one defect,—it came too late. The treaty between the high and mighty States and France is signed; and, instead of peace, we must expect war with the high allies. The French army is come to the coast, and their officers here are recalled.

"The House of Commons embrace the plan, and voted it, nemine contradicente. It is to pass both Houses with a rapidity that will do every thing but overtake time past. All the world is in astonishment. As my letter will not set out till the day after to-morrow, I shall have time to tell you better what is thought of this amazing step.

Feb. 20.

"In sooth I cannot tell you what is thought. Nobody knows what to think. To leap at once from an obstinacy of four years to a total concession of every thing; to stoop so low, without hopes of being forgiven—who can understand such a transformation? I must leave you in all your wonderment; for the cloud is not dispersed. When it shall be, I doubt it will discover no serene prospect! All that remains certain is, that America is not only lost, but given up. We must no longer give ourselves Continental airs! I fear even our trident will find it has lost a considerable prong.

"I have lived long, but never saw such a day as last Tuesday! From the first, I augured ill of this American war; yet do not suppose that I boast of my penetration. Far was I from expecting such a conclusion! Conclusion!—y sommes nous? Acts of Parliament have made a war, but cannot repeal one. They have provoked—not terrified; and Washington and Gates have respected the Speaker's mace no more than Oliver Cromwell did.

"You shall hear as events arise. I disclaim all sagacity, and pretend to no foresight. It is not an Englishman's talent. Even the second-sight of the Scots has proved a little purblind.

"Have you heard that Voltaire is actually in Paris! Perhaps soon you will learn French news earlier than I can.

"What scenes my letters to you have touched on for eight-and-twenty years! I arrived here at the eve of the termination of my father's happy reign. The rebellion, as he foresaw, followed; and much disgrace. Another war ensued, with new disgraces. And then broke forth Lord Chatham's sun; and all was glory and extensive empire. Nor tranquility nor triumph are our lot now! 'The womb of time is not with child of a mouse,—but adieu! I shall probably write again before you have digested half the meditations this letter will have conjured up."

This will lead us to a short digression, which may be pardoned as exhibiting more particularly his literary character. There was no love lost between Sir Horace and Voltaire, and the cause of Walpole's aversion is thus given by himself, in the "Short Notes" of his life. In Feb., 1768, he published his "Historic Doubts on Richard III." Twelve hundred copies were printed and sold so fast, that a thousand more were published the next week. In June, he received a letter from Voltaire desiring a copy of the "Historic Doubts." He sent it and along with it the Castle of Otranto, that the French Philosopher might see the preface of which Walpole had told him. Voltaire did not like it, but returned a civil reply defending his opinions. Walpole rejoined with even more civility, but dropped the subject, "not caring," as he says, "to enter into a controversy; especially in a matter of opinion, on which, whether we were right or wrong, all France would be on his side and all England on mine." In a memorandum of April 24th, 1769, he thus continues:

"About the same time Voltaire published in the Mercure the letter he had written to me, but I made no answer, because he had treated me more dirtily than Mr. Hume had. Though Voltaire, with whom I had never had the least acquaintance or correspondence, had voluntarily written to me first, and asked for my book, he wrote a letter to the Duchess of Choiseul, in which, without saying a syllable of his having written to me first, he told her I had officiously sent him my Works, and declared war with him in defence de ce bouffon Shakspeare, whom in his reply to me he pretended so much to admire. The Duchess sent me Voltaire's letter, which gave me such contempt for his disingenuity that I dropped all correspondence with him."

These "Notes" of his life contain ample evidence of his great industry in Literature. His pen was almost constantly occupied in composition, from a child's book for the great niece of the Countess Dowager of Suffolk, to tragedies, antiquities, historical and poetical criticism, and the memoirs of his times.

We have already occupied so much space with quotations, and the references to the subject before us are so frequent, that we shall be compelled to pass more rapidly towards the close of our revolutionary struggle. Walpole had declared that there was "no more chance of conquering America than the Holy Land." But as the long and arduous war, with its various fortunes, proceeded, we find him growing rather doubtful. The loss of Charleston, and the disasters of that period in both the Carolinas might well have cast a gloom of despondency over the prospects of the colonies and filled the best friends of the country with doubt and alarm. Franklin, however, was not of the number of those fearful ones. Writing from Paris to a friend in America he says,

"You seem to be too much affected with the loss of Charlestown. The enemy's affairs will not be much advanced by it. They have successively been in possession of the capitals of five provinces, but were not therefore in possession of the provinces themselves. The cannon will be recovered with the place; if not, our furnaces are constantly at work in making more. The destroying of our ships by the English is only like shaving our beards, which will grow again: their loss of provinces is like the loss of a limb, which can never again be united to their body."

In March, 1781, Walpole writes:

"America is once more not quite ready to be conquered, though every now and then we fancy it is. Tarleton is defeated, Lord Cornwallis is checked, and Arnold not sure of having betrayed his friends to much purpose. If we are less certain of recovering what we have thrown away, we are in full as much danger of losing what we acquired, not more creditably, at the other end of the world. Hyder Ally, an Indian potentate, thinking he has as much right to the diamonds of his own country as the Rumbolds and Syke's, who were originally waiters in a tavern, has given us a blow and has not done."

The following extract will show his sense of humanity and sympathy for the colonies well blended with his "tenderness for his country." Those who recollect the horrors of the prison ships of Charleston, or the sugar house of New-York can not cease to wonder that civilized Englishmen were ever guilty of such atrocities. Nov. 30, 1780, he says:

"The newspapers have told you as much as I know of Arnold's treachery, which has already cost the life of a much better man, Major André—precipitated probably by Lord Cornwallis's cruelty. You hear on the continent, but too much of our barbarity; the only way in which we have yet shown our power! Rodney found Rhode Island so strongly fortified that he returned to the West Indies and yet we still presume on recovering America!

"Do you wonder that, witness to so much delusion and disgrace, it should grow irksome to me to be the annalist of our follies and march to ruin! I cannot, like our newspapers, falsify every event, and coin prophecies out of bad omens. My friendship for you makes me persist in our correspondence; but tenderness for my country makes me abhor detailing its errors, and regard to truth will not allow me to assert what I do not believe. I wait for events, that I may send you something; and yet my accounts are dry and brief, because I confine myself to avowed facts, without comments or credulity."

We will bring these extracts to a close with the capture of Cornwallis, which ended the war. Nov. 26th and 29th, he says,

"An account came yesterday that could not be expected, that Washington and the French have made Lord Cornwallis and his whole army prisoners. I do not know what others think, but to me it seems fortunate that they were not all cut to pieces. It is not heroic perhaps, but I am glad, that this disaster arriving before our fleet reached the Chesapeake, it turned back to New York without attacking the French fleet, who were above three to two, thirty-seven to twenty-three. This is all I know yet; and yet this comes at an untoward moment; for the Parliament meets to-morrow, and it puts the Speech and speeches a little into disorder.

"I cannot put on the face of the day, and act grief. Whatever puts an end to the American war will save the lives of thousands—millions of money too. If glory compensates such sacrifices, I never heard that disgraces and disappointments were palliatives; but I will not descant, nor is it right to vaunt of having been in the right when one's country's shame is the solution of one's prophecy, nor would one join in the triumph of her enemies."

"I mentioned on Tuesday the captivity of Lord Cornwallis and his army, the Columbus who was to bestow America on us again. A second army taken in a drag-net is an uncommon event, and happened but once to the Romans, who sought adventures every where. We have not lowered our tone on this new disgrace, though I think we shall talk no more of insisting on implicit submission, which would rather be a gasconade than firmness. In fact, there is one very unlucky circumstance already come out, which must drive every American, to a man, from ever calling himself our friend. By the tenth article of the capitulation, Lord Cornwallis demanded that the loyal Americans in his army should not be punished. This was flatly refused, and he has left them to be hanged. I doubt no vote of Parliament will be able to blanch such a—such a—I don't know what the word is for it. He must get his uncle the Archbishop to christen it. There is no name for it in any Pagan vocabulary. I suppose it will have a patent for being called Necessity. Well! there ends another volume of the American war. It looks a little as if the history of it would be all we should have for it, except forty millions of debt, and three other wars that have grown out of it, and that do not seem so near to a conclusion."

In the same way that Sir Horace has noticed affairs as they transpired in America, he has taken cognizance of transactions in England and India, and in France, Spain and other parts of the continent; and the notes of himself and the Editor of the delightful volumes of his correspondence lend additional value to their contents. As we have already said, they are invaluable to us, as evincing a spirit of liberality and impartiality, which we know from experience is not always to be met with. From his eminence and talents we may regard him, so far, as the historian of his times, and his testimony and opinions will stand as an offset and corrective to those writers, who may espouse less liberal views. We have selected this one view of his writings as most akin to the Home-Spirit of our Journal and the patriotism of our people. But it may not be to many readers the most attractive one, and we assure them that they can not have a taste for which the versatility and variety of this noble author will not furnish abundance of gratification.

Notices of New Works.

WILEY & PUTNAM. NEW-YORK & LONDON, 1844.

REVOLUTIONARY ORDERS OF GENERAL WASHINGTON, issued during the years 1778, 1780, 1781, and '82. Selected from the MSS. of John Whiting, Lieut. and Adjutant of the 2nd Regiment Massachusetts line, and EDITED BY HIS SON, HENRY WHITING, Lieut. Col. U. S. Army.

Every thing that concerns Washington proves the consistency, the purity and grandeur of his character. Accustomed, as we are, to hold him in almost more than mortal reverence, whatever relates to him has a high value in our estimation, and we trust that his name is scarcely less embalmed in the hearts of others. But after the vast and valuable stores which have been preserved by a Marshall, a Sparks and others, more might reasonably be expected from any addition now made to them. It should not only be truly useful, but complete in itself. The Editor of the volume before us was aware of these things; and as long as he supposed that Mr. Sparks would make a volume out of the Revolutionary orders of General Washington, he forebore to publish the MSS. of his father. When Mr. Sparks had completed his "Life and Writings," and returned the MSS. in his possession to the Library at Washington, Col. Whiting made application for them, that his contemplated work might be rendered complete; but this he does not seem to have prosecuted with very great zeal; and not succeeding in procuring them, has determined to issue the volume before us. Like every thing else that relates to "the Father of his country" they show him to have been the best of the good and the wisest of the great. Nothing was too small for his attention, nor, as we think, too great for his comprehension. From the plan of a campaign on which might depend the fate of his country, down to the powdering of the hair of his soldiers, we find him carefully employed. The health and cleanliness of his army were no less attended to than its discipline and evolutions, and every thing, trifling or important, passed under his immediate supervision.

The matters of chief historic interest in the volume before us, are the celebrations of the alliance of France and of the birth of the Dauphin, General Green's order about Arnold after his treachery, Washington's order in relation to the Jersey Mutiny, and his thanks to Gen. Howe for his exertions in suppressing it, the annunciation of the actions of King's Mountain and the Cowpens, and of the rescue of Georgia from the hands of the enemy, and the trial of Gen. McDougall. There are other matters of curiosity and interest, which will repay the attention of the reader. In the following order issued in preparation for the celebration of the birth of the Dauphin, is a curious union of gallantry and attention to minutiae. The latter part reminds us of another invitation of Washington's to dinner, which is perhaps the most humorous thing in which he ever indulged.

"Head Quarters, Newburg,
Wednesday, May 29, 1782.

The troops are to be supplied with an extra gill of Rum per man to-morrow.

MEMORANDUM.

The Commander-in-Chief desires his compliments may be presented to the Officers' Ladies, with and in the neighborhood of the Army, together with a request that they will favor him with their company at dinner on Thursday next, at West Point. The General will be happy to see any other Ladies of his own or his friends' acquaintance, on the occasion, without the formality of a particular invitation."

Washington's firm reliance on Providence, which was the great secret of his success, shines forth in many of his orders, and vice, unofficer-like conduct, and gambling are deeply branded by his detestation and abhorrence,—pronouncing in several instances the punishments awarded to these offences entirely inadequate. The Editor thinks, and very justly, that his work will be useful as a book of precedents for the guidance of Courts-Martial; but herein its incompleteness must be again lamented. In style, type and paper, the work deserves particular commendation.

MAURY'S NAVIGATION; NATIONAL OBSERVATORY.

We have already spoken of the excellent treatise of Lieut. Maury in the terms to which its merits entitled it. But as our journal has long had more or less connection with the Navy, and is a quasi organ for its members, we now recur to the subject for the purpose of inviting attention to the following order from the Navy Department. This order has already been widely circulated: it was our intention to publish it sooner, but we have been prevented.

"GENERAL ORDER.

Navy Department, Sept. 4, 1844.

'Maury's Navigation' is hereby adopted as the Text Book of the Navy. Midshipmen are therefore required to make themselves well acquainted with at least so much of Mathematics, Nautical Astronomy and the other kindred branches of Navigation, as is therein contained.

Professors of Mathematics, and Boards for the examination of Midshipmen are charged with the execution of this order.

(Signed.)

J. Y. MASON."

The Hon. Mr. Mason has herein evinced a proper spirit towards the professional culture of the Midshipmen; and the most favorable results may be anticipated from erecting for them a proper standard of scientific attainment.

It is highly gratifying to learn that our National Observatory at Washington is now under the superintendence of Lieut. Maury. Independently of scientific qualifications, many other things are requisite for the proper management of such an establishment, and these seem to be united in him. We now look forward to this laudable institution accomplishing some of those important ends pointed out by President Garland, of Randolph Macon College, in his recent letter addressed to the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Gilmer. On the proper arrangement of the Observatory, the nice adjustment of the instruments so as to attain that accuracy, which a Mathematician, accustomed to weigh infinitesimal quantities and to lament almost infinitesimal errors, alone knows how to appreciate, and on the professional pride, zeal and industry of the superintendent, its usefulness and honor will mainly depend. Whilst these will make it best subserve the present purposes of its creation, they will commend it to the favor of the public and to the patronage of the government—and all will then be ready to unite in promoting the cause of Science and Literature, so honorably represented by the only Institution to which National pride can now offer its hopes and congratulations. Now is the time, in this period of overflowing abundance, for our nation to be generous in its offerings to Science. The time may come when public lands are almost exhausted; when a people averse to taxation and restive under more than necessary imposts for the support of Government, may deny to objects so general and so prospective in their blessings a fostering care which they can now so easily afford. Let our Congress be liberal—most liberal to Science and Arts, now in the day of superfluity. We feel entire confidence that the National Observatory which they have so nobly planted, will under the administration of Mr. Maury, best fulfil the wishes and expectations of its founders, and furnish a strong practical appeal to them for a continuance and enlargement of their patronage to it and kindred institutions.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Books for children constitute one of the most important and most difficult branches of Literature. By them life-impressions are made upon the youthful mind and heart; and the philosopher and philanthropist may both employ their most splendid efforts in seeking to give proper direction and control to those impressions. It is most lamentably true that many works put into the hands of children greatly pervert their minds. A short time since, one of the English Quarterly Reviews had a long leading article upon children's books, which might well command the attention of parents and instructors. The Messrs. Appleton have recently issued very beautiful editions of Puss in Boots, and MARY HOWITT'S PICTURE AND VERSE BOOK, which they have kindly sent us through Drinker and Morris. Upon these the public judgment has already been awarded. We have in our possession a very beautiful unpublished work, written by a lady of Virginia, for children, entitled THE SOUTHERN HOME, from which we may give a few extracts in order to introduce it to the attention of the public. Its sentiments are pure, its style attractive and its contents entertaining and instructive, and illustrative of our Southern manners. We hope to see the work published.

JOHN S. TAYLOR & Co. New-York, 1844.

Messrs. Perkins, Harvey & Ball have kindly sent us the following works, but they arrived too late for any thing more than a mere announcement. Any thing else, however, is rendered entirely useless by the reputation of the authors, and by previous notices which we have taken of many of them.

Personal Recollections. Letters from Ireland.
Floral Biography. Principalities and Powers.
Helen Fleetwood. The Wrongs of Woman.
The Siege of Derry. Judah's Lion.
 All by CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH.

SERMONS. By HUGH BLAIR, D. D. With a life of the Author by James Finlayson, D. D.

PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE.

We are indebted to Mr. Hewet for No.'s 22, 23 and 24 of this rich work—finishing Lear and commencing Cymbeline, which deserves to be more read than it generally is. Mr. H. proposes also to publish a very splendid edition of the "Tales from Shakespeare," by Charles and Miss Lamb. These will be a useful and appropriate companion of the pictorial work and will deserve and no doubt receive an equally wide circulation.

MAGAZINES.

Western Literary Journal, Cincinnati, Ohio. Edited by E. Z. C. Judson and L. A. Hine. 3 sheets. 8vo. $3 per annum.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of the first No. of this new work, which bids fair for usefulness and fame.

Graham's American Monthly has just completed its volume and makes a bold push for 1845. The Editor promises every thing and we bear full testimony to his energy and enterprise.

The Southwestern Law Journal and Reporter. Nashville, Tennessee. Edited by Milton A. Haynes, $2 50. We commend this work to the patronage of the legal profession, particularly in the West and South-West.

BLACKWOOD, J. Gill, agent.

This sterling Magazine for the month of October has been sent us by Leonard Scott & Co. The articles are excellent. "The great drought" is a thrilling conception and absorbs every thought and feeling of the reader. After perusing it, one feels almost covetous of water. The thirsty sufferer converts diamonds worth perhaps millions of dollars, a few weeks before, into only a few drops of water, to preserve his famishing wife and children.

ADDRESSES, PAMPHLETS, &c.

A great many of these have been received, for which no specific acknowledgment can be made. But in closing a volume we desire to present our sincere thanks to their authors and other donors respectively.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have had under consideration for several months a reply from Lieut. G. H. Talcott, to the remarks of a Subaltern in the June No. of the Messenger. But we must decline publishing it, because of the severe language employed.

The following are respectfully declined; "A Poem on Texas," by "C."; "Constance Devereux;" "Musings;" "The Doomed One;" "Slavery in the United States"—the writer has been anticipated by several articles recently published; "Memorial of Greenough's Statue to Congress"—we heartily concur with the writer in his indignant appeal, but think his mode of making it inappropriate; "Fredericksburg"—too local and individual.

The following will appear; "Love Sketches;" "Harbor Defence by Fortifications and Steam Vessels," &c.; "Perseverando, from the French of Victor Hugo;" Review of Barry Cornwall's Songs; "Acrostic;" "Marementis"—we are sorry is misplaced and not yet recovered; "Scenes Abroad." The addenda to Young England too late for insertion. We shall hereafter collect and publish some historical materials relating to Virginia. We have an old and important document already in hand.

The following are received and under consideration; "Dora, or the Spirit of Lake George;" "The City of Charleston before the Revolution;" "Thought in Spring;" "Farewell of the Mariner to his Love;" "Recollection;" "The Ascension;" "Guy and the Dragon;" "The Coming of the Mammoth;" "Night;" "Autumn," by T. H. C.; "The Morning Song of the Mocking bird;" "The Angel of the weary heart;" "When, where and how to die;" "A Ballad;" Mrs. Nichols' Poems; Poems of E. B. H., and "The Stranger;" "La Tortola."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

We have to acknowledge the receipt, but too late for notice, of Anthon's Homer and other recent publications of Harper & Brothers and Lea & Blanchard—all through Messrs. Drinker & Morris, who offer them for sale.

MR. F. W. THOMAS will please accept our thanks for his poem, the Beech-nut Tree. We shall recur to it and some of the works above alluded to.

Several pages are on the cover.
